Billage v. Southee, 9 Hare 534; 10 Eng. L. & Eq. 37; 16 Jur. 188, where a bill was filed seeking to restrain the defendant from proceeding to recover the amount of a promissory note for £325, on two grounds: first, that the plaintiff had signed it in the belief that it was for £25 only; second, that it was given by the plaintiff, the patient, to his medical attendant, on the occasion of an accession of fortune to the family of the patient, without any account delivered, and for an amount more than would be due for medical attendance on the most extravagant scale of charges. As to the second ground of relief, the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration that the note should stand as a security only for the amount due for medical attendance on the plaintiff, although the case of the plaintiff, as to the first ground of relief sought by his bill, was wholly disproved. Turner, Vice Chancellor, in his opinion, said: "No part of the jurisdiction of the court is more useful than that which it exercises in watching and controlling transactions between persons standing in a relation of confidence to each other."

It is said 'that he intended to be liberal,' but intention imports knowledge, and liberty imports the absence of influence. I see no evidence in this case either of knowledge or of the absence of influence; and where a gift is set up between parties standing in a confidential relation, the onus of establishing it by proof rests upon the party who has received the gift."

In Popham v. Brooke, 5 Russ. 8, where a patient, suffering from apoplexy and brain disease, scarcely able to talk, gave to the surgeon on board the vessel on which he had been voyaging, and under whose care he had been, an annuity of £100 for life, on consideration that the surgeon would live with him and attend him for life, it appeared that the patient had in all probability at the time the agreement was made only a short time to live, which fact was known to the surgeon, but so far as appeared, not known to the patient. It was held that the agreement was void.

Cadwallader v. West, 48 Mo. 497, where a patient who was aged, feeble, deaf, and of very weak mind, transferred all his property to his attending physician, who had great influence over him and who lived with him, for a very inadequate consideration—a provision for a support for life being the consideration recited—it was held that the transaction should be set aside. Currier, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "The presumption that West exerted an undue influence over Cadwallader's mind in procuring the deed, springs out of the relations which they sustained towards each other, and is intensified by the circumstances of Cadwallader's mental and physical condition. . . . It has been repeatedly declared by learned chancellors that the mere relation of patient and medical adviser is sufficient to avoid the contracts of the former made with the latter during the continuance of such relation." But see Doggett v. Lane, 12 Mo. 215.

physically or mentally weak or diseased, contracts of this nature present many questions of actual undue influence.¹ They are subject to the usual rules as to influence of this kind.²

The law in regard to gifts is the same as that governing contracts. There is a presumption against the validity of donations from a patient to his medical adviser, but it is rebutted in much the same manner as in the case of other transactions,³ although it is of course harder to overcome.⁴ Independent advice is generally, but not universally, held not indispensable, although a most important fact to be established.⁵ Any evidence which shows that the influence presumed, did not in fact exist, is sufficient.⁶

The above statement of the law is that deducible from the majority of the cases. Some courts, however, have held contrariwise, that the relation in question is not one from which influence is presumed, and that its existence is merely a circumstance tending, in connection with other evidence, to establish the facts of actual undue influence.⁷ These authorities are, however,

2. Dent v. Bennett, 4 Myl. & C. 269, where a medical attendant obtained from his patient, who was eighty-five years of age, an agreement to pay him £25,000 for services completed two years before, the regular charge for which had been previously paid, it being done privately, without the intervention of any third person, and concealed until after the death of the patient. In holding the agreement void, Lord Chancellor Cottenham said: "The relief, as Sir S. Romilly says in his reply in Huguenin v. Basely (14 Ves. 273), 'stands upon a general principle, applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another,' and when I find an agreement so extravagant in its provisions, secretly obtained by a medical attendant from his patient of a very advanced age, and carefully concealed from his professional advisers and all other persons, and have it proved that the habits, views and intentions of the testator were wholly inconsistent with those provisions, I cannot but come to the conclusion, that the medical attendant did obtain it by some dominion exercised over his patient."

3. In Gibson v. Russell, 2 Y. & C. N. C. C. 115, where a deed of gift of real estate from an aged and infirm person of weak mind, and subject to insane delusions, to his intimate friend and medical attendant, was set aside for fraud and undue influence, one of the circumstances in the proof being that the deed stated, contrary to the truth, a money consideration of £1,000, the decision of the court proceeded upon the ground that there was both actual undue influence, and also influence presumed from the relation of the parties.

Pratt v. Barker, 1 Sim. 1; 4 Russ. 507, where a voluntary deed was executed by an old and infirm man in favor of a person who had attended him as a surgeon, and secured dividends of certain stock for him. As it was proven that the donor understood the nature of the debt, and had the deed read over and explained to him, and had independent advice, the court refused to set it aside.

(2) Who is a Physician.—Like the term “attorney,” that of “physician” has a broad meaning. It is, as elsewhere used in the law, defined as “one lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine.”² As here used, its meaning is even wider. We must look to the fact of the relation, rather than to its legality. The rules above enunciated apply to the relation of patient to physician,³ surgeon,⁴ dentist,⁵ and to any other who as a fact practises the art of healing in any of its branches, whether a regularly licensed practitioner or not.

As to the time during which the prima facie disqualification lasts, the same principles apply as in case of attorney and client.⁶

c. CLERGYMAN AND PARISHIONER.—The relation of clergyman and parishioner is generally considered as raising a presumption of undue influence, in case of contracts between the parties, or gifts to the former from the latter, the presumption being of the same nature, and rebuttable by the same evidence as that arising in like transactions between physician and patient.⁷ The rule is not so generally established as in that case, however, of age, very wealthy, infirm, and confined to his house, although of sound mind and judgment. On a suit brought by the executors of the patient to set aside the transaction, the court, affirming the judgment of the court below (33 Leg. Int. 82; 11 Phila. 183), held that the physician could defend by showing that the transfer of the stock was by way of gift, and not for the consideration stated; that a physician is not prevented from receiving a donation from his patient by reason of the relation between them, and that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show fraud and undue influence, and not upon the physician to clear the transaction of the taint of unfairness. It was held that the draft must be surrendered.

Contracts.—Pironi v. Corrigan, 47 N. J. Eq. 135, where the defendant, a Catholic priest, promised to secure a divorce for a lady from her husband, if she would settle certain property on him. She agreed to the proposition, and made the settlement. An action was brought to have the transaction set aside. The court, in granting the prayer of the bill, held that when confidential relations exist between two persons, resulting in one having influence over the other, and a business transaction takes place between them, and high authorities have repudiated it, holding that there is no presumption of law from the fact of the relationship, which is important only as bearing upon the question of actual undue influence.¹ The more general doctrine is believed, however, to be that first stated.

It is immaterial whether the influence be exerted in favor of giving a benefit to the person in the position of influence, the law raises a presumption against the transaction, and casts upon the person benefited the burden of proving that the confidential relations had been, as to the transaction in question, suspended, and that it was fairly conducted, the parties dealing at arms' length. In this connection independent advice is a most important factor.

Gifts.—The leading authority is Huguein v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 406, where certain instruments were executed in favor of the spiritual adviser of a widow, who had induced her to discharge her solicitor and put her affairs in his hands. The settlements, which were voluntary, were set aside on account of the undue influence presumed from the relation of the parties. The court, by Lord Chancellor Eldon, said: "Repeating therefore, distinctly, that this court is not to undo voluntary deeds, I represent the question thus—whether she executed these instruments, not only voluntarily, but with that knowledge of all their effect, nature, and consequences, which the defendants, Baseley and the attorney, were bound by their duty to communicate to her, before she was suffered to execute them. And though perhaps they were not aware of the duties which this court required from them in the situation in which they stood, where the decision rests upon the ground of public utility for the purpose of maintaining the principle, it is necessary to impute knowledge which the party may not actually have had. These parties, therefore, cannot possibly hold the benefit of these instruments."

Corrigan v. Pironi, 48 N. J. Eq. 607, which decided that a gift of a remainder in lands, reserving life use to a priest, the spiritual adviser of the donor, who was an aged, eccentric and illiterate Roman Catholic, will be set aside, where the donee fails to sustain the burden of proof, and to show that the donor knew the legal effect of the conveyance, and that she acted independ-

Ross v. Conway, 92 Cal. 632, which held that a gift by a dying person—especially if of weak mind—through the influence of a spiritual adviser, whether to such adviser or to a recipient who is made the beneficiary through his influence, will be set aside in equity without investigation of the extent of the influence, where the donor had no independent advice, and such adviser remained in the room during the interview of the donor with the only other person who was permitted to see her.

Caspari v. First German Church, 12 Mo. App. 293, where there was a gift disproportioned to her means, made by an aged widow, to a church at the solicitation of the pastor thereof, who was also the donor's spiritual and business adviser, without disinterested advice from others, upon the condition, subsequently repudiated by the donee, that she was to receive an interest therein during her life. It was held that a gift made through the solicitation of one sustaining confidential relations to the donor must be free from the least taint of fraud; that a presumption of fraud arises from the existence of confidential relations between the donor and donee, and that it is incumbent on a donee who sustains confidential relations to the donor to show that he had competent, disinterested advice. Hence a decree setting aside the gift was rendered.

1. Greenfield's Estate, 24 Pa. St. 240; Jackson v. Ashton, 11 Pet. (U. S.) 229, where a decree of the circuit court for the District of Pennsylvania dismissing a bill was affirmed. The bill sought to set aside a bond and mortgage made by a woman to a clergyman, on the ground that they were induced by undue influence. The court found that there was no actual influence. As to the contention of the complainant that it should be presumed from the relation of the parties, the court, by McLean, J., said: "But he is represented to have been her pastor. Some years before the

the clergyman himself or some third person, who receives a benefit from the transaction.¹

The religion or position of the clergyman is immaterial, the principle extending to contracts with priests,² ministers of the English established church,³ dissenting ministers,⁴ and pastors of different denominations in the United States.⁵

A similar rule makes voidable prima facie gifts from nuns to their convents.⁶ For the same reason, the presumption above

mortgage deed was signed, Mrs. Goodwin did belong to the church under the charge of the defendant; but this relation had ceased long before the death of Goodwin: but if this relation existed in fact, it is not charged in the bill. Does the profession of a clergyman subject him to suspicions which do not attach to other men? Is he presumed to be dishonest? It would, indeed, exhibit a most singular spectacle if this court, by its decision, should fix this stain on the character of a class of men who are generally respected for the purity of their lives, and their active agency in the cause of virtue. They are influential, it is true; but their influence depends upon the faithfulness and zeal with which their sacred duties are performed. Acquainted, as we are, with the imperfections of our nature, we can not expect to find any class of men exempt from human infirmities. But why should the ministers of the gospel, who, as a class, are more exemplary in their lives than any other, be unable to make a contract with those who know them best and love them most? Their influence, by precept and example, does more to reform the actions of men, and restrain their vicious inclinations, than all the institutions of society. And yet we are called upon to denounce this whole class, and hold them incapable of making a contract with those who are under their pastoral charge, and who, like Mrs. Goodwin, are distinguished for their piety. Why not give them the same measure of right which is enjoyed by others? If any minister should become a traitor to his master, and disgrace his high and holy calling by using, for fraudulent purposes, his influence over the weak or unwary, the law affords a remedy; and the proceedings in this case show that the disposition will not be wanting to bring him to an account."

1. Ford v. Hennessy, 70 Mo. 580, where the facts were as follows: One F., a few days before his death, gave all his money, and made a will devising his other property to one H., a Roman Catholic priest who had for six years been his father confessor and pastor, and had visited him repeatedly, as such, during an illness of a year preceding his death. No relative of F. was with him during this time, and he had no advice from any other source. F. lived as a single man, and sometimes, though not always, represented himself to be single. H. had heard, however, that he had a wife without the country. He, however, made no inquiry to ascertain the fact, and never suggested to F. that he ought to provide for her. H. gave the money to the archbishop of the church, who gave it to a convent. In an action by the representatives of the donor against H., the archbishop and the convent, to set aside the gift and recover the money, it was held that it was the duty of H., before accepting the gift, to have investigated and satisfied himself, either that F. had no family, or that he was determined to disregard its members. H. had not done this, and the gift could not stand. The fact that he had no selfish motive, and received no personal benefit from the transaction, was immaterial. See also Ross v. Conway, 92 Cal. 632; Caspari v. First German Church, 12 Mo. App. 293.

f. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—(See AGENCY, vol. I, p. 331).—Not only do the relations of trustees and professional men to those for whom they perform their services give rise to presumptions of undue influence, but the doctrine extends further, and embraces transactions between the parties to the ordinary relationship of principal and agent.² The rules as to them are the same nun, and assigns all her property in trust for the benefit of a Roman Catholic congregation, the assignment is good, and the court or her petitioner will order the payment of the fund assigned to the trustees. This case is criticised in an article in 10 Jur. N. S., pt. 2, p. 91, where it is said: "It seems to be clear, that if a nun were to make a gift of her property to her convent, she or her representatives might have such deed set aside upon the ground of undue influence, the exercise of which the court of chancery, taking into consideration the vows she had taken and the circumstances under which she was placed, would, according to the principles upon which it ordinarily acts, undoubtedly presume."

1. Lyon v. Home L. R., 6 Eq. 655, where a widow aged seventy-five, within a few days after seeing one who claimed to be a spiritualist medium, through belief that she was fulfilling the wishes of her deceased husband, made an irrevocable gift to him of £30,000 and an estate in remainder subject to her life interest of £30,000. The gift was set aside. In this case there was also actual fraud inferred, from the fact that the medium translated rappings to mean that the widow's late husband wished her to adopt the medium as her son, and make him independent for life.

Nottidge v. Prince, 2 Giff. 246, where a gift was made by a person of weak intellect, of her whole fortune, to a person who had acquired great influence over her mind, by making her and others believe that he sustained a supernatural character. It was held to be invalid on the ground that no person who stands in a relation of special confidence to another, so as to acquire habitual influence over his mind, can accept any gift or benefit from the person who is under the dominion of that influence, unless a sufficient protection has been interposed against the exercise of such influence.

Am. St. Rep. 84, the facts were as follows: J was seventy-two years old, feeble both mentally and physically. He was a firm believer in spiritualism. Shortly after the death of his wife, he consulted the plaintiff as a medium, and afterward settled a sum of money on her. It was held that the settlement was voidable, because of the existence of a relation of peculiar trust and confidence between them, similar to that between a religious devotee and his spiritual adviser, and the proof of which would throw upon the plaintiff the burden of showing fair dealing, which requirement of the law had not been satisfied.

Leighton v. Orr, 44 Iowa 679, where one W lived for years in unlawful cohabitation with a woman who claimed to be a spiritualistic medium, and to have daily communication with his deceased wife, whose memory he greatly revered. During this time she acquired great influence, and had great control over him in business affairs. At the same time, he was in the habit of indulging considerably in the use of alcoholic liquors. Before his death, he conveyed large portions of his property to this "medium" for the consideration of one dollar and friendship. It was held that the conveyances should be set aside, on the ground that they were procured by undue influence.

2. Perry on Trusts (4th ed.), § 206; Beach's Modern Eq. Jur., § 125; Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (2d ed.), § 959, where it is said, his words being quoted with approval in Rochester v. Levering, 104 Ind. 569: "In any contract of purchase or sale with the principal, or other transaction by which the agent obtains a benefit, a presumption arises against its validity which the agent must overcome. . . . The mere fact that a reasonable consideration is paid and that no undue advantage is taken, is not of itself sufficient. Any unfairness, any underhanded dealing, any use of knowledge not communicated to the principal, any lack of the perfect good faith which equity requires, renders the transaction voidable, so that it will be set aside at the option of the principal. If, on the other hand, the agent imparted all his own knowledge concerning the matter, and advised his principal with candor and disinterestedness, as though he himself were a stranger to the bargain, and paid a fair price, and the principal on his side acted with full knowledge of the subject-matter of the transaction, and of the person with whom he was dealing, and gave full and free consent—if all these are affirmatively proved—the presumption is overcome, and the transaction is valid. These general doctrines are applied under every variety of circumstance and to every kind of transaction." See also Condit v. Blackwell, 22 N. J. Eq. 486; Burke v. Taylor, 94 Ala. 530.

McHarry v. Irvin, 85 Ky. 342, where a decree dismissing a petition to set aside a deed procured by an agent of his principal through fraud and undue influence was reversed. The conveyance was by a widow to her son-in-law, who as her agent had charge of her affairs. It was procured for an inadequate consideration, without the communication of material facts. The court, by Lewis, J., said: "The doctrine is too well settled to need a reference to authorities, that 'contracts between principal and agent should be jealously scrutinized, and slight circumstances of inequality, surprise and hardship may be sufficient to vacate them even sometimes without proof of fraud.' . . . The relation of parent and child is, of course, to be always considered in determining, as a question of fact, whether a gift or bounty from one to the other has been unfairly obtained; for the same implication or presumption of undue influence or fraud does not arise in such case as when the parties are strangers, and the relation of principal and agent exists. But there is no reason for a rule, nor is there a rule, which will enable a son-in-law, who is her agent, to profit by a gift or purchase obtained from his mother-in-law by undue influence or fraud, or exempt him from the consequences thereof, if the fact be established by proof."

Rochester v. Levering, 104 Ind. 562, where a confidential agent to sell a tract of land, purchased it himself, having communicated fully and correctly all the facts of which he had notice about the tract and its value, and having made no misrepresentations, and the price being not manifestly inadequate. The court upheld the transaction, on the ground that, although it was presumptively invalid, the agent had sustained the burden of proving its fairness.

Rep. 243, where a sale of a principal's land to one interested jointly with the principal's agent, the agent not having disclosed the relation of the parties and other material facts, was avoided. Gifts.—Le Gendre v. Byrnes, 44 N. J. Eq. 372, where a daughter, who acted as the confidential business agent of her mother, who was old and feeble, received from her a gift of real estate of the value of $40,000, of which property she had the charge, and had collected the rents. The daughter withheld the deed from record until after the mother's death. In a suit to set aside the conveyance, a motion to dismiss the bill was denied. The court, by Van Fleet, V. C., said: "Whether we say the defendant, at the time she obtained title, was simply the agent of her mother, or stood in a relation to her mother where she was subject to higher duties and greater responsibilities than those of an agent, is, in my judgment, of no importance whatever. As agent simply, she was bound, in all her dealings with her mother, to practise toward her mother the utmost good faith. The law on this subject is settled beyond question, and rests upon the highest considerations of justice and safety. An agent is bound to serve his principal to the best of his skill, knowledge, ability, and judgment. The law, to prevent him from being tempted to betray his principal, will not allow him to place his interests in conflict with those of his principal, and if, in any case, this rule be violated, the agent, in order to keep what he has obtained, must show that, in the particular transaction, he served his as those governing contracts and gifts between trustee and cestui que trust, with the exception that, as the confidence reposed and the inequality between the parties are less, the presumptions are more readily overcome.¹ As in the previous instances, the rules proceed out of the great principle that one may not serve himself, while serving another, in such a way as to injure that other.²

The rule is most strictly applied where there is a dealing concerning the very subject-matter of the agency,³ but is not confined to such transactions, the only restriction being that the subject must be such that there will be naturally an influence arising out of the relation.⁴ Whether such an agency exists as will disqualify the agent, is a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances of the case.⁵ While a special agency to perform some defined duty will not prevent the agent from contracting with his principal, in respect to matters totally dis-principal, against himself, with the same fidelity that he would have been required to use against a third person.

. . . If an agent obtains from his principal, the title to lands of which he has charge for his principal, and the validity of his title is subsequently assailed, he must, even in a case where he has given a consideration, in order to maintain his title, show affirmatively that there was no undue influence exercised, no advantage taken, and no imposition practised. . . . Now, I think, the facts stated in the bill demonstrate, beyond dispute, that the parties to the transaction under review did not deal on terms of equality. On the one side there were weakness, dependence, and trust, and on the other there was a person in a position of influence, where she could practice fraud with ease and with little danger of detection. Besides, the transaction on its face renders it highly probable that all was not fair, open, voluntary, and well understood. The gift was a very large one, amounting in value to at least $40,000. The fact that the evidence of it was concealed until after the death of the donor, or rather withheld from the public records, where a prudent grantee, under ordinary circumstances, would have placed it very soon after getting it, if not a strong badge of fraud, is a circumstance which, I think, the complainants have a right to have explained in a judicial proceeding."

Todd v. Grove, 33 Md. 191, where a gift from a principal to an agent was set aside, the agent not having sustained the burden of proving the fairness of the transaction, and the knowledge and free agency of the donor.

connected therewith,¹ yet, if the circumstances show that an influence in fact probably exists, the rule will be applied with full vigor. The burden of establishing the agency is on the one alleging it.²

The fact that the principal stands in a relation in loco parentis to the agent, is a fact which may be shown to help rebut the presumption of undue influence, but is not conclusive upon that point.³

Independent advice is not generally regarded as necessary to the validity of the transaction.⁴

Some authorities have not extended the doctrine of presumptive undue influence to the case of gifts from principal to agent. They lay down the rule that equity will closely scrutinize such donations, but that the burden of proof is upon those seeking to set them aside. They draw a distinction between the technical relations of confidence—those already treated—and the more in formal relations, considering that, in regard to the former, influence in case of gifts is presumed; while in the latter, it must be proven.⁵ The Supreme Court of the United States has greatly narrowed the domain of presumptive undue influence in this regard. In case of principal and agent, it has not only not directly recognized it, but has used an expression which would seem to imply that it does not hold the doctrine of the majority of the courts.⁶

674, the rule is laid down as follows by the court, speaking by Harlan, J.: "The agent is bound to act with absolute good faith toward the principal in respect to every matter intrusted to his care and management. In accepting a gift from his principal, he is under obligation to withhold no information in his possession respecting the subject of the gift, or the condition of the estate in his hands, which good faith requires to be disclosed, or that may reasonably influence the judgment of the principal in making the gift. All transactions between them, whereby the agent derives an advantage beyond legitimate compensation for his services, will be closely scrutinized by courts of equity, and set aside if there be any ground to suppose that he has abused the confidence reposed in him." The decision of the case sheds no clear light on the question. The court found that the donor had acted independently, deliberately, and with knowledge, and hence upheld the gift. In the opinion of the court below—Speer, J., 25 Fed.

exercise of undue influence as that existing between husband and wife. Owing, however, to the common-law disabilities of married women, the older cases do not present many instances of the application of the rules governing their transactions with their husbands.

At common law, the existence of the wife was merged in that of her husband.¹ She could make no contract with him,² and none—save as his agent and in his name—with third parties.³ Her contracts were, however, recognized in equity, although to a limited extent.⁴ Under the modern statutes, which give to married women, to a great extent, the rights and subject them to the liabilities of a feme sole, the scope of their contracts with their husbands has largely increased.⁵ In our discussion of the subject, we shall presuppose that the contracts in question are valid—by statute or otherwise—if freely made, and shall consider the effect of the influence of the husband—how it may be proved to actually exist, when it is presumed, and how the presumption of the law may be rebutted.

Under the head of actual undue influence, it may be said that it is always competent to show the relation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances, and that in case the contracting parties sustain to each other the relation of husband and wife, and the agreement is such as to operate to the advantage of the former, equity will most closely scrutinize the transaction, and will set it aside upon evidence which might be insufficient were the parties in no confidential relation to each other.⁶ This prin-

In Witbeck v. Witbeck, 25 Mich. 439, a conveyance of land on an inadequate consideration from a wife to her husband was set aside, it appearing that it was made in order to preserve family peace, and through the influence of the husband. The court, by Campbell, J., said: "The law certainly does not prevent persons in this confidential relation from doing, without urgency, of their own accord and under the natural impulses of kindness and affection, such generous acts as are the results of mutual confidence and good will. But the same principle which encourages confidence, protects it by preventing any profit to be gained from abusing it. The law recognizes the fact that a married woman is easily subjected to a ciple is independent of any presumption, and is universally recognized. Nearly all courts, however, go farther than this, and bring the matter in line with the decisions as to agreements between other parties to fiduciary relationship, viz. : that a presumption of undue influence exerted by the husband arises which is rebuttable by proof of the fairness of the transaction, full understanding and free agency on the part of the wife, and that there was no fraud, concealment, or imposition on the part of the husband.¹

The rule embraces not only transactions between the parties, but applies to contracts made by the wife which operate to the benefit of a third party. If such a transaction results from the undue influence of the other party to the marriage relation, it will be voidable.² The fact of whether or not the wife duly and regularly acknowledged a conveyance, is always a material fact, and strong evidence tending to disprove undue influence.³ The same principle as to ratification and confirmation after disability removed applies to contracts voidable through abuse of their relation as to other voidable transactions.⁴

species of coercion, very much more effectual than any ordinary operation of fear or fraud from strangers. It has always been found necessary to examine jealously into all transactions whereby the husband gets an advantage over the wife, not plainly spontaneous on her part. Any undue advantage gained by the use of the marital relation, is a legal fraud on the wife, which courts of equity will not allow to stand to her prejudice." But see Shelby v. Burtis, 18 Tex. 644, which held that where it appeared that a wife had mortgaged her property for the benefit of her husband, through an appeal to her sympathy, but not through any coercion that took away her free agency, the transaction should stand.

In Hadden v. Larned, 87 Ga. 635, loans had been made to a husband on the strength of land conveyed to him by his wife, which land was afterward levied on, in execution of a judgment against the husband. To the claim set up by the wife, that she never parted freely with the property, the court said, as the wife had executed this deed, and solemnly acknowledged the same, it was in conflict with all the analogies of the law to treat it as prima facie void, before any fact whatever tending to impeach it had been introduced, and that, though wives were to be protected against undue influence, it was of equal importance that honest creditors should be protected against wily husbands.

4. Kelly on Contracts of Married Women, p. 125.

(b) Gifts.—(See also GIFTS, vol. 8, p. 1308). — Gifts between husband and wife were void at common law, but valid in equity.¹

When made by the wife to the husband, they are jealously regarded by the courts,² and presumptions attach, similar to those in case of contracts between the parties.³ While it is not necessary to interpose a trustee,⁴ nor that the donor have independent advice,⁵ it must appear that the transfer of property was made freely, voluntarily, understandingly, and with the intention of granting a benefit to the donee.⁶ The husband must have done everything in his power to see that his wife understood the nature and value of the property, and must show affirmatively that he exerted no pressure upon her.⁷

The same principles apply to gifts induced by the husband in favor of third persons as if in his own favor.⁸ The property given

2. In Dolliver v. Dolliver, 94 Cal. 642, it was held that a conveyance of property by a wife to her husband, obtained by means of moral pressure, through the existence of divorce proceedings against the wife, she having no counsel, should be set aside. See also Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 446.

5. Kelly on Contracts of Married Women, p. 137; Dolliver v. Dolliver, 94 Cal. 642. But independent advice is an important fact. Thus, where a woman of sixty-five executed a deed in favor of her husband, who was but twenty-six, which disinherited a son by a former marriage and also a grandson, it was held that, there being no evidence of weakness of mind or body and the presence of independent advice being shown, the gift was valid. Ravens v. Nau, 110 Mo. 416.

7. Boyd v. De La Montagnie, 73 N. Y. 503; 29 Am. Rep. 197, which holds that in gifts from a wife to her husband, the burden is upon the husband to show that the gift was fair and proper. Hence, where a wife gratuitously transferred real property to her husband in order to delay parties to whom she wrongly believed she was indebted, such belief being induced by the husband, although there was no evidence of fraud, the conveyance was set aside, and it was held no defense that the transfer was made to defraud creditors, the plea of particeps criminis being allowed only where the parties stand upon an equal footing.

Where a woman, soon after her marriage, conveyed her property, on a nominal consideration, at the request of her husband, to a third party, who immediately thereafter conveyed the same to the husband, it was held that the deed might be avoided if, in the words of the court, speaking by Trunkay, J., there is no "affirmative evidence that it was the purpose of that woman, free from her husband's undue influence, to give him the land, and that his conduct was fair and conscionable." It is immaterial that the certificate of acknowledgment is in due form. Darlington's Appeal, 86 Pa. St. 512.

The same presumptions apply in case of dealings between husband and wife as in those between attorney and client, guardian and ward, and trustee and cestui que trust. Meldrum v. Meldrum, 15 Colo. 478; Witbeck v. Witbeck, 25 Mich. 439. But see Jones v. Gorham, 90 Ky. 622, where it was held that proof that a wife had conveyed her property to a trustee to be transferred to her husband, with the understanding and upon the agreement that the husband should make his will in her favor, is not sufficient so to justify a court in setting the deed aside as procured by the exercise of undue influence.

8. In Edwards v. Bowden, 107 N. Car. 58, where a wife, sick in bed, was threatened with abandonment by her husband, and her husband was also threatened with unlawful prosecution if she did not sign a deed of mortgage, and she signed the same under these must be that of the wife; that it stands in her name is not necessarily conclusive on this point.¹

The influence is presumed to exist so long as the relation continues. The law will not permit an inquiry into the question of whether or not confidence and trust are in fact reposed. It is immaterial even, that proceedings for divorce are pending.²

(2) Exerted Upon the Husband.—While the familiar instances of undue influence are those where advantage is taken of the wife, the rule works in both ways, and transactions may be avoided on the ground of undue influence exerted by the wife upon the husband. There is naturally no presumption of its existence, but it may be inferred from circumstances.³ In certain cases, a presumption of undue influence arises, not from the relation of the parties, but from weakness of mind or some other circumstance, the marital relation being incidental and not essential to it.⁴

(3) Similar Relations.—Not only do the rules above stated apply when persons occupy the relation of husband and wife, but they extend to relations which, though differing widely from them in other regards, are like them in so far as there is in them the same element of influence.

In Holt v. Agnew, 67 Ala. 371, the appellant (Mrs. Holt) assigned certain policies of insurance on her husband's life to satisfy demands on her husband for money which he had embezzled. She expressed her willingness to make the assignments without solicitation or persuasion, or any allusion to the prosecution of her husband, and other facts showed that she acted freely and voluntarily. Her suit to set aside the assignment was not sustained.

1. In Allen v. Drake, 109 Mo. 626, where a husband, who had settled an ample amount upon his wife, of which he kept a separate account, managing it as her trustee, purchased property with his own funds, and assumed an incumbrance upon it, but took title in her name and subsequently she conveyed it to him, acknowledging the deed separate and apart, it was held that the conveyance could not be avoided.

2. Dolliver v. Dolliver, 94 Cal. 648.

3. In Turner v. Turner, 44 Mo. 535, the plaintiff, on his marriage to the defendant, had purchased land, and at her desire, request, and importunity, had permitted the deeds to be taken in her name. Subsequent events showed that the husband had been made the victim of a deliberate attempt by a faithless wife, in conjunction with guilty confederates, to wrest from him all his property. The court considered that a wife in whom her husband reposed confidence, might well be able to exert an influence on his mind and obtain the title to property in her own name. If she should exercise this influence with a design of despoiling her husband, and then abandoning him, the husband would be entitled to redress. Hence a demurrer to a bill setting up the above facts was overruled.

In Ximines v. Smith, 39 Tex. 49, it was held that a transfer of notes from a husband to his wife, given her on consideration that she would continue to live with him as his wife, she having threatened desertion, was voidable, there being no consideration, and the transaction not being a voluntary gift.

According to this view—which is, perhaps, the more logical and tends most strongly to make systematic the law upon these subjects—the presumptions usual in confidential relations

In Gilmore v. Gilmore, 7 Oregon 374, a suit was brought to set aside a deed made by a woman to the man to whom she was engaged to be married, and by whom she was pregnant. The deed was ordered canceled. The court, by Boise, J., said: "The law seems to be well settled that when one occupies a confidential or fiduciary relation to another, as that of guardian and ward, attorney and client, and the like, where the donee or grantee is supposed to exercise an unusual and commanding influence over the grantor, courts will set aside the conveyance, unless the grantee can show that the transaction was fair, and without fraud and undue influence. It is laid down as a rule that the influence of a man over a woman to whom he is engaged to be married, is presumed to be so great, that the court will look with great vigilance at the circumstances and the situation of the parties, and will not only consider the influence which the intended husband, either by soothing or violence, may have used, but require satisfactory evidence that it has not been used to sustain such a conveyance."

The above principles apply to releases executed at the time of marriage. See Shea's Appeal, 121 Pa. St. 319, where a woman had released on the day of her marriage all her expectant interest in the estate of her husband. On his death she brought a bill against his estate claiming dower. Her bill was sustained on the ground that she had previously very positively refused to execute such a contract, and that it was not shown that she had changed her mind at the time. The burden of proof of the free execution of the release being on those setting it up, the court held that from the relation of the parties the ordinary inference of consent did not arise. Consent was not affirmatively shown, and the plaintiff's claim was sustained. The court, by Green, J., said, that the law "will require, when the husband claims a benefit arising from any such dealings, that it be shown affirmatively that he acted in perfect good faith and took no advantage of his influence or knowledge, and that whatever contracts he made were fair, adequate, and equitable." 2. Perry on Trusts (4th ed), § 210; Bivins v. Jarnigan, 3 Baxt. (Tenn.) 282; Muller v. Buyck, 12 Mont. 354. It has been held that in the case of gifts by a man to his mistress, there is a presumption against validity which the donee must overcome by proving affirmatively that the donation was not the result of undue influence. Hanna v. Wilcox, 53 Iowa 547.

A man, whose mind and body were against validity arise and are rebuttable by the same evidence; the transactions are regarded as voidable until affirmative proof of free agency, full knowledge, and good faith is produced.¹ This is the general doctrine of the English courts,² and is supported by high authority in the United States.

Many courts and text-writers of the highest position, however, decline to extend the principle thus far, considering that, while the influence is naturally great, it is not so controlling in its nature as that existing in the case of parties to the marriage relation, and that there is at least a probability in any given case that the weak by dissipation, gave all his property to a prostitute with whom he had been living. The court held that in such a case the transaction should be viewed with such suspicion by a court of equity as to cast on the donee the burden of proving that the donation was the result of free volition, and was not induced by fraud or undue influence, and in this case the deed was set aside. Shipman v. Furniss, 69 Ala. 555; 44 Am. Rep. 528.

M. & G. 137, which held that a gift for life from a daughter to her father of three fifths of her property in possession, made a few months after majority, will be set aside, even if reasonable under all the circumstances, and if the solicitor acted properly, and no fraud or deceit be shown, and there be no mistake, incapacity, or failure to understand the effect of the act and the value of the gift. The court, by Knight Bruce, L. J., said: "Upon the ground of the close attention, the strictness, and the jealousy with which, upon principles of natural justice and upon considerations important to the interests of society, the law of this country examines, scrutinizes, and, if I may borrow an old expression weighs in golden scales, every transaction between guardian and his ward or between a parent and his child, which, including or consisting of a gift from the younger to the elder, takes place soon after the termination of the legal authority, as that the ward or child may, in consequence, probably be—not in the largest and amplest sense of the term; not in mind as well as person—an entirely free agent."

In Davis v. Strange, 86 Va. 808, it was held that a reconveyance by a natural daughter to her father would be avoided in a case where he had deliberately conveyed to her the property in question as a gift, and after becoming feeble in body and mind, was induced by other members of his family to ask her for a reconveyance, which she gave without reflection, consultation, or advice, through sympathy for his distress, and urged by the family lawyer, who had told her that it would be best for her to do so, although he knew the fact, unknown to her, that her father's latest will had omitted all provisions for her which former wills contained. The court, by Fauntleroy, J., said, quoting from Bigelow on Fraud: "In respect of bounties by children in favor of their parents, it is for the parent—father or mother—to show that no advantage was taken of his or her influence or knowledge, and that the transaction was fair and conscionable. And the same is true of those standing in affection and influence in loco parentis."

In Whitridge v. Whitridge, 76 Md. 54, it was held that a deed of trust made by a girl of twenty-one, granting half of her estate to her father, if she should die without issue and he should survive her, and appointing him and another trustees under the deed, is prima facie valid, and if assailed by the grantor, must be shown by the trustees to have been her free, voluntary and unbiased act; and if new trustees have been appointed, the same duty falls upon them or the deed will fall. Berkmeyer v. Kellerman, 32 Ohio St. 239; 30 Am. Rep. 577; Noble v. Moses, 81 Ala. 530; 60 Am. Rep. 175; Ashton v. Thompson, 32 Minn. 25; Miller v. Simonds, 72 Mo. 669. ties of blood are strong and that no injustice is in fact done to the weaker party.¹ The cases taking this view state the law thus: that transactions between a parent and child will, in the interest of the latter, be closely and jealously scrutinized by the courts,² and will be avoided if slight circumstances of imposition appear, but that some positive evidence of undue influence is required. No presumptions of law against validity exist. Such is the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States and of many of the other American courts, as well as of a few of the English tribunals.³ According to this view, the court will consider all the

A father, having advanced to a child in his infancy, upon his coming of age, took a bond from him to a greater amount than the sums advanced and which the son was totally unable to pay. Lord Keeper Henly held that the bond was obtained by parental influence, and decreed that it should not stand as security for the sums advanced, but be set aside altogether. Carpenter v. Herriot, 1 Eden 338.

A daughter conveyed her real estate to her father immediately before her marriage, under a belief that she would be benefited by it, and that the property conveyed would become hers after the decease of her parents. She was influenced by the declarations and by the advice of her father, in whom she appears to have placed the most explicit confidence. The transaction was set aside, the court considering that a transaction attended by such circumstances would naturally excite the jealousy of a court of equity. Slocum v. Marshall, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 397; Georgia Code (1882), § 666.

3. In Jenkins v. Pye, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 241, an attempt was made to set aside the conveyance of property to a father by his daughter, for a nominal consideration. The daughter was twenty-three years of age. No undue influence was actually exerted. The bill was dismissed. The court, by Thompson, J., said: "But the grounds mainly relied upon to invalidate the deed were, that being from a daughter to her father, rendered it at least, prima facie, void. . . . The first ground of objection seeks to establish the broad principle that a deed from a child to a parent, conveying the real estate of the child, ought, upon considerations of public policy, growing out of the relation of the parties, to be deemed void; and numerous cases in the English chancery have been referred to, which are supposed to establish this principle. We do not deem it necessary to travel over all these authorities; we have looked into the leading cases, and cannot discover anything to warrant the broad and unqualified doctrine contended for on the part of the appellees. All the cases are accompanied with some ingredient, showing undue influence exercised by the parent, operating upon the fears or hopes of the child, and sufficient to show reasonable grounds to presume that the act was not perfectly free and voluntary on the part of the child; and in some cases, although there may be circumstances tending in some small degree to show undue influence, yet if the agreement appears reasonable, it has been considered enough to outweigh light circumstances, so as not to affect the validity of the deed. It becomes the less necessary for us to go into a critical examination of the English chancery doctrine on this subject, for should the cases be found to countenance it, we should not be disposed to adopt or sanction the broad principle contended for, that the deed of a child to a parent is to be deemed, prima facie, void. It is undoubtedly the duty of courts carefully to watch and examine the circumstances attending transactions of this kind, when brought under review before them, to discover if any undue influence has been exercised in obtaining the conveyance. But to consider a parent disqualified to take a voluntary deed from his child, without consideration, on account of their relationship, is assuming a principle at war with all filial as well as parental duty and affection, and acting on the presumption that a circumstances of the case, the presence or absence of outside advice,¹ the adequacy of the consideration, if a contract, or the intention to confer a voluntary benefit, if a gift,² the age of the parties, the knowledge of the son or daughter, and draw from them inferences of fact.³ A case of undue influence may be established by evidence that would be insufficient in a suit between parties who had dealt at arm's length.⁴ Gifts made shortly after attaining majority are most strictly regarded.⁵ The principle extends as well to dealings with illegitimate children as to those with the legitimate.⁶

(2) Exerted Upon the Parent.—As in the case of husband and wife, so in that of parent and child, transactions may also be avoided because of influence unduly exerted by the one who is more dependent upon the other.⁷ No presumptions of such influence, however, arise from the existence of the relation. It is established as an inference of fact only. Most of the decisions which seem to hold contrary to this rule only apparently do so, parent, instead of wishing to promote the interest and welfare, would be seeking to overreach and defraud his child; whereas, the presumption ought to be, in the absence of all proof tending to a contrary conclusion, that the advancement of the interest of the child was the object in view, and to presume the existence of circumstances conducing to that result. Such a presumption harmonizes with the moral obligations of a parent to provide for his child, and is founded upon the same benign principle that governs cases of purchases made by parents in the name of a child. The prima facie presumption is that it was intended as an advancement to the child, and so not falling within the principle of a resulting trust. The natural and reasonable presumption in all transactions of this kind is that a benefit was intended the child, because in the discharge of a moral and parental duty. And the interest of the child is abundantly guarded and protected, by keeping a watchful eye over the transaction, to see that no undue influence was brought to bear upon it."

In Taylor v. Taylor, 8 How. (U. S.) 183, a deed from a young woman, just of age, made without consideration, to a third party in trust for her parents with whom she lived, was set aside. The court affirmed Jenkins v. Pye, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 241, but, putting especial stress upon the principle that slight evidence of imposition is sufficient, gave the relief sought, on the ground that from the recital of false statements in the conveyance, and misrepresentation and pressure on the part of the parents, undue influence must be inferred.

The doctrine of these cases is ably criticised by Prof. Pomeroy on the following grounds: (1) the expressions are mainly obiter; (2) they are in conflict with the overwhelming weight of authority; (3) they are in conflict with principle; (4) the reasons supporting them are opposed to the common experience; (5) they have not been generally adopted by the American courts. 2 Pomeroy's Eq. the presumption arising from other circumstances, and the parental relation being only accidental.¹ Thus, while there are dicta and some cases to the contrary,² it may be taken as the generally accepted doctrine, that affirmative proof is necessary to set aside contracts between parent and child operating to the benefit of the latter, and gifts from the former to the latter.³ The courts generally regard such dealings as rather to be favored than condemned, as being one means of performing a parental duty.⁴ On the other hand, the courts will eagerly seize upon any circumstances tending to show imposition when proved, and will give them due weight. Such a circumstance would be the great age of the parent, or his failing health.⁵ In such cases presumptions of invalidity often exist upon other grounds,⁶ or if they do not,

In Parker v. Parker, 45 N. J. In *Sanfey v. . . . A settlement made by a parent on a child, so far from being regarded with jealousy will always be presumed to be free from suspicion; because it is the natural course for property to take. One of the main objects of the acquisition of property by the parent is to give it to his child; and that child in turn will give it to his, and in this way the debt of gratitude we owe to our parent is paid to our children."

Failing to do this, a bill in

(3) Parties Within the Relation.—Not only does the rule in question extend to cases of parent and child, but it reaches also to those relations which are similar to it, and where the influence would naturally be the same, embracing the case of grandfather and grandson,³ uncle and nephew or niece,⁴ step-mother and step-son or step-daughter,⁵ older and younger brothers and sisters,⁶ more distant relatives,⁷ and, in short, all cases where one, in fact,

Lord Langdale, M. R., set aside the security, saying: "Nobody has ever asserted that there cannot be pecuniary transaction between a parent and child, the child being of age; but everybody will affirm in this court, that if there be a pecuniary transaction between parent and child just after the child attains the age of twenty-one years, and prior to what may be called a complete 'emancipation' without any benefit moving to the child, the presumption is that an undue influence has been exercised to procure that liability on the part of the child; and that is the business and duty of the party who endeavors to maintain such a transaction, to show that that presumption is adequately rebutted; and that it may be adequately rebutted is perfectly clear." The child must be "placed in such a position as will enable him to form an entirely free and unfettered judgment, independent altogether of any sort of control."

Hall v. Perkins, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 626, held that where a person induced his nephew, an ignorant young man, to receive a lot of land worth little more than one third of the amount due him sustains to another a relation in loco parentis, as it is ordinarily understood and defined.¹

The age of the child is material, but youth is not essential to the continuance of the relation recognized by the doctrine in question.²

The influence is greatest before or soon after majority, but is presumed to last until affirmative proof is introduced to show that the dominion of the parent is no more.³

i. GUARDIAN AND WARD—(See GIFTS, vol. 8, p. 1308; GUARDIAN AND WARD, vol. 9, p. 85).—Dealings between guardian and ward, taking place about the time of the attaining of majority by the latter, are the objects of the close scrutiny of courts of equity. The relation gives to the party in the position of power much of the authority and opportunity for the exercise of influence possessed by both trustee and parent, without the guaranty of fairness which the nearness of relation, in the latter case, does much to afford.⁴

The law, therefore, is, that gifts from a ward to a guardian and contracts between them are presumed to be voidable on the ground of undue influence, if they took place while the influence and dominion lasted.⁵ The length of time during which this dominion lasts is generally considered a question of fact dependent upon the circumstances of the special case.⁶ It has been held, relationship, to disclose all the facts, and that she only sold in consequence of such confidence reposed in him, it was held that there was no such fiduciary relation between them; that the sale was invalidated by the son-in-law's failure to disclose to her all material facts within his knowledge as to the value of her interest.

But see Hamilton v. Mohun, 1 P. Wms. 121, where an agreement on the part of a man about to marry, that he would release his fiancée's mother, who was also her guardian, of all accounts for the mesne profits of her estate, was set aside.

Father-in-Law and Son-in-Law.—A conveyance of a farm worth $2,200, by a man seventy-seven years old, and weak in body and mind, to his son-in-law, in consideration of a promise, afterward fulfilled, on the part of the latter to take care of the grantor as long as he lived, and to bury him, will not, in the absence of positive proof of fraud or duress, upon the grantor's death within a year after conveyance, be set aside at the instance of the heirs. *Travis v. however, that in the absence of evidence it will be presumed to continue a year.¹ It will last until the ward has had full and free opportunity to examine the accounts and is in a position to act independently and intelligently.² The presumption of influence is rebuttable by affirmative evidence of fairness and a full disclosure on the part of the guardian and thorough understanding and free agency on that of the ward.³ It is a strong one, however, and requires clear and convincing proof to overcome it.⁴

The rule embraces gifts from a ward to a guardian,⁵ sales between them,⁶ releases,⁷ settlements,⁸ receipts,⁹ leases,¹⁰ and contracts generally.

The guardian need not have been legally appointed. It is sufficient if he be guardian in fact.¹¹ As in the case of other parties to voidable contracts, the ward after emancipation may ratify his previous acts, either expressly or by conduct from which such ratification may be inferred.¹²

As by delay to sue or conduct inconsistent with his claim of a right to rescind. Voltz v. Voltz, 75 Ala. 555.

It may affect all kinds of transactions between persons of all classes and conditions.

It is difficult to define the limits of presumptive undue influence. No classification can be complete, and the kinds that have been enumerated are but examples. It has been said that relief will be afforded upon this ground in case of all transactions where "influence is acquired and abused, where confidence has been reposed and betrayed."¹ Other courts and jurists have stated that the principle is a universal one, applying to men in all circumstances, wherever one occupies toward another a position of trust and confidence.²

It is obvious, however, from what has gone before, that such statements are rather suggestive than strictly accurate. As in all other matters of equity jurisdiction, the rules applied by the courts are flexible, and the limits of the doctrine shift from time to time, as conditions and ideas change. It may be safely said, however, that in the case of persons in the relations already enumerated, a presumption of undue influence exists, and that this presumption is extended to cover similar cases. The question of just what those cases are, depends not so much on principle, as upon the precedents of the courts.

Thus, the rules have been extended to cover transactions between partners,³ the directors and promoters of corporations,⁴ contracts between a sheriff and a debtor, against whom he had an execution,⁵ between mortgagor and mortgagee,⁶ agreements with very illiterate persons,⁷ dealings between persons, one of whom is accustomed to repose great confidence in the other, although there is no technical fiduciary relationship between them.⁸

5. Remedies.—While the law affords an adequate relief in some cases of undue influence, the usual remedies sought are those to be had in courts of equity. They do not differ materially from the remedies granted in case of fraud.¹ The relief often granted is by raising a constructive trust in favor of the person injured.² In granting redress the courts will try to do complete justice, and in setting aside conveyances they will often decree that the subject-matter stand as security for the property or price that actually passed to the complainant.³

6. Pleading and Evidence.—The undue influence must be clearly set up in the pleadings, not in general terms merely, but by stating, in substance, the facts which show the domination of the will of the one influencing.⁴

The burden of proving undue influence is ordinarily on the one alleging it.⁵ There are many exceptions in the form of presumptions of law to this rule, as already seen. Direct proof can seldom be had. The influence may be inferred, however, from the circumstances of the case, as shown in evidence, and by the influence of the dominant party in other matters.⁶

It was held, although there was no actual fraud, that fraud was presumed, that the transaction could not be allowed to stand, and that the stock and mortgage being tendered by the widow to the executor, together with accumulations, the executor should not be allowed the amount so expended on his administration account. It was held also no defense, that the widow did not take steps to repudiate the transaction until the expiration of three years, it appearing that she did so, as soon as she knew the circumstances.

her own use, as legatee, and for her to hold as guardian of an infant legatee, being induced to allow him to do so by his advice, which was not disinterested, as he was to receive a commission, which fact he did not communicate, the Connecticut court of probate, though not properly a court of equity, had full power to apply equitable principles, and might refuse to allow the amounts so spent on the executor's administration account. The question before such a probate court was held precisely the same as if it had been brought before a court of equity by a direct proceeding.

Rowell (deceased) was very feeble both in mind and body, he was persuaded and induced, through some undue and improper influence unknown to complainants, to execute the instrument, of which exhibit B [the deed] is a copy," was held insufficient.

IV. IN WILLS—1. In General—a. INTRODUCTORY.—The subject of undue influence in wills is an exceedingly important division of the general topic. Much of the discussion that has gone before is applicable to undue influence of all kinds, whatever may be the precise nature of the transaction affected. The subject, as applied to wills, has, however, many peculiarities. The term in this connection has a broader meaning, covering much of what in other transactions is included in duress.²

b*. DEFINITION.—As used in the law of wills, undue influence has been defined as "that which compels the testator to do that which is against his will, from fear, the desire of peace, or some feeling which he is unable to resist."³

As in all cases of undue influence, the underlying idea is that the will of another is substituted for that of the person nominally acting, whose act is but the expression of the volition of the former.⁴

1. Time Constituting Laches in Certain Cases—Three Years.—Where a gift is made by a woman to a physician, there being no actual fraud or undue influence, and she, at the time, having no independent advice, it cannot be rescinded after the death of the giver, if she took no steps herself to set it aside, during a period of between three and four years which elapsed between the time when the beneficiary ceased to be her physician, and the time of her death, and it is immaterial that she did not know that the gift was voidable. Mitchell v. Homfray, 8 Q. B. Div. 587.

Two Years.—Where a suit is brought to set aside a purchase for an inadequate consideration, by a solicitor from his client—the plaintiff being the devisee of the client, and the defendant, the successor in interest of the solicitor—it was held that the suit being brought two years after the plaintiff attained his majority, was not barred by laches, although the bill was filed eighteen years after the client's death, and two years after the solicitor's death, no active acquiescence being shown. Gresley v. Mousley, 4 De G. & J. 78.

Five Years.—Where the representatives of a deceased grantor filed a bill to set aside the conveyance as fraudulent, five years after the death of the grantor, three years after her will was probated, and five years after the deed was recorded, it not appearing when actual notice was received, it was held there had been no laches. Courts of equity never refuse relief "at the threshold of a suit, in a case where (as here) there is no analogous statutable bar, unless it is clear, on the face of the bill, that the complainant has delayed suing for so long a time, after his cause of action arose, as to deprive the court of the power of ascertaining, with reasonable certainty, what the truth is respecting the matter on which he rests his right to a decree, or that he has by his delay placed himself in a position, where he has gained an unfair advantage over his adversary. Nothing of that kind appears in this case." Per Van Fleet, V. C., in Le Gendre v. Byrnes, 44 N. J. Eq. 372.

2. See supra, this title, In Transactions Inter Vivos; also Schouler on Wills (2d ed.), § 228.

The above definition is substantially that given by Goldwaite, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Gilbert v. Gilbert, 22 Ala. 532. See also Turner v. Cheesman, 15 N. J. Eq. 265; Gardiner v. Gardiner, 34 N. Y. 155; Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324; 50 Am. Dec. 329; Davis v. Calvert, 5 Gill & J. (Md.) 269; 25 Am. Dec. 282; Wittman v. Goodhand, 26 Md. 95; *O'Neill v. It has been held that such influence as suppresses the independent volition

There is a destruction of free agency.¹ The influence necessary to thus destroy free agency and substitute the will of another depends upon the strength of the will of the testator.² Each case will differ from every other one. As has been said, it is "a relative thing, always to be taken in the concrete."³ The question in each instance is, Was the influence exerted sufficient under the circumstances to overcome the will of the particular testator, whose will is before the court?⁴ This principle is subject, of course, to the qualification that the law has established certain general rules in the way of presumptions, which take the place of proof of particular facts. The influence, to be material, must be operative; it must, in fact, produce the effect claimed. Otherwise its mere presence is irrelevant.⁵ Likewise it is never inferred from mere of the testator, and constrains him to give expression to the will of another, instead of his own, is undue. Matter of Blair's Will, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 540.

Where there was reason to suppose that the father of the beneficiary exerted some influence over the testatrix, but it did not appear that it was such as to take away the free exercise of her will at the time, it was held not such undue influence as would render the will void. Hazard v. Hefford, 2 Hun (N. Y.) 445.

The undue influence which will destroy a will, must be nothing less than such as subjugates the mind of the testator to the will of the person operating upon it, so as to make it the act of the latter person instead of the testator. Tawney v. Long, 76 Pa. St. 114.

Instructions to Jury.—But an instruction which defines undue influence merely as "the substitution of the will of another for that of the testator" is error, as being too general to be of use. Jones v. Roberts, 37 Mo. App. 179.

There must be moral coercion, Brick v. Brick, 66 N. Y. 144; Barnes v. Barnes, 66 Me. 297; or constraint. Sutton v. Sutton, 5 Harr. (Del.) 459.

"Mere passion and prejudice, the influence of peculiar religious or secular training, of personal associations, of opinions, right or wrong, imbibed in the natural course of one's experience and contact with society, cannot be set up as undue to defeat a will." Schouler on Wills (2d ed.), § 227; Georgia Code (1882), § 2401.

2. Rollwagen v. Rollwagen, 63 N. Y. 519. It has been held error to refuse to instruct the jury that it requires less undue influence and less fraud to influence a testator of weak and impaired intellect, than one in full mental vigor. Reichenbach v. Ruddach, 127 Pa. St. 590. Contra, St. Leger's Appeal, 34 Conn. 449.

To invalidate a will undue influence must so have overpowered the testator's volition as to cause him to make disposition of the property which he would not have made were it not for its existence. Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 357; Leverett v. Carlisle, 19 Ala. 80; Marshall v. Finn, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 199.

If the jury are satisfied from the evidence taken as a whole, the will would not have been executed but for the influence exercised, they must find that the will was procured by undue influence, and is void. Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147; 2 Am. Rep. 491.

In Dale's Appeal, 57 Conn. 133, the judges sustained the decision of the lower court, and approved the 'por-opportunity or interest, but must arise either from proof or presumption of law.¹

Undue influence is a force coming from without the testator. The term does not include mere prejudices, animosities, or predilections, not directly traceable to some outside pressure.²

Hence, a disposition of property, induced by gratitude for past kindness, affection, or esteem, is not the result of undue influence.³

It is immaterial that a provision in a will was suggested by another, if adopted by the testator of his own free accord.⁴

c. ITS RELATION TO TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY.—Undue influence is quite distinct from testamentary capacity. The former presupposes the existence of the latter.⁵

Capacity is the power to act.⁶ It depends solely upon the mental soundness of the actor. It exists whether the act stands in law or not. Undue influence affects the will of one having testamentary capacity, and invalidates what would otherwise be operative. Were there no capacity, there could be no will, and the question of whether or not there was influence would be an idle one.⁷

tion of the charge of Fenn, J., on the subject of undue influence. "What constitutes undue or improper influence, which would defeat the probate of the will, is again a question of law, and upon this point I instruct you that the degree of influence necessary to be exerted over the mind of the testatrix to render it improper, must from some cause or by some means be such as to induce her to act contrary to her wishes, to make a different will and disposition of her property from what she would have done if left entirely to her discretion and judgment; that her free agency and independence must be overcome, and that she must, by some domination or control exercised over her mind, have been constrained to do what was against her will, and what she was unable to refuse, or too weak to resist."

Instructions to Jury.—Where the evidence tends but slightly to show undue influence, it is insufficient to tell the jury that undue influence is improper influence exerted to induce the testator to dispose of his property otherwise than he would have done had it not been exercised, and in determining whether such influence existed, all the circumstances should be considered. Such instruction is too general, and is not clear and free from doubt. Myers v. Hanger, 98 Mo. 433. The undue influence to affect a will must be connected directly with its execution, and specially directed in favor of certain

Influence arising from social relations, must be allowed to have its natural effect upon wills; and there can be no presumption of its unlawful exercise, merely from the fact that it may be known to have existed, and to have affected the testator's mind. Sechrest v. Edwards, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 163.

Undue influence and weakness of mind are frequently found together, but they have no necessary connection with each other. They should not be confused; neither should influence and total incapacity be confounded.¹

d. COERCION A NECESSARY ELEMENT.—Undue influence is not only something from without, but it is a force which operates upon the will, and is not an appeal to the judgment.² It has been said that there is in it an element of wrong,³ although no fraud need be present.⁴ It has been held, however, that there must be either fraud or “contrivance;”⁵ that is, there must exist, either actually, or in presumption of law, something more than the unconscious, involuntary influence which one may exert upon another who respects or loves him. Mere acts of genuine kindness or attention are not undue influence, whatever their effect may be.⁶

e. WHAT INFLUENCE NOT UNDUE.—Suggestion and advice addressed to the understanding and judgment never constitute undue influence,⁷ neither does solicitation,⁸ unless the testator be worn out with the importunities so that his will at last gives way.⁹ Even earnest entreaty,¹⁰ importunity and persuasion¹¹ may be employed, as well as appeals to remember past kindnesses or to relieve ing his better judgment, are not undue influence. Tucker v. Field, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 139. Where the court below, on the trial of an issue to establish a will, instructed the jury that, if induced by fair argument or kind offices, it might be valid, it was held no error. Rogers v. Diamond, 13 Ark. 474.

The mere suggestion to a testator that an indicated testamentary provision would be productive of justice between the natural objects of his bounty, is not undue influence. Elkinton v. Brick, 44 N. J. Eq. 154.

The mere fact that the mind of a testator has been influenced by the arguments or persuasions of the person to be principally benefited by the will, however indecorous, indelicate, or improper they may be, will not, ordinarily, in the absence of fraud, vitiate a will. But it must be the will of a testadistress.¹ The amount of pressure allowable in each case will depend largely upon the relations of the parties.² The criterion in every case is, Is the influence irresistible? If it is, the will is not the instrument of the testator, and it cannot stand. If it is not, the influence is not undue, and its existence is immaterial, even though the testator did in fact yield to it, and executed his will in accordance with its dictates.³

Thus, flattery may be undue influence or not, according to its effect upon free agency.⁴

On the other hand, physical violence, and threats of such violence—if sufficient in amount and actually operative—are always undue influence.⁵

The fact that one passively encouraged the testator's resentment towards another does not establish undue influence.⁶ It is said to be immaterial whether or not the influence was consciously exercised by the person influencing.⁷

f. WHEN EXERTED.—The influence exerted, to be legally operative, must be in existence and effect at the time of the making of the will; otherwise it is unimportant.⁸ By this is meant, tor, however induced. Newhouse v. Godwin, 17 Barb. (N. Y.) 236; Tawney v. Long, 76 Pa. St. 106.

The testator must be constrained to do that which was against his actual will, but which he was unable to refuse, or too weak to resist. Brick v. Brick, 66 N. Y. 144; Barnes v. Barnes, 66 Me. 286.

In Hall v. Hall, 37 L. J. P. & M. 40; L. R., 1 P. & M. 481, the court, by Wilde, J., said: "To make a good will a man must be a free agent, but all influences are not unlawful. Persuasion appeals to the affections or ties of kindred, to a sentiment of gratitude for past services, or pity for future destitution, or the like. These are all legitimate and may be fairly pressed on a testator. On the other hand, pressure of whatever character, whether acting on the fears or the hopes, if so exerted as to overcome the volition without convincing the judgment, is a species of restraint, under which no valid will can be made. Importunity or threats, such as the testator has not the courage to resist; moral command asserted, and yielded to for the sake of peace or quiet, or of escaping from distress of mind or social discomfort—these, if carried to a degree in which the free play of the testator's judgment, discretion, or wishes is overborne, will constitute undue influence, though no force is either used or threatened. In a word, a testator may be led, not driven, and his will must be the offspring of his own volition, and not that of another."

In Dale's Appeal, 57 Conn. 143, the court below, in charging the jury, said—the charge being approved by the supreme court: "A moderate and reasonable solicitation, entreaty, or persuasion, though yielded to, if done intelligently, without constraint, and from a sense of duty, would not vitiate a will, in other respects valid."

not that the act giving rise to the influence must be done at that time, nor that the relation from which it is presumed or inferred be then in existence, but that the effect of that act or relation must still remain.¹ It must be a present influence, operating upon the testator's mind at the time he makes the will. Hence, acts and relations of a time quite remote from the date of the will are admissible, if they naturally give rise to an inference that the influence remained up to the time of the execution.² What time will be too remote will depend upon all the circumstances of each particular case.³

g. EFFECT.—Undue influence has the effect of vitiating a will induced by it,⁴ not only as to the beneficiary in whose favor it was exercised, but as to all others.⁵ If the will as a whole was not the result of undue influence, but only certain portions, which are separable from the remainder of the will, those portions alone will be affected, while the rest will stand.⁶ Thus, where undue influence is used in procuring one only of several legacies, it alone is void, the rest being untainted.⁷ It is of course immaterial by

Mere bad treatment of children on the part of the wife of the testator many years previous to the making of a will disinheriting them, does not furnish a reason for impeaching its validity. whom the influence was exerted, whether by a beneficiary or an outsider.¹

2. How Established.—Undue influence in wills is either established by proof, or arises out of presumptions of law. The latter—presumptive undue influence—will be considered hereafter. In studying the former, we must first determine upon whom rests the burden of proof.

a. BURDEN OF PROOF.—However it may be on principle,² it is held by the cases, almost if not quite universally, that the burden of proving undue influence is in ordinary cases upon him who alleges it.³

The one contesting the will upon this ground must set up the undue influence in his pleading,⁴ and must prove it by a fair preponderance of evidence.⁵

b. NATURE OF THE PROOF.—Direct proof of undue influence is never required.⁶ It may be inferred from other facts proven.⁷

2. "The objection of undue influence may seem at first of the nature of a defense, of confession, and avoidance in common-law pleading; it virtually admits the testator's competency (though not his entire soundness of body or mind) and the due execution of the instrument, but seeks to avoid the effect thereof. But in reality it denies that the supposed will is the will of the supposed testator. That is, instead of confessing and avoiding, it traverses; and as it is for the one who offers an instrument for probate (an instrument by which the rights of widow, heirs and next of kin under the law are disturbed) to prove it to be the true will of the alleged testator, it should follow in principle that the burden of proof, as well in regard to undue influence as in regard to capacity, should rest upon him." Bigelow's Jarman on Wills (6th Am. ed.), p. 68.

Where it appeared that a prior will dividing the property of the testatrix equally among her children, two sons and two daughters, had been revoked,

The court or the jury, as the case may be, are to draw the inference from the evidence submitted.¹ There are certain facts and circumstances, however, which go far toward establishing it. Thus the internal evidence of the will itself is always to be considered.² If it appears that its provisions are just,³ natural,⁴ and reasonathat at that time and subsequently she was on good terms with at least one of the daughters, that afterward she went to live with her sons, and refused to see the daughters, that she then made another will in favor of the sons who were present at the time, which will gave the unfilial conduct of the daughters as the only reason for disinheriting them, although this fact was clearly disproved; it was held that the above facts, being unexplained, should cause the will to be rejected, and the decree of the surrogate admitting it to probate should be reversed. Matter of Bernsee's Will, 17 N. Y. Supp. 669; 63 Hun (N. Y.) 628; Chaplin on Wills 100.

1. Farr v. Thompson, 1 Spears (S. Car.) 193; O'Neil v. Murray, 4 Bradf. (N. Y.) 311. It is not error to charge the jury that facts and circumstances, not the opinions of witnesses, are the primary evidence, in deciding whether a testator is competent on the ground of influence or incapacity. Browne v. Molliston, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 129.

When the court has properly explained to the jury, in a will case, what would amount to undue influence, and has called their attention to the different classes of testimony tending to show it, there is no error in refusing to tell the jury that undue influence might be inferred from certain facts, some conceded and some disputed, which are isolated from other facts in the case which would affect their force. Thornton v. Thornton, 39 Vt. 122.

2. Myers v. Hanger, 98 Mo. 438. In this connection, the frame of the will and the nature of the testamentary dispositions are in themselves important evidence. Mitchell v. Mitchell, 43 Minn. 73.

In cases where want of testamentary capacity or undue influence is alleged, it is the duty of the court to scan the provisions of the will to see whether or not they furnish any evidence of the truth of the charges made against its validity. Standing alone, they are insufficient to support a judgment against the validity of the will, but are evidence in determining whether or not the will is the free expression of the testator's mind. Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726.

3. Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, in which Van Fleet, V. C., while holding to the principle stated in the text, thus pointed out its limitations: "A will may be contrary to the principles of justice and humanity; its provisions may be shockingly unnatural and extremely unjust; nevertheless, if it appears to have been made by a person of sufficient age to be competent to make a will, and also to be the free and unconstrained product of a sound mind, the courts are bound to uphold it. The courts must so treat papers of this kind in order to maintain that great principle which confers upon every citizen of full age and sound mind the right to do with his own as he pleases, so long as he does not attempt to apply his property to an immoral or unlawful purpose." To same effect is Kitchell v. Beach, 35 N. J. Eq. 446; Webber v. Sullivan, 58 Iowa 260.

While unjust provisions in a will may be considered in connection with evidence tending to show undue influence, such provisions alone will not be regarded as such evidence. Hubbard v. Hubbard, 7 Oregon 42.

Evidence that the distribution of the property is grossly unequal is inadmissible, even if offered in connection with evidence of impaired intellect, unless there be evidence of actual undue influence. Storer's Will, 28 Minn. 9.

4. Fountain v. Brown, 38 Ala. 72; Cornwell v. Riker, 2 Dem. (N. Y.) 354; Cramer v. Crumbaugh, 3 Md. 491. If the provisions of the will are unnatural or unjust, there is an indication of undue influence. Matter of Blair, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 540.

Where a testator's will was made in favor of his relations, when he was in full health, and he afterward, through the influence of a friend, made another will in favor of such friend, when very old and out of health, it was held that sufficient ground was shown for an issue to determine the question of undue influence. Wilson's Appeal, 99 Pa. St. 545.

On an issue of undue influence, the ble,¹ these facts will do much to show that it was the proper will of the testator. They are of course not controlling,² and are not of themselves sufficient to outweigh more direct proof of influence, but they are often important evidence. For the same reason, the statements in the will as to why certain natural objects of bounty were omitted are considered.³

The relation of the testator to one who is alleged to have exerted influence, may be shown, including the degree of affection which the testator apparently felt towards him, and the confidence which he reposed in him.⁴

jury were instructed that, "If, under all the circumstances of the case, they find that this will was unnatural in its provisions, and inconsistent with the duties and obligations of the testator to the different members of his family, it imposes upon the proponents the duty of giving some reasonable explanation of its unnatural character, or at least of showing that it was not the result of mental defect, obliquity, or perversion." This was held correct. Matter of Budlong, 18 Civ. Pro. Rep. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 18. To the same effect is Gay v. Gillilan, 92 Mo. 250; Harrel v. Harrel, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 203.

It appeared that a testatrix had executed a will making her sister her beneficiary; that afterward, while abroad, she executed another will, leaving property, part to her sister-in-law, with whom she was stopping, part to a niece, part to a cousin, a bequest to the poor, and the residue to her husband. The draughtsman of the latter will, who was also a witness, testified that no other person was present when he received her instructions and drew the will, and no other person except the other witness, when it was executed. The testatrix had not previously been on good terms with her sister-in-law, but it appeared that afterward, when she fell sick, she sent for her. The sister-in-law thereupon came and took the testatrix to her home, where she died. It was held that the evidence did not warrant any inference of undue influence. McDonald's Estate, 130 Pa. St. 480.

Where a testator's mind was very feeble, an unnatural and unreasonable disinheriting of one who would be expected to share the property, must be shown to have been freely and intelligently done, or the provision will not be sustained. Esterbrook v. Gardner, 2 Dem. (N. Y.) 543.

1. But if a testator is legally competent to make a will, and acts freely, his will cannot be impeached, because unreasonable, imprudent, or unaccountable. Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251; Coffman v. Hedrick, 32 W. Va. 132.

The harmony of the will with the testator's habitual disposition and affection is worthy of much consideration. Allen v. Public Administrator, 1 Bradf. (N. Y.) 378.

2. Salisbury v. Aldrich, 118 Ill. 199.

3. A declaration by a testator in his will, that one of his children—a contestant—has been amply provided for otherwise, must have great weight in determining whether the will bears internal evidence that it was his free and voluntary act, and not procured by undue influence, it appearing that he was of sound mind. King v. Holmes, 84 Me. 219.

4. Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 374. Evidence of estrangement between the testator and a devisee is admissible. Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 78.

On the contest of a will, upon the ground of undue influence, evidence is admissible that the testator always treated the stepmother of his grandchildren, who were disinherited, in a friendly manner. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 216.

In Canada's Appeal, 47 Conn. 450, it was held that the feeling—whether kindly or not—of the testator toward the legatee might be shown, and that for this purpose the files and records of a suit brought in chancery between the parties to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, is admissible.

5. Matter of Blair, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 540.

The intention, however, is of importance only when it exists at, or near the time of, the execution of the will. A mere change of intention, taken by itself, is never evidence of undue influence. It is only when found in connection with other suspicious circumstances that it is important.¹

But more important than any other single consideration, upon the question of undue influence, is the condition of the mind of the testator himself. While the issue of undue influence is quite distinct from that of testamentary capacity, the two are commonly found united, and must be considered together. Some authorities regard a partial incapacity as a prerequisite to the existence of undue influence.² Whether this is the case or not, the strength or weakness of the testator's mind will often determine whether a set of circumstances, ambiguous in their nature, amount to undue influence or not. Hence, the mental and bodily health of the testator, the peculiarities of his mind, his beliefs and prejudices, will all go to assist in the determination of the question of whether or not he acted as a free agent.³ In the same connection the age of the testator is an important circumstance.⁴

Some cases may have seemed to go even further, and to regard the burden of proof as shifted, by the mere fact of the weakness of the testator's mind. Closely examined, however, they will generally be found to say merely that a presumption of fact may arise from proof of weakness of mind, which should be rebutted.⁵ In some instances, also, the burden of proof may have been confused with the weight of evidence.⁶ Some of the apparent conflict may be explained on the ground that testamentary capacity and undue influence are often considered on the same issue.⁷

While it is generally not necessary to show that a testator of

1. The fact that a will was made about six weeks after the testator had drawn a totally different one, in accordance with a draft made by his father, is no evidence that the latter will was the result of undue influence. Mason v. Williams, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 402.

In determining questions of undue influence, the importance of a change of testamentary intention depends upon its connection with other facts. If made upon a reason satisfactory to the testator, although not so to the court, it furnishes no ground for setting aside the will. The only question is, was the will the free act of a competent testator—not whether its provisions were inequitable. Horn v. Pullman, 72 N. Y. 269.

4. The execution of a will by one of advanced age, impaired sight and hearing, should be scrutinized for traces of undue influence. Weir v. Fitzgerald, 2 Bradf. (N. Y.) 42.

5. Where the testator is of weak judgment, and the amount of the legacy great, a strong presumption of undue influence will arise. Such presumption can be rebutted only by evidence showing the will to be such as a person of average mind, morals, and family love might be willing to make. Walker v. Hunter, 17 Ga. 413.

full testamentary capacity understood his will, or that it was read over by or to him—a person being presumed to know fully the contents of an instrument which he has signed¹—it has been held otherwise in case of the wills of aged persons and those of feeble mind, and proponents have been required to produce affirmative proof of these facts.²

(1) Declarations of Testator.—Questions as to the admissibility of the declarations of a testator, as evidence to prove undue influence, have been often before the courts. While there is on some points a lack of uniformity in the decisions, the true rule, and the one generally accepted, seems to be that they are admissible for the purpose of proving the condition of the testator's mind,³ whether that condition be permanent or temporary,⁴ his intention,⁵ his idiosyncrasies, ideas, and beliefs,⁶ and his relations with, and

1. Bigelow's Jarman on Wills (2d ed.), p. 70.

On a question of undue influence, the trial judge rejected certain clauses, on the ground that, "The court finds there is no sufficient proof to show that the same were made a part of the will by the direction or with the knowledge of the testator; and so the court finds the words above recited are not a part of the will." This was held error, as the presumption is that a man knows the contents of the instrument which he signs, and the burden of proof is on the contestant. Rockwell's Appeal, 54 Conn. 119.

It is not enough to justify a court in denying probate to a will, that it does not appear affirmatively that it was read over by or to the testator, it not appearing that it was not read over to or by him, and it appearing that he could have read it and understood its contents. Kahl v. Schober, 35 N. J. Eq. 461. See also Pettes v. Bingham, 10 N. H. 514.

2. Day v. Day, 3 N. J. Eq. 549. But proof of instructions for making the will, or reading it over, is not indispensable. Its place may be supplied by other proof of knowledge or assent. McNinch v. Charles, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 229; Worthington v. Klemm, 144 Mass. 167.

5. Gardner v. Frieze, 16 R. I. 640; Matter of Blair, 16 Daly (N. Y.) 540; Neel v. Potter, 40 Pa. St. 483.

Thus statements made by the testator a considerable time previous to the execution of the will, that he intended to make a disposition of his property similar to that in the will are admissible. Dye v. Young, 55 Iowa 433. But see In re Storer's Will, 28 Minn. 9. But not subsequent statements of a contrary intention. Muir v. Miller, 72 Iowa 585. But it has even been held that declarations made three weeks after the execution of a will, expressing dissatisfaction with it, are admissible. Parsons v. Parsons, 66 Iowa 754.

The mere circumstance that a will differs in its tenor from the testator's previously expressed intentions is, by itself, of no importance as showing undue influence; although in connection with other facts, it may become significant. Wood v. Bishop, 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 512. But mere expressions of wishes and desires, not tending to establish undue influence, are inadmissible. Ryman v. Crawford, 86 Ind. 262.

6. Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112.

Evidence is admissible of a testator's statements as to his ideas on the subject of making wills, and his opinion that all children should share alike, such declarations having reference to his own plans. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 207.

But the fact that a testator, previous to making his will, had expressed satisfaction with the disposition which the law made of intestate property, does not show undue influence, where the will was reasonable, deliberately executed, feelings toward his beneficiaries, natural objects of his bounty,¹ and those said to have improperly influenced him.² They may thus be shown to establish everything pertaining to the testator himself, as distinguished from matters which go to show the act of influence.³ These must be shown by evidence other than declarations, which are not admissible to prove the facts stated, unless part of the res gestæ.⁴

The cases seem to establish this distinction, and generally have been decided in accordance with the principle above. Departures from it are given in the notes. It has been said, that the influence and remained unrevoked for a considerable period preceding his death. Kaul v. Brown, 17 R. I. 14.

1. In Canada's Appeal, 47 Conn. 463, declarations of the testator were admitted, tending to show unkindly and suspicious feeling toward his beneficiary the declarations being made several days before and after the execution of the will. Some of the declarations being as to the alleged unkind treatment of the testator by the beneficiary, it was held that the falsity of the charges might be shown to the jury, as it would tend to prove that the alleged statements were not made at all, or if made, that they afforded no true index of the testator's mind. As to the latter point, see Mills' Appeal, 44 Conn. 484, which follows the same rule.

Where declarations tending to show unkind feeling are admitted, evidence of pleasant relations may be shown in reply. Vester v. Collins, 101 N. Car. 114.

In Denison's Appeal, 29 Conn. 399, it was held that declarations made a considerable time before, should be allowed to go to the jury, who would take the time that had elapsed into account, in determining their weight. Statements by a testator made some time prior to the execution of the will, that some of his children did not treat him rightly, were held admissible on the question of undue influence. Stephenson v. Stephenson, 62 Iowa 163.

Statements of estrangement between the testator and a devisee are admissible. Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 69.

The letters of a testatrix, written before making a will, showing unkind feelings toward a beneficiary, are admissible. Robinson v. Stuart, 73 Tex. 267. See also Potter v. Baldwin, 133 Mass. 427.

2. Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 459. It is proper to show that the testator, at different times before the will was made, said that while in the presence of a certain person, charged with having exerted undue influence, he could not resist her, and also that shortly before his death, he said he did not know but that he had been deceived in disinheriting his son. Potter v. Baldwin, 133 Mass. 427. But the evidence must be of declarations made near enough to the time of the will, to furnish a reasonable ground of inference of undue influence. If made six years before, they are inadmissible. Bunyard v. McElroy, 21 Ala. 316.

3. Middleditch v. Williams, 45 N. J. Eq. 726.

4. Schailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Comstock v. Hadlyme Ecclesiastical Soc., 8 Conn. 254; 20 Am. Dec. 100; Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Mo. 227; Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157; 62 Am. Hoshauer*, 26 Pa. St. 404; Smith v. Fenner, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 170.

Declarations by the testator that he was unduly influenced, are not enough of themselves to warrant setting aside a will; there must be some independent proof of effort to influence him. Cudney v. Cudney, 68 N. Y. 148.

In Herster v. Herster, 122 Pa. St. 258, it was held that declarations of the testator are admissible to show the condition of his mind, but that the failure of the trial court to instruct the jury that the declarations of the testator were not evidence at all, as to the fact of undue influence, is reversible error. But see Stephenson v. Stephenson, 62 Iowa 163, where statements after making a will, "I don't know anything about it; they got around me and confuddled me. It is to be done over again," were held admissible, to show undue influence. See also In re Hollingsworth's Will, 58 Iowa 526.

must be proved by evidence other than declarations, but that they are competent to prove the effect of the influence.¹

Evidence of declarations made before the execution of the will is more readily admitted than is evidence of declarations made after execution, but there seems to be no difference in principle.² Of course the value of the declarations as evidence, depends largely upon the nearness of the time when they are made, to the date of the execution of the will.³

(2) Declarations of Beneficiary.—The declarations of one taking beneficially under a will are often admissible under the rules governing admissions against interest, or as part of the res gestæ. If offered on the former ground, they may be proved, unless the rights of those who are not parties to the proceeding would be affected by them,⁴ in which case they are excluded.⁵

(3) Surrounding Circumstances.—The evidence admissible upon issues of undue influence covers a much wider field than usual in judicial contests. It does not differ in the main from that allowed in the trial of questions of capacity, and it may be said that all the surrounding circumstances may be shown,⁶

Evidence of an exclamation made by a testator shortly after executing his will: "I have not made my will as I wanted to; I know I did wrong, but I could not help it," was held admissible to show actual undue influence, and that he was in a condition to be easily influenced. Dennis v. Weekes, 51 Ga. 24. See also Howell v. Barden, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 442; Ray v. Ray, 98 N. Car. 566.

On the trial of the question of undue influence, the fact that a statement was made by a legatee that he and another legatee "had got the will fixed as they wanted it . . . that they had got it fixed now with a man put in as executor, who was not afraid of John Saunders [the contestant]," is admissible for two purposes, as an admission of a fact in issue, and as affecting the credibility of the legatee as a witness, and it is in the discretion of the court to allow the evidence to be put in before the legatee goes on the stand. Saunders' Appeal, 54 Conn. 108.

5. Dye v. Young, 55 Iowa 433; Shailer v. Bumstead, 99 Mass. 112; Blackwell v. Blackwell, 33 Ala. 61; 70 Am. Dec. 556. They are not admissible if made by legatees not parties to the proceeding, Carpenter v. Hatch, 64 N. H. 573; nor if made before the execution of the will. In re Ames' Will, 51 Iowa 596. But if they are the statements of the executor and principal legatee, they are admissible to affect his own interest, even though he is not a party to the record. Morris v. Stokes, 21 Ga. 552.

6. In Mooney v. Olsen, 22 Kan. 77, the court, by Brewer, J., said: "The question of undue influence is one of peculiar character. . . . Was the mind strong or weak? Clear of comprehension or only feebly grasping the facts suggested? Was the will resolute and firm or enfeebled by disease and bodily weakness? What prompted the making of the will? Was it the thought of the testatrix, or the suggestion of interested parties? What influences were brought to bear to secure its execution or the disposition of any specific property? These are inquiries always difficult of solution, made more so by the fact that the parties most competent to give information are the ones most interested to withhold it. To fully inform the jury they should know the condition of the testatrix's mind at the time of the execution, the circumstances attending the execution, the relations and affections of the testatrix and such including the relation of the testator to those about him,¹ when and in whose presence the will was made,² and whether or not the will was secretly made or kept secret—always a suspicious circumstance.³ The jury are to draw their inferences from such circumstances, and if there be no confidential relationship between the testator and the one alleged to have exerted influence, it is the duty of the court to charge them in general terms, leaving it for them to draw conclusions from the facts proven.⁴

3. Effect of Confidential Relationship—The General Rule.—The effect of confidential relationship on undue influence in wills has already been cursorily noticed.⁵ We are now to trace the rules in detail, and note their application to the various kinds of fiduciary relations.

While the doctrine of presumptive undue influence is generally recognized in the case of transactions inter vivos, no uniformity of opinion exists in the case of wills. In spite of the confusion caused by loose statements of the principles, it is possible to trace three distinct doctrines, each supported by authority. The first is that no presumption of law arises from the existence of a fiduciary relation, but that undue influence is to be inferred, if at all, from the facts of the case.⁶ At the same time, the fact of relationship other matters as tend to show what disposition, if in health and strength and uninfluenced, she would probably have made of her property. This opens a broad field of inquiry and gives to such a contest over a will a wider scope of investigation than exists in ordinary litigation."

Where it is shown that a testator in sound mind, though in feeble health, was alone with the scrivener when he gave the instructions for the will; that he was not under any restraint; and that for three years previously he had intended to make a disposition of his property like that of the will, it was held to justify probate, though the beneficiaries had notice and opportunity to exert undue influence. Ewen v. Perrine, 5 Redf. (N. Y.) 640.

The fact that a testator has been induced to make a new will, by false representations as to the contents of an existing will, is a proper element in the consideration of the question of undue influence, although the new will may not materially vary from the former one in respect to the subject-matter of the false representations. Moore v. Blauvelt, 15 N. J. Eq. 367. See also Greenwood v. Cline, 7 Oregon 17.

1. The manner in which the testator and his family lived together, may be shown, as well as the fact that his son conducted his business, and that this son was not on friendly terms with his sister, one of the contestants. Staser v. Hogan, 120 Ind. 207.

The facts that a will was written by one who took immediate charge thereof, did not read it to subscribing witnesses, and told the children of the testator, when the latter afterward called for his will, not to mind him, as he was crazy, were held admissible to show fraud or undue influence. In re Hollingsworth's Will, 58 Iowa 526.

But where the proponent satisfactorily accounted for the secrecy maintained as to the execution and existence of a will, not unreasonable in its provisions, it was held that any presumption of undue influence that might arise was overcome. *Brick v. will cause the court to scrutinize the instrument with great care.¹ This will be so even though the will be not in favor of the one alleged to have influenced the testator.² The second doctrine places wills and transactions inter vivos upon the same footing in this regard, and makes the former subject to the rules already laid down as applying to the latter.³ The presumption, however, which the law raises may be rebutted by the proof described under the head of the third doctrine. The third view—and the one perhaps having on its side the weight of reason and authority—is that the fact of fiduciary relationship alone, does not give rise to a presumption of undue influence, but that, if combined with other circumstances tending to show imposition, such a presumption does exist.⁴ Such circumstances would be the fact that the one in confidential relationship drew the will, or caused it to be drawn, in his own favor,⁵ that the testator was of weak

McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 371; Matter of Smith, 95 N. Y. 516; Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226; 21 Am. St. Rep. 85.

In Dale's Appeal, 57 Conn. 143, the court said: "In certain cases where the natural objects of the testator's bounty are excluded from participation in his estate, where strangers supplant children, and the will is in favor of his attending physician or of the lawyer drawing and advising as to its provisions, or of the guardian having charge of his person or estate, or of his spiritual adviser attending him in extremis, the law requires the legatee at the outset to assume the burden of proving that his influence did not overcome the free agency and independence of the testator; that he did not exercise such domination or control over his mind as to constrain him to do what was against his will." In this case the charge of the court below was held a correct statement of the law: "If a paper is executed with the requisite formalities of a will and the person signing it is shown to have sufficient capacity to make a will, the presumption is that it was executed fairly and without mistake or fraud until the contrary appears, and the burden of proof is therefore upon the person alleging undue influence. That burden may, however, be satisfied, shifted or discharged, whenever the business relations existing between the testator and the person specially benefited by a will or having been shown to have had part in procuring it to be drawn, is such as denotes special confidence and gives to the party so benefited a controlling influence over the testator. In such cases, the jury should be fully satisfied that the relation had no undue or improper influence over the mind of the testator, and did not induce a different disposition from what would have otherwise been made."

5. Dale's Appeal, 57 Conn. 133. In Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226; 21 Am. St. Rep. 85, the court said: "Whenever a legacy is given to an attorney, confidential adviser, guardian, or other person sustaining a relation of special confidence to a testator, or whenever the individual who prepares the instrument or conducts its execution, not being a relative who would in the absence of a will be an heir, derives a benefit from its provisions, in either instance the surrounding circumstances may be such that a presumpmind,¹ that persons other than the one influencing and the necessary witnesses were excluded from the room at the time the will was made,² or that the person in the position of power made active personal efforts to procure the will in his own favor.³ To rebut the presumption thus raised, the proponent must show that the will was intelligently and freely made.⁴

In order that a relation be confidential within the meaning of the rule, it must be such as to give one a real power over the testator. If there exists no superiority of knowledge or will power, the principle does not apply.⁵ The existence of a confidential relationship and the extent of the confidence reposed is to be inferred from all the circumstances.⁶ Many illustrations of the views stated above will be found in the pages which follow this, in which are considered the various relations, both those subject to the rule and those to which it does not apply.

a. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.—The doctrines above stated are well illustrated by legacies and devises made by clients to their tion, similar in character in each case, would naturally arise against the volition or knowledge of the testator; and if, in this regard, the rules of law are to correspond with those of reason, such presumption, in the absence of rebutting proof or explanations, should justify the finding of a jury that undue influence existed." The court also said: "The mere existence of a confidential relation would not, indeed, in all cases, and necessarily, raise such a presumption, especially when it appeared that the opportunity of familiar and secret communication and intercourse between the testator and the beneficiary, at a time proximate to the execution of the will, was wanting." See also Riddell v. Johnson, 26 Gratt. (Va.) 152.

But this presumption does not require, as part of the evidence to rebut it, the independent advice of an outside party. St. Leger's Appeal, 34 Conn. 450; 91 Am. Dec. 735. But see contra, Post v. Mason, 91 N. Y. 539; 43 Am. Rep. 689.

Where the circumstances of the great age of the testator, and that the draughtsman, her attorney and trusted friend, was made a residuary legatee, concur, the burden of disproving undue influence is on the proponent to show that a codicil radically changing the residuary provisions of the will was executed understandingly. Matter of Soule, 22 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Surr. Ct.) 236.

A woman made a will, leaving all her money to the family with which she had lived for twenty-nine years. The property consisted of wages due for her services during this time. On application for probate, it appeared that the woman had expressed an intention to leave her property to her niece, to whom she was attached, and that the family in question had taken an active part in the preparation of the will. It was held that it should not be admitted to probate. Banta v. Willets, 6 Dem. (N. Y.) 84.

6. Upon the question as to whether or not a confidential relation existed between a testatrix and a beneficiary under a will, the facts and circumstances surrounding the relations of the parties are admissible. If the testatrix had intrusted property to the beneficiary, its amount, situation, and character, and the knowledge of the testatrix as to it, are material, and it is error to rule out questions as to the value of the property. Such questions would show the amount of the confidence reposed, and the reasonableness of the bequest. For the same reason the inventory and distribution of an estate from which the testatrix received a part of her property, and the testatrix's assess-attorneys. They will be closely scrutinized.¹ If the attorneys draw the wills, it has been held by some courts—but contrariwise by others—that they are prima facie invalid as being induced by undue influence.² The advice of an outside party, however, is not a necessary part of the evidence required to sustain them.³ Whether the mere fact of the professional relation raises a presumption against them is, as above indicated, a mooted point.⁴ Whenever a presumption arises, lapse of time and the absence of any attempt at revocation, are material circumstances tending to rebut it.⁵

b. PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT.—Similar principles are applied where the will is made by a patient in favor of his physician. The law is especially strict where the physician draws the will, or is instrumental in procuring it.⁶

c. CLERGYMAN AND PARISHIONER.—Wills are often attacked on the ground of the alleged undue influence of priests or ministers. The principles governing this class of cases are not different from those already enunciated. The same jealousy of fraud and imposition is manifested by the courts, and the same diversity of view as to when, if ever, undue influence is presumed, is observed.⁷ It is immaterial whether the influence ment tests should have been admitted. Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226; 21 Am. St. Rep. 85.

In Ashwell v. Lomi, L. R., 2 P. & M. 477, where one Dr. Ashwell, who took an interest of at least £10,000 by a will, was the medical attendant of the testatrix, who had long been suffering from a severe malady in a very aggravated form, and was very weak, the court held that although there is no rule of law which forbids a man to bequeath his property to his medical attendant, yet it is not a favorable circumstance for one in such a confidential position, with respect to a patient laboring under a severe disease, to take a large benefit under such patient's will, more particularly if it be executed in secrecy, and the whole transaction assumes the character of a clandestine proceeding, and in such a case the onus will lie very heavily upon the party benefited to maintain the validity of the will.

The will of an unmarried woman, who left relatives, gave everything to her physician. There was evidence tending to show that she was not of sound mind, and the physician appeared to have been instrumental in procuring the execution of the will. The suspicious circumstances were not explained away by proof. It was held that the will should be refused admission to probate. Peck v. Belden, 6 Dem. (N. Y.) 299.

Where a will was drawn by the physician and confidential adviser of the testatrix, devising him property of considerable value, it was held that the burden of proof was on the proponent to satisfy the court, that the instrument was the product of a free and capable mind. Crisfell v. Dubois, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 393.

7. See supra, this title, Effect of Confidential Relationship.

Undue influence was held not to be presumed from the relationship alone in Figueira v. Taafe, 6 Dem. (N. Y.) 166; Marx v. McGlynn, 88 N. Y. 358. Parfitt v. Lawless, L. R., 2 P. & M. 462; 41 L. J. P. & M. 68; 27 L. T. N. S. 215, where the plaintiff, a Roman Catholic priest, had resided with the testatrix and her husband for many years as chaplain, and for a part of the is exerted in favor of the clergyman himself, or of some outside party or object.¹ The case of the contestant is much strengthened, of course, if it can be shown that the will was written, dictated, or procured by the clergyman.²

Exhortations and appeals to duty are not undue influence.³

If presumptions are regarded by the court to have arisen, they are rebutted by proof of fairness and free agency.

Closely allied to the influence of a clergyman is that of a spiritualist over his disciples. Its effect is much the same, so far as the questions in hand are concerned.⁴

d. GUARDIAN AND WARD.—Wills made by wards in favor of their guardians, or those lately their guardians, are closely scrutinized, and according to some decisions, prima facie invalid.⁵ This, however, is disputed, and represents only one of the three views on this subject already noted.⁶ It has been held that the fact of guardianship is prima facie evidence of incapacity.⁷

e. HUSBAND AND WIFE.—The matter of undue influence in wills made by a husband or wife in favor of the other is beset by peculiar difficulties. It is, on the one hand, impolitic to allow inquiry into the particular relation of the parties, and, on the other, hard to follow out such inquiry,⁸ but the general princitime as confessor, which position he occupied at the time the will in dispute was made. There was no evidence that he had interfered in the making of such will, or had exercised coercion over the testatrix, nor was it shown in the common affairs of life, in business or in anything else, that the testatrix was under the plaintiff's control or dominion. It was held that there was no evidence to go to a jury on an issue of undue influence. Natural influence, exerted by one who possesses it, to obtain a benefit for himself, is undue in transactions inter vivos, so that gifts and contracts between certain parties will be set aside, unless the party benefited can show affirmatively that the other party could have formed a free and unfettered judgment in the matter; but such natural influence may be lawfully exercised to obtain a will or legacy. The rules, therefore, of courts of equity in relation to gifts inter vivos, are not applicable to the making of wills.

2. Matter of Welsh, 1 Redf. (N. Y.) 238; Redf. Am. Cas. Wills 506, where the testatrix attended the church of which one Cox was pastor. He visited her daily, and was her religious guide.

In her will, which he dictated, she left him a certain sum of money. The court held that in such cases, where the will is dictated by an interested party, sustaining toward the testatrix the relation of spiritual adviser, and where large bequests are made to religious objects, there arises a presumption of fraud and undue influence, and it becomes necessary, in order to establish the will, to rebut the presumption.

A testator embraced spiritualism so that it dominated his life. The man who influenced him to embrace it, also induced him, through his belief, to become alienated from his wife and child, and make a will in favor of his adviser. ples prevail.¹ It is established, however, that there are no presumptions arising from the relation.² It is both natural and just that the husband or wife should make generous provision for the other, whose labor or economy may have contributed much to accumulate the property left by the will. The undue influence must, therefore, be alleged and established as a fact by the contestant.³

The facts that a man is attached to his wife, that she guides or even dominates him in the ordinary affairs of life,⁴ or has acquired an ascendancy over him, do not render his will, if made in her favor, invalid.⁵ It is her right and, in certain cases, her duty to use persuasion and importunity to procure a proper provision for herself.⁶ So far from an influence being presumed from her relation to him, she may lawfully go much farther than an outsider, and make appeals and exert influence which, coming from another, would be undue.⁷ It is only when, as a matter of true as a general principle, reasonable and proper inquiry into the relation of the parties will be made. Pierce v. Pierce, 38 Mich. 412; Reynolds v. Adams, 90 Ill. 134; 32 Am. Rep. 15.

Thus, where a man just divorced married a woman of wealth, who died in a few weeks, leaving him all her property, it was held that, on the issue of undue influence, a broad latitude was proper in the introduction of evidence of their relations before and after marriage. Potter's Appeal, 53 Mich. 106.

3. This is a matter for the jury, and they may find that there was no undue influence, even if the provisions of the will be unnatural. Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260; Farr v. Thompson, 1 Spear (S. Car.) 93.

It is competent to show that natural objects of bounty, as the children of a former wife, were excluded without apparent reason. Mullen v. Helderman, 87 N. Car. 471.

Where a will was contested on the ground of undue influence by a second wife, to whom the testator gave most of his property, it was held that evidence which afforded an insight into the private history of the family, the relations of the testator with the second wife, and the means employed by her to alienate his affections from his children by a former wife, was admissible. Reynolds v. Adams, 90 Ill. 134; 32 Am. Rep. 15.

That a wife asks her husband to appoint her an executor of his will, is not evidence of undue influence; neither is the fact that the wife's sisters, one of whom the testator was visiting, summoned the lawyer of one of them to assist the testator's counsel in drawing the will. Black v. Foljambe, 39 N. J. Eq. 234.

4. Schouler on Wills (2d ed.), § 236; Small v. Small, 4 Me. 220; 16 Am. Dec. 253; Storer's Will, 28 Minn. 9; Hughes v. Murtha, 32 N. J. Eq. 288.

The rule is the same where the husband is dependent on his wife, because of his enfeebled physical condition. Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260.

5. If a wife, by her virtues, has gained such an ascendancy over her husband, that her pleasure is the law of his conduct, such influence is no reason for impeaching a will made in her favor, even to the exclusion of the residue of his family. Small v. Small, 4 Me. 220; 16 Am. Dec. 253.

6. Lide v. Lide, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 403. Thus, mere proof that a testator's wife urged upon him the propriety of leaving his property to her, does not establish undue influence. Hughes v. Murtha, 32 N. J. Eq. 288.

7. A will will not be set aside on account of any persuasions or representations of the testator's wife, while the testator is at the point of death, to induce him to make her a more liberal provision than he is disposed to make, although it should appear that such fact, his free agency is gone, and her will substituted for his, that the instrument is void.¹

The same considerations apply in the case of influence alleged to be exerted by the husband over the wife, except that it will be more readily inferred.²

f. MAN AND MISTRESS.—Undue influence is much more readily inferred in case of a will made in favor of a mistress, than of one in favor of a wife.³ The relation of the parties may always be shown,⁴ and it is error for the court to charge that it is immaterial whether the parties were lawfully married or not.⁵

While, therefore, the fact of adulterous relations between a testator and another, is admissible, and, taken in connection with the internal evidence of the will or other circumstances, may be sufficient to justify a verdict against the instrument,⁶ there is, according to the general opinion, no presumption from the mere fact of the relation.⁷ Some of the authorities, however, have considered that this relation is subject to the rules as to fiduciary persuasions had prevailed on him to comply with her wishes, provided it shall appear that the testator was of sound mind, and was not imposed on by false representations, and that the provision made for the wife is not greatly disproportionate and unreasonable. Lide v. Lide, 2 Brev. (S. Car.) 403.

As illustrating the latitude allowed by some of the cases, see Storey's Will, 20 Ill. App. 183, where a will was admitted to probate, though there was evidence that the testator believed himself to be directed by a spirit which he called "Little Squaw;" that when he signed the will he was slightly intoxicated; that only his attorney and his wife were present, the witnesses attesting some days later; and that she, on handing him the will to be signed, said: "You know what the Little Squaw has said about making provision for those you love best, and you know I love you and you know you love me best."

Influence, which, when exercised by the wife of the testator, might be lawful, may be undue and illegitimate if exercised by a woman occupying merely an adulterous relation to him. Kessinger v. Kessinger, 37 Ind. 341.

The influence of a lawful relation over testamentary dispositions is not prohibited by law, except when unduly exerted over the very act of devising; but that of an illegal relation, is naturally and ordinarily unlawful, in so far as it respects testamentary dispositions favorable to the unlawful relation, and unfavorable to the lawful heirs. *Dean v. relations proper, and that when it concurs with other suspicious circumstances a presumption against validity arises.¹

g. PARENT AND CHILD.—That the testator and the one alleged to have influenced him stood to each other in the relation of parent and child, is a fact to be considered and weighed by the jury in connection with other circumstances.² It gives rise to no presumption, however.³ This is the case whether the testator be the parent of the other or whether the relation be reversed.⁴ The influence is to be inferred, if at all, as a fact proved from other facts.⁵

Inequalities in the amounts given by a parent to the various children constitute evidence, but are not conclusive against the will.⁶ As to the husband or wife, so to the parent or child, a wide latitude is allowed. Persuasion, entreaty, and urgency may be lawfully carried far, so long as the will remains supreme.⁷

The same considerations apply in wills between brothers and sisters,⁸ and other relatives and inmates of the same household.⁹

presumption of law against a will written by one who is a beneficiary under it.¹ The fact may, however, go to the jury as a part of the evidence.² The rule seems to be the same even where the testator is of great age or in extremis, if of sound mind.³ The fact that a beneficiary drew the will may, however, according to some authorities, combine with that of confidential relationship to raise a presumption of undue influence.⁴

i. PERSONS IN OTHER CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONS.—There is no presumption of undue influence raised by the fact that a will is made in favor of the testator's partner or his business adviser.⁵

4. Undue Influence in Revocation of Wills.—As the revocation, as well as the making of a will, must be an intelligent and voluntary act, it follows that an apparent revocation, induced by undue influence, is void. The same considerations apply here, as in the case of such influence operating to induce the making of a will.⁶

5. Validation of Wills Induced by Undue Influence.—While a contract into which one has entered through the undue influence of another is voidable only and may be ratified, such is not the case with a will. It is void if so induced, and can only be validated by a re-execution with all the formalities which would have been required originally to make a valid will.⁷

2. Chaplin on Wills 97; Drake's Appeal, 45 Conn. 9.

Where a beneficiary drafted a will, it was held that the fact was itself ground of suspicion, and the circumstances of the execution of the will should have close scrutiny. Byrne's Estate, Myr. Prob. (Cal.) 1.

To same effect are Lyons v. Campbell, 88 Ala. 462; Cramer v. Crumbaugh, 3 Md. 491; Duffield v. Robeson, 2 Harr. (Del.) 384; McDaniel v. Crosby, 19 Ark. 550.

But it is error for the court to instruct the jury that the fact that the will was drawn by one taking a benefit under it is a suspicious circumstance, such language being apt to mislead. Stirling v. Stirling, 64 Md. 138.

3. Downey v. Murphey, 1 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 82; Stein v. Wilzinski, 4 Redf. (N. Y.) 441. But the rule is otherwise if the testator is unable to read. Kelly v. Settegast, 68 Tex. 13.

4. See supra, this title, Effect of Confidential Relationship.

A housekeeper may occupy such a relation. See Byard v. Conover, 39 N. J. Eq. 244, where a bachelor, over seventy years of age, in a moribund condition, executed at the instance of his housekeeper, a will which she had prepared four years before, giving her all of his property, of which will his relatives had no knowledge. It was held that the will was invalid.

But the exercise of undue influence in preventing a testator from revoking his will, will not be sufficient ground for setting aside the will. Floyd v. Floyd, 3 Strobb. (S. Car.) 44; 49 Am. UNION DEPOTS.—For convenience in the reception and discharge of passengers, the railroads centering in most large cities have perfected arrangements whereby one depot, commonly called a union depot, is used by them in common for all purposes of passenger traffic. The depot may be built by contributions from the railways using it, or by a private corporation, which charges the roads using it a rental.⁴

The legislature may require railway companies centering in a city

4. The St. Paul Union Depot Company is a domestic corporation, the general object of the organization of which may be said to have been to secure and afford necessary depot and terminal facilities for railroads running into the city of St. Paul by means of a combination of all such railroads for that purpose. Its stockholders are various railroad corporations operating lines of railroad running into that city. It was held in St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. Minnesota, etc., R. Co., 47 Minn. 154; 50 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 55, that, in view of the organization of the depot company, and construing the provisions of its charter, railroad companies entering the city since the corporate organization, were entitled, for the purpose of becoming members of the corporation and sharing in and contributing to the benefits of the organization, to subscribe for and purchase a proper proportion of its stock at its par value; and that, if necessary for its purpose and for a proper apportionment of the stock, the existing members might be required to surrender or sell a part of the stock held by them.

In St. Paul, etc., R. Co. v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 44 Minn. 325, a conveyance and lease from the depot company to the railroad company were considered and construed with reference to the right to the exclusive use and occupation by the railroad company of certain specified railway tracks and adjoining platforms in the train-house or annexed to the depot building.

In State v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 42 Minn. 142; 41 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 636, questions of taxation were involved.

In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 54 Minn. 411, questions analogous to those raised in St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. Minnesota, etc., R. Co., 47 Minn. 154; 50 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 55, were involved.

Contract.—In Union Depot Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 113 Mo. 213; 56 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 245, it appeared that in 1876, there were six railroad companies whose roads terminated at Kansas City. Besides these one other road extended its line through Kansas City. The depot company and these seven railroad companies entered into a written contract, by the terms of which to unite in a passenger station at a point to be determined by the commissioners appointed by court, and to extend their tracks in the city to that station; and a statute to that effect is constitutional.¹ If the articles of incorporation of an intended company declare that the purpose of the company is to locate, build, own, and maintain a union depot for railroads, and to locate, build, own, and maintain as many different lines of railroad from said depot as may be necessary for the use and accommodation of different railway companies, the articles will not be held to create a regular railroad company.² The legislature may authorize union depot

each road agreed to use the depot and to pay to the Union Depot Company for such use, an annual rental amounting to ten per cent. interest on the total ascertained outlay for actual cost of said depot, including grounds, buildings, etc., and in addition thereto, the expenses of maintaining and operating the same, and all repairs and taxes. The rent to be paid by any one company was not to exceed a designated amount yearly, and the total outlay was not to exceed a named sum, except with the written consent of the several companies. It was further provided that all rents for the use of the said depot derived from railroad companies not parties to the contract, and all rents and receipts derived from any source whatever "shall be applied as a credit upon and in reduction of the amount to be paid as rent by the several companies." Subsequently three other companies were admitted as parties to the contract, thus making ten parties of the second part. It was held that these ten companies all had the same rights and the only effect of admitting the three additional ones was to lessen the rent to be paid by each company from one-seventh to one-tenth of the whole rent. It was further held that, upon the extension by one of the companies of its line through Kansas City, by purchasing the line of another company that had been paying rent to the depot company, the former was entitled to use the said depot for its purchased as well as for its original line, upon payment only of the rent imposed by the contract. In this case the evidence was examined, and it was held that, under the agreement between the depot company and the purchased line, the latter had only a temporary right to use the depot and not a lease from year to year.

1. In Worcester v. Norwich, etc., R. Co., 109 Mass. 103, Chapman, C. J., said: "In chartering a railroad corporation, and conferring upon it the power to exercise the right of eminent domain, a power is granted which is carefully guarded by the constitution. Property must be taken for public uses. If the power were granted by the legislature for private uses only, the grant would be unconstitutional and void. The public use for which it is granted to a railroad corporation, is as a way for public travel and the transportation of property. One of the most obvious reasons for reserving to the legislature the right to alter, amend, or repeal such charters is to enable it to compel an unwilling corporation to perfect and extend its connections with other railroads, as the convenience of the public may from time to time require. The Boston and Albany Railroad Company must of necessity have a passenger station in Worcester, and it is obviously important for the public that all the other railroads named shall be connected with it. At any rate, the legislature was the exclusive judge as to that matter, and an amendment of the several charters, so as to secure such an object, was a reasonable exercise of their reserved right. It is no valid objection to such amendments that they require corporations to extend their tracks and to exercise the right of eminent domain for this purpose, and to incur additional expense."

2. In People v. Cheeseman, 7 Colo. 376; 16 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 400, Helm, J., said: "Does this language indicate an attempt to create an ordinary railroad company under our laws? We think not. The primary and principal design evidently was to build and maintain a union depot. The various lines of railroad extended to the city; they came in from different directions and discharged freight and passengers at different points; to successfully 'maintain' a union depot and thereby accomplish the purpose of the enter-companies to exercise the power of eminent domain in order to procure land, both for the depot and for the tracks necessary to make connections with the various railroads which it is intended to connect.¹ Where, under a statute, a union depot company is prise, it was of course necessary to connect the same with the several termini of the roads within the city. Incidental, therefore, to the main adventure, was the construction and keeping in repair of lines of track to make these connections. Had the articles of incorporation announced a purpose to build and maintain a union depot and connect the same by lines of track with the different railroads centering in Denver the same intention would, in our judgment, have been expressed, and the same end attained."

That provision of the Michigan Union Depot Act which authorizes companies organized thereunder to run local trains, is warranted by the provision in the title of such act authorizing the construction of depots, "with the necessary tracks and management of the same." Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Morton, 83 Mich. 265.

1. The Michigan Union Depot Act, authorizing the formation of union depot companies, and conferring upon them the power of eminent domain, so stamps the property to be taken with a public character, and imposes a trust upon it for that use, as to make the grant of the power of eminent domain perfectly constitutional. Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Morton, 83 Mich. 265.

If a Union Depot Act is entitled "An act to authorize the incorporation of companies for the construction of union railroad stations and depots, with the necessary tracks and management of the same," the title is sufficient to warrant the conferring of the power of eminent domain upon such corporations. Fort St. Union Depot Co. v. Morton, 83 Mich. 265.

The payment, by a Union Depot Company, organized under the Michigan statute, of the award of damages made by the jury in condemnation proceedings instituted by the company, upon the order of the court on confirming such award, cannot affect the right of the company to appeal from such award, and to have the question of damages retried by another jury. Union Depot Co. v. Backus, 92 Mich. 33.

The provision of the Missouri Constitution that the fee of land taken for "railroad tracks" without the consent of the owner thereof shall remain in such owner, subject to the use for which it is taken, even though it may be held to apply to land condemned for union depot purposes, does not invalidate the statutory provision authorizing the condemnation of land for depot purposes, and land when so condemned, and any interest therein, belong to the condemning corporation as owner, since merely an easement at law would pass in case of condemnation under the statute. Union Depot Co. v. Frederick (Mo. App.), 67 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 656.

Where a portion of a street in a city of the first class is vacated pursuant to Kansas Gen. St. of 1889, § 582, and a lot abutting thereon condemned, and the perpetual use thereof acquired by a union depot railroad company for the maintenance of a union depot, the portion of the vacated street in front of the lot so condemned becomes, as it were, an accretion or appurtenant to the lot, and passes with the same to the company. Challiss v. Atchison Union Depot & R. Co., 45 Kan. 398.

Condemnation of Track of one Road by Another, in Entering Depot.—Under the Massachusetts Stat. of 1871, ch. 343, providing for the establishment of a union passenger station in the city of Worcester for the use of the several railroad corporations entering the city, authorizing them to extend their tracks to the station, and giving the board of railroad commissioners power to order such changes in the locations and arrangement of tracks in the vicinity of the station as the safety and convenience of the public might require, the board has the power, in authorizing one railroad corporation to take a portion of the location of another railroad corporation, to do so on condition that the latter shall have the right to use a track of the former, subject to reasonable regulations to be established by the board. Providence, etc., R. Co. v. Norwich, etc., R. Co., 138 Mass. 227; 22 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 493.

Reservation in Grant.—Where a railroad company conveyed to a union depot company a site for its passenger station, and the deed of conveyance contained a provision that the railroad allowed to lay its tracks and erect buildings on streets, with the consent of the proper authorities of the city, the phrase "proper authorities," refers only to those properly so called, and does not include the county court.¹

The delivery by a railway company of baggage to a union depot company, to be cared for and delivered to passengers on the presentation of their checks, makes the depot company the agent of the railway company, and the railway company is liable as a common carrier for the loss of baggage while in the depot company's custody, if the loss occurs before a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed.²

A union depot company has power to prescribe reasonable rules, requiring passengers to exhibit their tickets before entering the cars, and for preventing their getting on moving trains, and may enforce such rules with that amount of force made necessary by the exigencies of the occasion.³

company should have the perpetual and exclusive use and control of the three most northerly tracks in the said depot for its own business, and the business of such other railroad companies as it was then, or should at any time thereafter be under obligation to furnish or provide with passenger depot accommodations, the railroad company was entitled to the use of three tracks, not merely for the business of those companies to whom it was at the time of the execution of the deed under obligation to furnish depot accommodations, but also for that of any other companies with which it might thereafter contract to furnish such accommodations, and the reservation covered not only the right to run trains in and out of the depot, but also the right to general depot accommodations; such construction of the grant being neither repugnant, nor in conflict with public policy, nor prejudicial to the interests of the union depot company. St. Paul Union Depot Co. v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 35 Minn. 320; 26 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 567.

1. The county court is in no sense "an authority of the city," and it is fairly inferable that it was the intention of the legislature to permit the use of the streets of a city by union depot companies provided the consent of the city authorities only should be obtained. Union Depot Co. v. St. Louis, 76 Mo. 393.

2. Jacobs v. Tutt, 33 Fed. Rep. 412.

3. In Linn v. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co., 10 Mo. App. 125, Thompson, J., said: "If it delivered the baggage to an intermediate corporation for the purpose of effecting this delivery, then the corporation became in law its agent for the purpose of making such delivery." In Dickerman v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 44 Minn. 433; 45 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 596, the company had a rule requiring persons passing through its gates, for the purpose of taking trains, to exhibit their tickets to the gatekeeper and have them punched by him; and, also, one providing that no passenger should be allowed to board any train while in motion. It was held that these rules were reasonable and all persons intending to take trains and knowing of, and having a reasonable opportunity to do so, were bound to comply with them, and that the company had a right to enforce them or prevent violation of them, and to employ such force as might be necessary for that purpose, and might seize, hold, or detain passengers so far as necessary to prevent them from boarding trains in motion.

Assault by Employé.—An allegation in a complaint that the plaintiff had purchased a ticket at a union depot, where several railroad lines received and discharged passengers, and while passing from the depot to his train, was assaulted at the gate, through which he had to pass in order to take his train, by the gateman, who was an employé of the depot company, states a good cause of action. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Ind. App. 202.

I. DEFINITION.—In America, the United States is the political entity or entirety founded by the adoption of the constitution; also the whole territory or country subject thereto. Used adjectively, that which emanates from, pertains, or belongs to, the general or national government.¹

II. CONTRACTS—1. Power to Make.—The United States in its political capacity may, within the sphere of the constitutional powers confided to it, and through the instrumentality of the departments to which these powers are intrusted, enter into contracts not prohibited by law and appropriate to the just exercise

1. Anderson's Law Dict.

There is an inconvenient ambiguity in the phrase "United States;" sometimes it designates the states composing the American Union, separately considered, as in the expression "one of the United States;" more often, the national government, the political entirety, as in the phrases, "United States bonds," "United States currency," "United States marshal." Sometimes it means the whole country subject to the state and federal governments. Abbott's Law Dict.

The term "United States" designates the whole American empire. It is the name given to our great republic, composed of states and territories; "constituent parts of one great empire," Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 414, "who have formed a confederated government," Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 334; Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 591; by the act of the people of the "great empire," the "great republic," the "American empire" the

A Body Corporate.—The United States became a body corporate from the moment of the association of the states. Respublica v. Sweers, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 41. Although of limited powers, it is supreme within its sphere, and its laws are the supreme law of the land. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 316.

Domicile.—The debts due the United States have no locality at the seat of government. The United States in their sovereign capacity have no particular place of domicile, but possess, in contemplation of law, an ubiquity throughout the union, and the debts due by them are not to be treated like the debts of a private debtor which constitute local assets in his local domicile. Mackey v. Cox, 18 How. (U. S.) 100; Vaughan v. Northup, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 1; Wyman v. Halstead, 109 U. S. 654.

2. Liability.—The United States, when it enters into a contract with an individual, relinquishes its sovereign character quoad that transaction, is subject to the rules of right and justice between man and man, and is controlled by the same laws that govern individuals with respect to such contract,² and all obli-

Being a body corporate and politic, the United States has within its constitutional limitations, all the properties, faculties, and powers of a government, and the right to exercise them freely for the accomplishment of the objects of its creation, and among them the power to enter into contracts. U. S. v. Maurice, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 96.

The United States is a corporation capable of contracting, and a bond payable to the "United States of America" is a valid bond at common law. Dixon v. U. S., 1 Brock. (U. S.) 177.

To adopt a different principle would be to deny the ordinary rights of sovereignty, not merely to the general government, but even to the state governments within the proper sphere of their own powers brought into operation by express legislative adoption. A doctrine to such an extent is not known to this court as ever having been sanctioned by any judicial tribunal. U. S. v. Tingey, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 114.

When the form of contract is prescribed by law, a mere departure therefrom will not make it invalid, but the contract will be good at common law. Jessup v. U. S., 106 U. S. 147.

In Brown v. U. S., 5 Pet. (U. S.) 373, a bond taken under an act of Congress wholly omitted one of the clauses required by statute to be inserted in the condition. In U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 362, Story, J., commenting upon this case, said: "The court there entertained no doubt as to the validity of the bond, and only expressed a doubt, whether a breach which was within the direct terms of the omitted clause, and yet which fell within the general words of the inserted clause, could be assigned as a good breach under the latter. But if the bond, being a statute bond, was totally void, because the condition did not conform to all the requirements of the act, it would have been wholly useless to discuss the other questions arising in the cause. Upon the whole, upon this point we are of the opinion that there is no solid distinction in cases of this sort between bonds and other deeds containing conditions, covenants, or grants not malum in se, but illegal at common law, and those containing conditions, covenants, or grants, illegal by the express prohibition of statutes. In each case the bond or other deeds are void as to such conditions, covenants, or grants, which are illegal, and are good as to all others which are legal and unexceptionable in their purport." But if the bond be wholly different from what the statute requires for the omission of necessary conditions or for other causes, and is not voluntarily given, it seems that the bond is wholly void. See U. S. v. Morgan, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 10; Dixon v. U. S., 1 Brock. (U. S.) 178; U. S. v. Gordon, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 190.

A statutory bond which super-adds a condition not authorized is vitiated by the surplus matter, and the court will reject the surplusage as a mere nullity. U. S. v. —, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 195.

In Benner v. Atlantic Dredging Co., 134 N. Y. 156, it was held that the United States was judicially authorized to make contracts for harbor improvement under the various acts of Congress appropriating money for such improvement.

In Curtis v. U. S., 2 Ct. of Cl. 144, it is held that the liability of the government on a contract, express or implied, is identical with that of an individual—neither greater nor less. The government is to be regarded as a principal, and its officers as agents.

"The United States is as much bound by its contracts as individuals. If it repudiates its obligations, it is as much repudiation with all the wrong and reproach the term implies, as it would be if the repudiator had been a state, or a municipality, or a citizen." Waite, C. J., in the Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 719.

In U. S. v. Smith, 94 U. S. 214, the contract, in effect, bound Smith to furnish certain materials and erect certain buildings, the labor being performed by the soldiers at the fort, except to the extent that skilled workmen were necessary. There was no time specified within which the work must be done, neither was there any power reserved by the United States to direct its suspension. Under such circumstances, the law implied that the work should be done within a reasonable time, and that the United States would not unnecessarily interfere to prevent this. The work was stopped by order of the United States. Smith asked to be released from his contract unless he could proceed, but this was refused until the expiration of sixty days, when he was allowed to resume. It was held that as between individuals, this would be considered an improper interference, and damages would be awarded to the extent of the loss which was the necessary consequence of the suspension, and that the United States must answer according to the same rule.

The United States is as much bound by a contract, duly made by its authorized officers in its behalf, or by an election between alternatives offered them under a contract, when once exercised, as is any private person. Fowler v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 43; Allen v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 91.

When the United States becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. Bank of U. S. v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 904; Bank of U. S. v. McKenzie, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 393.

Ratification of Unauthorized Acts of Agents.—The rules of common law relative to the ratification of the unauthorized acts of agents, are as applicable to the obligations of the government, as to those of individuals. Fremont v. U. S., 2 Ct. of Cl. 461.

Implied Contract.—To constitute an implied contract with the United States for the payment of money, upon which an action will lie in the court of claims, there must have been some consideration moving to the United States, or it must have received the money charged with a duty to pay it over, or the claimant must have had a lawful right to it when it was received, as in the case of money paid by mistake. No such implied contract with the United States arises with respect to money received into the treasury, as the proceeds of property forfeited and sold under a confiscation act. Kuote v. U. S., 95 U. S. 149.

Where the owner of a vessel made a parol contract with an officer of the quarter-master's department to let the government use her for a trial trip, the government to pay a certain sum per day for her use, and to pay her value if lost, the contract being void, because not in writing, as required by statute, and the vessel was lost on the trip, it was held that the contract must be regarded as an implied one, such as arises on a simple bailment for hire, and that the loss of the vessel not being imputable to negligence, her owner must bear it; but that he was entitled, under the implied contract, to the value of her use up to the time of the loss, and that, in the absence of other evidence, that the value might be assumed fairly to be that stipulated in the parol contract. (Miller, Field and Hunt, JJ., dissenting, on the ground that the parol contract was not prohibited, and was therefore valid.) Clark v. U. S., 95 U. S. 539.

Faithful performance by the contractor, and a benefit received by the government, will take the case out of the Act of June 2d, 1862 (12 Stat. 411; U. S. Rev. Stat. 3747), requiring the contract to be in writing, this being a case of an unwritten agreement in its nature executory, so far as to leave it within the equitable rule of implied contracts, the acts of the parties in such a case operating a legal ratification of the agreement. Donald v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 65. See also Burchiel v. U. S., 4 Ct. of Cl. 549.

Government as Sovereign and Contracting Party Distinguished.—There is a radical distinction between the acts

gations to be implied against an individual should be implied against it.¹

Where property to which the United States asserts no title is of the government as a sovereign, and as a contracting party. In assuming the latter character, it lays aside its sovereignty, and becomes liable as an individual. But it can never be liable in damages to the person injured for its acts as a sovereign, and where such acts amount to a breach of its undertaking as a contracting party, the contractor injured thereby is without remedy. The claimant entered into a contract with the government, engaging to deliver mules in the city of Washington by a specified day, and, in time to perform his contract, sent a part of the mules in charge of his servant, who, upon approaching the city, was turned back by the pickets acting under the orders of the military governor and provost-marshal, and not allowed to enter with the mules, and in consequence, some of the mules were captured by the enemy. The government insisted upon the delivery of the full quota of mules under the contract, with allowance for those that were captured, and the claimant complied therewith. In an action for the breach of contract it was held that claimant was not entitled to recover. Wilson v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 513.

Contract for Secret Services.—A contract was entered into by President Lincoln and one Lloyd during the civil war, by which the latter was to go south, and procure such information concerning the confederate troops, plans of forts and fortifications, etc., as might be beneficial to the United States government, and report the same to the president; for which services he was to be paid $200 per month. It appeared that Lloyd proceeded south, and remained there during the entire period of the war, collecting, and from time to time transmitting, information to the president; and that he was only reimbursed his expenses. In an action to recover compensation under the contract, it was said by Field, J., in delivering the opinion of the court: "The service stipulated by the contract was secret service; the information sought was to be obtained clandestinely, and was to be communicated privately; the employment and the service were to be equally concealed. Both employer and agent must have understood that the lips of the other were to be forever sealed respecting the relation of either to the matter. This condition of the engagement was implied from the nature of the employment, and is implied in all secret employments of the government in time of war, or upon matters affecting our foreign relations, where a disclosure of the service might compromise or embarrass our government in its public duties, or endanger the person or injure the character of the agent. If upon contracts of such nature an action against the government could be maintained in the court of claims, whenever an agent should deem himself entitled to greater or different compensation than that awarded to him, the whole service in any case, and the manner of its discharge, with the details of dealings with individuals and officers, might be exposed, to the serious detriment of the public. A secret service, with liability to publicity in this way, would be impossible; and, as such services are sometimes indispensable to the government, its agents in those services must look for their compensation to the contingent fund of the department employing them, and to such allowance from it as those who dispense that fund may award. The secrecy which such contracts impose precludes any action for their enforcement. The publicity produced by an action would itself be a breach of a contract of that kind, and thus defeat a recovery." Totten v. U. S., 92 U. S. 105. See also Allen v. U. S., 27 Ct. of Cl. 89.

Where a military engineer was employed to go within the enemy's lines and make observations and procure information, his service was designated as secret service, and he gave receipts for accounts of secret service rendered. He was held to be a secret agent, and by the rule in Totten's Case, could not maintain an action in the court of claims. De Arnaud v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 370.

taken for public uses by its officers or agents duly authorized to do so, there is an implied contract to reimburse the owner;¹ but not where the property is taken under a claim of right.² The government is not liable upon contracts made by its officers, save when made within the scope of their official powers;³ and the

So, where the Secretary of War issues an order to the quartermaster general, "to suspend the making of any new contracts," for certain articles, the latter will not be justified in an attempt to annul a contract for such articles already made, nor in refusing to receive them when offered under the contract. Mann v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 404.

And where an individual, under an express contract with the government, which is void, delivers goods or performs services which are accepted, he is entitled to a recovery from the government on the implied contract in quantum meruit. Heathfield v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 213.

Such an implication being consistent with the constitutional duty of the government, as well as with common justice, the owner's claim is one arising out of implied contract, within the meaning of the statute defining the jurisdiction of the court of claims, although there may have been no formal proceedings for the condemnation of the property to public use. U. S. v. Great Falls Mfg. Co., 112 U. S. 645. And the value at the time of receiving the property should be allowed, and not its subsequent higher value at the time it was actually used. *U. S. v. Where a quartermaster general receives supplies for the government, and gives a receipt and vouches for the amount and the price, and the government uses as much of them as it wants, and suffers the remainder to decay by neglect and exposure, there is an implied contract to pay for such supplies. Solomon v. U. S., 19 Wall. (U. S.) 17, reversing 7 Ct. of Cl. 482.

Mails.—Though no express contract for transporting the United States mails is proved, nevertheless, where a railroad company has been carrying them and receiving compensation therefor, such contract will be presumed. Western Union R. Co. v. U. S., 101 U. S. 543.

Privity—Sub-Contractor.—Where a stone-cutter is employed by a government contractor, who under his contract, is to cut, furnish, and deliver granite, furnish the men necessary for the work, be paid the full cost of the labor, plus fifteen per cent., and forfeit a certain sum for each day of default between him and the government, there is no privity, and hence he has no claim against the government. U. S. v. Driscoll, 96 U. S. 421.

Impressment and not Implied Contract.—Where, during the late war, a vessel transported a load of coal under a contract with the United States, and at the place of destination tendered delivery of same to a quartermaster, who was the consignee, but he refused to receive it, and ordered the master to proceed to another port, with which order the master refused to comply, upon the ground that the state of the tide would render a departure unsafe, whereupon the vessel was towed by a government tug, and was injured by striking on a bar, it was held to be a case of impressment and not of implied contract, and that the court of claims had jurisdiction of the claim under the contract, but not of the claim for the other voyage. U. S. v. Kimball, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 636. Compare U. S. v. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 623.

Where a vessel is taken from the owners and impressed into military service and suffers injuries while navigated by government officers, the owners may recover for her use and service; but if the injuries suffered are made good to the owners by the insurers, the owners have no right of action against the government. *Dozier v. 2. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. U. S., 104 U. S. 680. Compare Eastern R. Co. v. U. S., 129 U. S. 396. Both are cases of contract for the transportation of the United States mails. In the former case the contract was for a period of four years, which had not expired, when the postmaster general, in pursuance of the Act July 12th, 1876 (19 Stat. at Law, 78 Ch. 179; Supp. R. S. 224), authorizing and directing him to readjust the compensation to be paid for the carriage of the mails, reduced the contract compensation. The company from time to time accepted the reduced compensation, but as it was bound to carry the mails during a certain period, such acceptance of less than it was entitled to demand, did not prejudice its rights to claim what was legally due under its contract. As was said by the court, the language of this statute may well be satisfied by confining it to cases when no time contracts for service were then in existence, and to contracts thereafter to be entered into; but it does not legitimately apply to contracts then existing, whose terms were unexpired, such as those in this case. In the latter case, however, the contract was subject to the provisions of the Act of March 3d, 1873 (17 Stat. at L. 558, Ct. 281; R. S., § 4002), which authorized the postmaster general to readjust the compensation to be paid for carrying the mails. The period covered by the contract had expired when the order for reduction was made, and the carriage was thereafter under an implied contract that the company should receive such compensation as was reasonable, not exceeding the maximum rates prescribed by Congress, and subject to a readjustment of rates as required by the Act of 1876. After that time the company was under legal obligation to carry the mails; and could have declined to accede to the readjustment of rates when they were made. But having received the reduced compensation without protest or objection, it must be held to have accepted it in full, and should not be permitted to recover the difference between the amount actually received and that which it would have received under the contract before the readjustment. Thus it will be seen that there is no inconsistency in the rulings in the two cases.

The government is liable for refusing to receive and pay for what it has agreed to purchase. Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. (U. S.) 269. formal, or written transfer of a contract is necessary to bring the case within the statute.¹

3. Dealings with Commercial Paper.—The United States, in the fiscal operations of the government, may avail itself of commercial paper whenever it may be necessary, and when it becomes a party to such paper it enjoys all the rights, and incurs all the liabilities, of private persons in the same circumstances, and is bound in any court, to whose jurisdiction they submit, by the same principles that govern individuals in their relations to such paper.² Where the United States, by its lawfully authorized agent, becomes the holder of commercial paper, it must exercise the same diligence, in order to charge parties liable, as an individual holder;³

In this case, where a contractor made a power of attorney authorizing another to receive and collect vouchers and receive a receipt for payments, and the nominal agent performed, and subsequently procured an assignment of the nominal contractor's claim, with authority to bring and deliver in his own name, it was held that the contract was thereby annulled and no suit could be maintained on it.

Exceptions to General Rule—Practice of the Departments.—To the general rule that when the United States becomes a party to commercial paper, it enjoys all the rights and assumes all the liabilities of other parties to such instruments, exceptions may be established by the practice of the departments. Thus, requisites of time or notice may be dispensed with, e. g., where drafts of the treasury on various local depositories of the United States are returned unpaid; such drafts are always paid in Washington without regard to time or notice. Government Drafts, 8 Op. Atty. Gen'l 1.

Treasury Notes.—Treasury notes of the United States payable to the holder or bearer at a future time, are negotiable commercial paper and transferable subject to the commercial law as to other paper of that character. Treasury notes of the United States stolen from an express company, and sold for value after due, in the regular course of business, may be recovered from the purchaser by the express company which has succeeded to the right of the original owner. Vermillie v. Adams Express Co., 21 Wall. (U. S.) 138.

Where a treasury note was assigned by the payee by indorsement in writing to A B when ordered, then transferred by a blank indorsement by A B, afterward indorsed in full by C D, into whose hands it had come regularly, to E F; this note, being afterwards stolen from the mail, coming by a series of indorsements into the hands of a bona fide assignee, may be recovered in an action of detinue brought by C D against the holder. Myers v. Friend, 1 Rand. (Va.) 12.

3. 8 Op. Atty. Gen'l 1; U. S. v. Central Nat. Bank, 6 Fed. Rep. 134; U. S. v. Barker, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 559. In this last case the United States was the holder of certain bills of exchange, and and is liable to damages on a protested bill of exchange drawn on it to the same extent as an individual.¹

The authority to issue bills of exchange, not being expressly conferred by statute, is only incident to the exercise of some other power, and the purchaser of such paper purporting to bind the government must, at his peril, ascertain whether the officer executing it is duly authorized to bind the government.²

its agent in New York City was directed, by letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated Washington, December 7th, 1814, to give notice of non-acceptance to the drawer and indorsers, residing in New York, and notice was given to them on the 12th of the same month, the mail which left Washington on the 8th having arrived at New York at 35 minutes past 10 o'clock A. M., on the 10th. It was held that the indorser was discharged by the negligence of the holders. And in another case in the United States Supreme Court, said: that the liability of parties to a bill of exchange or promissory note has been fixed on certain principles, which are essential to the credit and circulation of such papers. Those principles originated in the convenience of commercial transactions, and cannot now be departed from. From the daily and unavoidable use of commercial paper by the United States, it is as much interested as the community at large can be, in maintaining these principles. The rule, that upon an unconditional acceptance the acceptor is absolutely bound, no matter what equities exist between the drawer and acceptor, provided the holder is a bona fide purchaser without notice, applies to the United States as well as to private individuals. U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 377.

Where a pension check drawn by mistake for $1,280.20 instead of $18.00, is indorsed by the payee to a bank, and by that bank indorsed for collection to another, which indorses it to the assistant treasurer, who pays it, the money cannot be recovered from the collecting bank which has paid it over to the principal, the forwarding bank, and if the assistant treasurer retains the amount of the check out of money due the collecting bank from the United States, such bank may recover it from the United States. Wells v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 337.

the treasury, under a forged indorsement, is conditional on the promptness of giving notice to the person by whom the check was paid. U. S. v. Clinton Nat. Bank, 28 Fed. Rep. 357.

No good reason can be assigned for relief for the United States when dealing with commercial paper from the observance of the usages of the commercial world. Where the United States failed to give notice of the forgery of an indorsement on a check on the treasury within a reasonable time after the payment of the check, it was held that it could not recover the money from a person to whom the check was paid. Central Nat. Bank v. U. S., 6 Fed. Rep. 134.

In U. S. v. Cooke, 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 4, where the United States paid a draft drawn upon it, and it appeared subsequently to be a forgery, and the government delayed for six months to bring suit for the recovery of the money, it was held that such delay was fatal to the action.

The United States is liable for exchange. Where the United States was a party to a bill of exchange both as drawer and drawee, its interests were in no way affected by the want of either protest or notice. Beers v. U. S., Dev. Ct. of Cl. 27.

A written instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, but accompanied by other official documents, drawn by the United States on a foreign government, is not a bill of exchange within the law of merchants, and is not subject to protest for damages if dishonored. U. S. v. Bank of U. S., 5 How. (U. S.) 382.

2. In U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 377, it was decided that when an officer of the government, authorized to do so, accepted a draft in behalf of the United States or one of the departments, the validity of the instrument could not be disputed in the hands of an innocent holder. This proposition was the main, if not the only one controverted in this case, and an attentive examination of it will show that the authority of the officers to accept was not raised by counsel or considered by the court; and that it was impliedly held that such authority was a matter always open to inquiry when the draft was attempted to be enforced against the government.

Although it is true that when the United States enters the domain of commerce it submits itself to the same laws that govern individuals there, and, among these, to the rule that when one accepts forged paper purporting to be his own, and pays it to a holder for value, he cannot recall the payment, still the government cannot be so charged by any action of its agents which fall short of an adoption of the paper by it. Cooke v. U. S., 91 U. S. 389; 12 Blatchf. (U. S.) 43.

"The Floyd Acceptances."—In this case it appeared that Russell & Co., drawers of the bills in question, had contracts for supplies and transportation, to be furnished to the army in Utah. That, by these contracts, they were to be paid, either by the quartermaster at St. Louis, or by his drafts on his assistant treasurer in New York. In all the contracts save one, these payments were to be made on the final delivery of the supplies in Utah, but in one contract there was an agreement that partial payments should be made when the trains were started. In all cases payments were to be made upon certificates of the proper quartermaster. The performance of these contracts required a very large outlay of money, and R. & Co., finding it difficult to advance this and wait for its return until they were entitled to receive payment under their contract, made an arrangement with the secretary of war by which they should draw time drafts on him, payable to their own order at the Bank of the Republic in New York, which should be accepted by the secretary. That on these drafts they could raise the money necessary to enable them to perform their contract, and as the money for the transportation and supplies became due, they should receive it and take up the acceptances of the secretary before or at maturity. Under this arrangement, the secretary accepted drafts to the amount of $5,000,000, most of which were taken up by R. & Co., as agreed; but over $1,000, 000 in amount remained unpaid. Certain of these drafts were purchased by the plaintiff before maturity for a valuable consideration, and, as he alleges, without notice of any defense to them. It was held that the purchaser of paper purporting to bind the government, must, at his peril, see that the officer had authority to bind the government; the use of bills of exchange, by the officers of government in cases authorized by law, cannot be established as a usage in cases not so authorized, there being no express statutory authority to bind the government by such paper; when it exists it must be by the incident of some other power; there being, under the existing laws no lawful occasion for any officer of the government to accept drafts, such acceptances are not binding on the government. Miller, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "We make the further observation in this connection, that while it is readily to be seen that the exigencies of the business of the departments may require drafts to be drawn by them, and may justify drafts being drawn on them, which they ought to and do pay when presented, there can be no occasion for an acceptance, by any department or officer, of a draft drawn on either of them. . . . The authority to issue bills of exchange not being one expressly given by statute, can only arise as an incident to the exercise of some other power. When it becomes the duty of an officer to pay money at a distant point, he may do so by a bill of exchange, because that is the usual and appropriate mode of doing it. So, when an officer or agent of the government at a distance, is entitled to money here, the person holding the fund may pay his drafts. And whenever, in conducting any of the fiscal affairs of the government, the drawing of a bill of exchange is the appropriate means of doing that which the department, or officer having the matter in charge, has the right to do, then he can draw and bind the government in doing so. But the obligation resting on him to perform that duty, and his right and authority to effect such an object, are always open to inquiry, and if they be found wanting, or if they be forbidden by express statute, then the draft or acceptance is not binding on the government. It cannot be maintained that, because an officer can lawfully issue bills of exchange for some purposes, that no inquiry can be made in any case into the purpose for which a bill was issued. The government cannot be held to a more rigid rule, in this respect, than a private individual. . . . In accordance with these views, we are of opinion that, as there can be no lawful occasion for any department of the government, or for any of its officers, or agents, to accept drafts drawn on them, under any statute or other law now known to us, such acceptances cannot bind the government.” Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 666.

4. Liability for Interest.—The rule that “interest follows the principal, as the shadow the substance,” admits of an important qualification in the case of government contracts. In order to render the United States liable for interest, it must be either expressly stipulated for, or allowed by special statute.¹ An exception to this practice of the departments prevails where the United

Whenever interest is allowed, either by statute or the common law, except in cases where there has been a contract to pay interest, it is allowed for delay or default on the part of the debtor. But delay or default cannot be attributed to the government. It is presumed to be always ready and willing to discharge its obligations. U. S. v. Sherman, 98 U. S. 565.

The right is purely conventional in its origin, and where not sanctioned by law and usage, it cannot exist; as in case of a claim against the United States. Todd v. U. S., Dev. Ct. of Cl. 93. See also 7 Op. Atty. Gen'l 523.

It has been established as a general rule, in the practice of the government, that interest is not allowed on claims against it, whether such claims originate in contract or tort, and whether they arise in the ordinary business of administration, or under private acts of relief passed by Congress on special application. The only recognized exceptions are where the government stipulates to pay interest, and where interest is given expressly by an act of Congress, either by the name of interest or by that of damages. U. S. v. Bayard, 127 U. S. 251. That this is the established rule appears also from a succession of opinions of the attorneys general of the United States, given by Attorneys General Wirt, Crittenden, Lagare, Nelson, Johnson, Cushing and Black, and appearing in the following volumes and pages of those opinions as published: 1 Op. Atty. Gen'l 268, 550, 554; 3 Op. Atty. Gen'l 635; 4 Op. Atty. Gen'l 14, 136, 286; 5 Op. Atty. Gen'l 105; 7 Op. Atty. Gen'l 523; 9 Op. Atty. Gen'l 57, 449.

And in addition to the practice which has long prevailed in the department of not allowing interest on claims presented, unless it is in some way specially provided for, the statute under which the court of claims is organized, expressly declares, “that no interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment thereon in the court of claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for interest.” R. S., § 1091; Tillson v. U. S., 100 U. S. 43.

“An obligation to pay interest is not to be implied against the government as it is against a private party, from the mere fact that the principal was detained from the creditor after the right to receive it had accrued.” 9 Op. Atty. Gen'l 59. See also White v. Arthur, 10 Fed. Rep. 80.

Where acts of Congress direct the settlement of claims according to “equity,” or “equity and justice,” interest is not thereby authorized. 7 Op. Atty. Gen'l 105. But compare 2 Op. Atty. Gen'l 403.

Interest Allowed.—There are instances in which, from considerations of policy, interest has been allowed. Claim of the Heirs of Thomas Ewell, 5 Op. Atty. Gen'l 138. And where the State of Virginia contracted obligations for military supplies furnished during the War of the Revolution, which were assumed by the United States, upon receiving from that state the cession of the territory northwest of the Ohio river, and the said claims were referred by a special act to the court of claims, with directions to settle the same according to the rules and regulations theretofore adopted by the United States in settlement of similar cases, and without regard to the Statute of Limitations, it was held that, as the statutes would have been within the purview of an earlier act, which allowed interest on similar claims, but for their being within the bar of a proviso not in any wise affecting their merits, interest should be allowed, although such allowance was not according to the established practice of the treasury department, when not authorized by special legislation. The constitution confers on Congress power "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other cleared property in the United States." U. S. Const., art. 1, § 8.

States assumes a claim against a state, for then such claim should be paid in full, interest and principal, as the state would have paid it.¹

III. POWER TO ACQUIRE PROPERTY.—The United States may acquire and hold territory and other property in its corporate capacity.² The power to acquire territory, either by conquest or treaty, is clearly implied from the power conferred upon Congress to make wars, and to make treaties.³

It is provided by an act of Congress that the United States cannot acquire land by purchase, except under a law authorizing such purchase.⁴ This act, however, does not prevent the taking of property, real and personal, as security for debts due or to become due the United States.⁵

The United States Cannot Acquire Property by Devise When Forbidden by State Law.—So in New York where a devise of land can be made only to a natural person, or such corporations as are created under the laws of the state authorized to take by devise, the devise of lands to the government of the United States is void. U. S. v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315. So is a bequest to the United States to be administered as a charity, when forbidden by the state in which it is made. Levy v. Levy, 33 N. Y. 97.

As Proprietor Within a State Subject to State Laws.—Where the United States owns lands situated within the limits of a particular state, and over which it has no cession of jurisdiction, for objects either special or general, little doubt exists that the rights and remedies in relation to it are usually such as apply to other landowners within the state. U. S. v. Ames, 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 76; U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 115; New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. (U. S.) 662.

But the United States cannot acquire territory to be held as a colony, and to be governed at its will and pleasure, although it may acquire territory, which at the time has not the population that fits it to become a state, and may govern it as a territory until it has a population which, in the judgment of Congress, entitles it to be admitted as a state of the Union. *Scott v. In U. S. v. Hodge, 6 How. (U. S.) 279, a postmaster had made a mortgage of property, real and personal, to the post office department, to secure the amount due on a settlement to be made six months from the time of the mortgage, including debts due and to become due.

The government cannot appropriate and use a patented invention without compensation to the owner.²

IV. ACTIONS.—1. By the United States.—The United States is entitled to the same remedies for the protection of its legal rights as private parties, its civil rights being in no wise affected by the restraints of the constitution upon its sovereign powers; the power of suing on its part is necessary for the collection of the public revenue, the support of the government, and the payment of public debts.³ When, however, the United States appears as a suitor, it voluntarily submits to the law, places itself upon the same footing with other litigants, and is not entitled to remedies which cannot be granted to individuals.⁴ So, when a

It would be strange to deny them a right which is secured to every citizen of the United States. It would present a strange anomaly, if, having the power to make contracts and hold property as other persons, natural or artificial, they were not entitled to the same remedies for their protection. Cotton v. U. S., 11 How. (U. S.) 229.

The right to sue in its own courts, having once attached, becomes a prerogative right; and Congress will not be presumed to intend to deprive the government of such right, unless the intention appears in plain and unambiguous terms. U. S. v. Shaw, 39 Fed. Rep. 433.

Delegation of Power to Institute Suits.—As a general rule, the federal government, in its own court and those of the states, can act only through its offices and officers established by law. The delegation of power to institute suits by an executive officer to an individual having no official character or responsibility, and the sub-delegation of the same power, without any warrant of law for either, are in conflict with the theory of our institutions and ought not to be sanctioned. U. S. v. Smith, 7 La. Ann. 185.

Where the United States sues on a contract, it has no privileges or rights beyond those of a private person; hence, it must prove the contract the same as an individual, and any interference would be as fatal in one case as in the other. U. S. v. Parmele, 1 Paine (U. S.) 252.

The United States, as a creditor, has the same remedy as a private creditor, and no other, to compel payment of any moneys due it from a debtor corporation, or to prevent it from wasting its assets before the debt matures, and that remedy must be by a regular judicial proceeding in due course of law. *In re Pacific R. The "Arlington Case."—(U. S. v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196). An action of ejectment was instituted by George W. P. C. Lee, against Kaufman and Strong in a court of the State of Virginia, to recover possession of a tract of land known as "Arlington," of which the plaintiff alleged that he was seised in fee. The land was occupied by the United States, through agents and officers, as a military station. The title relied on by the defendants was a certificate of sale of the lands to the United States by the commissioners under an act of Congress for the collection of direct taxes, which certificate was impeached because of the refusal of the commissioners to permit the owner to pay the tax, with interests and costs, before the day of sale, by an agent, or in any other way than by payment in person. The case was removed to the circuit court of the United States by writ of certiorari, where all the subsequent proceedings took place. The jury rendered a verdict upon which judgment was entered, that the plaintiff recovered possession of the premises partly against Kaufman and partly against Strong. The case was then carried to the Supreme Court of the United States on writ of error. Miller, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, observed: "No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law, and are bound to obey it. It is the only supreme power in our system of government, and every man who, by accepting office, participates in its functions, is only the more strongly bound to submit to that supremacy, and to observe the limitations which it imposes upon the exercise of the authority which it gives. Courts of justice are established, not only to decide upon the controverted rights of the citizens as against each other, but also upon rights in controversy between them and the government; and the docket of this court is crowded with controversies of the latter class. Shall it be said, in the face of all this, and of the acknowledged right of the judiciary to decide in proper cases, statutes which have been passed by both branches of Congress and approved by the President to be unconstitutional, that the courts cannot give remedy when the citizen has been deprived of his property by force, his estate seized and converted to the use of the government without any lawful authority, without process of law, and without any compensation, because the President has ordered it, and his officers are in possession? If such be the law of this country, it sanctions a tyranny which has no existence in the mon-

The consent of the United States to be sued must be shown by some act of Congress; an officer of the United States cannot waive its privilege, and lawfully consent to the prosecution of a suit against it.¹ Where, however, the United States seeks its rights from the hands of a court, as where the United States resorts to a prize court to procure condemnation and judicial administration, equity requires that the rights of all parties should be adjudicated, and the court may proceed to the final determinaarchies of Europe, nor in any other government which has a just claim to well-regulated liberty and the protection of personal rights. It cannot be, then, that when, in a suit between two citizens for the ownership of real estate, one of them has established his right to the possession of the property according to all forms of judicial procedure, and by the verdict of a jury and the judgment of the court, the wrongful possessor can say successfully to the court, 'Stop here, I hold by order of the President, and the progress of justice must be stayed.' That, though the nature of the controversy is one peculiarly appropriated to the judicial function, though the United States is no party to the suit, though one of the three great branches of the government, to which by the constitution this duty has been assigned has declared its judgment after a fair trial, the unsuccessful party can interpose an absolute veto upon that judgment by the production of an order of the Secretary of War, which that officer has no more authority to make than the humblest private citizen. The evils supposed to grow out of the possible interference of judicial action with the exercise of powers of the government essential to some of its most important operations, will be seen to be small indeed compared to this evil, and much diminished, if they do not wholly disappear, upon a recurrence to a few considerations. . . . Another consideration is, that since the United States cannot be made a defendant to a suit concerning its property, and no judgment in any suit against an individual who has possession or control of such property can bind or conclude the government, . . . the government is always at liberty, notwithstanding any such judgment, to avail itself of all the remedies which the law allows to every person, natural or artificial, for the vindication and assertion of its rights. Hence, taking the present case as an illustration, the United States may proceed by a bill in chancery to quiet its title, in aid of which, if a proper case is made, a writ of injunction may be obtained. Or it may bring an action of ejectment, in which, on a direct issue between the United States as plaintiff, and the present plaintiff as defendant, the title of the United States could be judicially determined. Or, if satisfied that its title has been shown to be invalid, and it still desires to use the property, or any part of it, for the purposes to which it is now devoted, it may purchase such property by fair negotiation, or condemn it by a judicial proceeding, in which a just compensation shall be ascertained and paid according to the constitution." U. S. v. Lee, 106 U. S. 96. See also Cunningham v. Macon, etc., R. Co., 109 U. S. 446. Gray, J., in delivering the dissenting opinion, said: "The sovereign is not liable to be sued in any judicial tribunal without its consent. The sovereign cannot hold property except by agents. To maintain an action for the recovery of possession of property held by the sovereign through its agents, not claiming any title or right in themselves, but only as the representatives of the sovereign and in its behalf, is to maintain an action to recover possession of the property against the sovereign; and to invade such possession of the agents, by execution or other judicial process, is to invade the possession of the sovereign, and to disregard the fundamental maxim that the sovereign cannot be sued."

3. In State Courts.—Suits against the United States cannot be sustained in the courts of a state.⁴ This exemption is not a no power under direction of the attorney general to submit the government to the jurisdiction of a state court, and thereby clothe that court with a jurisdiction to render a judgment binding upon the United States, in the absence of an act of Congress authorizing it. *Stanley v. In U. S. v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If it be said that the proposition here established may subject the property, the officers of the United States, and the performance of their indispensable functions to hostile proceedings in the state courts, the answer is, that no case can arise in a state court, where the interests, the property, the rights, or the authority of the federal government may come in question, which cannot be removed into a court of the United States under existing laws. In all cases, therefore, where such questions can arise, they are to be decided, at the option of the parties representing the United

In Briggs v. Light-boats, 11 Allen (Mass.) 157, several vessels were built for the United States for the purpose of being used as floating lights, under an agreement to construct and equip them according to certain specifications annexed, and to the satisfaction and approval of an agent of the United States, and to deliver them in the State of Massachusetts for a gross sum to be paid by the United States to the builder after their completion; they were completed and the builder received the contract price; possession was taken by the United States, the spars and rigging were put up, and the lanterns put on board and prepared for use. It was held that the title to them was vested in the United States, subject to the lien for labor and materials furnished the builder, and that such lien could not be enforced in the courts of the state upon proceedings afterward commenced. The court, by Gray, J., said: "The United States have never, by general statute or special order, submitted themselves or their rights in this matter to the jurisdiction of the state courts. . . .

These vessels were not held by the United States, as property might perhaps be held by a monarch, in a private or personal, rather than in a public or political character. It is difficult to see how the government of a republic can hold any property for personal or private purposes. But these light-boats were built and held for public objects only, and were unsuitable for any other. They were, in the precise and emphatic language of the plea to the jurisdiction, 'held and owned by the United States for public uses, and as instruments for the execution of their sovereign and constitutional powers.' The government thus summoned in as a defendant, and from whose possession these vessels are sought to be wrested by the personal privilege which must be pleaded in abatement, but an attribute of sovereignty, and goes to the jurisdiction.¹

If the United States prosecutes its suits in the state courts, availing itself of the state law for that purpose, there is no reason why such state process as it uses for the purpose of enforcing its right, should not be subject to state law.²

4. Set-off Against the United States.—For the same reason that an original suit cannot be maintained against the United States without its consent, a set-off will not be allowed the defendant when the United States is plaintiff, without its express consent.³

order of this court, is not the government of the state by whose constitution and laws this court is established and the tenure of office of its judges secured. But it is the supreme government of the nation. . . . The petitioners suffered the title to pass, and the possession to be delivered, to the United States, before they took one step in the state courts to establish their lien. If they had filed their petitions and attached their vessels before these came into possession of the United States, they might well have contended that the courts of the commonwealth had acquired a jurisdiction of the cases, which could not be divested until the object of the suit was accomplished."

1. Goldsmith v. Revenue Cutter, 6 Oregon 250. And the objection is not waived by pleading to the merits.

2. Subject to State Laws When Suing in a State Court.—"The United States are a body corporate, having a capacity to contract, to take, and to hold property, and in this respect stand upon the same footing with other corporate bodies; if they will prosecute their suits in the state courts, and avail themselves of the state laws for this purpose, it is not perceived that any good reason can be given why such state process as they use for the purpose of enforcing their right, should not be subject to the state law." Hence, where a person committed to jail under a judgment at the suit of the United States, is discharged under state law, such discharge operates as a bar to an action by the United States on a bond for jail liberties. Stearns v. U. S., 2 Patne (U. S.) 300.

The United States, by voluntarily appearing in a state court, as claimant of a fund therein, subjects itself to the jurisdiction of this court, and will be bound by its decision. Johnson v. Stimmel, 89 N. Y. 117.

Suits to Recover Duties.—A suit by the United States to recover a sum of money claimed to be due and owing to them for unpaid duties upon imported goods, may be brought in a state court. The primary object of such a suit being not simply to execute the laws of the United States, but to collect a debt by enforcing an obligation due to it, and in that class of cases, the United States, as a body politic, may maintain an action in a state court in the same manner as other states and sovereignties. U. S. v. Graff, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 304.

And bonds given for duties to the United States, may be sued in the state courts, which have, by the Judiciary Act of the United States, concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States, of all suits at common law, where the United States are plaintiffs. U. S. v. Dodge, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 95.

3. See SET-OFF, RECOUPMENT, AND COUNTERCLAIM, vol. 22, p. 272; STATES, vol. 23, p. 72.

But when the United States proceeds in rem, it opens to consideration all claims of equity in regard to the property libeled, and it then stands, with reference to the rights of the defendants and claimants, precisely as private suitors, except that they are exempt from costs and from affirmative relief against them beyond the demand, or property in controversy. U. S. v. MacDaniel, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 1; U. S. v. Ringgold, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 150; The Siren, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 154.

The proper evidence to show that the claim has been rejected by the accounting officers, is a transcript from the office of the treasury. U. S. v. Gilmore, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 491; U. S. v. Smith, 1 Bond (U. S.) 68.

It is not necessary that the claim be presented before the commencement of the suit. U. S. v. Hawkins, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 125.

It has, however, been provided by law since an early date, that in suits brought by the government, claims for set-offs which have been presented to the accounting officers of the treasury, and disallowed by them, may be admitted upon trial in the reduction of damages, and, under some circumstances, without such presentation.¹ But no judgment can be rendered against the government, although it may be judicially ascertained that, on striking a satisfactory and just balance, the government is indebted to the defendant for an ascertained amount.²

There is no limitation as to the nature and origin of the claim which may be set up, and so it is held that it is intended to allow the defendant full benefit of any credit, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he is sued, or out of any distinct and independent one.³ It is immaterial whether the claim to be

If not presented and disallowed in accordance with the statute, unless within the exception of the statute, a set-off cannot be allowed. U. S. v. MacDaniel, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 1; U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 397; U. S. v. Giles, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 212; U. S. v. Gilmore, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 491; Halliburton v. U. S., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 63; Western Union R. Co. v. U. Smith, 1 Bond (U. S.) 70; U. S. v. Prentice, 6 McLean (U. S.) 65.

Local law or usage cannot affect the determination of questions of set-off in federal courts, as they arise exclusively under acts of Congress. Watkins v. U. S., 9 Wall. (U. S.) 765.

A postmaster, in an action against him to recover money received and not accounted for by him, could not set up a claim for commissions of which he alleged that he had been deprived by the illegal discontinuance of the post office. Such a claim was held to be one for damages merely, and not the subject of set-off, without showing a presentment of the claim, and the audited disallowance of it, or some valid excuse for non-presentment. Ware v. U. S., 4 Wall. (U. S.) 617.

2. DeGroot v. U. S., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 431; U. S. v. Eckford, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 484; Schaumburg v. U. S., 103 U. S. 667.

In a suit in which under local process a verdict for the defendant for an amount set off is the foundation for a scire facias against the plaintiff, no judgment can be rendered for the balance, nor can the writ be issued, the government being exempt from suit. Reese v. Walker, 11 How. (U. S.) 272.

Where, in an action by an assignee in bankruptcy against the United States, the defendant sets up a counterclaim exceeding the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and neither party desires the amount due on the counterclaim to be finally determined, it may be allowed to the extent of defeating the plaintiff's claim, and no further determination be made concerning it. Boughton v. U. S., 13 Ct. of Cl. 284. Yet the indebtedness of the government to the defendant exceeding the amount of the government's claim against the defendant may be established, and such finding will thereafter be conclusive upon the parties. Tillou v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 220.

Set-offs have been allowed for claims for costs arising in a previous suit, U. S. v. Ringgold, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 150; for fees, U. S. v. Mann, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 9; U. S. v. Fillebrown, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 28, and the claims of a military officer for money expended by him in an official capacity. U. S. v. Lent, 1 Paine (U. S.) 417.

If the United States sues, and the defendant holds its negotiable paper, the amount of it may be claimed as a credit, and if, after being presented, it has been disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury, it should be allowed by the jury as a credit on the debt claimed by the United States.

set off is legal or equitable;¹ but unliquidated damages cannot be allowed.²

V. CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.—Claims against the United States are to be settled in the treasury department, or, in cases provided by statute, in the court of claims,³ whose jurisdiction is fully treated elsewhere in this work.⁴ Where there is a dispute as to such claims against the United States, by the officers authorized to adjust such accounts, they may be compromised, and if the claimant voluntarily accepts a smaller sum than the claim, and executes a discharge in full, he is bound by the adjustments, and cannot sue for what he has relinquished.⁵

U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 397.

If a navy agent, without a receipt from a purser, upon a requisition for money, volunteers to pay demands which it is the purser's duty to pay, or shall pay the orders of a purser and shall permit the receipts of the sums paid by him to go into the purser's possession by whom they are exhibited at the treasury, and allowed in the final settlement of his account, without the purser's having given credit to the navy agent, or to the government for the amount, it assumes the character of a private transaction between the purser and the navy agent, or becomes a debt due from the purser, as an individual, to the navy agent, as a private person, and the latter cannot claim the amount at the treasury as an allowance in settlement of his account, nor as a legal or equitable credit in a suit against him by the United States. U. S. v. Hawkins, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 125.

In a suit for taxes brought by the United States, a set-off growing out of independent claims cannot be pleaded. U. S. v. Pacific R. Co., 4 Dill. (U. S.) 69; Apperson v. Memphis, 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 363.

The court cannot allow as a set-off a claim which is a mere appeal to the generosity of the government, such as damages sustained by an officer in the discharge of his duty. U. S. v. Wells, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 161.

A claimant who accepts certificates of indebtedness instead of money, in payment of his demand against the government, cannot afterward recover the difference in value. Gibbons v. U. S., 2 Ct. of Cl. 421.

Constructive Compromises.—In Comstock v. U. S., 9 Ct. of Cl. 141, the following rules concerning constructive compromises were deduced: First, Where the government is contractor, a refusal to carry out an express contract by the head of an executive department, or a dispute on the part of the officers authorized to adjust such accounts, will render the case not merely disputed, but "disputable," within the intent of the ordinary rule of law, so as to make it the subject of compromise, without the compromise being necessarily supported by a new consideration. Second, Where payment of an express contract is disputed by the head of an executive department, and a means of compromise is proffered beyond the ordinary accounting officers of the treasury, or the officers authorized by law to adjust such accounts, such as quasi arbitrament, in the form of a commission, there, if the party, voluntarily or involuntarily, avail himself of the proffered means, and accept the amount which is allowed, without affirmatively informing the government that it will not be taken in discharge of the debts, it will constitute a final and conclusive compromise. Third, Where an express contract is for any reason, or without a reason, disputed by the officers authorized to adjust such accounts, acceptance of the portion allowed, accompanied by the giving of a receipt in

The act of Congress¹ declaring void, under certain circumstances, assignments of claims against the United States, embraces in general every claim against the government, however arising, of whatever nature it may be, wherever and whenever presented.² The act, however, applies only to cases of voluntary assignment, and does not inhibit transfers by operation of law, assignments in bankruptcy, or for the benefit of creditors.³ It operates directly full, will attach to the receipt all the consequences of a release under seal, and be deemed conclusive evidence of a legal agreement to accept a portion in satisfaction of the whole.

Receipt in Full.—The receipt in full for a disputable account will bar a recovery by the claimant in the court of claims. Murphy v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 537. And in such a case, a receipt cannot be impaired or varied by evidence that, by usage of the executive departments, such receipts are regarded only as acknowledgments of the amount paid. Hancox v. U. S., 9 Ct. of Cl. 400.

A receipt in full given upon the payment of a part of a liquidated debt, is not a discharge of the whole debt, and the balance is recoverable. Baldwin v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 297.

2. U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407; Irwin v. U. S., 97 U. S. 392; Burke v. Child, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 441; Ely v. U. S., 19 Ct. of Cl. 658; Morgan v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 319; Johnston v. U. S., 13 Ct. of Cl. 217.

A transfer of an approved account by one of the government departments was held void. 16 Op. Atty. Gen'l 191. So was an agreement with an attorney to pay out of a particular fund a percentage for his services. Burke v. Child, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 441.

A mortgage sale of a claim for services rendered, under a contract to carry the mails, by a railroad company, is within the prohibition of an act, and void. St. Paul, etc., R. Co. v. U. S., 112 U. S. 733.

A transfer or assignment of a decree against the government in an equity proceeding by it for an accounting given after the passage of the act, is void, unless made in accordance therewith, Adams v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 312; and if the act in question covers the case of an assignment of the claim of a county for indemnity for swamp lands sold by the United States, the county which has sold and assigned such a claim, after it has been paid by the government, cannot invoke the law to set aside its contract of sale, or to recover the amount received by its assignee. American Emigrant Co. v. Adams County, 100 U. S. 61.

So far from giving new potency to assignments and transfers of rights of action, so far from changing the common-law rule relative to such rights, the statute strikes down, and denies any effect to powers of attorney, orders, transfers, and assignments which before were good in equity, and which a debtor was bound to regard when brought to his notice. U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407. It embraces alike legal and equitable assignments. It includes powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof. It strikes at every derivative interest, in whatever form acquired, and incapacitates every claimant upon the government from creating an interest in the claim in any other than himself. Spofford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484.

The statute refers only to claims against the United States which can be presented by the claimant to some department or officer of the government for payment, or may be prosecuted in the court of claims. Accordingly, where a person, in anticipation of obtaining a government contract, forms a partnership with two other parties for the execution of the contract, such partnership contract is not a violation of the statute, as, at the time of the contract of partnership, there was no contract with the United States, nor, indeed, any certainty that one would be secured; and hence the party had no claim which he could present for payment, or on which he could have brought suit, and therefore no claim, the assignment of which the statute forbids. There could have been no claim, in any sense of the word, until after the contract with the United States had been performed, in whole or in part. Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 567.

3. Goodman v. Niblack, 102 U. S.

upon the claims themselves, not as a limitation upon, or a definition of, the powers of those who are to adjust or adjudicate them;¹ but payment to one authorized to receive it by power of attorney executed before the allowance of the claim is good, as between the claimant and the government, the statute being for the protection of the government.²

VI. PRIORITY OF THE UNITED STATES AS CREDITOR.—By virtue of the laws of Congress, clearly within its power to enact, debts due the United States have priority over all other debts of a decedent,³ 556; Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298; Erwin v. U. S., 97 U. S. 392; Goreley v. Butler, 147 Mass. 8; Stanford v. Lockwood, 24 Hun (N. Y.) 291.

An assignment which takes place before the United States assumes the indebtedness, is not within the statute. U. S. v. Griswold, 12 Sawy. (U. S.) 398.

Where a shipowner conveys in general terms his interest in a ship and voyage to one of his co-owners, including "any claims by the owners of said ship against the United States government . . . being a compromise sale and settlement of all matters pertaining to the ship," and Congress afterward appropriates money for a pre-existing claim of such ship against the government, the conveyance is not void under this act. United States Rev. Stats., § 3477; Jernegan v. Osborn, 155 Mass. 207.

A Judgment by the Court of Claims against the government is not within the statute, and may be assigned. 12 Op. Atty. Gen'l 216.

1. Becker v. Sweetzer, 15 Minn. 427; Spofford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484; U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407, overruling Lawrence v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 252, which overruled the previous cases of Cooper v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 87; Sines v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 12; Cote v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 64, holding that all transfers and assignments of claims against the United States are made void by the statute, not only when the assignees set up claims in the treasury department, but also when they attempt to sue in a court of claims.

2. Bailey v. U. S., 109 U. S. 432. If a government creditor voluntarily gives such an assignment or power, and the officers of the treasury treat it as valid, and pay the debt to the persons named therein, the parties thereby take the instrument out of the operation of the statute, and the courts must then deal with it as if no such statute existed. "While the courts of the United States cannot give effect to such powers or assignments so long as they remain unexecuted, they cannot ignore consummated transactions under them, by either permitting the assignor to recover from the assignee money paid him, or by compelling the government, whose officers have acted on the faith of such an instrument, to pay the debt a second time. The purpose of the statute is not to protect individuals, nor to regulate the business transactions of private persons, but to protect the government."

But the payment by the government of part of such claim to assignees, will not estop it, when suing for the balance, from denying the validity of the assignment. McKnight v. U. S., 98 U. S. 179. And if the government recognizes an assignment, parties to it cannot claim that it is invalid, as the sole purpose of the statute is the protection of the government, and not that of the parties to the assignment. Goodman v. Niblack, 102 U. S. 556.

Mischiefs Designed to Be Remedied.—

They are mainly two, namely: First, the danger that the rights of the government might be embarrassed by having to deal with several persons instead of one, and by the introduction of a party who was a stranger to the original transaction; Second, that, by a transfer of such a claim against the government to one or more persons not originally interested in it, the way might be conveniently opened to such improper influences in prosecuting the claim before the departments, the courts, or Congress, as frequently in desperate cases, when the reward is contingent on success. U. S. v. Gillis, 95 U. S. 407; Spofford v. Kirk, 97 U. S. 484.

3. See DEBTS OF DECEDENTS, vol. 5, p. 248.

Taxes and funeral expenses are not "debts of decedents," but charges imposed upon the estate, under state law, and must be paid before the claim of and in cases of insolvency, over all the claims of other creditors.¹

A mere state of insolvency, however, is not sufficient to give the preference under the statute; but there must be, as well, an actual assignment, either voluntary or by process of law, of all the debtor's property;² an assignment of all the property and not a part thereof.³ But if the assignment be in fact of all the debtor's property, although it does not so appear in the instrument, or if a small part be left out for the purpose of fraudulent evasion, the priority attaches.⁴

The priority of the United States does not affect a lien, general or specific, existing when the event happened which gave it the preference to priority.⁵

When a deed of assignment transfers all property enumerated in a certain schedule, but does not purport to transfer all the debtor's property, the burden of proof of showing that all the debtor's property is included, is on the United States. U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 108.

Partnership Assets.—The United States has no priority over partnership assets by reason of the indebtedness of one of the partners. U. S. v. Evans, Crabbe (U. S.) 60; U. S. v. Hack, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 271.

3. U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 73. A conveyance to one or more creditors of all the debtor's property, not including the amount due and payable to them, and not for the benefit of the creditors at large, is not such a voluntary assignment as gives the United States priority. U. S. v. McLellan, 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 345.

4. U. S. v. Langton, 5 Mason (U. S.) 280; U. S. v. Clark, 1 Paine (U. S.) 639; U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 73; U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 108; Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (U. S.) 439; U. S. v. Mott, 1 Paine (U. S.) 188.

The priority does not supersede or overrule the assignment as to property, which the United States may subsequently take in execution and prevent such property from passing to the assignee. Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (U. S.) 386. The priority is not a lien on the estate of the debtor, but his priority is simply over other creditors, and is subordinate to the rights of vendees and mortgagees. Brent v. Bank of Washington, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 596. It will not avoid conveyance to a bona fide purchaser, made before an insolvency is declared according to law. Conard v. Nicoll, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 291.

Where a judgment has been obtained by the government after the debtor has filed his petition in insolvency, but before an assignment, it is entitled to priority. Hunter v. U. S., 5 Pet. (U. S.) 173.

The government has priority in a case of a general assignment upon a bond for duties executed before, but payable after, assignment. U. S. v. State Bank, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 29.

In U. S. v. Bryan, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 374, it was held that the priority by the Act of 1797, did not extend to a debt contracted before, although the balance was substituted at the treasury after the act was passed.

VII. UNITED STATES OFFICERS¹—1. Who Are.—Any person occupying a position under the federal government, conferred upon him by a legally authorized election or appointment, whose duties consist of the exercise of important public powers and trusts, as a part of the regular administration of the government, such duties being continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary, and prescribed by the government or by a superior officer, and whose compensation is paid out of the treasury, is an officer of the United States.² Unless one in the service of the United States debted" to the United States, within the meaning of the Act of 1797, and in the event of his insolvency the government is entitled to the priority. Bayne v. U. S., 93 U. S. 642.

1. See also ATTORNEY GENERAL, vol. 1, p. 974; PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, vol. 19, p. 32.

2. "An office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument and duties." Accordingly, when a person, viz., a clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States, was appointed pursuant to law and his compensation was fixed by law; where the "vacating of the office of his superior would not have affected the tenure of his place," and "his duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary, and were to be such as his superior in office should prescribe," such person was held to be an officer of the United States. U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 385.

In U. S. v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 508, it was held that a surgeon appointed by the commissioner of pensions to examine pensioners and applicants for pensions is not such an officer. In delivering the opinion in this case, Miller, J., said: "The duties are not continuing and permanent and they are occasional and intermittent. The surgeon is only to act when called upon by the commissioner of pensions in some special case, as when some pensioner or claimant of a pension presents himself for examination. He may make fifty of these examinations in a year or none. He is required to keep no place of business for public use. He gives no bond and takes no oath, unless by some order of the commissioner of which we are not advised. No regular appropriation is made to pay his salary. . . . There is no penalty for his absence from duty or his refusal to perform."

"An office is defined to be a 'public charge or employment,' and he who performs the duties of the office is an officer. If employed on the part of the United States, he is an officer of the United States. Although an office is 'an employment,' it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to do an act or to perform a service without becoming an officer. But if a duty be a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the government, and not by contract which an individual is appointed by government to perform, who enters on the duties appertaining to his station without any contract defining them, if those duties continue, though the person be changed, it seems very difficult to distinguish such a charge or employment from an office, or the person who performs the duty from an officer." Marshall, C. J., in U. S. v. Maurice, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 103; 24 Myer's Fed. Dec., § 9.

When a person was appointed clerk in the fractional currency office of the treasury department by the direction and with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury, such an appointment constituted him an officer of the United States, within the meaning of the constitution and statutes in regard to officers charged with the safe keeping of public money. U. S. v. Bloomgart, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 356.

A receiver of a national bank, pursuant to an act of Congress, is a United States officer. Platt v. Beach, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 303.

A justice of the peace in the District of Columbia is an officer of the United States so as to render him exempt from militia duty. Wise v. Withers, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 331, rev'd 1 Cranch (C. C.) 262.

And deputies to a United States marshal are officers of the government, within § 22, Act April 20th, 1790. U.

holds his office by virtue of an appointment made by one of the courts of justice or heads of department authorized by law to make such appointment, he is not, strictly speaking, an officer of the United States.¹

2. Eligibility.—The principles relating to eligibility to office in general, have been fully stated in a previous article;² and for any distinctions in this respect between public officers generally and the United States officers, reference must be made to the constitution and statutes.

3. Appointment and Removal.—As has been seen from a definition of a United States officer, his right to hold office is conferred upon him, either by a legally authorized election,³ or by appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, or by a court of law or the head of a department.⁴

4. Departmental Officers.—In regard to the relation of the different executive departments and their officers to the President of the United States, it may be said that while the latter is the chief executive officer,⁵ and certain political duties imposed upon the officers are under his direction, it by no means follows that every officer of every branch of the department is under his exclusive control,⁶ but he is said to act and speak through the heads of

S. v. Tinklepaugh, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 425.

1. So held of a clerk to a paymaster of the navy. U. S. v. Mouat, 124 U. S. 303; U. S. v. Hendee, 124 U. S. 309. In the latter case, however, it was said that while a paymaster's clerk is not for all purposes, and in the general sense of that term, an officer in the navy, yet that such clerk is included in the term "officer," as used by Congress in the act of March, 1883, providing for an increase of pay to officers of the navy according to the length of their service.

So a clerk of the collector of customs is not an officer, and for the same reason, viz.: that he is not appointed by the President, a court of law, or the head of a department; and the fact that his appointment was made with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury does not alter the rule, such approbation not being required by law. U. S. v. Smith, 124 U. S. 525.

By act of March 2d, 1863, § 1, it is provided that any person in the land or naval forces of the United States who shall steal, etc., any money or other property of the government, shall be deemed guilty of a criminal offense and subject to trial by court martial. The third section of the same act provides that any person not in the military or naval forces committing any of the acts prohibited by the first section, shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of $2,000, and in addition double damages, etc. It was held that a paymaster's clerk in the navy is a person in the land or naval forces of the United States, under the first section, and is not liable under the third to the penalty, but only to actual damages in an action by the United States against him. U. S. v. Bogart, 3 Ben. (U. S.) 257.

The payment of navy and privateer pensions, under the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, does not constitute the person paying them an officer of the United States. Brown v. U. S., 1 Curt. (U. S.) 15.

2. See PUBLIC OFFICERS, vol. 19, p. 397 et seq.

3. See ELECTIONS, vol. 6, p. 255.

5. PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, vol. 19, p. 32.

6. Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. (U. S.) 610, where it was also said: "There are certain political duties imposed upon many officers in the executive departments, the discharge of which is under the direction of the President. But it would be an alarming doctrine that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may these departments in relation to subjects which appertain to their respective duties.¹

As a general rule, the official duties of the heads of departments are not ministerial, and therefore are not subject to the direction or control of the courts,² nor are their acts subject to be reviewed by their successors.³ There may, however, be cases in which the conduct of such officers is subject to examination by the courts, think proper which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the constitution; and in such cases the duty and responsibility grow out of, and are subject to, the control of the law, and not to the direction of the President. And this is emphatically the case, where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial character."

The Secretary of State cannot lawfully withhold a command signed and sealed, though directed so to do by the President. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137.

Regulations of a Department.—This phrase in acts of Congress should be understood as meaning general rules relating to the subject upon which a department acts, made by the head of the department, under some act of Congress conferring power to make such regulations, and thereby giving to them the force of law. It does not include a mere order of the President or the Secretary of State. Harvey v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 38.

The regulations of a department, however, in settling its accounts are intended for general rules in the transactions of its business, but are subject to the revision of a court and jury, when they work a manifest injustice to individuals. U. S. v. McCall, Gilp. (U. S.) 563.

1. In U. S. v. Cutter, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 617, where the immediate agent in requiring certain reservations of land for purposes of the government, was the Secretary of War, it was held that his act in requiring such reservation was, in legal contemplation, the act of the President, and, consequently, that the reservation thus made was, in legal effect, the reservation made by order of the President, within the terms of the act of Congress providing for such reservations. Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 513.

The action of the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of the Land Office, in canceling an entry for land, is not a ministerial duty, but a matter of discretion, and the courts will not interfere to control it. Gaines v. Thompson, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 347.

The Secretary of the Navy is the organ through which the President, as commander-in-chief, makes known his will to the navy. Orders issued by him are, in legal contemplation, the orders of the President. 1 Op. Atty. Gen'l 325. His acts and decisions on subjects submitted to his jurisdiction and control by the constitution and laws, do not require the approval of any other officer of another department to make them valid and conclusive. So where the Secretary of the Navy forwarded to a lieutenant a sum of money to pay the medical expenses necessitated by a wound received in a foreign country, the disbursing officer of the treasury had no right to detain it. U. S. v. Jones, 18 How. (U. S.) 92.

2. Decatur v. Paulding, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 497, where Taney, C. J., said: "The head of an executive department of the government, in the administration of the various and important concerns of his office, is continually required to exercise judgment and discretion. He must exercise his judgment in expounding the laws and resolutions of Congress, under which he is, from time to time, required to act. . . . The court could not entertain an appeal from the decision of one of the secretaries, nor revise his judgment in any case where the law authorized him to exercise discretion or judgment."

The official acts of the heads of the executive departments as organs of the President, which are of a political nature, and rest in executive discretion, are not within judicial cognizance, but are only politically examinable. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137.

3. U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 397; Lavalette v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 147.

When a claim is presented to a department head, and by him decided adversely, after referring the same to the President, the principle of res adjudicata applies, and the official's successor cannot reopen and reverse the matter.

I. DEFINITION.—United States commissioners are but officers of the court to whom are committed some of the duties which must otherwise be performed by the court itself, or the judge thereof.²

II. APPOINTMENT OF—1. How Appointed.—By act of Congress of 5 Asst. Atty. Gen'l 28; 5 Asst. Atty. Gen'l 664; 12 Op. Atty. Gen'l 169; 13 Op. Atty. Gen'l 387-456.

1. As, for example, to record a patent, or furnish the copy of a record. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 137.

In Brent v. Hagner, 5 Cranch (C. C.) 71, it was held that the head of a department, chief of a bureau, or clerk of either, has not such possession of the archives of the department that a party can, by writ of replevin against such officer, obtain possession thereof.

2. The exigencies of the public service demand that speedy inquiry shall be made into all criminal charges, in order that the defendants shall be brought to justice; and as, from the press of business or remoteness from the place where the crime may be committed, or other cause, the court cannot always or ordinarily perform that service, commissioners are appointed to facilitate the business. In all that they do they are not separate or independent tribunals, but the arms of the court to execute the preliminary work of securing the presence of the offenders at the time appointed for arraignment and trial. Indeed, they are not, and under the constitution they cannot be, clothed with judicial power to hear and finally determine any matter whatsoever. Their duties relate only to the detention of the accused until the charge against him be formally presented to the court, and constitutionally tried. In that they are not bound to hear more than the evidence of the government, and do not finally determine any question touching the guilt or innocence of the accused. U. S. v. Berry, 4 Fed. Rep. 779. In this case it was held that a writ of prohibition to control the conduct of the commissioner did not lie.

The commissioner "holds no court, he acts simply as an arresting, examining, and committing magistrate." By Woodruff, J., in U. S. v. Case, 8 Blatchf. (U. S.) 250.

March 2d, 1793, and amendatory acts of February 20th, 1812, and March 1st, 1817, it is provided that each circuit court may appoint in different parts of the district for which it is held, so many discreet persons as it may deem necessary, who shall be called, "commissioners of the circuit courts," and shall exercise the powers which are or may be expressly conferred by law upon them.¹

2. Who Eligible.—Any person of lawful age and sound mind, is eligible to appointment as a commissioner, except United States marshals and their deputies, who are prohibited by statute from holding the position or exercising any of its duties.²

III. TENURE OF OFFICE.—There being no statutory limitation of the term of office of a commissioner, he holds during good behavior, subject to removal for incompetency, neglect, or malfeasance in office, by the circuit court, which appointed him, upon a rule to show cause supported by affidavits charging misconduct, and granted on the district attorney's motion after due notice to the commissioner.³

IV. DUTIES AND POWERS OF COMMISSIONERS.—1. Generally.—The duties and powers of a United States commissioner are purely statutory, and are briefly summarized in the note.⁴

S.) 523, he is designated by Field, J., as "an examining and committing magistrate. The powers conferred are judicial in their nature, for judgment and discretion must be exercised, but they are not judicial in the sense in which judicial power is granted by the constitution to the courts of the United States." See In re Kaine, 14 How. (U. S.) 103.

An indictment for perjury committed before a district judge sitting as an examining magistrate, was held bad because it charged the perjury to have been committed in a "court of the United States." U. S. v. Clark, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 497. In delivering his opinion, Justice Story characterized the argument, that a judge under these circumstances was a court, as "utterly insupportable."

1. U. S. Rev. St., § 670. Under the civil rights acts the circuit and district courts are required from time to time to increase the number of commissioners, so as to afford a speedy and convenient means for the arrest and examination of persons charged with crimes against the civil rights of citizens of the United States. Apr. 9th, 1866, ch. 13, § 4, vol. 14, p. 28, and May 31st, 1870, ch. 114, § 9, vol. 16, p. 142; U. S. Rev. St. (U. S.), § 1983.

The appointment is a matter of record in the court from which it emanates, and his authority may be proved by producing such record. U. S. v. Stowell, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 162.

2. Act of August 16th, 1856, U. S. Rev. St., § 628.

3. In re Gilbert, 31 Fed. Rep. 277; In re Eaves, 30 Fed. Rep. 21. In this latter case it was held that while the appointing court has power to remove commissioners at pleasure, such discretion should be a sound and legal one, and such power should never be exercised capriciously or arbitrarily; but the court should proceed with great caution, and every presumption of innocence allowed in a criminal case should be indulged in favor of the commissioner.

4. First. To administer oaths and take acknowledgments, in all cases in which, under the laws of the United States, such oaths or acknowledgments might be made or taken before a justice of the peace of any state or territory, or the District of Columbia. U. S. Rev. St., § 1778. Under this section, oaths and acknowledgments should be certified under the hand and official seal of the commissioner, and are given the same force and effect as if taken or made before a justice of the peace under the state laws. A paper certified by a commissioner, under his hand and official seal, as a true copy of the original record in a proceeding within his jurisdiction, is admissible in evidence without oath. Frost v. Holland, 75 Me. 108. An oath under the United States banking law may be administered by a commissioner or notary public, and perjury assigned upon. U. S. v. Neale, 14 Fed. Rep. 767. But he has no authority to administer, such as is required by act of Congress, to a deputy surveyor of the United States, and to take and certify his affidavit in regard to the manner in which he has fulfilled a contract for surveying, to be used in procuring pay for such services. U. S. v. Reilly, 131 U. S. 58.

Second. To apprehend fugitives from justice in certain cases. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 5270, 5271.

Third. To bail, commit and examine offenders against the laws of the United States, in accordance with the usual mode of process against offenders in the state. U. S. Rev. St., § 1014. And see Ex p. Kie, 46 Fed. Rep. 485; Ex p. Halley, 1 Okla. 12.

Fourth. To take bail and affidavits, when required or allowed, in any civil case in any circuit or district court. U. S. Rev. St., § 945. In the absence of a rule of court providing otherwise, appeal bonds in admiralty may be taken and approved by a commissioner under this section, The Canary No. 2, 22 Fed. Rep. 536; but a stipulation in admiralty authenticated by the mere certificate of a commissioner appointed in another circuit is not authorized or binding. Sawyer v. Oakman, 11 Blatchf. (U. S.) 65. It has been held that these statutes make a distinction between civil and criminal business, giving commissioners of the circuit courts authority to take bail, affidavits and depositions in civil cases, while in criminal proceedings, they have the powers of magistrates in arresting and imprisoning offenders, but no general powers in respect to depositions and affidavits in criminal causes. U. S. v. Smith, 17 Fed. Rep. 510.

Fifth. To hold to security of the peace, and good behavior in cases arising under the laws of the United States, as may be lawfully exercised by any judge or justice of the peace of the respective states in cases cognizable before them. U. S. Rev. St., § 727.

Sixth. To issue search warrants authorizing any internal revenue officer to search premises, if such internal revenue officer shall make an oath in writing that he has reason to believe and does believe that a fraud upon the revenue has been or is being committed by the use of the said premises. U. S. Rev. St., § 3462. By Act of Congress of August 14th, 1876, commissioners were also authorized to issue search warrants for counterfeits of trade-marks, labels, stamps, brands, wrappers, etc., where the owner of any registered trade-mark, or his agent, made oath that he had reason to believe that such trade-marks, labels, brands or wrappers were in the possession of any person with intent to use the same for the purposes of deception and fraud. This statute seems to have been omitted from the Revised Statutes.

Seventh. To take proof of debts in bankruptcy, subject to revision by the register of the court; and to take evidence and examinations in proceedings in bankruptcy. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 5076, 5003.

Eighth. To carry into effect the award, arbitration or decree of any consul, vice consul or commercial agent of any foreign nation, made as judge or arbitrator in differences between the captains and crews of vessels, and to issue all proper remedial process, mesne and final; to carry into full effect such award, arbitration or decree, and to enforce obedience thereto by imprisonment. U. S. Rev. St., § 728.

Ninth. To issue his warrant for, and arrest seamen of foreign nations in certain cases of controversy, difficulty or disorder, where the consuls or agents of the foreign governments have exclusive jurisdiction of such controversies by treaty stipulations. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 4079, 4080, 4081.

Tenth. To arrest deserting seamen from foreign vessels. U. S. Rev. St., § 5280.

Eleventh. To summon masters of vessels to show cause why process should not issue against the vessels for payment of wages due seamen. U. S. Rev. St., § 4546.

Twelfth. To discharge poor convicts of the United States who are imprisoned solely for the non-payment of a fine, or fine and costs, after such convict has been imprisoned thirty days, on taking the oath required by statute. U. S. Rev. St., § 5296.

Thirteenth. To institute prosecutions against all persons violating the civil rights of citizens of the United States. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 1982, 1983, 1984.

Fourteenth. To act as chief supervisor of elections when appointed for that purpose. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 2024-2031. And see ELECTIONS, vol. 6, p. 310.

In the territory of Alaska they have jurisdiction in all testamentary and probate matters, in accordance with the laws of Oregon,¹ and in Utah, commissioners appointed by the supreme court may exercise all the powers and jurisdiction possessed by justices of the peace of the territory.²

2. Commissioner's Process.—A commissioner's process runs throughout the district for which he is appointed, but cannot run into other states or districts, unless, perhaps, under indorsement from some commissioner or judge in the district where it is to be executed. A commissioner should, however, avoid bringing prisoners and witnesses from remote parts of his own district, if there are other commissioners residing nearer to the prisoner or the place of the commission of the offense before whom he can make his warrant returnable; as one commissioner can commit on an affidavit taken before another.³ When an offense is begun in one circuit and completed in another, the commissioners for either circuit may examine and commit the offender just as if the crime had been wholly committed in their circuit, as the statute makes it punishable in either judicial circuit.⁴ A subpcena may run into any other district.⁵ Although the commissioner may not be "a court of the United States," within the meaning of the statute, process issued by him for the apprehension or detention of a criminal is "legal process" within the meaning of the statutes of the United States, so that resisting or obstructing an officer in the execution thereof, is a criminal offense.⁶

A commissioner is authorized to appoint one or more suitable persons who shall execute all such warrants or other process as he may issue.⁷

3. Power to Secure Attendance of Witnesses.—Witnesses should, if possible, be summoned at the same time that the prisoner is

As to the pay of supervisors and the presentation of their accounts, see In re Conrad, 15 Fed. Rep. 642; Gayer v. U. S., 33 Fed. Rep. 625; Muirhead v. U. S., 13 Ct. of Cl. 51; U. S. v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151; In re Allen, 19 Fed. Rep. 809. This statute has been repealed by the Fifty-third Congress.

Fifteenth. To examine witnesses mentioned in letters rogatory addressed from any court of a foreign country to any circuit court of the United States. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 4071, 4072, 4073.

1. Under the organic law of Alaska, commissioners have jurisdiction in the first instance, subject to the jurisdiction of the district judge, in all testamentary and probate matters, in accordance with the laws of Oregon, applicable to that territory, and are vested with the jurisdiction of the county court of Oregon pertaining to probate courts. Ex p. Emma, 48 Fed. Rep. 211.

2. And a commissioner exercising such jurisdiction at a particular precinct, has only the power and jurisdiction belonging to a justice of the peace of that precinct. People v. Hills, 5 Utah 410.

3. Ex p. Bollman, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 129.

Where the examination is transferred by the commissioner before whom the warrant is returnable to another commissioner in the same district, the latter has jurisdiction to take the examination and commit the defendant, if the charge is sustained. In re Wahll, 42 Fed. Rep. 822.

arrested, so as to avoid delay in the examination,¹ and all the names of witnesses should be included in one subpoena, if possible. The commissioner is authorized to require of any witness produced against the prisoner, on pain of imprisonment, a recognizance, with or without sureties, for his appearance to testify in the case, and where the crime or offense is charged to have been committed on the high seas, or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, he may require a like recognizance and sureties from the defendant's witnesses, if in his opinion their testimony is important and liable to be lost otherwise.²

All papers concerning the case or certified copies thereof, together with the recognizances of the witnesses, should be returned by the commissioner as speedily as may be into the hands of the clerk of the court.³

4. Power to Punish for Contempt.—It would seem to follow that as commissioners do not hold a court,⁴ they have no power to punish for contempt committed against them, and where a witness refused to be sworn or testify before a commissioner, it was held, in a well-considered opinion, that the commissioner had no power to punish for contempt, but must refer any matter of contumacy, obduracy, or contempt to the court, as masters in chancery and registers in bankruptcy are required to do.⁵

5. Power to Hold to Security of the Peace.—A commissioner has a like power to hold to security of the peace, and for good behavior, in cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, as may be lawfully exercised by any judge or justice of the

2. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 879, 1014.

3. U. S. Rev. St., § 1014.

4. See supra, this title, Definition.

5. In Ex p. Perkins, 29 Fed. Rep. 909, Gresham, J., said: "It is not necessary to decide whether a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or a circuit or district judge, sitting as an examining magistrate, may punish a contumacious witness or other person guilty of misconduct before him. It is sufficient in this case to hold that commissioners exercise such powers as are expressly conferred on them by Congress, and that neither section 1014, nor any other federal statute, authorizes them to punish for contempt."

In Ex p. Doll, 7 Phila. (Pa.) 595, it was held that a commissioner has no power to commit a citizen for an alleged contempt, and Cadwalader, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that he very much doubted the power of Congress to invest a commissioner with authority, in a proceeding originally instituted before him, to summarily commit a citizen for an alleged contempt. This was an exercise of the judicial power of the United States, which, under the constitution, could not be intrusted to an officer appointed and holding his office in the manner in which these commissioners are appointed and hold their offices.

On the other hand, it has been held that where, by the local law, a justice of the peace, or other similar state magistrate, has power to attach a disobedient witness and punish him for contempt, a commissioner has like authority, and that the punishment is left to the discretion of the commissioner within the limits of the power conferred on magistrates in similar cases by the state laws. In re Thompson, M. S., Opinion of Krekel, J., Conklin's Treatise 576.

A commissioner of the supreme court of Utah has no authority to arrest a person for contempt for writing and publishing newspaper articles concerning his court, and a writ of pro-peace of the respective states, in cases cognizable before them,¹ and a judge or commissioner, if there are just grounds of suspicion, may require security for the observance of the neutrality laws.²

6. Adjournment—Bail.—A commissioner may adjourn a hearing to another time and place, but cannot do so in the absence of the accused.³ On adjournment, the commissioner may take bail for the further appearance of the accused; but his power in this respect is the same as a state magistrate, and no greater.⁴

7. Duties and Powers in Case of Extradition.—(See EXTRADITION, vol. 7, p. 623 et seq.)

8. In Proceedings to Secure Seamen's Wages.—Where the residence of the district judge is more than three miles distant, or he is absent from home, United States commissioners are given authority, whenever any dispute arises between the master of a vessel and a seaman, concerning wages, or the wages of any seaman are withheld for more than ten days after the time they should have been paid, to summon the master to appear before them to show cause why process should not issue against the vessel to answer for the wages due the seamen.⁵ Before assuming to act, hibition will lie to prevent such arrest. People v. Carrington, 5 Utah 531.

1. U. S. Rev. St., § 727; U. S. v. Horton's Sureties, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 94.

If there is probable cause to believe that the accused is guilty of treason, he may be required to give security of the peace and for good behavior. U. S. v. Greiner, 4 Phila. (Pa.) 396.

2. U. S. v. Quitman, 2 Am. L. Reg. 645, 652.

3. The power to adjourn to another time and place is incident to the power to hear and determine, but the commissioner cannot adjourn in the absence of the accused. U. S. v. Rundlett, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 41.

In the recent cases the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly held that the granting or refusing of motions for continuance is a necessary incident to, and a part of the hearing and determining of criminal charges by a commissioner, and that the exercise of such a power in criminal proceedings is indispensable to the right of the accused to have a fair and full investigation of the offense charged against him, and to a sufficient time for the summoning of his witnesses, as well as for employing and consulting with counsel to aid him in his defense. U. S. v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483; U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142.

4. U. S. v. Horton, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 94. In this case the Missouri statute provided that a magistrate might adjourn the examination of a prisoner for a period not exceeding ten days at one time. At the request of a prisoner charged with violating the revenue law, a commissioner adjourned the examination for nineteen days and took bail for his appearance at the end of that time; the bail having been forfeited, it was held, in a suit against the sureties, that the commissioner's order for the appearance of the accused after an interval of nineteen days was directly contrary to law, and that recognizance for such an appearance was invalid, and that the consent of the accused could not confer jurisdiction or power to make the order, nor did it estop him or his sureties to set up the invalidity of the recognizance. And to the same effect, see U. S. v. Rundlett, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 41; U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; U. S. v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483.

In New York, a commissioner has no authority to take bail for the appearance of a party accused for examination before himself at a future day, the magistrates in that state having no power to take such recognizance. U. S. v. Case, 8 Blatchf. (U. S.) 250.

the commissioner should satisfy himself of the absence of the district judge, and his certificate should show this fact upon its face;¹ but if he once assumes to act, the court will not go behind the certificate.² If the master fails to show that the wages are paid, or otherwise satisfied, or forfeited, or if the matter in dispute is not settled, the commissioner shall certify to the clerk of the district court that there is a sufficient cause of complaint whereon to found admiralty process against the vessel, and the clerk shall thereupon issue process against the vessel, and the suit shall be proceeded with in the district court and final judgment given according to the usual course of admiralty courts in such cases.³

All the seamen should be joined as complainants in this proceeding;⁴ but although the libel is in its form joint, the contract is treated in admiralty as a several and distinct contract with each seaman.⁵ The seamen are competent witnesses for each other.⁶ The remedy is a cumulative one, which the seamen may pursue at their option, and they are not thereby deprived of the right, in the first instance, to resort to the ordinary admiralty process against a vessel upon a direct application to the court or judge.¹

Indeed, the court is not certain that the certificate of the commissioner should show affirmatively the absence of the judge from his residence. It does not appear in the form prepared by Benedict, now a distinguished admiralty judge, and formerly a United States commissioner."

9. Power to Carry into Effect Awards of Foreign Consuls.—Commissioners have power to carry into effect the award or arbitration or decree of any consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of any foreign nation made or rendered by virtue of authority conferred upon him.² The consul's authority to make any award or decree which will be enforced by officers or courts of the United States under this section, must come, not from any law, rule or regulation of his own country, but from some statute or treaty stipulation of the United States, conferring such power upon him, for under the general international law, a consular officer has no right to sit as judge or arbitrator within a foreign territory, and render decrees or orders enforceable by the foreign courts.³

1. Murray v. Ferry-boat, 2 Fed. Rep. 86. Acheson, J., in this case says: "The remedy conferred by the statute is not exclusive, but cumulative, and the right of the seaman to arrest the vessel is not dependent upon a previous resort to the statutory proceeding, but it is optional with him, whether to pursue the preliminary measure of summoning the master, or make direct application for admiralty process. Ship William Jarvis, Sprague (U. S.) 485; The M. W. Wright, 1 Brown Adm. 290; The Waverly, 7 Biss. (U. S.) 465. The first two of the above cited cases arose under the Act of 1790; the latter, under sections 4546 and 4547, of the Rev. Stats."

2. U. S. Rev. St., § 728. By this statute application for the exercise of this power, is required to be made by petition to the court or commissioner; and the commissioner is authorized to issue all proper remedial process, mesne and final, to carry into full effect, the award, arbitration or decree of the consul, and to enforce obedience thereto by imprisonment in the jail of the district, until such award is complied with, or the parties are discharged therefrom by the consent in writing of the consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or his successor in office, or by the authority of the foreign government. The foreign government, or its agent, requiring such imprisonment, must, by the terms of the statute, bear all expenses of said proceeding, and the imprisonment and maintenance of the prisoner.

It has been held that section 728 of the Rev. Stats. should be construed in connection with sections 4079, 4080, and 4081, of the Rev. Stats., and that the authority, apparently given to all consular officers in section 728, is limited to such officers of foreign nations as are entitled thereto by treaty stipulations, and then only when such foreign country gives the same privilege to consular officers of the United States, which fact is to be ascertained and proclaimed by the President of the United States.

In Re Aubrey, 26 Fed. Rep. 848, Pardee, J., said: "In the revision of the statutes, the preamble to these sections is omitted, and the application of the statutes seems to be enlarged so as to embrace the consular agents of all nations; and it does embrace all consular agents whose governments give them jurisdiction, unless the statute is so construed as to hold that the authority conferred to sit as judge or arbitrator, etc., mentioned in the statute, refers to and is limited to authority conferred by the consent of the United States. Such a construction is strengthened by the original preamble to the statute, and by the fact that the Rev. Stats., sections 4079, 4080, 4081, are limited in terms to such officers of foreign nations as are entitled thereto, under treaty stipulations with the United States, and then only when such foreign country gives the same privilege to consular officers of the United States, the latter fact to be ascertained and proclaimed by the President."

Arrest of Foreign Seamen on Application of Consul.—By Rev. Stats., sections 4079, 4080, 4081, commissioners

10. To Arrest Deserting Seamen from Foreign Vessels.—Commissioners are given power to arrest deserting seamen from foreign vessels, where such seamen are not citizens of the United States, and to deliver them up to the consul or vice-consul of the foreign government.¹ This is the only remedy provided in case of a foreign seaman deserting,² and it applies only to desertion when the vessel is in a United States port, and the deserter is not an American citizen.³

11. To Discharge Poor Convicts.—A commissioner has power to discharge from imprisonment any person sentenced by any court of the United States to be imprisoned and pay a fine, or fine and costs, where such person has been confined in prison thirty days, solely for the non-payment of such fine and costs.⁴

are given power, on the application of foreign consuls, to cause the arrest and imprisonment of foreign seamen in certain cases of difficulty, controversy, and disorder on board of foreign ships, where, by treaty stipulations, the consuls of such foreign powers have exclusive jurisdiction of such controversies and disorders, and where American consuls are allowed similar privileges in the foreign nation represented by such consul. No citizen of the United States can be held under these provisions, but if it appears, upon an examination, that the person complained of is a citizen of the United States, he shall be forthwith discharged from arrest, and shall be left to the ordinary course of law, and no person can be imprisoned for a longer period than two months after his arrest; but, at the end of that time, shall be set at liberty, and shall not be again arrested for the same cause. The procedure and powers of the commissioner are fully set forth in the sections referred to.

1. No person so arrested shall be detained longer than two months or be again molested for the same cause. U. S. Rev. St., § 5280.

2. U. S. v. Minges, 5 Hughes (U. S.) 494.

3. 16 Op. Atty. Gen'l 358.

4. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 5296, 1042. In order to obtain a discharge under these sections, the convict must make application in writing to any commissioner of the United States court in the district where he is imprisoned, setting forth his inability to pay such fine, or fine and costs, and, after notice to the district attorney, who may appear, offer evidence, and be heard, the commissioner shall proceed to hear and determine the matter. If, on examination, it shall appear to the commissioner that such convict is unable to pay such fine, or fine and costs, and that he has been imprisoned thirty days solely for the non-payment of the same, and that he has not any property exceeding twenty dollars in value, except such as is by law exempt from being taken on execution for debt, the commissioner shall, upon his taking the following oath, "I do solemnly swear that I have not any property, real or personal, to the amount of twenty dollars, except such as is by law exempt from being taken on civil process for debt by the laws of (naming the state where oath is administered), and that I have no property in any way conveyed or concealed, or in any way disposed of, for my future use or benefit. So help me God," discharge such convict, and shall give to the keeper of the jail a certificate, setting forth the facts.

Term of Imprisonment Must Have Been Completed.—If one sentenced to a term of imprisonment and to pay a fine and costs and be imprisoned until they are paid, is pardoned on condition that such payment be made, he is not entitled to his discharge as a poor convict under this section, until the term has been completed, and thirty days in addition for the non-payment of the fine and costs. In re Ruhl, 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 186.

Illegal Sentence.—The object of this section is to grant a discharge to a poor convict, after he has been imprisoned for thirty days for a fine, or fine and costs, on showing his inability to pay the same; a sentence, therefore, of imprisonment for a stated period, and for fifty days beyond that period for the non-payment of a fine of one hundred dollars, was held erroneous, as authorizing an imprisonment for twenty days longer than the law under this section of the Rev. Stats. allows to be inflicted. Kie v. U. S., 27 Fed. Rep. 356.

12. To Take Depositions de Bene Esse.—In civil causes pending in a district or circuit court, the testimony of any witness may, in certain cases, be taken before a commissioner de bene esse.¹ The commissioner must not be of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, or interested in the event of the cause, and his certificate should so state.² This power can only be exercised in a civil cause pending in a district or circuit court,³ and upon reasonable notice in writing to the opposite party, or his attorney of record.⁴

1. See generally BILL TO TAKE TESTIMONY DE BENE ESSE, vol. 2, p. 285. In civil causes pending in a district or circuit court, the testimony of any witness may be taken before a commissioner de bene esse, in the following cases: First, when the witness lives at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles; second, or is bound on a voyage to sea; third, or is about to go out of the United States, or out of the district in which the case is to be tried, and to a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of trial, before the trial; fourth, when he is ancient and infirm. U. S. Rev. St., § 863.

A commissioner of the district court may take a deposition under this section, when such district court has the power of a circuit court. Whitney v. Hunt, 5 Cranch (C. C.) 120. The certificate of the person taking the deposition that he is such commissioner, is sufficient, and his appointment need not be authenticated by the record. Whitney v. Hunt, 5 Cranch (C. C.) 120; Vasse v. Smith, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 31; Ruggles v. Bucknor, 1 Paine (U. S.) 358.

2. The commissioner's certificate should state: First, that he is not the attorney or counsel or a party in interest; second, that the depositions were reduced to writing in deponent's presence; third, in what court it is to be used; but where it fails to do so, leave will usually be given to withdraw the deposition, in order that the certificate may be amended. Gartside Coal Co. v. Maxwell, 20 Fed. Rep. 187; Donahue v. Roberts, 19 Fed. Rep. 863. But see Miller v. Young, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 53; Peyton v. Veitch, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 123.

3. And it has been held that, after an appeal is taken and perfected, the case is no longer "depending" in the circuit court, and hence is removed from the operation of the act of Congress permitting depositions to be taken de bene esse. Richter v. Jerome, 25 Fed. Rep. 681; Slaughter House Cases, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 273. It has been held that this act has no application to cases pending in the supreme court, The Argo, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 287; and must be strictly construed. Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 351; Harris v. Wall, 7 How. (U. S.) 693; Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 157.

4. Reasonable notice must first be given in writing by the party, or his attorney, proposing to take such deposition to the opposite party, or his attorney of record, as either may be nearest. U. S. Rev. St., § 863. By the thirtieth section of the Judiciary Act of 1789 (1 Stats. at Large 88), notice was required to be served on the adverse party, or his attorney, provided either of them was within one hundred miles of the place where the deposition was to be taken, and the certificate of the commissioner, that neither the adverse party, nor his attorney, lived within one hundred miles of such place, and that therefore no notice was made out, was held sufficient. Dick v. Runnels, 5 How. (U. S.) 7.

If an attorney has acted in the cause, notice should be given, though his name does not appear on the record. Allen v. Blunt, 2 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 121. And where depositions are to be taken against the government, the United States attorney must have notice. The Argo, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 314.

In an action against three persons, where only one was arrested, and the magistrate certified that no notice was given to the defendant under arrest, because he was not within one hundred miles of the place of caption, but the other two defendants were within that distance, a deposition was held inadmissible. Brown v. Piatt, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 253.

The notice must be reasonable,¹ and should contain the name of the witness to be examined,² and the time and place of examination;³ but it need not state the reason for taking it.⁴ Any person may be compelled to appear and depose,⁵ and everyone deposing must be cautioned, as well as sworn, to testify the whole truth.⁶ The mode of taking depositions is either by oral questions put at the time, if desired, and not necessarily by written interrogatories given to the officer before commencing;⁷ but the testimony must

If the deposition be taken without notice, the other party must have it retaken. Goodhue v. Bartlett, 5 McLean (U. S.) 186.

Waiver of Notice.—The requirements as to previous notice are not necessary, if notice was in fact served, and the adverse party appears by counsel and cross-examines the witnesses. Dinsmore v. Maroney, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 416.

1. Notice Must Be Reasonable.—A notice served at noon, for the taking of a deposition between four and six o'clock on the same day, was held not to be a reasonable notice, no circumstances being shown why longer notice might not been given. Renner v. Howland, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 441. And a notice given at Washington the last day of December, of the taking of a deposition at Baltimore on January second following, was held not reasonable. Barrell v. Simonton, 3 Cranch (C. C.) 681. It was so held of a notice served at half-past eight o'clock to take testimony between nine and two on the same day, in the place where all the parties resided. Irving v. Sutton, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 575. But one hour's notice, where all the parties resided in the same place, in the absence of special circumstances showing it to be unreasonable, has been held a sufficient and reasonable notice. Leiper v. Bickley, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 29; Nicholls v. White, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 58.

2. Carrington v. Stimson, 1 Curt. (U. S.) 437.

3. Leiper v. Bickley, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 29; Egbert v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 7 Fed. Rep. 47.

4. DeButts v. McCulloch, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 286. Nor that it was to "put interrogatories," nor is it bad if a word be accidentally omitted from the caption. Bussard v. Catalino, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 421.

5. Compulsory Process.—Any person may be compelled to appear and depose, as provided by this section, in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in court. U. S. Rev. St., § 863.

6. U. S. Rev. St., § 863. The deponent must be cautioned as well as sworn. Luther v. The Merritt Hunt, Newb. Adm. 4. But see contra, Brown v. Piatt, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 253. But if it be certified that he was "sworn in pursuance of the act," it will be sufficient, although it does not say that he was cautioned. Moore v. Nelson, 3 McLean (U. S.) 383.

The certificate should show that the deponent was carefully examined and cautioned and sworn to testify to the whole truth. Pentleton v. Forbes, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 507; Garrett v. Woodward, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 190; Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Jackson, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 295; Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 151; Rainer v. Haynes, Hempst. (U. S.) 689; Bussard v. Catalino, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 421.

The witness may be sworn before or after the deposition is written, Tooker v. Thompson, 3 McLean (U. S.) 92; and may affirm, if it be certified by the commissioner that he is conscientiously opposed to taking an oath. Elliott v. Hayman, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 678.

As to the form of the oath administered, the law of the state controls. Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Jackson, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 295.

7. Bischoffsheim v. Baltzer, 10 Fed. Rep. 1.

Parties having a right to take a deposition under the federal statute in a common-law case, may, as to the mere mode of procuring the deposition, follow as their election, either the provisions of the state law or the acts of Congress; the depositions may be taken upon written interrogatories duly served under the state statute and in the mode therein provided, as well as in the manner provided by act of Congress. Flint v. Com'rs, 5 Dill. (U. S.) 481; McLennan v. Kansas City R. Co., 22 Fed. Rep. 198. But see contra, opinion by Swing, District J., in Sage be reduced to writing by the commissioner, or by the deponent in the commissioner's presence, and subscribed by the deponent,¹ and these facts must clearly appear upon the certificate, and will not be presumed.² The depositions should be retained by the commissioner until delivered into court with his own hand, or be sealed up by him and directed to the court, and remain under seal until opened by the court.³

v. Tansky (Ohio, 1877), 6 Cent. L. J. 7. And the United States circuit court, sitting in a state where, by state laws, depositions of witnesses can be taken only upon commission, can authorize, in the absence of any conflicting federal statute, commissioners to take depositions of witnesses, to be issued, executed, and returned in the manner, and subject to the regulations prescribed by the laws of such state, and the restrictions limiting the use of depositions de bene esse do not apply. Warren v. Younger, 18 Fed. Rep. 859. But see Randall v. Venable, 17 Fed. Rep. 162, where it was held that if a state law for the taking of depositions conflicts with the acts of Congress on the subject, depositions taken according to the mode prescribed by the statutes of the state, are not admissible in evidence in a circuit court of the United States. "The laws of the state are only to be regarded as rules of decisions in the federal courts, where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States have not otherwise provided; when the latter speaks, they are controlling." By Bradley, J., in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Schaefer, 94 U. S. 458. And see Ex p. Fisk, 113 U. S. 713. And where Congress has provided a mode of taking testimony, the district and circuit courts of the United States are not authorized to make rules touching the mode of taking such testimony. Randall v. Venable, 17 Fed. Rep. 162.

1. The testimony shall be reduced to writing by the magistrate taking the depositions, or by the deponent in the magistrate's presence, and by no other person, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing, be subscribed by the deponent. U. S. Rev. St., § 864.

2. Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 355. The omission by the commissioner in his certificate, of the fact that he reduced the testimony to writing himself, or that it was done by the witness in his presence, is fatal. Cook v. Burnley, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 659; U. S. v. Smith, 4 Day (Conn.) 126; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 355; Donahue v. Roberts,

A certificate by the commissioner that it was reduced to writing by the witness and himself, has been held good. Bussard v. Catalino, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 421. But where the commissioner certified that it was reduced to writing in his presence, without saying by whom, the certificate was held bad. U. S. v. Smith, 4 Day (Conn.) 121.

3. U. S. Rev. Stat., § 865, provides that the deposition taken under the previous sections shall be retained by the magistrate taking it, until he delivers it with his own hand into the court for which it is taken; or it, together with a certificate of the reasons of taking it, and of the notice given to the adverse party, shall be sealed up and directed by him to such court, and remain under his seal until opened by the court. The commissioner should certify that he retained the deposition until it was sealed and directed to the court. Shankwiker v. Reading, 4 McLean (U. S.) 240.

If he does not retain the deposition until he delivers it into court, or seals or directs it to the court, it cannot be read. Jones v. Neale, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 268.

Where an officer by whom depositions are taken, sends them to the court by due course of mail, his certificate has been held sufficient, though it failed to state that he delivered the depositions to the court, or that he sealed them up and deposited them in the post office. Egbert v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 7 Fed. Rep. 47.

A deposition not sealed must be rejected, but it is sufficient if it bears the seals of an express company over which is written the name of the commissioner. In re Thomas, 35 Fed. Rep. 337; Thorpe v. Orr, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 335.

13. Power Under Dedimus Potestatem.—A commissioner may take depositions under a dedimus potestatem,¹ but where depositions de bene esse can be taken a dedimus potestatem will not be granted.²

V. PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COMMISSIONER—1. Mode of Procedure.—A commissioner, in the examination of criminals, and in his process of mittimus, should, in the absence of federal statutes, proceed according to the law of the state in similar cases;³ and the provision of the United States statute that, "no writ is necessary to bring any prisoner into court or to remand him," has been held inapplicable to proceedings before commissioners—that commissioners should issue commitments on remanding prisoners for further examinations from day to day, and a final commitment on the decision of the case designating the crime for which the prisoner is held, such being the proceedings before committing officers under the state laws.⁴

A warrant of commitment not stating on its face any offense, is not evidence of a commitment for felony, although written on the back of a warrant of arrest charging a felony, but not referring to it in the commitment warrant.⁵ A warrant of commitment of a seaman for deserting must be under the seal of the commissioner, must be founded on oath or affirmation, and must limit the term of imprisonment.⁶

The proceedings before the commissioner having terminated by a commitment of the prisoner, he has no further power over him and cannot afterward discharge him.⁷ The only question before the commissioner is, whether there is probable cause, and the confession of the prisoner of the crime charged, without other proof of the corpus delicti, has been held sufficient to warrant a commissioner in committing him for trial.⁸

2. The Complaint.—A complaint must allege all necessary juris-livers the deposition in court, he need not state any reason for taking it. Jones v. Neale, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 268.

1. U. S. Rev. St., §§ 866, 867, 868. These sections of the statutes being in derogation of the common law, are strictly construed, and no commission should be issued except to prevent a failure of justice. U. S. v. Parrott, McAll. (U. S.) 456.

2. Walsh v. Rogers, 13 How. (U. S.) 286; Turner v. Shackman, 27 Fed. Rep. 183.

3. U. S. v. Martin, 17 Fed. Rep. 154; In re Kelley, 25 Fed. Rep. 268.

Indiana Rev. Stats. (1881), §§ 1628, 1639, are made applicable to United States commissioners' examinations held in Indiana by U. S. Rev. St., § 1014, and they contemplate a trial and hearing, and a commissioner is not bound to accept an offer of the accused

4. U. S. Rev. St., § 1030; U. S. v. Martin, 17 Fed. Rep. 154.

The commitment of a prisoner on a preliminary warrant for examination, should be for a short fixed period of time, and not for an indefinite time. The time should not exceed twenty-four hours, except for special cause shown, unless requested by the prisoner. U. S. v. Worms, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 332.

dictional facts, and if made simply upon information and belief, is fatally defective, and gives the commissioner no jurisdiction.¹ The commissioner, before issuing the warrant, should have before him the oath of the real accuser to the facts upon which the charge is based, and on which belief or suspicion of guilt is founded,² and he has no jurisdiction to examine or commit on a complaint alleging facts, which, if true, would constitute no offense against the United States.³

3. Authority of District Attorney Over Commissioner's Proceedings.—A district attorney of the United States has no absolute power to dismiss a criminal charge while an examination of the accused is proceeding before a commissioner. After indictment found, and before trial has commenced, the attorney has absolute power to enter a nolle prosequi, but while the charge is under investigation before the commissioner, he attends only as counsel for the government, to present the evidence against the accused, and has no control over the course to be pursued.⁴

4. Correction of Errors.—The errors of a commissioner may be

A warrant of commitment must state a good cause certain, supported by oath. Ex p. Burford, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 448.

Objections to Complaint.—Mere formal or doubtful objection to the complaint on preliminary hearing or examination, should not be considered by the commissioner, but the complaint should be treated as sufficient, unless so defective in its material averments, that a court, before which it was presented by a grand jury, would be bound to decline to act upon it. In re Clark, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 540.

Amendment of Complaint.—In extradition cases, it has been held that the commissioner has no power to amend the complaint or warrant, or to supply defects by his certificate after the case is closed, and a writ of certiorari is served upon him to produce the record of his proceedings. Ex p. Lane, 6 Fed. Rep. 34.

2. In re Rule of Court, 3 Woods (U. S.) 502. In this case Bradley, J., entered the following order for the guidance of commissioners: "No warrant shall be issued by any commissioner of this court for the seizure or arrest of any person charged with a crime or offense against the laws of the United States upon mere belief, or suspicion of the person making such charge; but only upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation of such person, in which shall be stated the facts within his own knowledge constituting the grounds for such belief or suspicion."

3. Ex p. Perkins, 29 Fed. Rep. 900. A recognizance taken by a commissioner conditioned for the appearance of the principal, "to answer the charge of a willful and corrupt conspiracy to burn the steamer Martha Washington on the Mississippi river," is void, as not describing an offense made punishable by any act of Congress cognizable by the circuit court. U. S. v. Hand, 6 McLean (U. S.) 274.

4. U. S. v. Schumann, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 523.

The district attorney has no authority to take from the United States marshal a commissioner's warrant, for the purpose of deciding whether it shall be executed. It is the duty of the marshal to execute and return such warrants to the commissioner, notwithstanding any order of the district attorney to the contrary. The commissioner acts on his own responsibility, and is not subject to the control either of the district attorney or the marshal. See U. S. v. Scroggins, 3 Woods (U. S.) 529. In delivering the opinion in this case, Judge Woods said: "If the district attorney can suppress a commissioner's warrant after it is issued and before it is executed, he can forbid the commissioner to issue the warrant. If he has this supervision of the conduct of the commissioners, he has the same over the conduct of the circuit justices and the circuit and district judges, and can forbid them to issue warrants,

VI. COMPENSATION AND ACCOUNTS.—A commissioner is compensated by fees fixed by law;² and in case the fees for any service that he is authorized to render are not fixed by statute, he is permitted to charge the same fees that are allowed to clerks or

although, in their judgment, the warrants should issue. Such a power will hardly be claimed for the district attorney, and yet such a power is the logical sequence of what is claimed for him on this hearing. . . . The power does not exist in that office, and it would be a most dangerous power, and liable to the greatest abuses, if it did."

1. The commissioner is subject to the control of the court when acting as an examining magistrate, and the court can assume control of the proceedings, whenever justice may require it. U. S. v. Berry, 4 Fed. Rep. 779. But any defect of power or error committed by him can only be revised and corrected by the courts of the United States; the state court has no jurisdiction to remise or correct his judgment, or to liberate a prisoner committed or held by a commissioner upon habeas corpus, and no state court or judge, after they are judicially informed that the party is imprisoned under the authority of the United States, has any right to interfere with him, or require him to be brought before them. Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. (U. S.) 506.

2. U. S. Rev. St., § 847.

Where the United States district attorney examines and approves complaints drawn by a commissioner, the court will not reduce the fees for the same on account of being unnecessarily verbose, unless it appears that surplusage was inserted merely to increase fees. Barber v. U. S., 355 Fed. Rep. 886. See Bell v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 26; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671.

The above section relates to commissioners appointed by the circuit court, and does not affect a private agreement between an attorney and a commissioner appointed by the court of commissioners of Alabama for claims providing for a certain charge per day for taking depositions. Powers v. Manning, 154 Mass. 370.

A commissioner in the territory of Arizona is entitled, under the U. S. Rev. St., § 837, and Act of August 7th, 1882 (22 Stat. at Large 244), to charge double the fees allowed to commissioners by the Act of Feb. 26th, 1853 (10 Stat. at Large 161). McGrew v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 273.

In Alaska, if the duties of the commissioner arise from a violation of the Oregon statutes, made applicable to Alaska, he is entitled to the fees allowed in similar cases in Oregon, otherwise to the usual commissioner's fees. Jewett v. U. S., 27 Ct. of Cl. 519.

A commissioner has discretionary powers in hearing and deciding criminal charges, to suspend the hearing of a case where, in his judgment, a proper regard for the interests of justice requires it, and is entitled to per diem fees where continuances are granted by him at a defendant's request. U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; U. S. v. Carter, 140 U. S. 702; U. S. v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483; Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405. See also McKinistry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211; Harper v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 56; Goodrich v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 392; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671. And see 3 Lawrence's Comptroller Dec. 268.

He is entitled to per diem fees where the proceeding consists of an arraignment and plea, an examination of witnesses, granting a continuance, fixing the amount of bail, and committing the prisoner in default of bail. McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1.

He is entitled to per diem fees pending the preliminary examination of an offender, though no witnesses are examined or arguments heard on some of the days. Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357; U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671.

He is entitled to fees for services rendered in good faith in criminal proceedings, in case of actual arrest and hearing, whether the accused was discharged or held for trial; and it is immaterial that the complaint was defective, if it was manifestly intended to charge an offense. Southworth v. U. S., 151 U. S. 179. And see Van Buren v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 77.

But not to a per diem fee for an examination of a complaint antecedent to issuing a warrant, nor is he entitled to per diem fees for hearing and deciding different cases on the same day. McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1. The expression "criminal charges" is restricted to cases in which formal written complaints have been legally preferred, and does not include the examination of complaining witnesses to determine whether a warrant shall issue, and this, although this duty is placed by statute upon committing magistrates of the state in which he acts. U. S. v. Patterson, 150 U. S. 65, distinguishing U. S. v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483. And see also Ives v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 363.

Where a commissioner charged for services which he was not required to perform, but which might have been performed by clerks; for entries as to subpoenas where the warrants were returned "not executed;" for daily pay for an unusual number of days in criminal cases, for which the accounting officers requested an explanation and none was given; for new subpoenas, where a pending case was adjourned from day to day; for additional warrants on such adjournments; for separate recognizances for witnesses where all might have been joined in one; for process returned where the defendants were not held; and for copies when the original was required, it was held that his accounts would not be allowed. Davies v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 468.

He is entitled to fees in each of two separate cases for distinct offenses against the same defendant, McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1; and his fees will not be disallowed in two or more cases on the ground that they might have been jointly prosecuted with another case of the same character, where the district attorney elected that they be prosecuted separately. Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446; Barber v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 886.

He is not entitled to fees for filing final bonds. Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446.

Fees in Criminal Cases.—In criminal cases, a commissioner of the circuit court is entitled to the following fees: for drawing complaints, where the local practice requires the complaint to be reduced to writing, 20c. per folio; for each oath administered in connection with the complaint, 10c., and 15c. for each jurat; for filing a complaint or other paper, 10c.; for issuing

He is entitled to fees for enter-a warrant, $1; for entering returns thereon, 15c. per folio; for filing a warrant, 10c., and the same fees for like services in issuing and return of subpoena; for acknowledgment of recognizance, 25c. each; but only one acknowledgment can be allowed for each recognizance; for the oaths of sureties and the jurats to such oaths; for pay rolls of witnesses, 15c. per folio and 10c. for each oath administered to witness in support of his claim for his fees; for transcript of proceedings, 15c. per folio; for depositions on examinations, 20c. per folio; for filing each paper, 10c. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 177; U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164; U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142.

In cases where the defendant is charged with violation of the elective franchise law, he is entitled to a fee of $10 for all services incident to the arrest and examination. Hazeltine v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 424.

He is entitled to fees for hearing and deciding criminal charges, where his services consist in fixing the amount of bail, and committing the defendant to jail if it is not tendered. Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154.

In internal revenue cases, unless the complaint is made by an officer of the internal revenue, the complaint must allege personal knowledge on the part of the affiant of the acts constituting the offense, or the prosecution must be approved by the district attorney, or by the circuit or district judge, as a prerequisite to the payment of any fees. Sundry Civil Appropriation Bill, June 30th, 1889; Treasury Circular, July 21st, 1891.

But where the attorney general requested the courts to adopt such a rule, and one of them failed to do so, a commissioner in that circuit who continues to issue warrants without the approval of the district attorney is entitled to his fees. Morgan v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 481.

An indorsement by the district attorney that "the commissioner will issue the warrant if, in his opinion, there is reasonable ground to believe the accused guilty," is a sufficient compliance with the rule. Churchill v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 1.

1. The words "like services" mean similar, not identical services, and where the service of the clerk bears a substantial resemblance to the duty performed by the commissioner, it is a ing returns on warrants and subpœnas,¹ taking and filing depositions,² drawing affidavits,³ administering oaths,⁴ drawing and fil-like service. U. S. v. Wallace, 116 U. S. 398.

Where a statute requires the services of public officers, who are paid exclusively by fees, but makes no provision therefor, they are entitled to the fees allowed by law in like cases. Cass v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 118.

If, for any service which commissioners are authorized to render, no statute or rule of court fixes the compensation, the local law may be resorted to as a proper basis in cases where the fees are payable by the government. 4 Op. of Atty. Gen'l 233. And see Cooper v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 346.

In Tennessee, the seal of a magistrate is necessary to validate a process, and the Rev. Stat., § 1014, requires the process issued by a commissioner to be the same as that issued against offenders under the state law by examining magistrates. The Rev. Stat., § 828, allows clerks one dollar for issuing and entering every process, with certain exceptions, and a further fee of twenty cents for affixing the seal of the court to any instrument when required. Rev. Stat., § 847, allows commissioners the same fees as are allowed clerks for like services. It was held that the allowance of twenty cents applies only to instruments for which specific provisions are not made, and that a commissioner in Tennessee is not entitled to such fee for affixing his seal to warrants, writs of mittimus, etc., issued by him upon preliminary examinations; such action being a necessary part of the issuance of the process and paid for by the fee for the process. U. S. v. Clough, 55 Fed. Rep. 373, reversing 47 Fed. Rep. 791; Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921.

1. U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; Clough v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 791; Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357; Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921; U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556; Goodrich v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 392; Rand v. U. S., 38 Fed. Rep. 665; McDermott v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 217. But see Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280; Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154; Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17; McKinistry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211.

He is entitled to fees for entering the returns on warrants and subpœnas, since such returns are necessary in order to ascertain what the deputy marshals have done, and what fees they have earned. In re Gourdin, 45 Fed. Rep. 842.

2. A charge of twenty cents per folio proper for depositions taken on examination is allowable, but each deposition is not a paper within the meaning of the Rev. Stat., § 828, allowing a "fee for filing and entering every declaration, plea, and other paper," and the charge for filing the same is improper. All depositions attached together and filed are a single paper. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164.

The Alabama Code provides that the magistrate, in a preliminary examination of a criminal, shall reduce the testimony to writing, and styles such testimony a deposition; but the testimony need only be signed by him and need not be certified and filed, nor are the same formalities observed in the proceeding as are prescribed in the taking of depositions; and it was held that such an examination, in the case of one charged with an offense against the United States, not reduced to writing by a commissioner in Alabama, was a "deposition" within the meaning of the Rev. Stat., § 847, prescribing a fee of twenty cents per folio for taking and certifying depositions to file. Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17; McKinistry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211.

3. He is entitled to compensation for drafting affidavits of the supervisors that they had actually performed the services, where the attorney general instructs him that such affidavits are required before the supervisors shall be paid for their services. U. S. v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151; 40 Fed. Rep. 217. But see Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280; Bell v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 26. Or for drawing and filing affidavits upon which warrants are issued, where, by the laws of the state, such affidavits are necessary to the issuance of the warrants. In re Gourdin, 45 Fed. Rep. 842; Ravesies v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 224. Or for drafting affidavits of sureties in bail bonds. Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921. But a commissioner is not entitled to fees for the preparation of affidavits to facilitate the discharge of the duties of the district attorney, that being no part of his duty. Ravesies v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 299.

4. He is entitled to a fee of ten cents

ing complaints,¹ issuing writs,² and taking acknowledgments and for each oath administered in connection with complaints in criminal cases, and fifteen cents for each jurat, as for a certificate. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164. And see Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921; McDermott v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 217.

He is entitled to a fee for administering the oath in every criminal complaint made before him, and for filing the same, but not for drawing the complaint. Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17; McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211. And also to a fee for oaths administered to sureties in criminal cases, Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671; McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211, and for oaths administered to witnesses as to their mileage and attendance, and for each certificate issued to a witness for his pay. Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17; McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211.

His jurat to an oath of a supervisor of elections is a proper charge under the Rev. Stat., § 828, allowing fifteen cents per folio for entering any returns or making any record, "certificate," return, or report. U. S. v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151. And he is entitled to a fee for administering an oath to a supervisor under the Rev. Stat., § 2927, requiring commissioners to forward oaths of office of supervisors of election. Hoyne v. U. S., 27 Ct. of Cl. 289. But see Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446, where it was held that he was not entitled to fees for drawing affidavits and administering oaths in qualifying supervisors, though he performed such services at the request of the chief supervisor. Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446.

1. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164; U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; Rand v. U. S., 38 Fed. Rep. 665; Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357; Clough v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 791; U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 177; Goodrich v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 392; Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446.

He is entitled to fees for drawing complaints, as for taking and certifying depositions to file; for entering returns of process, and for writing out the testimony of witnesses examined by him. U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; U. S. v. Carter, 140 U. S. 702. He is entitled to fees for drawing complaints in criminal cases at the rate of twenty cents per folio. Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921.

He is entitled to fees for drawing complaints in criminal proceedings, in states where it is the practice for the committing magistrate to put them in writing. U. S. v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151, modifying 40 Fed. Rep. 217.

He is entitled to fees for drawing complaints, although the accused is already in custody under process from the state court. U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556.

Though one complaint is ordinarily sufficient, notwithstanding the number of charges against the defendant, the court, in its discretion, may allow the commissioner's charges for more than one case against the same person for violation of the same section of the Revised Statutes. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 177, reversing 35 Fed. Rep. 886.

In Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280, and Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154, it was held that he was not entitled to fees for drawing complaints on which to base warrants of arrest, in the absence of a law of the state requiring committing magistrates to do so. And see Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17; McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211.

2. In a state where a prisoner is required to be committed to jail during adjournment, for want of bail, a commissioner is entitled to a fee for a mitimus issued by him for that purpose, if in his opinion the safe custody of the prisoner requires such precaution. U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; U. S. v. Carter, 140 U. S. 702. And see Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405; Clough v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 791; Clough v. U. S., 55 Fed. Rep. 921; Hoyne v. U. S., 38 Fed. Rep. 542.

But he should not be allowed fees for temporary warrants of commitment issued by him to hold prisoners, already before him on proper warrants, in custody during adjournments, Gilbert v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 218; unless a jailor refuses to receive the prisoner. Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154; McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1; Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280.

The commissioner is entitled to fees for warrant, affidavit, etc., where the accused person was not arrested, having left the state. Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405; Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154.

A new warrant is necessary when a prisoner is transferred from state to federal custody, and the commissioner recognizances;¹ but the acknowledgment of a recognizance is a single act for which only a single fee is chargeable, though it be made by both principal and sureties.² He is entitled to fees for copies of protest and transcripts of the record returned to the clerk's office;³ and formerly he was entitled to compensation for keeping a docket when directed by the court to do so, but that is is entitled to a fee therefor. Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357.

He is entitled to fees for written orders of commitment and discharge of persons necessarily remaining in the custody of the commissioners over night. Heyward v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 764.

He may charge for issuing two subpoenas in the same case, where the witnesses reside in opposite directions and have to be subpoenaed by different officers. Goodrich v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 392.

He is entitled to a fee of $1 for issuing, and 10c. for filing, a warrant, and 25c. for issuing a summons, and 10c. for filing it when returned. McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211.

1. U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164. And the fee is fixed by statute at 25c. Barber v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 886.

He is entitled to fees for taking acknowledgments of recognizances, since the acknowledgment is an essential part of the recognizance. In re Gourdin, 45 Fed. Rep. 842; Goodrich v. U. S., 42 Fed. Rep. 392; McKinstry v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 813.

Where the justices of the peace of the state have power to take such recognizances, the commissioner is entitled to a fee for a recognizance of record taken by him. Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405.

And where a statute of the state provides for taking the recognizance of an offender upon any adjournment of the examination, a commissioner examining an offender is entitled to fees for taking their recognizances from day to day. U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556, aff'd, 48 Fed. Rep. 357.

But where a bond for the defendant's appearance is taken, no recognizance is required, and the charge for taking the same will be disallowed. Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280.

Nor is he entitled to fees for drawing affidavits of justification of sureties to bail bonds of defendants, Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154; nor for taking acknowledgments to bail bonds.

Fees for recognizances must be allowed, although the instruments exceed the length arbitrarily fixed by the comptroller as sufficient, when they contain no unnecessary verbiage. Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357.

His fees cannot be scaled, on the ground that the form of recognizance used was longer than necessary, where such form has been used in his district for a long time, and thus impliedly sanctioned by the court. Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446.

But where the principal and surety enter into recognizances by separate acknowledgments before the commissioner, he is entitled to a fee for each acknowledgment. Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405; McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1. And see Crawford v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 446; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671; Barber v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 886.

It must appear that it was necessary to take separate acknowledgments, U. S. v. Hall, 147 U. S. 691; and where both are present and make the acknowledgment at the same time, he is entitled to but one fee. Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154; Churchill v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 1.

3. He is entitled to fees for copies of process returned to the clerk of the court under § 1014 Rev. Sts., in cases where no charge was made for returning the originals. *Ravesies v. U. But where, according to the practice in his state, he makes written notes of the testimony in a case before him, and sends them in to the district attorney, he should be allowed compensation for the same under § 1014 Rev. Sts., requiring the commissioner to perform his duty "agreeably to the usual mode of process" in his state. Stafford v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 280.

When required by order of the court to forward a transcript of the proceedings in each case examined by them to the clerk, they are entitled to be paid for the copy at the rate of ten cents per folio, and for the certificate annexed thereto at the rate of fifteen cents per folio, and are entitled to compensation for a monthly report in duplicate of all cases instituted or examined before them at the rate of fifteen cents per folio. McKinstry v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 211; Strong v. U. S., 34 Fed. Rep. 17.

1. In U. S. v. Wallace, 116 U. S. 398; 20 Ct. of Cl. 273, it was held that a commissioner who, by direction of the court, keeps a docket of entries of each warrant issued and subsequent proceedings thereon, made on the day of the occurrence, is entitled to a fee like that allowed to the clerk for dockets, indexes, etc., although his docket entries may differ from those made by the clerk. And see Phillips v. U. S., 33 Fed. Rep. 164; Heyward v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 764; Rand v. U. S., 38 Fed. Rep. 665. And where the Chinese Immigration Act of July 5th, 1884 (23 St. at L. 117), imposed duties upon commissioners, but made no provision for compensation, he was held nevertheless entitled to docket fees. Cass v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 118.

But the Deficiency Appropriation Act of Aug. 4th, 1886 (24 United States Stats. 274), providing that commissioners shall "be paid the same compensation as is allowed to clerks for like services, but they shall not be entitled to any docket fees," was held to operate as an amendment to § 847 of the Rev. Stat., and to abolish docket fees altogether. U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; U. S. v. McDermott, 140 U. S. 151, rev'g McDermott v. U. S., 40 Fed. Rep. 217; U. S. v. Carter, 140 U. Rep. 813; Calvert v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 762. But see contra, Bell v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 889; Hoyne v. U. S., 38 Fed. Rep. 542. But it does not apply to docket fees earned before its passage. Gardner v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 24; Thornley v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 765; Rand v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 357; U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671.

A commissioner who, before it was required by an order of the circuit court, kept a docket of all criminal cases, according to the practice of his state, was held entitled to his fees therefor. Knox v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 367. And in Phillips v. U. S., 33 Fed. Rep. 164, it was held that commissioners are impliedly authorized to keep a docket, and entitled to docket fees therefor.

Where the keeping of a commissioner's docket is not required by statute, and no fees are allowed or paid for keeping the same, the commissioner is not bound to allow a special agent of the department of justice to inspect a docket kept by him. In re Rand, 18 Fed. Rep. 99.

2. Clough v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 921,

The accounts of commissioners must be verified by oath and submitted for approval in open court by the district attorney,¹ which approval is prima facie evidence of the correctness of the items therein charged.² But the approval of the court is not a prerequisite to payment, and if the commissioner verifies and presents his accounts, as required by law, and the court declines to act upon them, his right to compensation is not thereby defeated.³

following U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 164.

1. And the court will thereupon cause an order to be entered of record approving or disapproving the account, as may be according to law and justice. 18 St. at L., ch. 1, p. 95.

A commissioner cannot maintain a suit against the government to collect fees due him, unless his petition is filed within six years of the time when the last item of service charged for was rendered. Patterson v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. Rep. 322.

Payment of Witnesses. — Witnesses before commissioners are paid by duplicate orders on the marshal of the district. If more than four witnesses are summoned, their materiality and importance must be certified to and approved by the district attorney. U. S. Rev. St., § 981.

2. And in the absence of clear and unequivocal proof of mistake on the part of the court, is conclusive. U. S. v. Jones, 134 U. S. 483; U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142.

And hence a commissioner was held entitled to fees for drawing orders, etc., in excess of the number of folios allowed by the accounting officers, where his account had been approved by the court. Faucett v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 154; McCafferty v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 1.

The decision of the comptroller is conclusive only within the executive department, and his disallowance of a commissioner's fees is not within the proviso of the Act of March 3d, 1887 (24 Stats., p. 505), giving the circuit and district courts concurrent jurisdiction of claims against the United States, providing that it shall not be construed as giving those courts jurisdiction to hear and determine "claims which have heretofore been rejected, or reported on adversely by any court, department, or commission authorized to hear and determine the same." U. S. v. Rand, 53 Fed. Rep. 348; 3 C. C. A. 556.

3. U. S. v. Knox, 128 U. S. 230; Knox v. U. S., 23 Ct. of Cl. 367.

But the refusal of the court may be considered as bearing on the good faith of the transaction. Southworth v. U. S., 151 U. S. 179.

The law in regard to the duties of the courts in approving the accounts of commissioners is contained in Act of Feb. 27th, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 333), which provides: "United States commissioners shall forward their accounts, duly verified by oath, to the district attorneys of their respective districts, by whom they shall be submitted for approval in open court, and the court shall pass upon the same in the manner aforesaid. . . . Nothing contained in this act shall be deemed in any wise to diminish or affect the right of revision of the accounts to which this act applies by the accounting officers of the treasury, as exercised under the laws now in force."

In Turner's Case, 19 Ct. of Cl. 629, the court said: "In our opinion, the duty imposed upon the court of examining and approving or disapproving of accounts which are not to be taxed in cases pending therein, and are not chargeable to any fund within its control, but are payable out of the public treasury after review by the accounting officers, is not a judicial power, the exercise of which constitutes the approval or disapproval a judicial determination of the rights of the parties. A similar question, almost identical with this in principle, was discussed in the case of U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. (U. S.) 40, and we understand the views there expressed in the opinion of the court to warrant the conclusion which we have reached on that point. The statute having made such accounts, after approval or disapproval, subject to revision by the accounting officers of the treasury, in the ordinary processes of accounting, the order of the court is only prima facie evidence of the amount due thereon from the United States. That evidence may be rebutted by either party when the account is reviewed, either in the treasury department or by this court, in a suit brought upon it."

I. UNITED STATES COURTS IN GENERAL—1. Definition.—The United States courts are the judicial tribunals established and maintained under the federal constitution and laws. They are courts of limited jurisdiction, and can exercise only such powers as are granted by the constitution and the acts of Congress.¹

2. Authority and Organization.—The warrant for the existence of the United States courts resides in the constitution and in the laws passed in accordance therewith.² The constitution has established a judicial system, and roughly defined its jurisdiction, leaving to the subsequent legislation of Congress to provide for the organization of courts, fix the number of the judges, and regulate

S.) 586; U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 32; Boyce's "Manual of Practice in U. S. Circuit Court" (1869), p. 21.

In U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. Rep. 885, the court, by Speer, J., said: "The courts of the United States are of limited jurisdiction, and they can try no case which, either in the action of the court, the exercise of its jurisdiction, or in the controversy itself, is not a case provided for by the laws of the United States."

The United States Const., art. 3, § 1, provides that, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

2. The provision of the United States Const. is to be found in art. 3, § 1.

more minutely the jurisdiction and procedure.¹ As to these matters the constitution is mandatory upon Congress,² whose duty it is to provide for them, and that body has full power to make proper changes at any time.³ This power was exercised in an act passed Sept. 24th, 1789, entitled, "An Act to Establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,"⁴ and thus was framed the system of tribunals which, with modifications, exists to-day.⁵

3. Enumeration—(See also COURTS, vol. 4, p. 447).—The courts of the United States are as follows: The Supreme Court; the Circuit Courts of Appeals; the Circuit Courts; the District Courts; the Court of Claims; the Court of Private Land Claims; and the courts of the territories and of the District of Columbia. Besides the foregoing, the Senate of the United States is a court for the trial of impeachments. There are also sundry other bodies and officers possessing certain judicial or quasi judicial powers, but which are not properly judges or courts.⁶

4. Officers—a. IN GENERAL.—The courts of the United States have the usual officers of judicial tribunals, such as clerks, reporters, marshals, deputy marshals, etc. Their duties and fees, and

3. Congress has complete authority to establish courts, and commission officers of courts, in order to carry out the provisions of the constitution. Stephens, Petitioner, 4 Gray (Mass.) 559. It may, under the constitution, at any time establish circuit and district courts in any state of the Union, and confer on them both legal and equitable powers. Livingston v. Story, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 632. The courts thus established must, however, be invested with judicial powers, and cannot be made the instruments of Congress for conducting mere legislative investigation. In re Pacific Railway Commission, 32 Fed. Rep. 241. Military courts of a temporary character may be established in a state in insurrection. The Bark Grapeshot, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 129. Congress cannot confer judicial power on an executive officer. Beatty v. U. S., Dev. Ct. of Cl. 231. Nor on a military commission. Ex p. Milligan, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 121. Congress may make changes in the constitution of courts pending a suit, so as to oust jurisdiction which has already attached. Ex p. McCardle, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 506.

5. Justice Stanley Matthews' "Judicial Power of the United States" (pamphlet 1888), p. 13.

6. The interstate commerce commission is not a court. The court, by Jackson, J., in Kentucky, etc., v. Bridge Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 567, said it "is invested with only administrative powers of supervision and investigation, which fall far short of making the board a court, or its action judicial, in the proper sense of the term. . . . The functions of the commission are those of referees or special commissioners, appointed to make preliminary investigation of, and report upon, matters for subsequent judicial examination. In respect to interstate commerce matters covered by the law, the commission may be regarded as the general referee of each and every circuit court of the United States, upon which the jurisdiction is conferred of enforcing the rights, duties, and obligations recognized and imposed by the act. It is neither a federal court under the constitution, nor does it exercise judicial powers, nor do its conclusions possess the efficacy of judicial proceedings."

The commissioner of pensions is not a judicial officer, and the United States can go behind his decisions and recover money paid under pensions improv-

b. JUDGES—(1) Appointment and Removal.—The President is empowered by the constitution to “nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate . . . appoint judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for.”² This clause includes the appointment of judges of the lower federal courts, which is to be made in the same manner as that of the justices of the supreme court.³

Before exercising the powers, and performing the duties of judge, the appointee must take the oath of office prescribed by law.⁴ The distinction between officers de facto and de jure existing at common law applies in the case of United States judges, and the powers, and the effect of the acts of each are governed by the general legal rules.⁵

The judges, when appointed, hold office during good behavior,⁶ and receive for their services compensation which cannot be diminished during their continuance in office.⁷ They are amenable for any corrupt violation of their trust, being subject to impeachment by the Senate. If convicted, they may be removed from office.⁸

(2) Duties and Powers.—It is the duty of the judge to preside at trials, decide upon questions of the admissibility of evidence, charge the jury, summing up the evidence, and, at his discretion, erly granted. U. S. v. Lalone, 44 Fed. Rep. 475.

6. In Kentucky, etc., Bridge Co. v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 567, the court, by Jackson, C. J., said: “Congress, in ordaining and establishing inferior courts and prescribing their jurisdiction, must confer upon the judges appointed to administer them the constitutional tenure of office, that of holding ‘during good behavior,’ before they can become invested with any portion of the judicial power of the government.” This provision of the constitution does not apply to judges of the territorial courts who exercise strictly no part of the “judicial power,” but are officers of courts erected by the United States, by virtue of its sovereignty over the territories. American, etc., Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 546; McAllister v. U. S., 141 U. S. 176.

The fees of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia cannot be diminished during their term of office. U. S. v. Moor, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 160.

8. “Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.” United States Const., art. 1, § 3.

expressing his opinion on the facts, render judgments and decrees, and perform the other general judicial functions.¹

To this end he is invested with the authority and powers usually granted to judges by the common law.² This includes the power to administer oaths, preserve order, and punish for contempt.³ In addition to these general powers the statutes grant him certain special authority, as that of arresting offenders against the laws of the United States,⁴ and issuing writs of habeas corpus.⁵

During his term of office he is forbidden to practice law.⁶ In making official appointments, he is prohibited from conferring any office in his gift upon a near relative, either by blood or by affinity.⁷

1. Summing Up the Evidence.—It is the duty of the trial judge to sum up the evidence in order to assist the jury. U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. Rep. 896; Rucker v. Wheeler, 127 U. S. 85.

He may, in either civil or criminal cases, whenever he thinks it will assist them in arriving at a just conclusion, express his opinion on the questions of fact which he submits to them. Simmons v. U. S., 142 U. S. 148; Vicksburg R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545; U. S. v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 123 U. S. 113.

In Lovejoy v. U. S., 128 U. S. 171, the court, by Gray, J., said: "It is established by repeated decisions that a court of the United States, in submitting a case to the jury, may, at its discretion, express its opinion upon the facts, and that such an opinion is not reviewable in error, so long as no rule of law is incorrectly stated, and all matters of fact are ultimately submitted to the determination of the jury."

The practice in United States courts is quite different in this regard from that of the state courts. The United States judge can comment on facts, although whatever he says will be advisory only, and have the effect alone of aiding the independent judgment of the jury. U. S. v. Hall, 44 Fed. Rep. 864.

In Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 439, the court, by Swayne, J., said: "Care must be taken that the jury is not misled into the belief that they are alike bound by the views expressed upon the evidence, and the instructions given as to the law. They must distinctly understand that what is said as to the facts is only advisory, and in no wise intended to fetter the exercise finally of their own independent judgment. Within these limitations, it is the right and duty of the court to aid them by recalling the testimony to their recollection, by collating its details, by suggesting grounds of preference where there is contradiction, by directing their attention to the most important facts, by eliminating the true points of inquiry, by resolving the evidence, however complicated, into its simplest elements, and by showing the bearing of its several parts and their combined effect, stripped of every consideration which might otherwise mislead or confuse them. How this duty shall be performed depends in every case upon the discretion of the judge."

Rulings.—A judge will, in general, follow the rulings of one of his colleagues at a former stage of the case, or a precedent established in another case. Cole Silver Min. Co. v. Virginia, etc., Water Co., 1 Sawy. (U. S.) 685; Wakelee v. Davis, 44 Fed. Rep. 532; Worswick Mfg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 30 Fed. Rep. 625. But this is not invariable. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Sanders, 47 Fed. Rep. 604.

Greater respect will be paid to the ruling of a higher judge than to that of a lower judge. Preston v. Walsh, 10 Fed. Rep. 315.

2. U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 32.

3. See U. S. Rev. St., § 715.

Authority existed, however, independently of this statute, it being implied in the very existence of the court. U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. Rep. 885.

4. U. S. Rev. St., § 1014.

5. U. S. Rev. St., § 752.

6. U. S. Rev. St., § 713.

7. "No person related to any justice or judge of any court of the United States, by affinity or consanguinity within the degree of first cousin, shall hereafter be appointed to, or employed by, such court or judge in any office or duty in any court of which such justice or judge may be a member." 25 St. at L., p. 437.

Being a judicial officer, he cannot be required to perform any but judicial duties.¹ He is, while exercising the functions of his office, exempt from civil liability for his judgments.² In order that his acts may have the binding effect of valid judgments, they must be performed while the court is in session, or while he is exercising his legal powers in chambers. Under other circumstances, even though present in body, he is absent in the eye of the law.³

c. CLERKS—(1) Appointment and Removal.—Clerks are inferior officers whose appointment has been vested by Congress in the courts of law under certain restrictions differing in the several courts.⁴ This power of appointment implies the right to remove, which may be exercised at any time by the appointing power, either by direct act, or by granting the office to a successor of the incumbent. The exercise of the right cannot be reviewed by the United States Supreme Court.⁵ The clerk must, before entering on his duties, take the oath of office,⁶ and give a bond in a sum to be fixed and sureties to be approved by the court which appoints him, for the faithful discharge of his duties.⁷

(2) Powers and Duties.—It is the duty of the clerk to keep the records, enter promptly the decrees, judgments, and determinations of the court, issue its process, and perform the other acts required of him by the law.⁸ He is required to give his personal attention to the duties of his office,⁹ and can hold or exercise no incompatible office, appointment, or employment.¹⁰

1. Hayburn's Case, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 410; U. S. v. Todd, 13 How. (U. S.) 52, note; U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. (U. S.) 49, note. The decision of a judge in matters arising upon the account of a United States marshal, although made in open court, is only quasi judicial. U. S. v. Strobach, 48 Fed. Rep. 908.

A new bond may be required at an amount to be fixed by the attorney general, not to exceed forty thousand dollars, should the business of the court render it necessary. Act Feb. 22d, 1875, 18 St. at L. 233; Sup. Rev. St. (2d ed.), p. 65.

8. U. S. Rev. St. §§ 795, 911.

Records.—There are no statutes prescribing what records the clerk shall keep or how they shall be kept in criminal cases. In a general way he must be guided by the common law. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470.

Defects in the record in appeals to higher courts are cured by writs of certiorari addressed to the clerk of the court below, directing him to send up the omitted portions. Curtis on "Jurisdiction of U. S. Courts" (1880), p. 91.

Citizens have the right to examine the docket of decrees and judgments of circuit and district courts during office hours without the payment of fees. The clerk is entitled to charge only when he is required to make the search himself. U. S. Rev. St., § 828; In re Chambers, 44 Fed. Rep. 786; In re McLean, 9 Cent. L. J. 425.

For the proper practice and the fees where the clerk is required to make such search, see In re Woodbury, 7 Fed. Rep. 705; 17 Blatchf. (U. S.) 517.

10. Such as practicing law in his own court or district, U. S. Rev. St., § 748, or acting as receiver or master except where the judge of the court shall determine that special reasons exist therefor, which reasons shall be assigned in

(3) Deputies.—Provision is made by statute for the appointment of deputies to the clerks of the various courts. The deputy is the mere representative of his principal. He stands in his place, exercises his rights, and performs his duties. The principal is entitled to the fees earned by him.¹

(4) Fees.—(a) In General.—The fees of clerks are fixed by statute for each of the courts of the United States. The principal ones are prescribed in the revised statutes, and for the circuit and district courts are given in the note.²

the order of appointment. Act of March 3d, 1879; 20 St. at L. 415. But the offices of clerk and United States commissioner are not incompatible and a person performing both duties may receive the pay of both. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470. Nor are those of clerk and jury commissioner. Goodrich v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 267; Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405; Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470.

Duties in Regard to Judgments.—Every clerk of a circuit or district court shall, within thirty days after the adjournment of each term thereof, forward to the solicitor of the treasury a list of all judgments and decrees, to which the United States are parties, which have been entered in said court, respectively, during such term, showing the amount adjudged or decreed, in each case, for or against the United States, and the term to which execution thereon will be returnable. U. S. Rev. St., § 797.

Accounts.—At each regular session of any court of the United States, the clerk shall present to the court an account of all money remaining therein or subject to its order, stating in detail in what causes they were deposited and in what causes payments have been made; and said account and the vouchers thereof shall be filed in the court. U. S. Rev. St., § 798.

Special Powers.—Among the special powers granted to the clerk are, in case of absence or disability of the judge, the administering of oaths by circuit and district clerks to persons identifying papers found and to be used in admiralty trials, U. S. Rev. St., § 799; and the issuance of warrants of attachment on presentation of proper affidavit. U. S. Rev. St., § 926.

2. Clerk's Fees.—The term folio, as used in the fee-bill, means one hundred words, counting each figure as a word.

In counting the folios, each separate or distinct order, or other proceeding, is to be counted separately, and is to be considered one folio, if more than one hundred words are counted. If the proceeding contains less than one hundred words, and over fifty in number, they are to be counted as one folio; but if less, they are not to be counted at all. U. S. Rev. St., § 854; Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470.

For issuing and entering every process, commission, summons, capias, execution, warrant, attachment, or other writ, except a venire, or a summons or subpoena for a witness, one dollar; for issuing a writ of summons or subpoena, twenty-five cents. When there is a rule of court that the clerk, in issuing subpoenas in criminal cases, shall make copies of subpoenas to be left with the witnesses, he is entitled to charge for such copies. U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169. Where the copies are made, in criminal cases, at the request of the district attorney, the fees are properly chargeable to the government. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470.

For filing and entering every declaration, plea, or other paper, ten cents. The clerk is allowed his fee for filing each separate paper connected with the arrest of offenders, under U. S. Rev. St., § 1014, and not one fee only for each case. Taylor v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 531; Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 194. Thus, a clerk receiving papers from a commissioner holding the examination in a criminal case, is entitled to his fee for filing each one. U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169. In Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470, it was decided that the different papers need not be fastened together. In order that a paper be filed, it must be properly indorsed by the clerk, Amy v. Shelby Co., 1 Flip. (U. S.) 104; but an entry on the court docket is not in every case necessary. U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169. The clerk is entitled to his fees for each voucher filed with his report of money on hand. Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 193. The clerk may charge for filing præcipes when they are necessary, as in case of a præcipe for a bench warrant; but a mittimus after sentence is an unnecessary paper, not required by law, and no fee for filing it can be collected. U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169. The clerk is entitled to fees for filing receipts from the collector of the United States; for fines paid by persons sentenced for violation of the internal revenue laws; for filing the written report of the district attorney as to the result of his examination of the accounts of the marshal, clerk, and commissioners; for filing discharges given by the district attorney to witnesses of the government; and for filing vouchers and duplicates accompanying the accounts of the marshal. Van Duzee v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 643.

For administering an oath or affirmation, except to a juror, ten cents. The clerk is entitled to compensation for administering the oath to witnesses in criminal cases, compensation for this service not being included in the docket fees. Van Duzee v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 643. He is allowed to charge for taking the affidavit as to the services of government witnesses. Taylor v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 531. The clerk cannot claim a fee for administering the oath of office to a district attorney, deputy marshal, jury commissioner, or bailiff, or for drafting their bonds, as "it is the duty of persons receiving appointments from the government to prepare and tender to the proper officer the oaths and bonds required by law; in other words, to qualify themselves for the office. What shall be done with such qualifying papers does not concern them. Their duty is discharged by the tender of such papers properly executed according to law." Brown, J., in U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169.

For taking an acknowledgment, twenty-five cents. The clerk is entitled to fees for taking the acknowledgment of sureties on recognizances. Davis v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 162; Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470; Jones v. U. S., 39 Fed. Rep. 410; Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 193; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 674. In U. S. v. Barber, 140 U. S. 177, the court, by Brown, J., said: "We have already held that a fee is properly chargeable for the acknowledgment of a recognizance, but that such acknowledgment is a single act, though it be made by a principal and sureties, and that but a single fee is chargeable therefor." To the same effect are U. S. v. Ewing, 140 U. S. 142; Churchill v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 1.

For taking and certifying depositions to file, twenty cents for each folio of one hundred words; for a copy of such deposition furnished to a party on request, ten cents a folio. This clause includes a copy of a party's own deposition for use in printing evidence under a rule of court. Brewster v. Shuler, 38 Fed. Rep. 549.

For entering any return, rule, order, continuance, judgment, decree, or recognizance, or drawing any bond, or making any record, certificate, return, or report, for each folio, fifteen cents. The clerk is entitled to fifteen cents per folio for approving recognizances in criminal cases, by indorsing them in accordance with the usual practice. Van Duzee v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 643. Also for entering orders of continuance from day to day. Taylor v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 531. The clerk is not entitled to fees as for reports for letters transmitting receipts of the depository for money and stating the case and its nature, as the commissioners are intended to pay for these services. Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405. The clerk is entitled to fees for entering the order requiring the marshal to pay jurors and for copies of the same for the marshal, and for making a report to the court of the per diem and mileage due the jurors. Van Duzee v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 643. The clerk is entitled to fees for entering orders of the approval of accounts of district attorneys, marshals, and commissioners. Davis v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 162; Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470; Jones v. U. S., 39 Fed. Rep. 410; Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 193; Rand v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 671; Dimmick v. U. S., 36 Fed. Rep. 82. The clerk may recover his fees for entering on the minutes, by order of the court, resolutions in memory of a public servant. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470.

For a copy of any entry or record or of any paper on file, for each folio, ten cents. It has been held in reported cases in the southern district of New York that the provision authorizes the clerk to forbid an attorney or party, to himself copy a paper in a suit or even an opinion, without payment of the

(b) Fees for Special Service.—While the fees of the clerk are in general strictly prescribed by statute, it does not follow that, if no specific provision has been made by Congress for payment for the services rendered, no fees may be charged. On the same fees as if the clerk had made the copy. But this is probably not the law. 1 Foster's Federal Practice (2d ed.), § 331. The government must pay for copies of indictments furnished to defendants under order of the court. U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 169. The clerk is entitled to a fee for a duplicate of an order of the court which is in itself a voucher for the benefit of the marshal. Van Duzee v. U. S., 48 Fed. Rep. 643. A clerk is entitled to proper fees for making and authenticating orders of the court upon a marshal to bring prisoners, who have been committed by a commissioner to jails of other counties, to court for trial. Taylor v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 531.

For making dockets, issuing venire, taxing costs, and all other services, on the trial or argument of a cause where issue is joined, and testimony given, three dollars. In U. S. v. Van Duzee, 140 U. S. 199, the court, by Brown, J., said: "The docket fee of three dollars was intended to cover the entry of the case upon the docket, indexing the same, making contemporaneous minutes and entries upon the docket or calendar, and such other incidental services as are not covered by other clauses of the statute. Where, however, the entry is not a mere memorandum, but requires to be made part of a permanent record, it is a proper subject of a charge per folio." An attachment for contempt against a defaulting witness or juror is a "cause" in which the clerk is entitled to his docket fee. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470; Taylor v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 531.

For making dockets and indexes, taxing costs, and all other services in a cause where issue is joined, but no testimony is given, two dollars; for making dockets and taxing costs and other services in a cause which is dismissed or discontinued, or where judgment or decree is made or rendered without issue, one dollar; for making dockets and taxing costs in cases removed by writ of error or appeal, one dollar; for affixing the seal of the court to any instrument when required, twenty cents. The clerk is allowed fees for attaching certificates and seals to copies of the orders of the courts when required.

For every search for any particular mortgage, judgment, or other lien, fifteen cents. This is exclusive of his fee of ten cents for filing the requisition for search. In re Woodbury, 7 Fed. Rep. 705.

For searching the records of the court for judgments, decrees, or other instruments constituting a general lien on real estate, and certifying the result of such search, fifteen cents for each person against whom such search is required to be made; for receiving, keeping, and paying out money in pursuance of any statute or order of court, one per centum on the amount so received, kept and paid. This includes money collected by the marshal in execution. Fagan v. Cullen, 28 Fed. Rep. 843. No commission is allowed the clerk "for receiving, keeping and paying out, in pursuance of any statute or order of court," any money, unless the money passes through his hands. Upton v. Tribblecook, 4 Dill. (U. S.) 232, note; In re Goodrich, 4 Dill. (U. S.) 230; Leech v. Kay, 4 Fed. Rep. 72; Ex p. Plitt, 2 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 453; Easton v. Houston, etc., R. Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 718.

For traveling from the office of the clerk, where he is required to reside, to the place of holding any court required by law to be held, five cents a mile for going and five cents a mile for returning, and five dollars a day for his attendance on the court while actually in session. The clerk is entitled to his per diem if he attends while the court is actually in session, whether any business is transacted on such days or not. If both circuit and district courts are in session at the same time, he can charge his per diem in either at his discretion, and the government officials cannot transfer the items to the account of the other court so as to cut down his compensation under the maximum allowance rule. Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 193. The clerk may collect his per diem and his fees for entering orders, etc., when the circuit court is open, under the U. S. Rev. St., §§ 2011, 2014, providing for a term of the circuit court to appoint supervisors of elec-contrary, wherever a service is performed, either in pursuance of law,¹ or at the request of a proper party,² or in accordance with an order of court,³ the presumption is that the clerk shall be allowed his reasonable fees.

Where, however, the services performed are clearly outside of his duties as clerk, or where there is no provision of law for compensation, either express or by fair implication, no fees may be charged.⁴ In case of disputed fees, the decision of the comptroller of the treasury disallowing charges, is not conclusive against the clerk.⁵ While deputies are the mere representatives of their principals, yet where the law requires clerks to be in two places at the same time, the clerks will be entitled to double fees for services performed by themselves and their deputies.⁶

tions. Pleasant v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 270. And he is entitled to his fees rendered in respect to such supervisors of election, even though the judge erred, and improperly ordered the appointment of a supervisor. Goodrich v. U. S., 35 Fed. Rep. 193. No per diem is allowed for attendance at rule day. U. S. Rev. St., § 831.

1. Erwin v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 470, where the court, by Speer, J., said, in reference to services performed by the clerk in the selection of jurors under the act of June 30th, 1879 (21 St. at L. 43); (Sup. to U. S. Rev. St. (2d ed.), p. 270): "Here was a new, important, and arduous duty placed upon the clerk, not contemplated at the time of the enactment of the clerk's fee-bill in 1853 (U. S. Rev. St. § 828), and yet the act is silent as to compensation to the clerk or to the jury commissioner. If the silence of the act in this particular be indicative of an intention to throw this additional labor upon the clerk without any compensation therefor, as Congress had an undoubted right to do, it would be indicative also of an intention not to compensate the jury commissioner, whose appointment is provided for also, and to make that office purely honorary. But the attorney general appears to have held otherwise. He allowed what he considered reasonable compensation to jury commissioners out of the fund appropriated for the miscellaneous expenses of the courts. Annual Report of the Atty. Gen'l for 1883, p. 19."

In a case where an act of Congress is doubtful in the matter of compensation to officers for new services, the contemporaneous construction of the act by the government officials is of great weight. U. S. v. Hill, 120 U. S. 169.

S. 169, where the court, by Brown, J., said: "When the clerk performs a service in obedience to an order of the court, he is as much entitled to compensation as if he were able to put his finger upon a particular clause of a statute authorizing compensation for such services."

4. As for services in keeping a list of the names and residences of jurors, Marvin v. U. S., 44 Fed. Rep. 405; Act of Jan. 31st, 1879, ch. 39, St. at L., p. 277; Sup. Rev. St. (2d ed.), p. 211.

salary.¹ The compensation of clerks for each year shall, in all cases, be allowed only out of the fees and emoluments of that year.²

d. MARSHALS AND OTHER MINISTERIAL OFFICERS—(See also SHERIFFS, vol. 22, p. 564).—The marshal is the chief ministerial officer of the United States court, and his principal duties are to preserve order during the trial, and execute the process of the court.³ Among the inferior officers of the courts are criers, who may be appointed either by the circuit or district courts or by the marshal.⁴

e. ATTORNEYS—(See also ATTORNEY AND CLIENT, vol. 1, p. 942)—(1) In General.⁵—In every case in the federal courts, a party has a right to plead and manage his own cause.⁶ If, however, he appoints an attorney, the authority of the latter, while acting within the scope of his employment, is complete, and he cannot be hampered in the discharge of his duty by the actions of other agents of his client.⁷ In order to entitle an attorney to be heard, he must be a member of the bar of the court.⁸

The fees provided by law are as follows: "On a trial before a jury, in civil or criminal causes, or before referees, or on a final hearing in equity or admiralty, a docket fee of twenty dollars: Provided, that in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the libellant recovers less than fifty dollars, the docket fee of his proctor shall be but ten dollars." A district attorney appearing for the government in an attachment for contempt is allowed the statutory fees. Van Hoorebeke v. U. S., 46 Fed. Rep. 456. For services rendered in bringing suit against a national bank, and obtaining a forfeiture of its charter, he is entitled to his fees. Bashaw v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 40. If, after a decree refusing a preliminary injunction, the plaintiff dismisses the bill, the docket fee of twenty dollars is taxable for the solicitor of the prevailing party upon final hearing. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Merchant's Compress, etc., Co., 50 Fed. Rep. 449. The fee is allowed as for a jury trial, although the jury disagrees. Van Hoorebeke v. U. S., 46 Fed. Rep. 456. A district attorney is entitled to compensation under this section of the revised statutes for services rendered by him in defending an action brought against the United States by an ex-district attorney for fees alleged to have been earned by the latter while in office. Bashaw v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 40. In cases at law when judgment is rendered without a jury, ten dollars; in cases at law when the cause is discontinued, five dollars; for scire facias and other proceed-in like manner as the fees of the attorneys of the states respectively for like services rendered.¹ The scale of fees laid down in the revised statutes does not, however, prohibit attorneys from charging and receiving from their clients, other than the government, such compensation as is sanctioned by usage in the states, or agreed upon by the parties.²

(3) Attorneys of the United States.—The counsel of the United States are chiefly the attorney general, solicitor general, the district attorneys, and their assistants, together with the counsel specially retained.

(a) Attorney General and Solicitor General.³—See ATTORNEY GENERAL, vol. 1, p. 974.

(b) District Attorneys.—(See also DISTRICT OR PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS, vol. 5, p. 713).—District attorneys are sworn officers of the government appointed for a term of four years.⁴ They are required to be persons learned in the law,⁵ and represent the government in its legal matters, generally within the districts for which they are appointed.⁶ It is the general, but not universal, rule that there shall be a district attorney for each separate district.⁷

(c) Compensation of District Attorneys.—(See also DISTRICT OR PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS, vol. 5, p. 713).—The district attorneys are allowed fees for particular services in addition to those of attorneys generally.⁸ They may also be employed by the

ings on recognizances, five dollars; for each deposition taken and admitted in evidence in a cause, two dollars and fifty cents. This fee is allowed in any case, and it is immaterial before what officer the deposition was taken. Ferguson v. Dent, 46 Fed. Rep. 88.

On instituting a suit for the recovery of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, the district attorney is required to immediately transmit a statement thereof to the solicitor of the treasury. U. S. R. S., § 772.

He is required, immediately after the end of every term of the circuit and district courts, to forward a report of the cases to the solicitor of the treasury, and on October first of each year, must make a report of the litigation in his district for the year past. U. S. R. S., § 773.

For returns to the commissioners of internal revenue and the various other reports required, see U. S. R. S., §§ 774, 775.

By the settled practice of the United States courts, the district attorney and assistants are permitted to attend before the grand jury, U. S. v. Kilpatrick, 16 Fed. Rep. 765; and the fact that a stenographer of the district attorney, at the latter's request, attended before the grand jury and took notes of the testimony, is no ground for quashing an indictment. U. S. v. Simmons, 46 Fed. Rep. 65.

7. A special legislation exists affecting certain states in this regard. U. S. R. S., § 767.

8. The district attorney is allowed fees for attendance before a commissioner on days when recognizance was taken and the hearing was continued; and also for attendance for the examination of poor convicts applying for discharge. Bird v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 110; Stanton v. U. S., 37 Fed. Rep. 259.

He is entitled to mileage from his place of abode to the place of any examination of a person charged with crime, before a commissioner, and to his per diem for the examination of such person before such commissioner in any case where, in his judgment, it was necessary for him to attend, and he actually did attend such examination. U. S. v. Perry, 50 Fed. Rep. 743.

department of justice for the performance of services not covered by their fees and salaries, as established by law, and paid therefor.¹ They may also collect their fees for action taken on the complaints of the collectors of their districts as to alleged violations of the customs laws, even though no proceedings are instituted.² Certain fees are also allowed in other cases.³ In general, as to the multifarious duties of the district attorney, it may be said that no compensation can be allowed, unless it is expressly provided or reasonably implied from the terms of the law directing that the services be performed.⁴

(d) Accounting to the Government and Compensation to Be Retained.—The district attorneys are required to make a semi-annual return of fees,⁵ and an annual account of sums received for their services in prize causes, and they can retain of the latter amount a sum not exceeding three thousand dollars annually, in addition to the compensation otherwise allowed them.⁶

(e) Special Counsel of the Government.—Special counsel may be employed by the government to conduct suits involving public

If the district attorney in his service of the government selects routes which are most convenient and practical, though such routes are not the shortest, yet he is entitled to mileage fees. U. S. v. Perry, 50 Fed. Rep. 743.

Where a district attorney goes from a place where he is engaged in the duties of his office to a place whither he is officially called to appear before a commissioner, where the distance is less than from his home to the place where the commissioner sits, he is entitled to mileage fees for the distance traveled. In Van Hoorebeke v. U. S., 46 Fed. Rep. 456, the court, by Allen, J., said: "If in such cases the distance to the point of examination has been greater than from the place of his abode, the objection to the allowance of the items might be well founded; but where there was a saving to the government by the course pursued, it should not be heard in the complaint."

The power to allow counsel fees resides in the court, and allowances made are not subject to reduction by the attorney general or any other officer of the government. U. S. v. Waters, 133 U. S. 208; Bird v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 110.

Thus the accounting officers of the treasury have no jurisdiction in the matter. Van Hoorebeke v. U. S., 46 Fed. Rep. 456; U. S. v. Waters, 133 U. S. 208.

5. Seats and Terms.—This subject is treated in a succeeding portion of this article.²

6. Jurisdiction.—a. TO WHAT CASES IT EXTENDS.—The cases³ to which the judicial powers⁴ of the United States extend are defined in the constitution.⁵ They are as follows: First, "to all cases in law and equity⁶ arising under this constitution,⁷ the laws

1. U. S. R. S., §§ 4648, 4649, and §§ 363, 364, 365, 366 and 380.

2. See infra, this title, the treatment of the several courts by name.

3. The word "cases" means contests before judicial tribunals, and is synonymous with "suits" and "actions." It is narrower than "controversies." To constitute "cases," there must be proceedings in court which are not necessary to "controversies." Home Ins. Co. v. North-Western Packet Co., 32 Iowa 223.

4. Judicial power is "the authority vested in the judges." Bouv. Law Dict. The power to exercise judicial power is jurisdiction. Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 718.

Jurisdiction is also defined as "the power to hear and determine a cause." U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 709. To the same effect is U. S. v. Crawford, 47 Fed. Rep. 561.

Power to examine claims in ex parte proceedings and report results to a government officer is not "judicial power," in the sense in which the term is used in the constitution. U. S. v. Ferreira, 13 How. (U. S.) 40. See also JURISDICTION, vol. 12, p. 244.

5. U. S. Const., art. 3, § 2.

6. The power to try cases in law or equity arises from the constitutional provision only, and is not derived from state laws. Fitch v. Creighton, 24 How. (U. S.) 159; Parsons v. Lyman, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 178.

And a state cannot, by prescribing an action at law to enforce statutory rights, such as a mechanic's lien, oust a federal court, sitting in equity, of its jurisdiction to enforce such rights, provided they are of an equitable nature. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Witherow, 149 U. S. 574. But see Hershberger v. Blewett, 55 Fed. Rep. 170.

The equitable jurisdiction of the federal courts is subject to neither limitation nor restraint by state legislation, and is uniform throughout the different states. Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202.

But although this power cannot be restrained by state statutes giving exclusive jurisdiction to a particular court, the rights of the parties are to be ascertained by the laws of the state. Bellows v. Sowles, 52 Fed. Rep. 528.

The rights of parties as given or restricted by the exclusive jurisdiction of state probate courts are fully recognized by the federal courts, and the latter, sitting as courts of equity, will not assume jurisdiction of the settlement of an estate, where the state statutes restrict such settlements exclusively to the probate courts. Sowles v. St. Albans First Nat. Bank, 54 Fed. Rep. 564.

The probate court of the Choctaw Nation has no equity powers, and hence a suit to enforce an equitable lien or mortgage upon personal property, created by an agreement of the parties, against the estate of an intestate, which is of purely equitable jurisdiction, is properly brought in the United States circuit court in the Indian Territory. Riddle v. Hudgins, 58 Fed. Rep. 490.

In order to ascertain whether a suit is at law or in equity, the law of the state is disregarded. If it was originally a common-law proceeding, it is such now, even though it be a case removed from a state court under whose practice equitable relief might have been granted, had the suit not been removed. Potts v. Accident Ins. Co., 35 Fed. Rep. 566.

Jurisdiction in equity must be given by law; it cannot be conferred by consent. Elgin v. Marshal, 106 U. S. 578; Citizens' Street R. Co. v. City R. Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 746.

7. In determining jurisdiction under this clause, it is necessary to look only to the subject-matter; the citizenship of the parties is immaterial. Home Ins. Co. v. North-Western Packet Co., 32 Iowa 223; Hodgson v. Millward, 3 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 418.

of the *United States*¹ and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." Law and equity are thus recognized as two complete systems. In the United States courts, each is kept distinct from the other. The union practice under state codes is

The fact that a single question dependent on the constitution or a law or treaty of the United States is involved, makes a case cognizable by the federal courts, and it is immaterial that other questions dependent on general principles of law are also involved. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. Rep. 746; 53 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 293; 29 Ohio L. J. 233.

If the legislation of a state is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, the officers of the state may be enjoined from acting in obedience thereto. Blaybrook v. Owensboro, 16 Fed. Rep. 297. Thus the United States courts may entertain actions involving the validity of state taxes claimed to be in violation of the federal constitution, the citizenship of the parties thereto being immaterial. U. S. Express Co. v. Allen, 39 Fed. Rep. 712.

A federal question may be presented as to whether a reservation in a charter of a corporation is operative to prevent subsequent legislation affecting such charter from violating the prohibition in the United States Constitution against the impairment of the obligation of contracts. Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Memphis, 53 Fed. Rep. 715.

Wherever, upon the record considered as a whole, there appears to be a controversy involving the constitution or laws of the United States, the federal courts have jurisdiction. Van Allen v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 1 McCrary (U. S.) 598. And see Santa Ana Water Co. v. San Buenaventura, 56 Fed. Rep. 339.

A suit arising out of the seizure of the plaintiff's property under color of a state law, which is claimed to be in violation of the federal constitution, is within the jurisdiction of the United States courts, and the question of jurisdiction is sufficiently presented by a demurrer, there being no necessity for the defendant to set up, in answer to the charges of seizure and the unconstitutionality of the law, that the circumstances were such as to bring such seizure within the terms of the state law. Booth v. Lloyd, 33 Fed. Rep. 593.

But a claim that a state statute violates the state constitution against the taking of private property for public use without due compensation, presents no federal question. Smith v. Bivens, 56 Fed. Rep. 352.

In a case in which the federal courts assumed jurisdiction on account of the alleged invalidity of a state law as being opposed to the Constitution of the United States, the federal question became eliminated. It was held that the jurisdiction of the court having once attached, the court could retain the case for the consideration of the question as to whether the state law was in accordance with the state constitution. Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tram-Way Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 727.

Where it is sought to be shown in a federal court that a state law impairs the obligation of the contract sued on, the fact that the supreme court of the state has held the act void on that ground, does not affect the jurisdiction of the federal court. Sawyer v. Concordia Parish, 4 Woods (U. S.) 273.

The federal courts have no jurisdiction of actions relating to violations of a state law or constitution by the officers of a state, which do not affect rights granted or secured under the federal laws or constitution. Bertonneau v. Board of Directors, etc., 3 Woods (U. S.) 177.

The decision of the United States Supreme Court as to the constitutionality of an act of Congress, is binding on state courts. Burwell v. Bugess, 32 Gratt. (Va.) 472.

1. As, for instance, a suit on a marshal's bond. Bachrack v. Norton, 132 U. S. 337; Feibelman v. Packard, 109 U. S. 421.

But a question as to the title of public land claimed under a statute of the United States does not fall within the jurisdiction of the federal circuit court, unless it involves the construction of a federal statute. Theurkauf v. Ireland, 27 Fed. Rep. 769.

An action on a judgment recovered in a United States court is not necessarily a suit arising under the laws of the United States. Provident Sav. L. Assur. Soc. v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635. Neither does a case arise under the United States laws simply because a federal court has decided in another suit the questions of law which are in-not regarded,¹ and only the forms of actions and defenses in cases of each kind are allowed, which belong properly to it. No actions other than legal or equitable can be heard.² The judiciary department of the United States is the final expositor of the constitution as to all questions of a judicial nature, and of the involved in it. Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Cooper, 120 U. S. 778.

But where a plaintiff's title rests upon the validity of a lien claimed to have been acquired under a judgment of a federal court, the disposition of the issue depends upon the laws of the United States and the rules of its courts, and a federal court has jurisdiction. Cooke v. Avery, 147 U. S. 375.

When it is apparent that a case depends on the construction of a law of the United States, and the complainant invokes its aid, a federal court has jurisdiction. Richards v. Rock Rapids, 31 Fed. Rep. 505.

A suit to enjoin the state treasurer from paying over, and an agricultural college from demanding, a certain sum payable under the act of Congress for the endowment of agricultural colleges, and to have the same payable to the complainant college, arises under the laws of the United States and is cognizable in the United States circuit court. Brown University v. Rhode Island College of Agricultural, etc., Arts., 56 Fed. Rep. 55.

A case arises under a law of the United States, whenever that law is the basis of the right or privilege, or claim or protection, or defense, of the party, in whole or in part, by whom it is set up. Lowry v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 83; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 257.

Where an action is brought against a receiver of a railroad under the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1887 (24 St. at L. 552, ch. 373), as amended by the act of Aug. 13th, 1888 (25 St. at L. 433, 436, ch. 866), which allows a receiver of a United States court to be sued without leave of the court, the suit is one arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 593.

On the ground that a suit has arisen under the laws of the United States, the United States court cannot entertain a suit brought by an assignor of national bank stock to recover from his assignee the amount which he was compelled, through the failure of such assignee to properly register the transfer, to pay toward the bank's liabilities, the National Banking Act not having imposed the duty of seeing to such registry on the assignee. Le Sassier v. Kennedy, 123 U. S. 521.

But telegraph companies which have accepted the provisions of the Act of Congress of July 24th, 1866, and put their lines at the service of the United States, giving precedence to its messages, become agents of the government, entitled to seek relief in the circuit court in all matters affecting their existence as such agents. Western U. Tel. Co. v. Charleston, 56 Fed. Rep. 339.

The federal courts having taken jurisdiction under this clause of the constitution, may retain the case for the determination of issues which would otherwise be triable by the state courts, but cannot extend their jurisdiction to other issues raised by a supplemental bill filed after the original case has been decided. Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tram-Way Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 689.

1. Thus, although state practice allows the mingling of law and equity in the same proceeding, the United States courts sitting in that state will not follow it. Shuford v. Cain, 1 Abb. (U. S.) 302.

A state statute allowing equitable defenses to be entertained in an action at law, will have no effect on a suit in a United States court sitting in that state. Herklotz v. Chase, 32 Fed. Rep. 433; Burnes v. Scott, 117 U. S. 582; neither will one abolishing the distinction between legal and equitable actions. Duncan v. Greenwalt, 3 McCrary (U. S.) 378; Foster's Federal Practice, vol. 1, § 4 (2d ed.); Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How. (U. S.) 669; Jones v. McMasters, 20 How. (U. S.) 8; Thompson v. Central Ohio R. Co., 6 Wall. (U. S.) 134; Walker v. Dreville, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 440.

2. Thus they have no jurisdiction upon the subject of divorce, or for an allowance of alimony, either as an original proceeding in chancery, or as an incident to divorce a vinculo, or from bed and board. Barber v. Barber, 21 How. (U. S.) 582. They neither national legislation in general.¹ Its jurisdiction extends over these matters whether the controversy in which they arise be in federal or in state courts.²

Second. "To all cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls."³

Third. "To all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction."⁴ Jurisdiction over admiralty proceedings is thus included in the constitutional grant, and cannot be enlarged or affected by subsequent legislation, although the modes of its exercise may be prescribed.⁵ This grant of admiralty jurisdiction is exclusive,⁶ but as it depends upon forms of procedure and not upon the remedies applied, it often happens that the state courts may have cognizance of proceedings at common law or chancery looking to the same result. But of admiralty proceedings proper, the state tribunals have no jurisdiction.⁷

Fourth. "To controversies to which the United States shall be a claim nor exercise probate jurisdiction. Parsons v. Lyman, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 170.

1. 1 Kent's Com., lecture 14, p. 296.

2. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (4th ed.), p. 12; Colder v. Bull, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 399; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 625; Yazoo, etc., R. Co. v. Thomas, 132 U. S. 174. But the question arising must be a genuine federal question, and none such appears in a suit in a state court where an attempt is made to enforce, on the part of a state court, rights under a judgment of a United States court. Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421.

To give jurisdiction, it must appear that the decision of a federal question was necessary to the determination of the cause in the state court. Citizens' Bank v. Board of Liquidation, 98 U. S. 140.

And the federal court will not review the decision of a state court, unless the question of federal law was actually presented to, and decided by, the state court. Santa Cruz Co. v. Santa Cruz R. Co., 111 U. S. 361.

3. Construed in Davis v. Packard, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 276. The subject-matter of the controversy is immaterial. Home Ins. Co. v. North-Western Packet Co., 32 Iowa 223.

4. A case in admiralty is not one arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. The clause granting jurisdiction in such cases, and that giving jurisdiction in admiralty cases are separate and distinct, and each exclusive of the other. American, etc., Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 545.

The jurisdiction of admiralty courts is not taken away by the fact that courts of common law have concurrent jurisdiction in certain matters. Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (U. S.) 441.

United States admiralty courts have jurisdiction of petitory as well as mere possessory actions. Ward v. Peck, 18 How. (U. S.) 267.

Admiralty jurisdiction can be exercised in the states in those courts only, which are established in pursuance of the third article of the constitution; but the same limitation does not extend to the territories and their courts. American, etc., Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 511.

State law has no effect in the consideration of admiralty cases. Watts v. Camors, 115 U. S. 362.

5. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black (U. S.) 522.

6. The Moses Taylor v. Hammons, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 411. See also ADMIRALTY, vol. 1, p. 200.

7. Home Ins. Co. v. North-Western Packet Co., 32 Iowa 223. Both common-law courts and courts of admiralty have concurrent jurisdiction of bills of lading, policies of marine insurance, charter parties, and shipping articles. Albany City Ins. Co. v. Whitney, 70 Pa. St. 248.

This want of jurisdiction in admiralty does not preclude a suit under state law to recover for an injury to a dredge. Walter v. Kierstead, 74 Ga. 18.

The exercise of admiralty jurisdiction by United States courts does not party."¹ The government being sovereign, no suit can be maintained against it without its consent.² When this consent is given, the suit can only be maintained in the court designated, and under the conditions and regulations prescribed, by Congress.³

Fifth. "To controversies between two or more states." The state must, in order to come within this clause, be either a technical party to the record or else the substantial party in interest.⁴ "Between a state and citizens of another state."⁵ As the judicial power stood originally, it extended to suits against a state by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.⁶ This was subsequently changed by the Eleventh Amendment, which provides that "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state."⁷ depend at all upon the residence or citizenship of the parties. Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. (U.S.) 341; The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. (U.S.) 442, 453.

As a general rule, where the only question in a salvage suit is as to the rate of reward, and the salvaged property is within the jurisdiction of the court, a court of admiralty, in this country, notwithstanding that all the parties are foreigners, will entertain the suit. But in its discretion it may remit the parties to their home forum, and if the facts are of a nature to be more properly inquired into by the foreign courts, the court will not exercise jurisdiction. One Hundred and Ninety-Four Shawls, 1 Abb. Adm. 317. And the rule is the same as to maritime matters generally. The Bee, 1 Ware (U.S.) 336; The Bark Havana, 1 Sprague (U.S.) 402; Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch (U.S.) 264. And in cases in which the parties are citizens of the same foreign country, the court will give no further remedy than the party would have possessed in the foreign jurisdiction. The Infanta, Abb. Adm. 263.

1. Where the United States is the real plaintiff, all suits should be in its name, unless Congress orders otherwise. Benton v. Woolsey, 12 Pet. (U.S.) 27.

2. U. S. v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196.

3. U. S. v. Lee, 106 U.S. 196; Com'rs of Sinking Fund v. Buckner, 48 Fed. Rep. 533. See UNITED STATES.

When the United States voluntarily appears in a court, it at the same time voluntarily submits to the law, and places itself upon an equality with other litigants. U. S. v. Ingate, 48 Fed. Rep. 251; U. S. v. Beebee, 17 Fed. Rep. 40.

A suit against the government to determine questions of title under the land laws, cannot be maintained in the courts, for Congress has never given the courts power or jurisdiction to pass upon questions of title, where there is a controversy between a person claiming title under the laws of the United States as against the government itself. U. S. v. Jones, 131 U.S. 1.

4. As a suit against the governor of a state, as such. Governor v. Sundry African Slaves, 1 Pet. (U.S.) 124.

5. But the suit must not be for a mere penalty imposed by state law. Thus, the United States courts have no jurisdiction of an action brought by a state against an insurance company of another state, upon a judgment for a penalty imposed by statute by the first state. Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U.S. 265.

Suits in which a state is a party are not exempted from the operation of that portion of the federal constitution (U.S. Const., art. 3, § 2), which extends the judicial power of the United States to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States. Ames v. Kansas, 111 U.S. 449; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Kansas, 111 U.S. 449.

7. The Eleventh Amendment prohibits suits wherein a state is a nominal defendant, and also suits against its officers, agents, and representatives, where the state, though not named as the defendant, is the real party against

"Between citizens of different states."¹ In order to give jurisdiction to the United States courts under this clause, the fact that the parties are citizens of different states must affirmatively appear on the record.² The warrant of jurisdiction must be clearly whom relief is asked, and the judgment will operate. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866; In re Ayres, 123 U. S. 443. But it must be an actual, substantial party. Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 831.

The United States court may grant an injunction restraining the railroad commissioners of a state from enforcing a schedule of rates in pursuance of a statute claimed to be unconstitutional, such a suit not being against a state nominally or actually, and, therefore, not in conflict with the Eleventh Amendment. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Dey, 35 Fed. Rep. 866.

The inhibition applies only to citizens or subjects, and does not extend to suits by a state, or by foreign powers. I Kent's Com., lecture 14, p. 297.

1. The improper joinder of parties in a suit in a United States court, as if citizens of the same state with the plaintiff be made defendants in a bill with citizens of another state properly made defendants, will not affect the jurisdiction of the court, as between the parties properly before it. Carneal v. Banks, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 181.

Thus, a writ issued from a circuit court against A and B, was returned executed as to A and non est as to B. The declaration alleged citizenship of the plaintiff in New York and of A in Ohio, being silent as to that of B. It was held that the court had jurisdiction. Morrison v. Bennett, 1 McLean (U. S.) 330.

And where a bill is filed by the beneficiary of a trust to remove a cloud upon the trust property, the jurisdiction of the federal court is not ousted by the fact that the beneficiaries, residents of the state in which the suit is brought and in which the defendants are citizens, are not made parties. Bowdoin College v. Merritt, 54 Fed. Rep. 55.

Although a partnership is authorized by the laws of a state to sue in its partnership name, it is not a citizen of the state so as to give the federal courts jurisdiction in the absence of citizenship in the state of component partners. Carnegie v. Hulbert, 10 U. S. App. 454; 3 C. C. A. 391; 53 Fed. Rep. 10.

If a suit can be maintained in a state court, it can also be maintained by original process in the federal courts, where the parties are citizens of different states. Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 529.

The citizenship which determines the jurisdiction of a federal court in regard to mortgaged property is that of the mortgagee, and not of the beneficiaries in the mortgage, since they are represented by the mortgagee. Morris v. Landaer, 54 Fed. Rep. 23.

Effect of State Laws on Jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction of federal courts over controversies between citizens of different states cannot be impaired by state laws prescribing the modes of redress in their courts, or regulating the distribution of their judicial power. Chicot County v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 529.

Common-Law Trade-Mark.—The federal courts have no jurisdiction of an action for the infringement of a common-law trade-mark between citizens of the same state. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. v. Prince Mfg. Co., 53 Fed. Rep. 493.

2. Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. (U. S.) 393; Ex p. Smith, 94 U. S. 455; Halsted v. Buster, 119 U. S. 341; Imperial Refining Co. v. Wyman, 38 Fed. Rep. 574; Mansfield, etc., R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379; Kempe v. Kennedy, 5 Cranch (U. S.) 185; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 322; Boyce's Manual of Practice in U. S. Circuit Courts (1869), p. 21; Briges v. Sperry, 95 U. S. 401; Smith v. Sun Printing & P. Assoc., 55 Fed. Rep. 240.

The consent of parties will not give jurisdiction, but they may admit facts showing jurisdiction. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. (U. S.) 322.

The fact of citizenship need not be pleaded; it is sufficient if it appears in the record, but this does not include papers merely copied into the transcript, which do not make a part of the record by bill of exceptions, or by an order of the court referring to them, or by some other legal mode. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646; Denny v. Pironi, 140 U. S. 121.

The courts of the United States, being of limited but not of inferior juris-shown.¹ An allegation of residence would be insufficient.² The provision must be taken literally, and the citizen of a territory has no standing in court under this grant of jurisdiction;³ nor has a citizen of the District of Columbia,⁴ nor the next friend of an insane plaintiff, on the ground of the difference of citizenship between such next friend and the defendant, the real plaintiff and diction, their proceedings are not nullities, though their jurisdiction does not appear on the record. Until reversed, their proceedings are conclusive evidence between parties and privies; but if their jurisdiction does not appear of record, they are erroneous and may be reversed. McCormick v. Sullivan, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 192; Reed v. Vaughan, 15 Mo. 137; 55 Am. Rep. 133; Kempe v. Kennedy, 5 Cranch (U. S.) 185; Skillern v. May, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 267.

Where the record does not show jurisdiction, and the fault rests upon the plaintiff, the supreme court will reverse judgment in his favor at his cost. Halsted v. Buster, 119 U. S. 341.

There is nothing in the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution which makes the mere allegation of residence sufficient to establish jurisdiction, the presumption being against jurisdiction unless it affirmatively appears. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646.

The United States courts may entertain a suit between citizens of different states, to annul deeds of lands forfeited to the state, though such deeds and sales were made under an order of a state court of the county where the lands were situated. De Forest v. Thompson, 40 Fed. Rep. 375.

An averment of citizenship in the first count is sufficient to give jurisdiction to a federal court, though no such allegation is made in the other counts of the declaration. Jones v. Heaton, 1 McLean (U. S.) 317.

When it appears that the parties are citizens of the same state, and, therefore, that the federal court has no jurisdiction, the court may direct pleadings to be filed in order to settle the question before raising the issue and proceeding with the suit. Gribble v. Pioneer Press Co., 15 Fed. Rep. 689.

1. U. S. v. Town-Maker, Hempst. (U. S.) 304; U. S. v. Alberty, Hempst. (U. S.) 444.

Where the bill alleges the plaintiffs to be citizens of the United States, and this is not denied in the answer, it must be considered as admitted, although no other evidence of citizenship is offered. Webb v. Powers, 2 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 497.

Where it appears by proper averments in the record, that the parties are citizens of different states, the court has jurisdiction, unless it be ousted by denial of the citizenship of either party, as alleged, and proof that such citizenship does not exist; but this exception must be taken by plea in abatement, or it will not avail. Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 578.

2. Robertson v. Cease, 97 U. S. 646; Everhart v. Huntsville College, 120 U. S. 223; Menard v. Goggan, 121 U. S. 253.

An averment in the record that the parties are "of" or are "inhabitants" or "residents" of different states is not sufficient to show jurisdiction. The record must allege that the parties are "citizens" of different states. Wood v. Wagnon, 2 Cranch (U. S.) 1; Catlett v. Pacific Ins. Co., 1 Paine (U. S.) 594; Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 8; Mossman v. Higginson, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 12; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 382; Abercrombie v. Dupnis, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 343; Capron v. Van Noorden, 2 Cranch (U. S.) 126; Course v. Stead, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 22; Wood v. Mann, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 581.

3. Watson v. Brooks, 8 Sawy. (U. S.) 316; Corporation of New Orleans v. Winter, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 91.

In an action brought in a territorial court where both defendants are citizens of the territory, and the two plaintiffs are respectively citizens of a state and another territory, the admission of both territories as states will not make the suit a "controversy between citizens of different states." Dunton v. Muth, 45 Fed. Rep. 390.

The United States courts have no jurisdiction over actions between alien and alien, where the question of jurisdiction turns on citizenship. Orosco v. Gagliardo, 22 Cal. 83.

4. Vasse v. Miffin, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 519.

the defendant being citizens of the same state.¹ Likewise in suits by executors and administrators, the citizenship of these representatives determine the question of jurisdiction, and not that of the testator or intestate respectively.² Corporations are citizens of the states which created them.³ And although recognized by other states, and allowed to do business therein, they still remain citizens of the state to which they owe their existence.⁴ The

The fact that the property attached is in the hands of an executor, who is a citizen of the same state as the plaintiff, does not oust jurisdiction, if the plaintiff and defendant are citizens of different states. Bacon v. Rives, 106 U. S. 99.

Nor is a party made a citizen of a state so as to deprive a federal court of jurisdiction, by the fact that he is appointed trustee by a court of such state of property in the state, and sues in his representative capacity. Shirk v. La Fayette, 52 Fed. Rep. 857.

3. Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U. S. 265; Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Wheeler, 1 Black (U. S.) 286; Empire, etc., Transp. Co. v. Empire, etc., Min. Co., 150 U. S. 159; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Dickinson, 40 Md. 444; Atlanta, etc., R. Co. v. Western R. Co., 50 Fed. Rep. 790, which was a case in which a Georgia corporation was the defendant, and where the court, by McCormick, J., said: "It is settled by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court that the appellant, being a corporation created under the laws of Georgia, is, from its creation through the whole period of its existence, a citizen of that state; that it is a person, within the meaning of the law regulating the institution and conduct of suits, and that it cannot emigrate from the state of its creation."

The rule is the same whether the corporation be political, municipal, or commercial, the citizenship of its members being immaterial. A parish of Louisiana is therefore a citizen of that state. Tunstall v. Madison Parish, 30 La. Ann. 471.

A corporation formed by the consolidation of corporations of several states, is a citizen of either of them. Union Trust Co. v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 29 Fed. Rep. 609. Hence a citizen of one of such states may sue the corporation in the federal courts for the other state, it being a citizen of that state for the purposes of the suit. Page v. Fall River, etc., R. Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 257.

Corporations created by different states, but consolidated for the purpose of operating one entire line of road, are not prevented from bringing suit against each other in the federal courts, by the fact of consolidation. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co., 9 Biss. (U. S.) 144. And see Western, etc., R. Co. v. Robertson, 61 Fed. Rep. 592.

A corporation of one state can sue a corporation formed by the consolidation of two corporate bodies, one chartered by the state, and the other by a sister state, in the federal courts for that sister state. Union Trust Co. v. Rochester, etc., R. Co., 29 Fed. Rep. 609.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage brought by bondholders against a corporation, citizens of the state of the corporation cannot join. Jackson v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 29 Fed. Rep. 474.

The jurisdiction of the federal court of suits against municipal corporations, on the ground of diversity of citizenship, cannot be divested by a state law providing that all suits against such corporations shall be brought in state courts. Cunningham v. Rawls Co., 1 McCrary (U. S.) 117; National Bank v. Sebastian Co., 5 Dill. (U. S.) 414. See also Allen v. Allen, 3 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 248; Greely v. Townsend, 25 Cal. 604.

The right of a foreign corporation to sue in a federal court is not affected by the existence of a state law forbidding it to resort thereto. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Harper, 3 Hughes (U. S.) 260.

4. Antelope Co. v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 16 Fed. Rep. 295. They cannot be considered citizens or residents of a state in which they have not been incorporated. Southern P. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202.

And the fact that a corporation has its principal place of business in such citizenship of merely formal parties, however, has no effect on jurisdiction.¹ The requirement as to citizenship refers only to the parties to the suit at the time it was instituted.² If the cause of action has been assigned, it is immaterial whether or not a difference in citizenship existed between the original holders,³ or what motives induced the transfer.⁴ If the parties have changed their domicile from a state in which they could have no standing in a United States court, to one where they could be heard, the motives of such removal cannot be inquired into.⁵

Nor is jurisdiction, which has once attached, ousted by any other state, and appoints a person there under a state statute on whom service may be made, does not make it a citizen of such state. St. Louis R. Co. v. Pacific R. Co., 52 Fed. Rep. 770.

But where a corporation is chartered by several states, it must, for the purpose of determining the jurisdiction of the federal courts, when sued in either state, be treated as a citizen of that state alone without regard to where it has its principal place of business. Phinizy v. Augusta, etc., R. Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 273.

1. Moore v. Davis, 18 How. (U. S.) 467.

The citizenship of a marshal, in an action by him on a forthcoming bond, is immaterial. Wade v. Wortsman, 29 Fed. Rep. 754.

As to a trustee, in an action to set aside or enforce a deed of trust, see Rust v. Brittle Silver Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 611; Reibach v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 33.

A receiver appointed by a court is not made a necessary party so as to affect jurisdiction where it depends on citizenship, by the fact that charges are made against the validity of his appointment. Phinizy v. Augusta, etc., R. Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 273. But where a railroad company has sold an undivided interest in a portion of its line to another company and entered into a traffic agreement, by which it was to receive a certain portion of the freight earnings over that part of the line, while not a necessary party to a suit by a lessee of its line against such other company for an accounting as to the earnings, is a proper party in view of its interest in the maintenance of the lease as affecting its income as rentals, and its contention that those clauses could not be abandoned or modified by the successor companies without its consent. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Bal-

3. Thompson v. Perrine, 106 U. S. 589.

But where the action is by the assignee of a chose in action, the record must affirmatively show, by apt allegations, that the assignor could have maintained the action. Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150. And the assignee of a state judgment recovered on contract, cannot, under Act of Congress 1875, maintain a suit for its enforcement in the circuit court, unless the assignor could have done so. Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 150 U. S. 202.

4. Blackburn v. Selma, etc., R. Co., 2 Flap. (U. S.) 525.

5. If a citizen of one state removes with his family into another state with a bona fide intention to reside there, he instantly becomes a citizen of that state within the meaning of this clause of the constitution, and may sue as such, in those courts. Cooper v. Galbraith, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 546; Catlett v. Pacific Ins. Co., 1 Paine (U. S.) 594; Butler v. Farnsworth, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 101; Read v. Bertrand, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 516; Den v. Sharp, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 609; Catlin v. Gladding, 4 Mason (U. S.) 308; Knox v. Greenleaf, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 360.

To deprive a citizen of the United States of the right of suing in the federal courts, on the ground of his not being a citizen of any particular state, the evidence must be very strong that he is a mere wanderer without any home. Raband v. D'Wolf, 1 Paine (U. S.) 580.

A suit will not be enjoined by a state court, on the ground that there was a removal from one state to another for the purpose of suing in the federal courts. Thompson v. Norris, 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 163.

But the removal must be a real change of residence during the progress of the case,¹ nor by any transfer of the subject-matter.² If jurisdiction is acquired, the court will retain it for the settlement of actions following the original suit, if they are continuations of such suit,³ or merely auxiliary or ancillary thereto,⁴ even though the parties to such actions are residents of the same states.

As an original and a cross-bill are in fact but one proceeding, if the federal court has jurisdiction of the former, it will retain change of domicile, and not one merely colorable, as where the pretended removal is without any present intention to remain permanently or for an indefinite time, but with a present intention to return as soon as the suit is ended. Morris v. Gilmer, 129 U. S. 315.

The fact that a citizen of another state is appointed administrator for the purpose of conferring on the federal court jurisdiction of an action, does not defeat the jurisdiction. Goff v. Norfolk, etc., R. Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 299.

1. U. S. v. Myers, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 516; Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 537; Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 290. See also Thomas v. Newton, Pet. (C. C.) 444; Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 164.

2. Jarboe v. Templer, 38 Fed. Rep. 213; Elliot v. Teal, 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 249. And see Hardenbergh v. Ray, 151 U. S. 112.

3. As a bill of revivor brought against the executor of the defendant. Hone v. Dillon, 29 Fed. Rep. 465.

Where a bill was filed in the circuit court for Rhode Island, against a citizen of that state, by a citizen of Connecticut, and, pending the bill, the complainant died and administration of his effects in Rhode Island was taken out by a citizen of that state, who filed a bill of revivor, it was held that the latter bill was a mere continuation of the former, and that the court had jurisdiction thereof. Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 290.

Where the United States filed a bill to subject property conveyed in trust to secure their debt, and, pending the suit, a surety for the debt, at whose instance the bill was filed and who was a party thereto, paid the debt, it was held that the court had jurisdiction to retain the suit for the benefit of the surety, though the principal debtor and surety being citizens of the same state, a suit between them would not lie in the federal courts. U. S. v. Myers, 2 Brock. (U. S.) 516.

A, a citizen of Virginia, recovered judgment in ejectment in the circuit court for Ohio, against B, a citizen of that state. After the death of A, a bill was filed in the same court, the plaintiffs and defendants all being citizens of Ohio, for an injunction to the judgment, and praying that a conveyance of the land might be made to the complainants. It was held, that to the extent of the prayer for an injunction, the bill was not an original proceeding, and that the court had jurisdiction for that purpose, not being deprived of its equitable control over the judgment by the change of residence of the parties; but that, so far as other relief was prayed, the court had not jurisdiction of the bill. Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 1.

4. But where a federal court acquires jurisdiction on the ground of diverse citizenship, it has no jurisdiction over the reasonableness of an interstate commerce rate. Swift v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 858; Root v. Woolworth, 150 U. S. 401; Ex p. Tyler, 149 U. S. 164; Lamb v. Ewing, 54 Fed. Rep. 269.

Therefore, pending a suit in equity brought by assignees in bankruptcy to set aside a conveyance of a bankrupt in fraud of creditors, a creditor, to whom the assignees have, under order of the court, conveyed the bankrupt's title, may file a supplemental bill, although a citizen of the same state as the defendants. Miller v. Rogers, 29 Fed. Rep. 401; Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 327; Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276; Pacific R. Co. v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 111 U. S. 522; Seymour v. Phillips, etc., Construction Co., 7 Biss. (U. S.) 460.

If a United States court has jurisdiction of an action at law, it may also entertain an equitable suit—as one to reform a contract, upon which the suit at law was brought—if auxiliary to the suit at law. Rosenbaum v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 724, where the court, by Shiras, J., said: "Jurisdiction, therefore, existing of the action at law, all auxiliary or dependent proceed-jurisdiction for the settlement of issues under the latter, even though the requisite citizenship as between the parties to the cross-bill does not exist.¹

Where jurisdiction exists under this section of the constitution, it will be retained for a complete determination of the controversy, although other questions of fact or law may be involved.²

"Between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states." This grant of jurisdiction is not exclusive of the state courts.³ It applies only to grants of land made by states by virtue of their sovereignty.⁴

"Between a state or the citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens, or subjects."⁵ Thus, under the constitution, the judicial power extends to various classes of cases, generally national ings necessary to the full and final hearing and disposition of that action, are sustainable in the federal courts without regard to the citizenship of the parties."

But a federal court obtaining jurisdiction of a suit against an administrator on the ground of diverse citizenship can go no further than that extends, and cannot administer the estate, or adjudicate the rights of citizens of a state as between themselves. Byers v. McAuley, 149 U. S. 608. And where a bill is not ancillary to a former suit, and when considered as an original bill, jurisdiction is defeated by the citizenship of the parties, a federal court has no jurisdiction. Ralston v. Sharon, 51 Fed. Rep. 702.

Where, however, a federal court has acquired jurisdiction in other suits of the property of a railroad company, it has jurisdiction to foreclose a mortgage thereon, without regard to the citizenship of the parties, whether the bill therefor be regarded as an original bill, a cross-bill, or an original bill in the nature of a cross-bill. Carey v. Houston, etc., R. Co., 52 Fed. Rep. 671.

1. First Nat. Bank v. Salem Capital Flour Mills Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 580; Osborne v. Barge, 30 Fed. Rep. 805.

But where citizens of a state, who are partners in business, are both sued in equity in a United States court, one of them cannot, by cross-bill against the other, settle their disputes inter sese. Vannerson v. Leverett, 31 Fed. Rep. 376.

2. Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 738.

3. Shepard v. Young, 1 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 203.

4. Hence, it has no application to a Tennessee grant on North Carolina claims, made by virtue of a compact between the states. Thompson v. Kendrick, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 113.

But they have jurisdiction of a case between citizens of Kentucky, claiming lands under different grants, one issued by Kentucky and the other by Virginia, but upon warrants issued by Virginia, and locations founded thereon prior to the separation of Kentucky from Virginia. The grant passes the legal title to the land, and if the controversy is founded on the conflicting grants of different states, the judicial power of the Union extends to the case, whatever may have been the equitable title of the parties before the grant. Colson v. Lewis, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 377. See also Pawlet v. Clark, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 322.

5. An Indian tribe living within the limits of a state is not a "foreign state." Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1.

Residence is only prima facie evidence of citizenship. Where the plaintiff, a native of France, came to the United States in her childhood, and afterward married a citizen of this country, was divorced, and again married to a French citizen, it was held that she was an alien, and competent to sue in the federal court, notwithstanding she and her husband continued to reside in this country. Pequignot v. Detroit, 16 Fed. Rep. 211.

The jurisdiction of a suit brought by an alien is not ousted by the joining of a co-plaintiff who had no standing in a federal court. Graham v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 14 Fed. Rep. 753.

Where a suit in equity is brought by foreign creditors to enforce their rights under a state statute declaring that an assignment with any preference in their character,¹ and determined in various ways, some by the subject-matter involved in the action, others by the parties, and the remainder by the remedy and procedure.²

b. EXCLUSIVE OF STATE COURTS.—The provisions of the revised statutes are as follows:³

"The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States in the cases and proceedings hereinafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states.

"First. Of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States.⁴

shall create a trust fund, to be administered in equity for all creditors, the federal courts have jurisdiction. Wyman v. Mathews, 53 Fed. Rep. 678.

The jurisdiction of a federal court of a suit of a citizen against an alien, is not defeated by the fact that the defendant is consul of a foreign government. Börs v. Preston, 111 U. S. 252.

1. 1 Kent's Com., lecture 14, p. 296.

2. Home Ins. Co. v. North Western Packet Co., 32 Iowa 223.

3. U. S. R. S., § 711.

4. The jurisdiction of offenses against the laws of the United States is by this clause made exclusive in the federal courts. Ross v. Georgia, 55 Ga. 192; 21 Am. Rep. 278. But the federal courts have no jurisdiction over offenses not made punishable by the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. Petibone v. U. S., 148 U. S. 197.

The same act may be an offense against both the state and federal law, and in that case the tribunals of each government may punish the infraction of its laws. Thus, an act may be prosecuted as a violation of the National Banking law by the general government, and also as a forgery by the state, and this will be so even in a case where the act of forgery was committed solely in order to deceive an examiner under the National Bankrupt law. Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 132.

To the same effect is U. S. v. Marigold, 9 How. (U. S.) 569, where the court, by Daniel, J., said: "The same act might, as to its character and tendencies, and the consequences it involved, constitute an offense against both the state and federal governments, and might draw to its commission the penalties denounced by either, as appropriate to its character in reference to each."

Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. (U. S.) 13; In re Loney, 134 U. S. 372; Ex p. Siebold, 100 U. S. 390.

Under a state law which provides for the punishment of anyone having in his possession tools for counterfeiting bank notes, the state courts have jurisdiction of a prosecution under this law, though the offense is punishable also under the federal statute. People v. McDonnell, 80 Cal. 285.

This clause does not affect the jurisdiction of the state courts to punish counterfeiting of United States coin current in the state. Dashing v. State, 78 Md. 357.

The federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of perjuries committed before a notary public in giving a deposition to be used in the case of a contested election of a member of Congress, as provided in the Revised Statutes, § 110. U. S. R. S., § 5392.

In Re Loney, 134 U. S. 372, the court, by Gray, J., said: "A witness who gives his testimony, pursuant to the constitution and laws of the United States, in a case pending in a court or other judicial tribunal of the United States, whether he testifies in the presence of that tribunal or before any magistrate (either of the nation or of the state) designated by act of Congress for the purpose, is accountable for the truth of his testimony to the United States only; and perjury committed in so testifying is an offense against the public justice of the United States and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts of the United States."

The Criminal Jurisdiction of the United States.—The federal courts have no common-law criminal jurisdiction. U. S. v. Eaton, 144 U. S. 677; U. S. v. Worrall, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 384; U. S. v. Lancaster, 2 McLean (U. S.) 431; U. S. v. Hudson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 32.

The jurisdiction of the federal courts

"Second. Of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States.¹

"Third. Of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it."²

"Fourth. Of all seizures under the laws of the United States, in matters of conspiracy extends only to a conspiracy for a purpose forbidden by some United States statute, or to be accomplished by acts expressly forbidden by a law of the United States, and hence a conspiracy to disbar an attorney from practising in state courts because of his conduct in a federal court, is not cognizable in a federal court. Greene v. Rogers, 56 Fed. Rep. 220.

The circuit court has jurisdiction to try and sentence a criminal for a murder committed on the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, although committed on the part not used for military purposes. Benson v. U. S., 146 U. S. 325.

Under U. S. Rev. Stats., § 5346, the federal courts have jurisdiction to try a person for an assault with a dangerous weapon committed on a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, when such vessel is in the Detroit river, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state and within the territorial limits of the Dominion of Canada. U. S. v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 249. But an indictment for manslaughter against a pilot, charging him with a willful and felonious assault, by propelling a tug boat against a yacht in which the deceased then was, so as to cast him out of the yacht into the river, is not within U. S. Rev. Stats., § 5344, making every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on a steamboat, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to duties the life of another is destroyed, guilty of manslaughter, so as to deprive a state court of jurisdiction. Re Welch, 57 Fed. Rep. 576.

Jurisdiction in a criminal action by the district attorney, to recover a fine of $5,000 from the owner of a bridge over a navigable stream, is given to the district court only when the Secretary of War has found that the bridge is an unreasonable obstruction of free navigation, and the owner has failed to obey the order of the Secretary in regard thereto. Oregon City Transp. Co. v. Columbia Street Bridge Co., 53 Fed. Rep. 549.

1. This clause refers only to penalties and forfeitures of a public nature, which may be recovered by the United States or by some person suing in its behalf. Ordway v. Central Nat. Bank, 47 Md. 217; 28 Am. Rep. 455.

It includes a suit for a penalty imposed by an act of Congress. Haney v. Sharp, 1 Dana (Ky.) 442; Jackson v. Rose, 2 Va. Cas. 34; U. S. v. Lathrop, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 4. But see Stearns v. U. S., 2 Paine (U. S.) 300; Buckwalter v. U. S., 11 S. & R. (Pa.) 193. But does not embrace civil actions by parties aggrieved to recover such a penalty. Ordway v. Central Nat. Bank, 47 Md. 217; 28 Am. Rep. 455.

Qui tam actions on penal statutes do not survive at common law, and this rule prevails in the United States courts as to actions on penal statutes of the United States, even in states where the local statutes allow suits on state penal statutes after the death of the offender. Schreiber v. Sharpless, 110 U. S. 76.

2. The expression, "saving and reserving to suitors in all cases a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it," refers only to remedies existing under the common law as it stood in 1789, when the statute was first enacted, and does not include such remedies as might afterward be given by the state statute. Henry on Admiralty Jurisdiction and Procedure (1885), § 1.

A state court has jurisdiction of a suit in personam against the master and owners of a vessel to enforce a claim given by the state statute, State v. Voorhies, 39 La. Ann. 499; also of an action for a maritime tort, where there is a remedy at common law and by state statute. Billings v. Breinig, 45 Mich. 65.

Though possession by the state court will not be disturbed, yet that court can only deal with the property subject thereto, and when its jurisdiction has determined, the admiralty courts may proceed. Moran v. Sturges, 154 U. S. 256. See also ADMIRALTY, vol. 1, p. 200.

on land or on waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.¹

"Fifth. Of all cases arising under the patent-right,² or copy-right laws of the United States.³

"Sixth. Of all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy.⁴

"Seventh. Of all controversies of a civil nature, where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, or

1. The United States courts alone have jurisdiction to decide upon the validity of seizures made by officers of the United States, under the laws of Congress, where the proceedings are in rem, or where the action divests the officer of the possession of the property seized. Stoughton v. Mott, 13 Vt. 175.

Comparative Jurisdiction of National and State Courts.—When a seizure is made for a forfeiture, no state authority can have possession of the property so as to defeat the national jurisdiction; if it has possession, the latter may compel a redelivery. Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 1.

2. See PATENT LAW, vol. 18, p. 70.

The jurisdiction in cases under the patent laws, is exclusive of state courts, whatever may be the citizenship of the parties. Consent of parties cannot confer jurisdiction. 3 Robinson on Patents (1890), §§ 855, 863.

Where the owners of a patent, after granting to complainant the exclusive right to make, use, and sell the patented machine in a certain territory, conveyed their right to the patent to defendant, subject to the rights of complainant, a suit by complainant to restrain defendant from manufacturing and selling the machine in the territory granted him, is an ordinary suit for infringement of a patent, cognizable in the federal courts, and not a suit founded on contract. Adriance v. McCormick Harvesting Machine Co., 55 Fed. Rep. 287. And see Walter A. Woods Harvester Co. v. Minneapolis-Esterly Harvester Co., 61 Fed. Rep. 256.

But where a partner fails to comply with an agreement of dissolution, whereby he takes the plant of the firm with the right to manufacture under a patent owned by it, this gives the latter no right to sue in the federal courts, although the unauthorized manufacture under the patent constitutes an element of damage; but the right of action is solely for breach of contract. Routh v. Boyd, 51 Fed. Rep. 821.

State courts have no jurisdiction of an action for the manufacture and sale of a patented article, unless there was an agreement to pay royalties for the manufacture. Denise v. Swett, 142 N. Y. 602.

3. See COPYRIGHT, vol. 4, p. 147.

The state courts may grant an injunction to restrain the infringement of an author's common-law right of property in a manuscript, but not his copyright under the acts of Congress; and it is immaterial that the plaintiff is an alien. Palmer v. De Witt, 47 N. Y. 532; 7 Am. Rep. 480.

This clause of section 711 was not affected by the acts of March 3d, 1875, or March 3d, 1887. Miller-Magee Co. v. Carpenter, 34 Fed. Rep. 433.

4. The states have the power to pass bankruptcy and insolvency laws, and to exercise jurisdiction in controversies arising under them. See BANKRUPTCY, vol. 2, p. 88.

The United States court in bankruptcy cases has no power to interfere with the proceedings of a state court in the ordinary and legitimate exercise of its jurisdiction. Clark v. Binninger, 38 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 341.

The jurisdiction of all matters in bankruptcy vested in the federal courts does not prevent a state court from entering an action for the abatement of a liquor nuisance on property belonging to the bankrupt estate, that being a matter of police regulation. Radford v. Hornell, 81 Iowa 709.

Creditors of a bankrupt may, if they wish, pursue their claims in the state courts, instead of under the United States Act. Peck v. Jenness, 16 N. H. 516; 43 Am. Dec. 573.

The United States courts sitting in bankruptcy, cannot, upon appeal or petition, correct or annul judgments rendered in a state court. In re Dunn, 11 Nat. Bank. Reg. 270.

State courts have concurrent jurisdiction of suits brought by assignees in bankruptcy, to set aside fraudulent conveyances by bankrupts, made prior to their being adjudicated such. Rison v. Powell, 28 Ark. 427.

between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens.¹ "

c. CONCURRENT WITH STATE COURTS.—Unless otherwise provided by law, the jurisdiction exercised by the United States courts is concurrent with that of the state courts.² The two systems of courts are each independent of the other, and are of equal dignity.³ It is no objection to the jurisdiction of the one that there is a suit involving the same questions pending in the other.⁴ But where one has acquired jurisdiction over the subject-matter, it is entitled to proceed without interference by the other.⁵ This rule is essential to due harmony of administration, and to avoid conflicts. State legislation cannot impair or affect the jurisdiction of the United States courts.⁶

d. LEGAL AND EQUITABLE.—The jurisdiction of the federal courts extends to both legal and equitable suits.⁷ The relief

1. A state may sue in a circuit court of the United States. The jurisdiction of the supreme court is not exclusive where a state is plaintiff. State v. Atkins, 35 Ga. 315.

2. Thus, a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage, brought by the receiver of an insolvent bank, is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal courts. Witters v. Sowles, 61 Vt. 366.

Each state has the right of determining all controversies between her citizens and all conflicting claims to property within her limits, unless this jurisdiction is clearly and expressly taken away. Ferris v. Coover, 11 Cal. 185. But Congress may vest exclusively in the courts of the United States all the judicial power of the United States. Stearns v. U. S., 2 Paine (U. S.) 300; The Moses Taylor v. Hammons, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 429; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 334; Ex p. McNiel, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 236.

Actions for breach of contract in relation to a patent, or for a tort to a patent, are not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States courts. Robinson on Patents, vol. 3 (1890), §§ 864, 865.

3. Walker v. Flint, 7 Fed. Rep. 435; Chapin v. James, 11 R. I. 87; 23 Am. Rep. 412; Foster's Federal Practice (2d ed.), § 6; Currie v. Lewiston, 15 Fed. Rep. 377; M'Kim v. Voorhies, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 279; Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. (U. S.) 506; Gamewell Fire Alarm Tel. Co. v. Mayor, 31 Fed. Rep. 312.

4. Sharon v. Hill, 22 Fed. Rep. 28; Washburn, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Scutt, 22 Fed. Rep. 710; Weaver v. Field, 16 Fed. Rep. 22; Henry in Admiralty Ju- isdiction and Procedure (1885), § 119; Pierce v. Feagans, 39 Fed. Rep. 587.

5. Parks v. Wilcox, 6 Colo. 489. And see Cole v. Oil Well Supply Co., 57 Fed. Rep. 534. But this rule applies only where the parties and subject-matter are both the same. Boston, etc., R. Co. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 12 R. I. 220.

A federal court will not appoint a receiver of property which is already in possession of a receiver appointed by a state court. Reinach v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 58 Fed. Rep. 33; Central Trust Co. v. South Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 57 Fed. Rep. 3. Nor is a constable authorized, under the South Carolina Dispensary law, to seize, without warrant or judicial action, intoxicating liquors in the possession of a receiver appointed by a federal court. Re Swan, 150 U. S. 637. But a federal court will not, through principles of comity, hold its hand and leave the determination of the validity of a state statute to the state courts. Re Langford, 57 Fed. Rep. 570.

6. Bank of British N. A. v. Barling, 44 Fed. Rep. 641; Curtis on Jurisdiction of U. S. Courts (1880), p. 13; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 425; Parsons v. Lyman, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 170; Hunton v. Equitable L. Assur. Soc., 45 Fed. Rep. 661; Hull v. Dills, 19 Fed. Rep. 657.

7. United States Const., art. 3, § 2. As to the latter, it is provided that, "Suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law." U. S. R. S., § 723.

This provision, however, is merely afforded by the law must be quite as full and complete as that which equity would grant, in order to defeat jurisdiction.¹ It must be a relief at law which may be pursued in a federal court, and it is no objection to the exercise of jurisdiction in equity, that the state court affords an adequate remedy,² or that such remedy exists under the probate law or by special statutory proceedings.³ If there is a proper remedy at law, there is a jurisdictional defect in the suit in equity, and the court should dismiss the bill upon its own motion, even though objection is not taken by demurrer, plea, or answer.⁴ By the remedy at law is meant the remedy at common law, and the equitable jurisdiction is not affected by the fact that supplementary statutes of a state give a new legal remedy which is plain, adequate, and complete.⁵

The jurisdiction in equity is the same as that of the English chancery courts,⁶ except that, on the one hand it is restricted to matters of federal cognizance, and on the other, extended to

1. Fechheimer v. Baum, 37 Fed. Rep. 175; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 430; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. (U. S.) 591; Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 210.

2. Parsons v. Lyman, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 178; Rich v. Bray, 37 Fed. Rep. 273; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. (U. S.) 592.

3. De La Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Montgomery Brewing Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 829; Rich v. Bray, 37 Fed. Rep. 273; Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co. v. Sparrow, 36 Fed. Rep. 210.

4. Hoey v. Coleman, 46 Fed. Rep. 221.

5. Grand Rapids, etc., R. Co. v. Sparrow, 36 Fed. Rep. 210; Curtis on Jurisdiction of United States Courts (1880), p. 171.

Thus, a bill quia timet is maintainable in a case where there was no full remedy at the common law, even though by state legislation the action of ejectment had been extended to cover the case in question. McConihay v. Wright, 121 U. S. 201.

6. Foster's Federal Practice (2d ed.), § 5; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling, etc., Bridge Co., 13 How. (U. S.) 518; Payne v. Hook, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 430; Hull v. Dills, 19 Fed. Rep. 657; Van Norden v. Norton, 99 U. S. 380. But it extends only to "those judicial powers which the high court of chancery in England, acting under its judicial capacity as a court of equity, possessed and exercised, at the time of the formation of the Constitution of the United States. Powers not judicial, exercised by the chancellor merely as the representative of the sovereign, and by virtue of the king's prerogative as parens patriæ, are not possessed by the circuit [or other federal] courts." McLean, J., in Fontain v. Ravenel, 17 How. (U. S.) 369, which held that the United States courts, for reasons given above, had not the power over charitable donations possessed by the English chancery court. The same principle is laid down in Loring v. Marsh, 2 Cliff. (U. S.) 469.

The rule adopting the equity jurisprudence of England as the basis of that of the federal courts applies only to the remedy granted, but not to the right enforced, which is governed by the special law of each state. Meade v. Beale, Taney's Dec. (U. S.) 339. In this case the court, by Taney, C. J., said: "The power of courts of chancery of the United States is, under the constitution, to be regulated by the law of the English chancery; that is to say, the distinction between law and equity, as recognized in the jurisprudence of England, is to be observed in the courts of the United States, in administering the remedy for an existing right. The rule applies to the remedy and not the right; and it does not follow, that every right given by the English law, and which, at the time the constitution was adopted, might have been enforced in a court of chancery, can also be enforced in a court of the United States; the right must be given by the law of the state, or of the United States. It is the form of remedy for which the con-cover the granting of relief created by the legislation of the state where the court sits, or where the right which is sought to be enforced arose.¹

Where equity has once taken jurisdiction, it will retain it until the complete settlement of issues in controversy. If necessary to this end, supplementary and ancillary proceedings may be entertained, although the court would not have had jurisdiction of the parties, if the proceedings had been original.²

c. TERRITORIAL.—This subject is more particularly considered under the heads of the several courts. There are, however, certain provisions common to all the federal courts.

(1) Crimes.—The trial of offenders punishable with death must be had in the county where the offense was committed, where stitution provides; and if a complainant has no right, the circuit court, sitting as a court of chancery, has nothing to remedy in any form of proceeding."

It is for a federal court, after the cause is docketed there, and upon final hearing, to determine whether, under the allegations and proof, a case is made which, according to the principles of equity, entitles a plaintiff to the relief asked. Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589.

1. Ex p. McNiel, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 243; Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 503; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Whitton, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 270; Smith v. Fort Scott, etc., R. Co., 99 U. S. 398; Borland v. Haven, 37 Fed. Rep. 394; Fechheimer v. Baum, 37 Fed. Rep. 167; Clark v. Smith, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 195; Ex p. Biddle, 2 Mason (U. S.) 472; Fitch v. Creighton, 24 How. (U. S.) 159; Lorman v. Clarke, 2 McLean (U. S.) 568; Goshorn v. Alexander, 2 Bond (U. S.) 158; Scott v. Neely, 140 U. S. 106; Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15; U. S. v. Block, 3 Biss. (U. S.) 208.

Where the legislation of a state provides that, in the case of fraudulent assignments, a court having jurisdiction is authorized to declare the assignment void, although the assignee had no notice of the fraud, the equity courts of the United States can enforce such rights. Jaffrey v. Brown, 29 Fed. Rep. 476; Bernheim v. Birnbaum, 30 Fed. Rep. 885.

Where the equity jurisdiction of the federal court is derived from the state statute, the construction put upon the statute by the state supreme court is binding upon the federal court. Beebe v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 481.

2. Dunn v. Clarke, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 1; Clarke v. Mathewson, 12 Pet. (U. S.)

164; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. (U. S.) 460; Johnson v. Christian, 125 U. S. 642; Conwell v. White Water Valley Canal Co., 4 Biss. (U. S.) 195.

Thus, if necessary to prevent abuse of its own process, a federal court will entertain a bill by a stranger to a suit in which the process issued without regard to diversity of citizenship. Krippeendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276.

One in whose favor an injunction has been granted in a United States court may always institute proceedings in that court for its violation. U. S. v. Lancaster, 44 Fed. Rep. 885.

A federal court has jurisdiction of a suit to set aside its former decree for being fraudulently obtained, although by present citizenship a purely original bill between the parties could not be maintained, as it is but a continuation of the former controversy. Foster v. Mansfield, etc., R. Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 627.

The limits of ancillary jurisdiction are defined in Ralston v. Sharon, 51 Fed. Rep. 709, where the court, by Hawley, J., said: "The ancillary jurisdiction of the court can only be maintained where the parties to a former suit are before the court, or the facts are such as to make the case a continuation of the former suit, or where the court is called upon to enforce or vacate its judgment or decree, or set aside its process, or to give relief with reference to property in its possession or under its control, or to bring in outside parties having an interest in the litigation, or where the property involved is in the custody of the court or its officers, and the rights of the parties thereto could not be determined in any other court without a conflict of jurisdiction between the courts."

it can be done without great inconvenience.¹ Other crimes are triable in the state and district where they were committed.² The trial for crimes committed without the jurisdiction of any particular state or district, whether upon the high sea or elsewhere, must be held in the district where the offender is found or into which he is first brought.³ When an offense is begun in one district and completed in another, it may be prosecuted in either.⁴

(2) Suits to Recover Penalties.—Pecuniary penalties and forfeitures may be sued for either in the district where they accrue, or in that in which the offender is found.⁵

(3) Suits for Internal Revenue Taxes.—Taxes accruing under any law providing internal revenue, may be recovered by suit, either in the district where the liability for such tax occurs, or in the district where the delinquent resides.⁶

(4) Ordinary Civil Suits.—It is provided by law that “no civil action shall be brought before either of said courts [circuit or district] against any person by any original process or proceeding in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant; but where the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of different states, suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant.”⁷ This provision, however, confers a mere personal privilege, which is waived by entering a general appearance and filing a plea in bar.⁸

1. U. S. R. S., § 729.

But this is a mere privilege of the accused, which he waives by not objecting to a trial out of the county. In the last instance, the matter of venue is left to the court, the question of convenience being always in its discretion. U. S. v. Cornell, 2 Mason (U. S.) 101.

2. United States Const., art. 3, § 2; U. S. R. S., § 563; U. S. v. Bird, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 299.

The constitutional provision upon this subject applies only to trials in federal courts. Nashville, etc., R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96.

Special laws regulating the criminal jurisdiction of federal courts held in several states, have been enacted as follows: Georgia, 21 St. at L. 63; Michigan, 20 St. at L. 175; Missouri, 20 St. at L. 263; Ohio, 20 St. at L. 101; 21 St. at L. 63; Tennessee, 21 St. at L. 175; Texas, 21 St. at L. 198.

3. U. S. R. S., § 730.

4. U. S. R. S., § 731. But a libel written in one district and published in another does not come within this provision. In re Buell, 3 Dill. (U. S.) 122.

5. U. S. R. S., § 732.

6. U. S. R. S., § 733; U. S. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 10 Ben. (U. S.) 144.

7. Act of March 3d, 1887, § 1; 24 St. at L. 552; Act of August 13th, 1888, 25 St. at L. 433; McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Walther, 134 U. S. 41; Bostwick v. American Finance Co., 43 Fed. Rep. 897; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Terre Haute, etc., R. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 385.

Thus a suit brought by two persons on a contract entered into by them as partners, cannot be maintained in a district of which the defendant and one of the plaintiffs are non-residents. Smith v. Lyon, 38 Fed. Rep. 53.

This clause has no application to suits in admiralty. In re Louisville Underwriters, 134 U. S. 488.

Estoppel.—A company which has represented itself in doing business as a corporation of a certain state, cannot deny that it is such to defeat the jurisdiction of the federal courts of that state over it. Blackburn v. Selma, etc., R. Co., 2 Flip. (U. S.) 525.

8. Betzoldt v. American Ins. Co., 47 Fed. Rep. 705; Ex p. Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 377; Toland v. Sprague, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 330; Harrison v. Rowan, Pet. (C. C.) 489; Flanders v. Aetna Ins. Co., 3 Mason (U. S.) 158; Hall v. Continental L. Ins. Co., 12 Fed. Rep.

f. DISMISSAL FOR WANT OF JURISDICTION.—There are in federal practice, as at the common law,¹ two kinds of defects of jurisdiction, i. e., that arising from the nature of the subject-matter, and that due to the character of the parties litigant. The former is fatal, the latter may be waived by the act of the party. If the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it is its duty to dismiss the suit on demand of the litigant, or sua sponte.² It must also reverse any judgment which it may have granted.³ Its jurisdiction is then at an end, and it cannot retain the case for any purpose, nor can it award costs or issue execution to collect costs to either party.⁴

7. Rules of Decision—a. STATUTORY PROVISION.—The fundamental rule is laid down in the revised statutes as follows: "The laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require,⁵ or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."⁶ This provision applies only to civil cases and does not regulate proceedings in equity or admiralty or in criminal prosecutions.⁷ It includes in its purview both the statute and common law of the several states.

b. THE LAWS OF THE SEVERAL STATES; HOW DETERMINED—
 (1) As to State Statutes.—In all questions involving the existence or non-existence of state statutes, the decision of the state courts is binding upon the courts of the United States. The discussion of whether the proper formalities in the enactment of the statute have been complied with cannot be raised in the United States court.¹ Similarly in all matters of the construction of statutes, the federal courts will strive towards uniformity with the courts of the state enacting the statute, and will look to their decision as strong evidence of what the statute really means.² Reference is mainly had to the decision of the highest state court.³

The rule, with its proper limits, may be stated as follows:

First. If there is in any state a settled construction of a statute, and if that construction was announced before the rights which are the subject of the controversy in the United States courts attached, the United States courts will be bound by the adjudicated rule of the state courts, even though they have to overrule their own former decisions.⁴

Neal*, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 291;

Suydam v. Williamson, 24 How. (U. S.) 427; League v. Eger, 24 How. (U. S.) 264. The rule is thus stated by Field, J., in Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 294, his words being quoted with approval by Shiras, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Morley v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 54: "The exposition given by the highest tribunal of the state must be taken as correct so far as contracts made under the act are concerned. . . . The construction, so far as contract obligations incurred under it are concerned, constitutes a part of the law as much as if embodied in it. So far does this doctrine extend, that when a statute of two states, expressed in the same terms, is construed differently by the highest courts, they are treated by us as different laws, each embodying the particular construction of its own state, and enforced in accordance with it in all cases arising under it." "The rule of construction adopted by the highest court of the state, in construing their own constitution, and one of their own statutes, in a case not involving any question re-examinable in this court under the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary Act, must be regarded as conclusive in this court." And thus by Fuller, J., in Stutsman Co. v. Wallace, 142 U. S. 293: "It is well settled that upon the construction of the constitution and laws of a state, this court, as a general rule, follows the decisions of her highest court, unless they conflict with or impair the efficacy

Second. If the state decisions are conflicting, or if the question has not been raised in the state courts, the federal courts will follow their own judgment.¹

Third. If the rule of the state courts is settled, but was announced after the rights in question attached, the state decisions will be of great weight as a precedent, but will not be regarded as binding.²

(2) As to the Common Law.—The principles which determine how the unwritten law of the states shall be ascertained, are not essentially different from those already laid down for the construction of statutes. In general, the decisions of a state's highest court, if uniform, and if announced before the rights under investigation accrued, will be regarded as binding by the federal court, although it be already committed to a different view of the law. Under other circumstances, the adjudications of the state courts are looked to only as precedents having more or less weight.³ But while this is the general rule, it is subject to important qualifications. It is most fully applied in the case of

of some provision of the federal constitution or of a federal statute or a rule of general commercial law."

In Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, the court, by Bradley, J., said: "Since the ordinary administration of the law is carried on by state courts, it necessarily happens that, by the course of their decisions, certain rules are established which become rules of property and action in the state, and have all the effect of law, and which it would be wrong to disturb. This is especially true with regard to the law of real estate and the construction of state constitutions and statutes. Such established rules are always regarded by the federal courts, no less than by the state courts themselves, as authoritative declarations of what the law is."

The federal courts will follow the construction given by a state supreme court to the words "charity" and "necessity," in the state Sunday law prohibiting traveling on that day, except in a work of necessity or charity. Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co., 125 U. S. 555.

In deciding whether a given instrument is a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage or a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, the federal courts will follow the decisions of the supreme court of the state. Rainwater-Boogher Hat Co. v. Malcolm, 51 Fed. Rep. 734.

2. Douglass v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 677; Confarr v. Santa Anna Tp., 116 U. S. 366; Rowe v. Runnels, 5 How.

(U. S.) 134; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, where the court, by Bradley, J., said: "When contracts and transactions have been entered into, and rights have accrued thereon, under a particular state of the decisions, or when there has been no decision of the state tribunals, the federal courts properly claim the right to adopt their own interpretation of the law applicable to the case, although a different interpretation may be adopted by the state courts after such rights have accrued. But even in such cases, for the sake of harmony, and to avoid confusion, the federal courts will lean towards an agreement of views with the state courts if the question seems to them balanced with doubt."

In Anderson v. Santa Anna Tp., 116 U. S. 356, the court, by Harlan, J., said: "While the courts of the United States accept and apply the construction of a state constitution or of a local statute, upon which the rights of the parties depend, which has been fixed by the course of decisions in the state court, it is the settled doctrine of this court, that rights accruing under one construction will not be lost merely by a change of opinion in the state court; and where such rights have accrued before the state court has announced its construction, the federal courts, although leaning to an agreement with the state court, must determine the question upon their own independent judgment."

controversies involving questions of real property law, while in matters of a more general, universal character it has little force. Such are cases involving the doctrines of commercial law or general jurisprudence, which are decided by the federal courts independently of the rules previously established by state tribunals.¹

The same is generally true of questions of interest,² insurance,³ negligence,⁴ and general corporation law.⁵ Such questions are decided by the federal courts on principle and precedent, independently of the state courts.⁶ A succinct statement of the whole matter is given in the note.⁷

(3) Rule After Cause Removed.—After a cause has been removed into the federal court, the decisions of a state court made before its removal will ordinarily be followed.⁸

7. The rule has thus been formulated by a distinguished lawyer and jurist: "Statement of cases in which United States courts do or do not follow state decisions: First. Statutes of states and the construction of them by the highest court of the state are binding and conclusive on the courts of the United States in all cases where such statutes so construed are not in conflict with the constitution, etc., and where such decisions can be regarded as the settled and fixed law of the state. Second. Whenever, in the judgment of the United States courts, such statutes, as construed by state courts, are not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or whenever they are conflicting so that they cannot be regarded as the settled law of the state, United States courts are not bound by them. Third. In questions affecting property rights, and especially real property, United States courts regard themselves as specially bound to follow decisions of the state court. Fourth. These rules are always subject to the qualification that the state statutes and decisions shall violate no right secured by the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. Fifth. In cases which fall under the denomination of general commercial law, and cases involving questions of public policy, or of general equity jurisprudence, United States courts are not bound by decisions of state courts." 8. Process—a. FORM—(1) In General.—It is provided¹ that all writs and processes issuing from the courts of the United States shall be under the seal of the court from which they issue, and shall be signed by the clerk thereof.² Those issuing from the supreme court or a circuit court shall bear teste of the chief justice of the United States,³ or, when that office is vacant, of the associate justice next in precedence, and those issuing from a district court shall bear teste of the judge, or, when that office is vacant, of the clerk thereof. The seals of the said courts shall be provided at the expense of the United States.

All process⁴ issued from the courts of the United States shall bear teste from the day of such issue.

Process issuing from the circuit or district courts may be amended by leave of court, where it can be done without prejudice to the party against whom such process issues.⁵ It is not abated nor rendered invalid by an act changing the time of holding court, but is deemed returnable to the term established next after the return day.⁶

respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law.¹

No process may be abated or quashed for any defect or want of form, but the proper amendment may be had.²

The forms of mesne process in equity and admiralty causes in the circuit and district courts must be according to the principles governing such suits, unless otherwise provided by statute or rules of court.³ In other cases the forms must conform, as near as may be, to those in the state courts of record in the state where the trial is held.⁴

(2) Attachments.—The remedies by attachment in the United States courts are similar to those allowed in the states within which the courts are held.⁵ The dissolution of attachments also is secured in the same way as in the courts of such states.⁶ Special provision is made by statute for garnishment in suits by the United States against corporations.⁷ Attachments are not affected by the removal of causes from the state into the United States courts.⁸

Where writs of attachment against the same defendant issue from both state and United States courts, the one under which the property is first actually taken into custody will hold it irrespective of the dates of the writs. A joint levy cannot be made under the writs, nor can the property be attached upon one subject to the prior levy of the other.¹

b. SERVICE—(1) By Whom Made.—The service of process is ordinarily made by the marshal, who is the general executive officer of the court, or by his deputy.² The officer should act in substantially exact compliance with the requirements of law or the order of court which he is executing. His return should show this compliance, when it will be sufficient proof of the service.³ By a rule of practice in equity, the service of process may be made by a person especially appointed by the court as well as by the marshal or his deputy. Such person must, however, make affidavit to the fact of service,⁴ a formality which the marshal or his deputy need not observe.⁵

(2) How Made.—The mode of service of process issuing from the circuit and district courts in causes other than those in equity and admiralty follows the practice in the courts of the state where the causes are tried.⁶ This applies to service on

1. Adler v. Roth, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 445.

2. Schwabacker v. Reilly, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 127. But a subpoena may be served by a private person. Russell v. Ashley, Hempst. (U. S.) 546. If the service is by a deputy marshal, he must make his return in the name of his principal. Spafford v. Goodell, 3 McLean (U. S.) 97. The return, however, is amendable. International Grain Ceiling Co. v. Dill, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 92.

In case of the death of the marshal, his deputies continue in office, unless otherwise specifically removed, and execute process in the name of the deceased until a successor is appointed and qualifies. U. S. R. S., § 789. If the marshal or his deputy be removed, or if the marshal's term expires, such officer may execute all process remaining in his hands at the time of such renewal or expiration of term. U. S. R. S., § 790.

The execution of process includes the returning of process, service under which has already been made. Thus the marshal may amend his return after going out of office. Cushing v. Laeid, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 70.

Such service or amendment may be made after the qualification of a successor. Stewart v. Hamilton, 4 McLean (U. S.) 534.

If the marshal or his deputy is a party in a cause, a disinterested party is appointed by the court or judge to make service. U. S. R. S., § 922.

A marshal may be ordered by the supreme court to return a writ directed to him for service upon a state, and, in case of default, to show cause therefor by affidavit. Oswald v. New York, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 402.

If personal service is made on a defendant, and return is made in the name of a special deputy marshal instead of in the name of the marshal, strangers cannot object to the judgment because of the irregularity. Hill v. Gordon, 45 Fed. Rep. 276.

both individuals and corporations.¹ The matter of service on non-residents in certain cases is especially regulated by United States statute given in the notes.² These provisions cover both legal and equitable writs. In equity, in cases other than those against non-residents, the service must be made by the delivery of a copy of the process to the defendant personally, or by leaving a copy thereof, at his dwelling-house or usual place of abode, with some adult person who is a member or resident in the family.³

2. When in any suit commenced in any circuit court of the United States, to enforce any legal or equitable lien upon, or claim to, or to remove any incumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title to real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought, one or more of the defendants therein shall not be an inhabitant of, or found within, the said district, or shall not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful for the court to make an order directing such absent defendant or defendants to appear, plead, answer or demur, by a day certain to be designated, which order shall be served on such absent defendant or defendants, if practicable, wherever found, and also upon the person or persons in possession or charge of said property, if any there be; or where such personal service upon such absent defendant or defendants is not practicable, such order shall be published in such manner as the court may direct, not less than once a week for six consecutive weeks; and in case such absent defendant shall not appear, plead, answer, or demur within the time so limited, or within some further time, to be allowed by the court in its discretion, and upon proof of the service or publication of said order, and of the performance of the directions contained in the same, it shall be lawful for the court to entertain jurisdiction, and proceed to the hearing and adjudication of such suit in the same manner as if such absent defendant had been served with process within the said district; but such adjudication shall, as regards such absent defendant or defendants, without appearance, affect only the property which shall have been the subject of the suit and under the jurisdiction of the court therein, within such district. And when a part of the said real or personal property against which such proceeding shall be taken shall be within another district, but within the same state, said suit may be brought in either district in said state; provided, however, "that any defendant or defendants not actually personally notified as above provided may, at any time within one year after final judgment in any suit mentioned in this section, enter his appearance in said suit in said circuit court, and thereupon the said court shall make an order setting aside the judgment therein, and permitting said defendant or defendants to plead therein, on payment by him or them of such costs as the court shall deem just; and thereupon said suit shall be proceeded with to final judgment according to law." 18 St. at L. 472.

An order, in accordance with the above provision, may be obtained on filing the bill, by making proof by affidavit that the defendant does not dwell within the district, and cannot be found or served therein. Forsyth v. Pier-son, 9 Fed. Rep. 801.

Publication can avail only on proof by affidavit that personal service is impracticable. Batt v. Procter, 45 Fed. Rep. 515; Bronson v. Keokuk, 2 Dill. (U. S.) 498.

Mere expensiveness of service does not constitute impracticability. Batt v. Procter, 45 Fed. Rep. 515.

The affidavit should state the residence, so far as known, and make it appear that diligence had been used to locate the others. Batt v. Procter, 45 Fed. Rep. 515.

A suit to determine the title to a patent right does not come within the terms of the above provision. Non-magnetic Watch Co. v. Association Horlogere Suisse, 44 Fed. Rep. 6.

8. Equity Rule No. 13.

Process in admiralty must be served by the marshal or his deputy, or where he or they are interested by some discreet and disinterested person appointed by the court.¹

(3) Territorial Limitations.—Process can ordinarily be issued only to the marshal of the district where the court sits.² It may be issued into another district, however, if especially authorized by express act of Congress.³

(4) Waiver.—Service may be waived either expressly or by appearance.⁴ Either form of waiver cures any irregularity in the writ,⁵ or the mode of service,⁶ or the return.⁷

The use of the phrase "as near as may be," which occurs in the statute, has been held to give the courts power to reject unimportant provisions of state statutes, which could not be wisely and conveniently adopted as a part of the federal procedure. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 301; Phelps v. Oaks, 117 U. S. 239.

Federal courts are not bound by a state statute prescribing a rule of practice for a single state court, nor by local practice dividing jurisdiction between courts of law and equity. Johnson v. Merry Mount Granite Co., 53 Fed. Rep. 566.

But a state statute providing that the husband is not a necessary or proper party to an action for damages to the person, estate, or character of his wife, is applicable in the federal courts for the state in actions at law. Morning Journal Assoc. v. Smith, 1 U. S. App. 270; 56 Fed. Rep. 141.

But the federal courts are not always restricted to the remedies provided by the laws of the state, and in proceedings to enforce a recognizance bond taken in a criminal case, they may resort to any of the common-law remedies, including scire facias, and a final judgment against the principals and sureties, on its return duly served. *U. utes.¹ Thus the state practice will be followed in determining the proper time to file the declaration,² the right of amendment as of course,³ the defects that may be taken advantage of by demurrer,⁴ and the sufficiency of the pleadings.⁵ The pleadings in actions for the infringements of patents and copyrights are expressly regulated by the legislation of Congress.⁶

b. IN EQUITY.—The pleadings in equitable actions are substantially uniform throughout the United States. They are regulated by rules framed by both the supreme court and the court where the suit is brought, in accordance with powers granted by Congress.⁷ As to the rules in detail and the decisions, reference is had to another part of this work.⁸

10. Appeals and Writs of Error—(See APPEAL, vol. 1, p. 616; ERROR, WRIT OF, vol. 6, p. 810).—The subjects of appeals and writs of error are naturally treated under the heads of the separate courts. There are some provisions, however, common to all.

a. WRITS OF ERROR—(1) Issuance.—A writ of error issues from the clerk's office of the appellate court to which it is returnable. If it is to review the judgment of a circuit court, it may issue from the office of the clerk of that court as well as from the office of the clerk of the highest court.⁹ It is, however, still the ment, must conform as nearly as possible to the state statutes in force at the time of the trial. Citizens' Bank v. Farwell, 56 Fed. Rep. 570.

The liability of a stockholder in a corporation, for which a special remedy is provided by the statutes of the state creating the corporation and imposing such liability, can be enforced in no other manner in a federal court. Bank of North America v. Rindge, 57 Fed. Rep. 279.

If in a state statute legal and equitable modes of procedure are confounded, the fact that the mode of procedure adopted by a claimant does not conform strictly to the requirements of the state statute, will not defeat the action, since the federal courts will enforce the right, but will preserve the distinction between law and equity. Leighton v. Young, 10 U. S. App. 298; 3 C. C. A. 176; 52 Fed. Rep. 439.

A state statute, allowing married women to sue alone, is not applicable to suits in equity in the federal courts, but they must appear by next friend. Wills v. Paulay, 51 Fed. Rep. 257.

Federal courts sitting in equity will comply with the Statutes of Limitations governing courts of law in such cases. Percy v. Cockrill, 10 U. S. App. 574; 53 Fed. Rep. 872.

8. See EQUITY PLEADINGS, vol. 6, p. 724.

9. "Writs of error returnable to the supreme court may be issued as well by the clerks of the circuit courts, under the seals thereof, as by the clerk of the supreme court. When so issued writ of the appellate court,¹ and its form cannot be changed otherwise than by authority of the justices of the supreme court.²

It issues as of course and need not be allowed by any judge;³ it bears the teste of the chief justice of the United States, or in case of the vacancy of that office, then the teste of the associate justice who has been longest in office;⁴ the teste may be from the date of issue;⁵ it is signed by the clerk and is under the seal of the court.⁶

It must be made returnable not exceeding thirty days from the date of serving the citation, whether the return day fall in vacation or in term time. It must be served before the return day.⁷ It may be amended at the discretion of the court.⁸

There must be annexed to the writ an authenticated transcript

they shall be, as nearly as each case may admit, agreeable to the form of a writ of error transmitted to the clerks of the several circuit courts by the clerk of the supreme court, in pursuance of section nine of the act of May eight, seventeen hundred and ninety-two, chapter thirty-six." The time allowed for returning writs of error issuing from the supreme court to the courts of California, Oregon, Nevada, Washington, New Mexico, Utah, Arizona, Montana, Wyoming,

North Dakota, South Dakota, Alaska and Idaho is extended to sixty days by Supreme Court Rule 9.

8. "The supreme court may, at any time in its discretion, and upon such terms as it may deem just, allow an amendment of a writ of error when there is a mistake in the teste of the writ, or a seal to the writ is wanting, or when the writ is made returnable on a day other than the day of the commencement of the term next ensuing the issue of the writ, or when the statement of the title of the action or parties thereto in the writ is defective, if the defect can be remedied by reference to the accompanying record, and in all other particulars of form, provided the defect has not prejudiced, and the amendment will not injure the defendant in error." U. S. R. S., § 1005; 26 St. at L. 826, § 11.

The right of amendment rests upon the statutory authority above. Porter v. Foley, 21 How. (U. S.) 393; Insurance Co. v. Mordecai, 21 How. (U. S.) 195; Hodge v. Williams, 22 How. (U. S.) 87; Washington v. Dennison, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 495. Under the authority above, almost all defects are curable. Curtis on Jurisdiction of U. S. Courts 87. But the whole matter is in the discretion of the court. Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U. S. 294.

A writ may always be amended if there is sufficient on the record to amend by. Course v. Stead, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 22.

If the names of the parties are not set forth in the writ, it will be dismissed for irregularity, but a new one in due form may be brought. Deneale v. Archer, 8 Pet. (U. S.) 526. If an appeal be taken in the name of a firm, of the record, an assignment of errors, and a prayer for reversal, with a citation to the adverse party.¹

(2) Service.—The writ and citation must be served, the former upon the clerk of the court to which it is directed,² the latter upon the defendants in error.³ The service of the latter may be waived either by express agreement,⁴ or by entering a general appearance without moving to dismiss.⁵

(3) Bond.—The Revised Statutes⁶ provide as follows: Every justice or judge signing a citation on any writ of error shall, except in cases brought up by the United States or by direction of any department of the government,⁷ take good and the writ may be amended if the record shows who are parties. Moore v. Simonds, 100 U. S. 145.

A wrong return day may be corrected. National Bank v. National Bank, 99 U. S. 608; Hampton v. Rouse, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 684. So, if the return day be left blank. Mossman v. Higginson, 4 Dall. (U. S.) 12.

The transcript must be signed by the clerk or by his deputy in the name of his principal, and bear the seal of the court. Garneau v. Dozier, 100 U. S. 7; The Rio Grande, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 178; Wilson v. Daniel, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 401.

Upon writ of error, no error in law can be reviewed which does not appear upon the record, or by bill of exceptions made part of the record. Claassen v. U. S., 142 U. S. 140.

Where the assignment of error is based on allegations of fact which the record shows to be untrue, the judgment or decree will be affirmed. Cheney v. Bacon, 49 Fed. Rep. 305; Mussina v. Cavazos, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 355. And so also where it is evident that the writ is sued out merely for delay, and by rule of court damages will be added. M'Neil v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. (U. S.) 84; Barrow v. Hill, 13 How. (U. S.) 54; Kilbourne v. State Sav. Inst., 22 How. (U. S.) 503; Jenkins v. Banning, 23 How. (U. S.) 455; Campbell v. Wilcox, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 421.

It is sufficient if the above requirements be substantially complied with. Mussina v. Cavazos, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 355.

The citation is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred into another court, where he may appear or decline to appear, as he may see fit. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 264, 411.

It is usually prepared by counsel and presented to the judge for his signature. Tiernan v. Booth, 4 Fed. Rep. 620. For the authorities showing the practice under Rev. Stat., § 997, see Bump's Federal Procedure, p. 693.

A failure to appear in answer to the citation does not entitle the plaintiff in error to judgment. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 264.

5. Radford v. Folsom, 123 U. S. 725; Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. (U. S.) 150; Pierce v. Cox, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 786.

6. U. S. R. S., § 1000.

7. Whenever a writ of error, appeal, or other process in law, admiralty, or equity, issues from, or is brought up to the supreme court, or a circuit court, either by the United States, or by direction of any department of the government, no bond, obligation, or security shall be required from the United States, or from any party acting under the direction aforesaid, either to prosecute said suit, or to answer in damages or cost. In case of an adverse decision, such costs as by law are taxable against the United States or against the party acting by direction as aforesaid, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the department under whose direction the proceedings were instituted. U. S. R. S., § 1001.

sufficient security¹ that the plaintiff in error or the appellant shall prosecute his writ or appeal to effect, and if he fail to make his plea good, shall answer all damages and costs, where the writ is a supersedeas and stays execution, or all costs only where it is not a supersedeas as aforesaid.

This provision is, however, directory only, and a failure to observe it does not avoid the writ of error.² The taking of the bond and the issuing of the citation are generally simultaneous acts,³ but further time may be allowed for the former.⁴ The statutes do not prescribe any particular form of bond;⁵ the practice is to give a bond in the usual form. The party himself need not sign the bond.⁶ The bond when executed may be lodged in the court below.⁷

(4) Supersedeas.—"A supersedeas is a stay of proceedings upon a judgment or decree to which a writ of error is issued, or upon which an appeal is taken."⁸ In any case where a writ of error may be a supersedeas, the defendant may obtain such supersedeas by serving the writ of error, by lodging a copy thereof for the adverse party in the clerk's office where the record remains, within sixty days, Sundays exclusive, after the rendering of the judgment complained of, and giving the security required by law on the issuing of the citation. But if he desires to stay process on the judgment, he may, having served his writ of error as aforesaid, give the security required by law within sixty days after the rendition of such judgment, or afterward with the permission of a justice or judge of the appellate court. And in such cases where a writ of error may be a supersedeas, executions may not issue until the expiration of ten days.⁹

1. The bond must be approved by the judge or justice, not by the clerk. Freeman v. Clay, 48 Fed. Rep. 849; O'Reilly v. Edrington, 96 U. S. 724; National Bank v. Omaha, 96 U. S. 737.

The sureties need not reside within the district. Ex p. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 188.

The bond may be approved by the judge at chambers. Hudgins v. Kemp, 18 How. (U. S.) 530.

The judge may approve a bond with a penalty for less than double the amount, if the writ is not a supersedeas, where judgment is for a large amount and where bond is to operate merely as a stay. Hatch v. Coddington, 5 Blatchf. (U. S.) 523. He alone is to judge of the sufficiency. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How. (U. S.) 495; Ex p. French, 100 U. S. 1; Jerome v. McCarter, 21 Wall. (U. 9. U. S. R. S., § 1007. A writ of error becomes a supersedeas per se on com-

A supersedeas bond must be taken with good and sufficient surety that the plaintiff shall prosecute his writ to effect, and answer all damages and costs if he fails to make his plea good. In general, the bond must be for the amount of the judgment, costs and interest, but where the property necessarily follows the event of the suit, as in real actions, replevin, suits on mortgages or suits over property in the custody of the court, the bond need cover only the damages recovered for use and detention, costs and interest.¹

If, after acceptance of the bond, the security becomes insufficient, the appellate court will make such orders as justice requires.² A supersedeas operates as a stay of proceedings, not affecting the previous action of the court, but merely keeping matters in statu quo.³

(5) Return.—The writ with the authenticated transcript, the assignment of errors, the prayer for reversal, and the citation must be returned on the return day.⁴

(6) Subsequent Steps.—On the return of the writ to the appellate court the matter is ready for hearing. If, on account of informalities or lack of jurisdiction, the writ is not properly before the court, it may be dismissed on motion;⁵ if not so dismissed, it proceeds to final hearing. The conclusions of the appellate court are announced in a mandate sent down to the court whose proceedings have been reviewed by the writ.⁶ If judgment is reversed, the court adjudges to the respondent in error just damages for his delay and single or double costs in its discretion.⁷

(7) Errors Considered.—The writ reaches errors of law only; not errors of fact.⁸ The error must have been committed otherwise than in ruling upon a plea in abatement.⁹

9. U. S. R. S., § 1011.

Errors committed by a state supreme court are reviewable by the United States Supreme Court only by writ of error.¹

Writs of error may be issued to review only final judgments or decrees, with the single exception in the circuit court of appeals of an interlocutory decree granting or continuing an injunction.²

A final judgment or decree is thus defined in a leading modern case:³

"A judgment or decree, to be final, within the meaning of that term as used in the acts of Congress giving this court jurisdiction on appeals and writs of error, must terminate the litigation between the parties on the merits of the case, so that if there should be an affirmance here, the court would have nothing to do but to execute the judgment or decree it has already rendered."

b. APPEALS.—The rules and regulations governing appeals are in the main similar to those regulating writs of error, and most of the above provisions laid down as applicable to writs of error apply as well to appeals.

An appeal, however, unlike a writ of error, must be allowed by a judge,⁴ who may be compelled to allow it by mandamus.⁵ If the appeal is taken in open court at the term at which the decree

S. 180; Mower v. Fletcher, 114 U. S. 127.

The mere fact that accounts remain to be adjusted, or that the court retains the fund in controversy for the purpose of distributing it as decreed, does not rob the decree of its final and appealable character. Lewisburg Bank v. Sheffield, 140 U. S. 445; Hill v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 140 U. S. 52.

"When a decree finally decides and disposes of the whole merits of the cause, and reserves no further questions or directions for the future judgment of the court, so that it will not be necessary to bring the cause again before the court was rendered, no citation is necessary;¹ if at a subsequent term, a citation must issue and be served.²

The rules as to bonds on appeal, are the same as those governing bonds on writs of error, and are set out in the section immediately preceding.

It is provided in the revised statutes³ that, "Appeals from the circuit courts and district courts acting as circuit courts, and from district courts in prize causes, shall be subject to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions as are or may be prescribed in law in cases of writs of error."⁴

These rules and regulations must be complied with. The supreme court has no power to dispense with or modify them,⁵ nor to receive an appeal not in accordance with them.⁶

If an appeal is dismissed for informality, a second appeal may be taken within the period allowed for an appeal.⁷

Where an appeal is duly taken by both parties from the judgment or decree of a circuit or district court to the supreme court, a transcript of the record filed in the supreme court by either appellant may be used on both appeals, and both are heard thereon in the same manner as if records had been filed by the appellants in both cases.⁸

Appeals lie only from final judgments.⁹ They may be dismissed for informality or lack of jurisdiction;¹⁰ if not so dismissed, they go on to final hearing, and the judgment is either affirmed or reversed, when the court will make such supplementary orders as justice may require.¹¹

those enforced in other tribunals. There are, however, certain statutory provisions applicable to federal practice which should be mentioned.

The statute regulating the subject of proof in common-law actions is as follows:¹

"The mode of proof in the trial of actions at common law shall be by oral testimony and examination of witnesses in open court, except as hereinafter provided."² In regard to equity and admiralty suits, it is provided³ that, "The mode of proof in causes of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to rules now or hereafter prescribed by the supreme court, except as herein specially provided." In such cases, if appealed to the supreme court or circuit court of appeals, no objection may be taken to the admissibility of any deposition, deed, grant or other exhibit found in the record as evidence, unless objection was taken thereto in the court below and entered of record; but the same shall otherwise be deemed to have been admitted by consent.⁴

Certain special rules governing the testimony to be admitted in federal courts exist either by virtue of statute or judicial decisions.

No testimony given by a witness before either house, or before any committee of either house of Congress, can be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. But an official paper or record produced by him is not within the said privilege.⁵

No pleading of a party, nor any discovery of evidence obtained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, may be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture; but this provision does not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid.⁶

In mining cases for the recovery of mining title or for damage to such title, no possessory action is affected by the fact that the paramount title to the land in which such mines lie is in the United States; but each case is adjudged by the law of

1. U. S. R. S., § 861.

2. An examination "in open court" is one "in the presence of the court and jury at the trial, and not before the trial." Beardsley v. Littell, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 102. This section is a restriction of the rule that state rules of practice govern in trials in the federal courts. Ex p. Fisk, 113 U. S. 713.

4. Supreme Court Rule 13. Circuit Court of Appeals Rule 12 extends the rule to translations.

5. U. S. R. S., § 859.

6. U. S. R. S., § 860. But this section does not prevent one from showing that a party who testifies in his own behalf voluntarily appeared in a criminal prosecution against another and testified differently, where such possession.¹ In cases of seizure under the revenue laws the burden of proof is in general on the claimant of the property; but probable cause must be made to appear for the prosecution, to be judged of by the court.²

b. WITNESSES — (1) Competency. — It is provided that the laws of the state in which the court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses. No person, however, shall be excluded on account of color or interest.³ This provision does not allow a husband or wife to become a witness in a suit by or against the other party to the relation where he or she would be excluded by the common law.⁴ Whether the husband or wife may testify depends upon the law of the state where the court sits.⁵ It applies to testimony, whether oral or by deposition,⁶ whether it be given by the party directly in interest or by some witness remotely con-testimony in itself has no tendency to criminate the party. U. S. v. Smith, 47 Fed. Rep. 501.

1. U. S. R. S., § 910.

2. "In suits or informations brought, where any seizure is made pursuant to any act providing for or regulating the collection of duties on imports or tonnage, if the property is claimed by any person, the burden of proof is upon such claimant; but probable cause must be shown for such prosecution, to be judged of by the court." U. S. R. S., § 909.

"Probable cause means reasonable ground of presumption that the charge is or may be well founded." Story, J., in Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. (U. S.) 366; U. S. v. The John Griffin, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 29. The above rule is to be applied to seizures under laws passed since its adoption. Cliquot's Champagnes, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 114.

3. "In the courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded in any action on account of color, or in any civil action because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried: provided that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other, as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court. In all other respects, the laws of the state in which the court is held shall be the rules of decision as to the competency of witnesses in the courts of the United States in trials at common law, and in equity and admiralty." U. S. R. S., § 858.

The right of persons of color to give evidence is further secured in U. S. R. S., § 1977. "The opposite party," as used above, is that party against whom the evidence is sought to be used. Eslava v. Mazange, 1 Woods (U. S.) 623.

In matters covered by the above provision, the state law is entirely disregarded. Potter v. Third Nat. Bank, 102 U. S. 163; Goodwin v. Fox, 129 U. S. 631.

As to whether a physician may be compelled to disclose communications made to him in his professional capacity, depends on the statute of the state where the federal court sits. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Trust Co., 112 U. S. 250.

U. S. R. S., § 858, quoted above, has no application to criminal trials. Logan v. U. S., 144 U. S. 263. It must be taken subject to the exception thus stated by the court, by Waite, C. J., in Whitford v. Clark Co., 119 U. S. 522: "When the statutes of the United States make special provisions as to the competency or admissibility of testimony, they must be followed in the courts of the United States, and not the laws or the practice of the state in which the court is held when they are different."

cerned in the suit.¹ It applies to actions to which the United States is a party.²

The accused in criminal cases is a competent witness, but cannot be compelled to testify.³

(2) How Attendance Is Secured.—Attendance is secured in the first instance by a writ of subpoena ad testificandum.

The common-law rule allowing the names of but four witnesses has been superseded by statute,⁴ and now it is the duty of the clerk to insert the names of as many witnesses in a cause in a subpoena as convenience in serving the same will permit.

Subpoenas for witnesses who are required to attend a court of the United States, in any district, may run into any other district; provided that in civil causes the witnesses living out of the district in which the court is held do not live at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of holding the same.⁵

If the witness living out of the district where the court is held lives more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, he cannot be subpoenaed.⁶

Witnesses who are required to attend any term of a circuit or district court on the part of the United States are subpoenaed to attend to testify generally on their behalf, and not to depart the court without leave thereof, or of the district attorney; and under such process they must appear before the grand or petit jury, or both, as they may be required by the court or district attorney.⁷

In criminal cases, indigent accused persons may have compulsory process to secure the attendance of witnesses at the expense of the government.⁸ The witnesses for the United States in

The attendance of witnesses whose testimony is needed in depositions under a dedimus potestatem may be secured by subpœna,³ or a subpœna duces tecum may issue on filing the proper affidavits.⁴

A party may serve subpœna if authorized by state practice. Miller v. Allen, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 484.

A witness who refuses to attend in answer to a subpœna may be punished for contempt. Voss v. Luke, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 331; U. S. v. Williams, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 372.

But where the witness shows no disposition to treat the subpœna with contempt, and the failure to attend results from sickness of himself or of a member of his family, the court in its discretion will dispense with the usual punishment. Ex p. Beebe, 2 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 127.

The contempt can be punished only by fine or punishment. U. S. R. S., § 725; Ex p. Robinson, 19 Wall. (U. S.) 506.

The punishment must be inflicted by a court; the commissioner has no such power. Elting v. U. S. (French Spoliation Cl. 5142), Ct. of Cl. (Feb. 8th, 1892).

3. "When a commission is issued by any court of the United States for taking the testimony of a witness named therein at any place within any district or territory, the clerk of any court of the United States for such district or territory shall, on the application of either party to the suit, or of his agent, issue a subpœna for such witness, commanding him to appear and testify before the commissioner named in the commission, at a time and place stated in the subpœna; and if any witness, after being duly served with such subpœna, refuses or neglects to appear, or, after appearing, refuses to testify, not being privileged from giving testimony, and such refusal or neglect is proven to the satisfaction of any judge of the court whose clerk issues such subpœna, such judge may proceed to enforce obedience to the process, or punish the disobedience, as any court of the United States may proceed in case of disobedience to process of subpœna to testify issued by such court." U. S. R. S., § 868.

The above statute does not refer to testimony before a special commissioner taken in another district under Equity Rule 67. In such case a subpœna may be issued by the clerk of the district within which the testimony is taken without direct order of the court. Johnson Steel St. R. Co. v. North Branch Steel Co., 48 Fed. Rep. 191.

deemed guilty of contempt for disobeying any subpoena so directed to him, unless his fees for going to, returning from, and one day's attendance at, the place of examination are paid or tendered to him at the time of the service of the subpoena.¹

Special statutory provisions secure the procuring of the testimony of witnesses found within the District of Columbia for use in state, territorial, or foreign courts.²

(3) How Compelled to Testify.—A witness who refuses to be sworn or to testify may be punished for contempt.³ It is said also that an action may be brought against him for the damages sustained by his refusal.⁴

A witness cannot, however, be compelled to submit to a surgical examination in advance of the trial when he is also the party suing for damages for an injury to the person.⁵

c. DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.—Copies of any books, records, papers, or documents, in any of the executive departments, authenticated under the seals of such departments, respectively, are admitted in evidence equally with the originals.⁶

The documents must, however, be made by the proper officers in the discharge of official duty.⁷

Statutes of the United States regulate proof as regards the following documents and records: documents, records, books and papers in the office of the solicitor of the treasury,⁸ documents executed by the comptroller of the currency and papers in his office,⁹ organization certificates of national banks,¹⁰ books and proceedings of the treasury department,¹¹ papers in the return offices of the department of the interior,¹ post office records,² records and papers in the general land office,³ records of the patent office,⁴ extracts from the journals of Congress,⁵ documents in the offices of consuls and commercial agents,⁶ lost records generally,⁷ public and judicial records of foreign governments, the several states and territories⁸ and United States statutes.⁹

But records may often be admitted, even though not especially allowed by a statute.

In general, the rule seems to be as follows: official registers or records are admissible in evidence in federal courts, if they are kept by a person exercising a public office, in which he is required, either by statute or by the nature of his office, to write down particular transactions or events occurring in the course of his official duty or under his personal observation. On this ground the records of the United States signal stations are admissible.¹⁰

The rules as to the admission of documentary evidence are more liberal in admiralty than in common-law or equity proceedings.¹¹

DEPOSITIONS—(See also DEPOSITIONS, vol. 5, p. 581; BILL DE BENE ESSE, vol. 2, p. 285)—(1) Depositions de Bene Esse.—Provision is made in the United States statutes for depositions de bene esse. They apply to both equity and common-law actions,¹² and allow a party to directly attain the same result as by a bill in equity to take testimony de bene esse.¹³ The provisions of the statute on the subject are given in the note.¹⁴

"The testimony of any witness may be taken in any civil cause depending in a district or circuit court by deposition de bene esse, when the witness lives at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles, or is bound on a voyage to sea, or is about to go out of the United States, or out of the district in which the case is to be tried, and to a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of trial, before the time of trial, or when he is ancient and infirm. The deposition may be taken before any judge of any court of the United States, or any commissioner of a circuit court, or any clerk of a district or circuit court, or any chancellor, justice or judge of a supreme or a superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, judge of a county court or court of common pleas of any of the United States, or any notary public, not being of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the cause. Reasonable notice must first be given in writing by the party or his attorney proposing to take such deposition, to the opposite party or his attorney of record, as either may be nearest, which notice shall state the name of the witness and the time and place of the taking of the deposition; and in all cases in rem, the person having the agency or possession of the property at the time of seizure shall be deemed the adverse party, until a claim shall have been put in; and whenever, by reason of the absence from the district and want of an attorney of record, or other reason, the giving of the notice herein required shall be impracticable, it shall be lawful to take such depositions as there shall be urgent necessity for taking, upon such notice as any judge authorized to hold courts in such circuit or district shall think reasonable and direct. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose, as provided by this section, in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify in court. U. S. R. S., § 863. See also Equity Rule 67.

This section has no application to the taking of depositions in foreign countries. Cortes Co. v. Tannhauser, 18 Fed. Rep. 667; Stein v. Bowman, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 209; Bischoffsheim v. Baltzer, 10 Fed. Rep. 1.

A notice that the plaintiff will take depositions of witnesses in three different cities on the same day, is not such reasonable notice as is required by U. S. R. S., § 863, and such depositions will be suppressed. Uhle v. Burnham, 44 Fed. Rep. 729.

If the notice provided for is not given, the adverse party, on making affidavit of the fact, may cross-examine the witnesses, either under a commission, or by new deposition, if the court or a judge thereof deem it reasonable. Equity Rule 68.

Notice must be given by the magistrate before whom the deposition is to be taken. Notice by the party is not sufficient. Young v. Davidson, 5 Cranch (C. C.) 515.

The liability of a witness in government employ to be ordered out of the reach of the court, is not sufficient ground for taking a deposition de bene esse. Depositions de bene esse must be taken strictly in accordance with statutory requisites. Otherwise they are not admissible. The Samuel, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 9; Evans v. Eaton, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 356; Evans v. Hettick, 3 Wash. (C. C.) 408; Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 351; Harris v. Wall, 7 How. (U. S.) 693; Carrington v. Stimson, 1 Curt. (U. S.) 437. "Every person deposing as provided in the preceding section, shall be cautioned and sworn to testify the whole truth, and carefully examined. His testimony shall be reduced to writing by the magistrate taking the deposition, or by himself in the magistrate's presence, and by no other person, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing, be subscribed by the deponent." U. S. R. S., § 864.

The witness must be sworn to tell the whole truth, as far as he knows, touching the matter in controversy between the parties. Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 151; Pendleton v. Forbes, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 507; Garrett v. Woodward, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 190; Rainer v. Haynes, Hempst. (U. S.) 689; Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Jackson, 1 Hughes (U. S.) 295. A certificate stating that witness was cautioned, examined, and sworn is sufficient. Edmonson v. Barrell, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 228.

"Every deposition taken under the two preceding sections shall be retained by the magistrate taking it until he delivers it with his own hand into the court for which it is taken; or it shall, together with a certificate of the reasons as aforesaid, of taking it and of the notice, if any, given to the adverse party, be by him sealed up and directed to such court, and remain under his seal until opened in court. But unless it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the witness is then dead, or gone out of the United States, or to a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place where the court is sitting, or that, by reason of age, sickness, bodily infirmity, or imprisonment, he is unable to travel and appear at court, such deposition shall not be used in the cause." U. S. R. S., § 865.

If, at the time of trial, the attendance of the witness can be secured, the deposition may not be read. Whitford v. Clarke Co., 119 U. S. 522; The Samuel, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 9; Weed v. Kellogg, 6 McLean (U. S.) 44; Park v. Willis, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 357.

The party seeking to read a deposition taken de bene esse must show that he has diligently sought to procure the attendance of the witness: otherwise it may not be used. Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 604; Jones v. Greenolds, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 339; Penn. v. Ingraham, 2 Wash. (U. S.) 487; Banert v. Day, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 243; Pettibone v. Derringer, 4 Wash. (U. or delay of justice,¹ any of the courts of the United States may grant a dedimus potestatem to take depositions according to common usage,² and any circuit court upon application³ to it as a court of equity, may, according to the usages of chancery, direct depositions to be taken in perpetuam rei memoriam, if they relate to any matters that may be cognizable in any court of the United States. And the provisions of the three sections of the statute immediately preceding have no application to any deposition to be taken under the authority of this section.⁴

Any court of the United States may, in its discretion, admit in evidence in any cause before it any deposition taken in perpetuam rei memoriam, which would be so admissible in a court of the state wherein such cause is pending, according to the laws thereof.⁵

(3) Letters Rogatory.—The testimony of witnesses in foreign countries is taken under letters rogatory.⁶

(4) Miscellaneous Provisions.—For the rules governing depositions other than as above given, reference is made to another part of this work.⁷

12. *Trial and Its Incidents*⁸—a. IN GENERAL.—The mode of conducting trials in civil causes, other than those in equity and admiralty, is that adopted in the courts of the state where the federal court is sitting.⁹ The practice of the state courts thus regulates the general conduct of the suit from its commencement to its close, except so far as modified by national legislation.¹⁰ But the rule above must not be pushed so far as to interfere with the proper discretion of the court, and its power to direct the proceedings in accordance with such discretion. Thus it does not apply to the personal conduct and administration of the judge in the discharge of his functions.¹¹ In equity and admiralty pro-

The provisions, being in derogation of the common law, are strictly construed. U. S. v. Parrott, McAll. (U. S.) 447.

2. "Common usage" has reference both to the usage at law and in equity. Bischoffsheim v. Baltzer, 10 Fed. Rep. 1. It refers to the usage in the state courts. Buddicum v. Kirk, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 293; Sutton v. Mandeville, 1 Cranch (C. C.) 115.

In Nudd v. Barrows, 91 U. S. 426, it was held that a state statute requiring a judge to instruct a jury only as to the law of the case, and providing that the written instructions of the court

ceedings the trial is conducted according to the ancient rules governing such cases, as modified by federal legislation and rules of court.¹

In criminal prosecutions the accused is guaranteed the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime was committed, to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.² In all cases, however, parties may manage their cases personally.³ Parties at the trial, on motion and due notice, may be compelled to produce books and writings in their possession.⁴

b. JURIES—(1) Constitutional Provision.—Trial by jury is secured by the constitution in criminal cases, and in suits at common law where the value of the matter in dispute exceeds twenty dollars.⁵

(2) In Civil Cases.—The trial of issues of fact in the supreme should be taken by the jury in their retirement, and returned with the verdict, and that papers read in evidence might be carried from the bar by the jury, was not binding upon the federal courts, and that a judge, in charging the jury upon the facts, and in refusing to permit them to take the written instructions, or the papers read in evidence, to the jury room, committed no error. See also Vicksburg, etc., R. Co. v. Putnam, 118 U. S. 545; U. S. v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 123 U. S. 113; Rucker v. Wheeler, 127 U. S. 93; Lovejoy v. U. S., 128 U. S. 171.

A state statute prescribing that the judge shall require the jury to answer special interrogatories, in addition to finding a general verdict, does not apply to the courts of the United States. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291.

It may be said in general that questions of the power and authority of the court are independent of the state law. Lyons v. Lyons Nat. Bank, 8 Fed. Rep. 373.

The presiding judge of a United States court doubtless may, in a proper case, direct the verdict for the defendant and order judgment entered thereon. Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 139 U. S. 24.

Neither a state constitution nor a state law prohibiting judges from charging juries with regard to matters of fact affect United States courts. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Vickers, 122 U. S. 360.

5. Art. 3, § 2, amendments 6 and 7. The right of trial by jury is not suspended by war. Ex p. Milligan, 4 Wall. (U. S.) 3, 123.

All suits not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, brought to settle legal rights, though of a peculiar form not known to the common law, are within the meaning of the term here used, "suits at common law." Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. (U. S.) 446; Knickerbocker Ins. Co. v. Comstock, 16 Wall. (U. S.) 258; U. S. v. La Vengeance, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 297; The James and Catherine, Baldw. (U. S.) 554. But a suit against the government is not included. McElrath v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 312.

The constitutional provisions require a jury as it existed at common law. The requirement of unanimity must be preserved. Kleinschmidt v. Dunphy, 1 Mont. 118.

court in all actions at law against citizens of the United States is by jury.¹

In the circuit and district courts the trial in common-law cases is by jury.² This rule is absolute, except that in the former court the parties or their attorneys of record may file with the clerk a stipulation in writing waiving a jury. The cause may then be tried by the court, whose finding, whether general or special, will have the same effect as the verdict of the jury.³ In such a trial the rulings of the court may be excepted to, and reviewed upon writ of error or appeal. If the finding is special, the review may extend to the determination of the sufficiency of the facts to support the judgment.⁴

There are special provisions giving a right to jury trial in certain admiralty and patent causes.⁵

(3) Choosing of Jurors and Conduct of Jury Trials.—The qualifications, exemptions and mode of choosing jurors correspond with those which obtain in the state where the court sits.⁶ But no person is disqualified to serve in a federal court as juror because of race, color or previous condition of servitude.⁷ The per diem pay of jurors is two dollars. No person may serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, nor as a grand juror more than once in two years.⁸ The method of drawing

The constitutional provision does not require a jury in preliminary criminal inquiries not involving a trial on the merits. Ex p. Martin, 2 Paine (U. S.) 348.

The grand jury consists of not less than sixteen, nor more than twenty-three persons;³ their foreman is appointed by the court, who is also required to administer the oath.⁴ The venire to the grand jury must be issued by the judge of the circuit or district court.⁵ Grand juries may be discharged by the court in its discretion.⁶ The juries of circuit and district courts may be used interchangeably.⁷ The accused, in treason, is entitled to twenty peremptory challenges, and the United States to five; in felony, he is entitled to ten and the United States to three; in other criminal and in all civil cases, each party is entitled to three peremptory challenges.⁸ There are other provisions of a special nature which are referred to in the notes.⁹ All proceedings in the case must be had in the presence of the jury, including the noting of exceptions to the charge or the refusal to charge.¹⁰

Decrees in rem exist in the federal equity practice, but are of purely statutory origin.¹

Interest is allowed on judgments in civil causes in circuit and district courts, and may be levied by the marshal under process of execution issued thereon, in all cases where, by the law of the state in which the court is held, interest may be levied under such process of execution on judgments recovered in the courts of the state. The rate of interest is the same as that on judgments of state courts. It begins to run from the date of the judgment.³ The rule above does not apply to cases in equity,⁴ nor to judgments against the United States.⁵

applicable therein whenever, and only whenever, the laws of such state shall authorize the judgments and decrees of the United States courts to be registered, recorded, docketed, indexed, or otherwise conformed to the rules and requirements relating to the judgments and decrees of the courts of the state. That the clerks of the several courts of the United States shall prepare and keep in their respective offices complete and convenient indices and cross indices of the judgment records of said courts, and such indices and records shall at all times be open to the inspection and examination of the public." (Special provision as to Louisiana.) 25 St. at L. 357; Act of August 1st, 1888.

Judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court, within any state, shall cease to be liens on real estate or chattels real, in the same manner and at like periods, as judgments and decrees of the courts of such state cease, by law, to be liens thereon. U. S. R. S., § 967.

A provision of a state law to the effect that a judgment shall not be a lien unless execution be issued thereon within a certain time, applies to federal courts. Sellers v. Corwin, 5 Ohio 398; 24 Am. Dec. 301.

stance, as follows: 'This cause came on to be heard (or to be further heard, as the case may be), at this term, and was argued by counsel; and thereupon, upon consideration thereof, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows, viz.: ' (Here insert the decree or order.)" When the decree is entered by consent this fact should be recited in the decree. Seton on Decrees (4th ed.) 1535; Foster's Federal Practice (2d ed.), vol. 1, § 325.

If the decree be for the performance of any specific act, as, for example, the execution of a conveyance of land or the delivering of deeds or other documents, the decree must prescribe the time within which the act shall be done. Equity Rule 8.

Every decree for an account of the personal estate of a testator or intestate shall contain a direction to the master, to whom it is referred to take the same, to inquire and state to the court what parts, if any, of such personal estate are outstanding or undisposed of, unless the court shall otherwise direct. Equity Rule 73.

(2) Correction.—The correction and vacation of judgments is a matter relating to the authority of the court, and as such is within its discretion. The court is not affected by state laws on the subject.²

A judgment may, for cause, be vacated or amended at the term at which it was entered,³ but not at a later term, unless the motion had been made or noticed within the term,⁴ or some material matter of fact had escaped attention, or there had been a clerical error,⁵ or the judgment was absolutely void and not voidable only.⁶

Decrees may be corrected if the mistakes are clerical only, or have arisen from accidental slips or omissions at any time before enrollment, upon petition merely.⁷ There are also seven other methods of correcting decrees: by petition for rehearing,⁸ by bill of review, by bill in the nature of a bill of review, by a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, by a bill to set aside a decree on account of fraud, mistake, accident or surprise, by a bill to suspend or avoid the operation of a decree, and by appeal.⁹

(3) Special Provisions.—Statutes have been passed having application to particular suits or special cases which are referred to in the notes.¹⁰

b. EXECUTIONS.—The Revised Statutes provide that the party recovering a judgment in any common-law cause in any circuit or district court shall be entitled to similar remedies upon the same, by execution or otherwise, to reach the property of the judgment debtor, as are now provided in like causes by the laws of the state in which such court is held, or by any such laws hereafter enacted which may be adopted by general rules of such circuit or district court; and such courts may, from time to time, by general rules adopt such state laws as may hereafter be in force in such states in relation to remedies upon judgments, as aforesaid, by execution or otherwise.¹

All writs of execution upon judgments or decrees obtained in a circuit or district court, in any state which is divided into two or more districts, may run and be executed in any part of such state; but shall be issued from, and made returnable to, the court wherein the judgment was obtained.²

Execution upon judgments in favor of the United States may run into every state and territory.³ Execution on judgments in a circuit court may be stayed at the discretion of the court,⁴ or if allowed by state law, as a matter of right.⁵ If the state law requires that goods taken on execution on a writ of fiery facias shall be appraised before sale, the state appraisers may appraise goods taken on a like process issuing out of the federal courts. The marshal may summon the appraisers according to the state law, and if they do not attend he may sell the goods without appraisal.⁶ The death of a marshal does not affect an execution sale, but his successor may perform the acts necessary to completely vest title.⁷

All money received by the court or its officers may be deposited with the treasurer, an assistant treasurer, or a designated depository of the United States, in the name and to the credit of the court, or may be delivered upon security, according to agreement of the parties, under direction of the court.⁸

ruled, the judgment shall be respondent onster; and thereupon a trial may be ordered at the same term, or a continuance may be ordered, as justice may require. U. S. R. S., § 1026.

1. U. S. R. S., § 916. This statute, in so far as it conflicts with the general rule, established in U. S. R. S., § 914, supersedes it. Under section 916 only such remedies can be pursued in the enforcement of judgments as were provided by state law at the time the section was re-enacted, Dec. 11th, 1873, together with such of the subsequent remedies provided by state legislation as have been adopted by rules of the federal courts. Lamaster v. Keeler, 123 U. S. 376. See infra, this title, Practice and Procedure.

3. U. S. R. S., § 986.

4. When a circuit court enters judgment in a civil action, either upon a verdict or on a finding of the court upon the facts, in cases where such finding is allowed, execution may, on motion of either party, at the discretion of the court, and on such conditions for the security of the adverse party as it may judge proper, be stayed forty-two days from the time of entering judgment, to give time to file in the clerk's office of said court a petition for a new trial. If such petition is filed within said term of forty-two days, with a certificate thereon from any judge of such court that he allows it to be filed, which certificate he may make or refuse at his discretion, execution shall, of course, be further stayed to the next session of said court. If a new trial be granted, the former judgment shall be thereby rendered void. U. S. R. S., § 987.

5. In any state where judgments are liens upon the property of the defendant, and where, by the laws of such state, defendants are entitled, in the courts thereof, to a stay of execution for one term or more, defendants in actions in the courts of the United States held therein, shall be entitled to a stay of execution for one term. While in the hands of the clerk it is exempt from attachment.¹ If deposited, it may be drawn on the signed and recorded order of the judge.²

The rules as to taking the body on execution, imprisonment for debt, and release from such imprisonment, are those governing executions issuing from the courts of the state.³ The matter of executions on judgments for duties⁴ and for fines,⁵ is regulated by statute.

In suits in equity, final process to execute any decree may, if the decree be solely for the payment of money, be by writ of execution, in the form used in the circuit court in suits at common law in actions of assumpsit.⁶

14. Practice and Procedure—a. IN ACTIONS AT LAW—(1) The Rule Stated.—Prior to 1872, the federal courts had generally adhered to common-law forms of actions, pleadings, and procedure. The practice in the states, on the contrary, had been largely codified by statutory provisions abolishing the distinctions between the forms of actions and eliminating the technicalities peculiar to the old law. To obviate the embarrassment following the use of two different systems, and to assimilate the state and federal practice, the act of 1872⁷ was passed,⁸ which, as incorporated into the Revised Statutes,⁹ is as follows: "The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes other than equity and admiralty causes in the circuit and district courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding."

The rule thus enunciated is, however, subject to two qualifications: first, it must, of course, give way before federal legislation on the subject,¹⁰ and it does not apply to the personal conduct of

1. The Lottawanna, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 201. In Tefft v. Sternberg, 40 Fed. Rep. 2, the court, by Speer, J., said: "The proposition, as settled by an ample and indeed irresistible array of decisions, may be broadly stated as follows: When property is seized and held under mesne or final process of either a state or United States court, it is in the custody of the law, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the court from which the process has issued for the purposes of the writ, and the possession of the officers having it in control cannot be disturbed by another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. Such disturbance would be to invade the jurisdiction of the court by whose command it is held, and to violate the law which that jurisdiction is appointed to administer. Of course this rule is not applicable in those cases where the courts of the United States exercise superior jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing the supremacy of the constitution and laws of the United States."

Thus state laws inconsistent with acts of Congress are not adopted. Walker v. Collins, 50 Fed. Rep. 737; O'Neil v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 663; U. S. v. Train, 12 Fed. Rep. 852.

the case on the part of the judge, as this is not included in the terms "practice, pleadings, and forms and notes of proceeding."¹

The phrase "as near as may be," which occurs in the statute, confines the section in its operation to state laws and rules of practice not inconsistent with the objects and customs of the United States courts.²

Subject to these limitations it is imperative.³

It applies to suits prosecuted in behalf of the United States.⁴

One of the most common illustrations of the rule is found in the adoption of code forms of pleading and practice. Such forms, if provided by statute for use in the state courts, will be followed in the federal courts,⁵ although not to the extent of allowing the union of legal and equitable causes of action and expenses in one proceeding.⁶

(2) To What Matters of Practice the Rule Applies.—The section just referred to⁷ has been held to apply to the following matters of practice:⁸ service of process,⁹ joinder of parties,¹⁰ joinder of causes of action,¹¹ the granting of non-suits and sustaining demur-

1. Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 426. And see supra, this title, Trial and Its Incidents.

But the judge may follow the rules of state practice in these matters, although he is not bound to do so. Mitchell v. Harmony, 13 How. (U. S.) 115.

The judge of a United States court is not bound by the statute of a state providing that judges direct the finding of special verdicts. Dwyer v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 52 Fed. Rep. 87.

2. Hat Sweat Mfg. Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co., 3 Fed. Rep. 294; Ex p. Chateaugay Ore. etc., Co., 128 U. S. 544.

Thus, while federal courts will conform "as near as may be" to state statutes, yet they will reject such provisions as tend to incumber the law or defeat justice. Lowry v. Story, 31 Fed. Rep. 769; In re Secretary, etc., 45 Fed. Rep. 396; Gould and Tucker's Notes to the Revised Statutes, 285; Phelps v. Oaks, 117 U. S. 239.

5. U. S. v. Parker, 120 U. S. 89.

Thus, in federal courts held within the State of New York, the common-law forms are neither necessary nor admissible, unless they are deemed to be substantially in compliance with the code of procedure, and unless such is the case will be set aside on motion. 9. Amy v. Watertown, 130 U. S. 301; Alexandria v. Fairfax, 95 U. S. 774; Settlemier v. Sullivan, 97 U. S. 444. The constitution of South Carolina in article 4, section 31, provides that all "process" shall run in the name of the state. The courts of South Carolina having decided that a summons is not "process," within the meaning of its constitution, and, therefore, need not be in the name of the state, a summons issued in that state by the circuit court of the United States need not be in the name of the United States in order to conform to state procedure. (3) When the Rule Does not Apply.—The rule laid down in this section of the statutes has been held not to apply to the following matters: suits in rem,¹¹ patent suits at law,¹² motions for new trials and bills of exceptions,¹³ rules of state courts which preclude the plaintiff from bringing suit after a certain time,¹⁴ the mode of commencing actions,¹⁵ the examination of parties and the inspection of books and papers before the trial,¹⁶ compulsory special verdicts,¹⁷ and the means of enforcing judgments.¹⁸

the state courts,¹ and follows the precedents of the English courts of chancery, save as the practice is regulated by rules of courts and national legislation.²

c. CRIMINAL CASES.—The practice in criminal prosecutions is that of the state in which the court is held as it existed at the time of the passage of the Judiciary Act of 1789, except so far as it has been since changed by act of Congress. No law of a state, however, passed since 1789 can affect it.³

The practice thus followed in the states at that time was that of the common law as it had been brought from England, with a few modifications. We may say, therefore, with but slight inaccuracy, that our criminal practice is that of the common law.⁴

d. COSTS.—Costs in actions at law in the federal courts follow the event of the suit and are given to the successful party; in equity they rest in the sound discretion of the judge, who will take into consideration the circumstances of the case and the situation and conduct of the parties, and award costs in accordance with that discretion. Such award of costs, however, cannot be capriciously made, but must be according to the rules as established by precedents.⁵

In suits to adjust claims against the United States, costs are allowed to the claimant only in case the government puts in issue the right of the plaintiff to recover, and then only at the discretion of the court.⁶ In the supreme court and the circuit court of appeals no costs are awarded, either for or against the government.⁷ The costs allowed under the fee bill apply only to those

Many suits may, and certain classes of suits must, be brought in its name.⁴ In such suits, if against individuals, no credits are allowed, unless they have previously been disallowed by the treasury department, except in the case of credits not so presented because of absence or accident.⁵ The United States cannot be barred by state statutes of limitations.⁶

It can only be brought in as defendant by virtue of a waiver of its exemptions from suit by statute.⁷ Once in court, however, as plaintiff, it can be made defendant to a counter claim, without express waiver.⁸

The question of suits against the United States is treated under the heads of the several courts. In general, if a right to sue exists, the assignee of the claim which is the subject of the litigation can bring suit in his own name.⁹

of jurisdiction over suits between different states extends only to controversies over property rights, and not over political rights.¹

c. INDIVIDUALS AND CORPORATIONS.—The common-law principles prevail in the determination of the question as to who are proper or necessary parties to suits in federal courts.

As a general rule, joining merely nominal parties has no effect, either in the way of conferring or excluding jurisdiction.²

A non-resident cannot be sued unless by personal service; mere attachment of property does not give jurisdiction.³ His exemption from suit, however, is a mere personal privilege which he may waive,⁴ as by a general appearance, and pleadings in bar.⁵

A corporation created by act of Congress may be sued in the federal courts in any district where it is doing business, and has an agent upon whom service of process can be made, notwithstanding its principal office is in another state.⁶

Suits are not defeated by the non-joinder of, or the fact that service cannot be gotten upon all who are, according to the rules of law, necessary parties, but judgment will be entered against those made parties, but without prejudice to the interests of others.⁷ The question of whether or not a right of action survives is determined by the local state law.⁸

Procedure on Death of a Party to a Suit.—When either of the parties, whether plaintiff, or petitioner, or defendant, in any suit in any court of the United States, dies before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party may, in case the cause of action survives by law, prosecute or defend any such suit to final judgment. 16. Remedies—a. IN GENERAL.—The ordinary legal and equitable remedies sufficiently appear in other portions of this title. The extraordinary remedies granted by other courts, may be obtained by suit in the federal courts.

b. MANDAMUS.—(See also MANDAMUS, vol. 14, p. 88).—The supreme court may issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed under the authority of the United States, or to persons holding office under the authority of the United States, where a state or an ambassador, or other public minister, or a consul or a vice consul is a party.¹ It cannot, however, issue a writ—even though authorized by act of Congress—to an officer of the government.²

The supreme court, the circuit court of appeals, the circuit and district courts may issue writs of mandamus which are ancillary to cases of which they have jurisdiction.³ The circuit courts can also by mandamus compel officers of the United States to file bonds, make returns and perform certain other duties.⁴ Both they and the district court may issue a mandamus to compel compliance with the Interstate Commerce Act.⁵

The supreme court of the District of Columbia has power also in proper cases to issue writs of mandamus.⁶

c. PROHIBITION.—(See also PROHIBITION, vol. 19, p. 263).—The supreme court has power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts,⁷ when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.⁸ It has been held that this power is confined to admiralty and maritime cases, and that in other matters the district court cannot be so restrained.⁹

d. QUO WARRANTO.—(See also QUO WARRANTO, vol. 19, p. 660).—The circuit and district courts may issue writs of quo warranto against any person holding office, except as a member of Congress or of some state legislature, contrary to the provisions of the third section of the Fourteenth Amendment to the constitu-of action survives to the surviving plaintiff or against the surviving defendant, and one or more of them dies, the writ or action shall not be thereby abated; but, such death being suggested upon the record, the action shall proceed at the suit of the surviving plaintiff against the surviving defendant. U. S. R. S., § 956.

e. HABEAS CORPUS.—(See HABEAS CORPUS, vol. 9, p. 161.)

f. LIMITATIONS.—(See also LIMITATION OF ACTIONS, vol. 13, p. 667).—The practice of following state statutes of limitations prevails in both legal and equitable suits.³ The equity courts do not consider themselves bound by them and will not regard them when they would work injustice and wrong.⁴ State statutes of limitations do not bar the United States, even though the United States be specially named therein.⁵

The United States may, however, pass statutes of limitations binding upon both federal and state courts⁶—a right which has been frequently exercised.

Thus, suits on a marshal's bond must be begun within six years after the right of action accrues, or, in case of plaintiffs under the disabilities of infancy, coverture, or insanity, within three years after the disability is removed.⁷

In prosecution for crimes—excepting willful murder and crimes under the slave-trade laws—the indictment must be found or the information instituted within three years after the commission of the criminal act.⁸ This time of limitation does not apply to criminals fleeing from justice.⁹ Crimes arising under the United States slave-trade laws must be prosecuted within five years after their commission.¹⁰

Suits against the United States are barred in six years.¹¹

17. Judicial Districts.—The territory of the United States has been divided into judicial districts. To ascertain the respective boundaries of the districts the revised statutes must be consulted.

II. SUPREME COURT—1. Authority and Organization.—The supreme court—the only court expressly provided for by the constitution—was organized by the Judiciary Act of 1789. Various judiciary acts since passed—the last being that of March 3d, 1891—have given it its present form.

2. Officers.—(See also COURTS, vol. 4, p. 447).—The duties and powers of the justices and clerks have been already enumerated.²

The rule as to the admission of attorneys is as follows: It shall be requisite to the admission of attorneys or counsellors to practise in this court that they shall have been such for three years past in the supreme courts of the states to which they respectively

But actions to recover pecuniary penalties and forfeitures, under the United States customs revenue laws, must be commenced within three years, the time of the defendant's absence from the United States or of the concealment or absence of property not being counted. 18 St. at L. 186, ch. 391, § 22.

2. See supra, this title, United States Courts in General—Officers.

Provision in Case of Death of Clerk.—“In case of the death of the clerk, his duty or deputies shall, unless removed, continue in office and perform the duties of the clerk in his name until a clerk is appointed and qualified; and for the defaults or misfeasances in office of any such deputy, whether in the lifetime of the clerk or after his death, the clerk and his estate, and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable; and his executor or administrator shall have such remedy for any such defaults or misfeasances committed after his death as the clerk would be entitled to if the same had occurred in his lifetime.” U. S. R. S., § 678.

“Undertaking for Fees.—In all cases, except in capital criminal cases, the plaintiff in error or appellant, on docketing a case and filing the record, shall enter into an undertaking to the clerk, with surety to his satisfaction, for the payment of his fees, or otherwise satisfy him in that behalf.” Supreme Court Rule 10; 25 St. at L. 656.

Official Residence.—The clerk must reside and keep his office at the seat of the national government. Supreme Court Rule 1, § 1.

Care of Records.—“The clerk shall not permit any original record or paper to be taken from the court-room or from the office, without an order from the court, except as provided in Rule 10 [to the printer for preparing record].” Supreme Court Rule 1, § 2.

Fee Bill.—By act of March 3d, 1883, 22 St. at L. 631, the supreme court was authorized to prepare a table of clerk's fees, which was accordingly done. As to such fees, see Supreme Court Rules 23 and 38.

In addition to the fees allowed by these Rules the clerk is allowed one per cent. as commission upon money paid into court. Florida v. Anderson, 91 U. S. 683. As to fees of clerk for copies of record for printer, see Amendment to Rules, 108 U. S. r. 4. The clerk may demand his fees in advance. Steever v. Rickman, 109 U. S. 74. Each party is liable to the clerk for the fees due from him. Caldwell v. Jackson, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 276. Upon the clerk's producing satisfactory evidence, by affidavit or the acknowledgment of the parties or their sureties, of having served a copy of the bill of fees due by them, respectively, in this court, on such parties or their sureties, an attachment shall issue against such parties or sureties, respectively, to compel payment of the said fees. Supreme Court Rule No. 10, § 8.

This rule embraces all the requirements, and it is immaterial that the applicant for admission was stricken off the roll of the United States district court for misconduct, so long as he is in good standing as a member of the state supreme court.² Before being admitted, the attorney must take and subscribe the oath of office.³ The other officers are elsewhere considered.⁴

3. *Seat and Sessions.*⁵—(See COURTS, vol. 4, p. 455.)

4. Jurisdiction—a. ORIGINAL.—In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state is a party,⁶ the supreme court has original jurisdiction.⁷

These words are held to exclude all cases not embraced within their terms. Such cases, if within the jurisdiction of the supreme court at all, are within its appellate jurisdiction.⁸

The supreme court has original jurisdiction of a suit in equity brought in the United States against a state, to determine the boundary between that state and a territory of the United States, and that question is susceptible of judicial determination. U. S. v. Texas, 143 U. S. 621.

A citizen of a state cannot sue the state in the supreme court, neither can a citizen or subject of a foreign state. Eleventh Amendment to U. S. Const. As to the effect of the amendment, see Ex p. Ayers, 123 U. S. 443.

7. United States Const., art. 3, § 2.

The supreme court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a state is a party, except between a state and its citizens, or between a state and citizens of other states, or aliens, in which latter cases it shall have original, but not exclusive jurisdiction. And it shall have exclusively all such jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive, jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors or other public ministers, or in which a consul or vice consul is a party. U. S. R. S., § 687.

The clerk of the supreme court enters all suits under its original jurisdiction in a separate docket, called "the original docket." Every step in such cases must be taken on motion first made and granted and entered on the docket. Curtis on Jurisdiction of United States Courts, p. 23.

In certain specified cases, the supreme court may issue writs of mandamus,¹ prohibition,² and habeas corpus.³

In exercising the original jurisdiction of the supreme court in common-law cases, issues of fact are determined by the jury.⁴

b. APPELLATE—(1) Prior to the Act of March 3d, 1891—(a) In General.—Prior to the passage of this act, known as the Evarts Act, the supreme court was the general court of appeal, and had a very wide jurisdiction, as will appear from the notes.⁵ As to

3. U. S. R. S., § 751; HABEAS CORPUS, vol. 9, p. 161.

But it may grant the writ only in cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers or consuls. Ex p. Hung Hang, 108 U. S. 552; Ex p. Barry, 2 How. (U. S.) 65, in this case it was held that the supreme court could not grant the writ on the petition of a private individual to bring up the body of his infant daughter.

4. U. S. R. S., § 689.

5. An outline of the jurisdiction before the Evarts Act, is given, as it is necessary in determining the effect of the provisions of that law.

All final judgments of any circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court in civil actions, brought there by original process, or removed there from courts of the several states, and all final judgments of any circuit court in civil actions removed there from any district court by appeal or writ of error, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five thousand dollars, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the supreme court, upon a writ of error. U. S. R. S., § 691. But see 26 St. at L. 826, § 14.

An appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court from all final decrees of any circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, in cases of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five thousand dollars, and the supreme court is required to receive, hear, and determine such appeals. U. S. R. S., § 692; 18 St. at L. 316.

An appeal shall be allowed to the supreme court from all final decrees of any district court in prize causes, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of two thousand dollars; and shall be allowed, without reference to the value of the matter in dispute, on the certificate of the district judge that the adjudication involves a question of general importance. U. S. R. S., § 695.

An appeal to the supreme court shall be allowed, on behalf of the United States, from all judgment of the court of claims adverse to the United States, and on behalf of the plaintiff in any case where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, or where his claim is forfeited to the United States by the judgment of the said court, as provided in section 1089. U. S. R. S., § 707.

This provision was afterward extended to similar suits in the circuit and district courts. 24 St. at L. 506, § 9.

Judgments in capital cases may be reviewed by a writ of error brought by the accused. 25 St. at L. 655, § 6.

A writ of error may be allowed to review any final judgment at law, and an appeal shall be allowed from any final decree in equity hereinafter mentioned, without regard to the sum or value in dispute.

First. Any final judgment at law or final decree in equity of any circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, or of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of any territory, in any case touching patent rights or copyrights.

Second. Any final judgment of a circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of any revenue law thereof.

Third. Any final judgment of a circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, in any civil action against any officer of the revenue for any act done by him in the performance of his official duty, or for the recovery of any money exacted by or paid to him which shall have been paid into the treasury.

Fourth. Any final judgment at law cases pending at the time of the passing of the act, and cases in which the writ of error or appeal was sued out or taken prior to July 1st, 1891, the former limits of jurisdiction prevail.¹

(b) Amount in Dispute.—In determining whether the matter in dis-

or final decree in equity, or of any circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, in any case brought on account of the deprivation of any right, privilege or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States, or of any right or privilege of a citizen of the United States.

Fifth. Any final judgment of a circuit court, or of any district court acting as a circuit court, in any civil action brought by any person on account of injury to his person or property by any act done in furtherance of any conspiracy mentioned in section 1980, title, "Civil Rights." U. S. R. S., § 699.

These provisions were afterward extended to violations of the civil-rights laws. 18 St. at L. 335. Also to cases wherein a judgment or decree has been rendered in a circuit court upon a question involving the jurisdiction of the court, but in cases involving less than five thousand dollars, the supreme court considered the question of jurisdiction only. 25 St. at L. 693.

In such cases the party may elect between taking the case to the supreme court on the constitutional question alone, and appealing the whole case to the circuit court of appeals. Barling v. Bank of British N. A., 50 Fed. Rep. 260.

Certification of Difference of Opinion.

—Any final judgment or decree, in any civil suit or proceeding before a circuit court which was held, at any time, by a circuit justice and a circuit judge or a district judge, or by the circuit judge and a district judge, wherein the said judges certify, as provided by law, that their opinions were opposed upon any question which occurred on the trial of hearing of the said suit or proceeding, may be reviewed and affirmed, or reversed or modified by the supreme court, on a writ of error or appeal, according to the nature of the case, and subject to the provisions of law applicable to other writs of error and appeals in regard to bail and supersedeas. U. S. R. S., § 693.

When any question occurs on the hearing or trial of any criminal proceeding before a circuit court upon which the judges are divided in opinion and the point upon which they disagree is certified to the supreme court, according to law, such point shall be finally decided by the supreme court; and its decision and order in the premises shall be remitted to such circuit court, and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order. U. S. R. S., § 697.

Judgments and Decrees of the State Courts on Writs of Error.—A final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a state in which a decision in the suit could be had, where there is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where there is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity; or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the constitution, or any treaty or statute of, or commission held or authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or immunity specially set up or claimed by either party, under such constitution, treaty, statute, commission or authority, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the supreme court upon a writ of error. The writ shall have the same effect as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a court of the United States.

The supreme court may reverse, modify, or affirm the judgment or decree of such state court, and may, at their discretion, award execution or remand the same to the court from which it was removed by the writ. U. S. R. S., § 709. See, as to appeals from territorial supreme courts, U. S. R. S., §§ 702, 704, 1909; 18 St. at L. 254; 23 St. at L. 443. And as to appeals from the supreme court of the District of Columbia, U. S. R. S., §§ 705, 706; 23 St. at L. 443; In re Heath, 144 U. S. 92.

pute is of sufficient value to give the court jurisdiction, the court will consider the amount actually and directly involved, and not the remote effects of a judgment.¹

(c) Writs of Error to the Highest Court of a State.—The jurisdiction of the court is limited to the cases for which the statute makes provision. If the decision of the state court is in favor of the title, right, privilege, or immunity claimed under the federal authority, the court has no jurisdiction.² The federal question decided in the state court must have been a material one and necessary to the determination of the case.³

1. New England Mortgage, etc., Co. v. Gay, 145 U. S. 123; The Sydney, 139 U. S. 331.

The money value in dispute only will be considered. Curtis on Jurisdiction of United States Courts, p. 65.

When in an action for the recovery of a money demand, a counter-claim of the defendant amounting to more than five thousand dollars is disallowed, and judgment is rendered on the plaintiff's claim, the supreme court has jurisdiction of a writ of error sued out by the defendant, without regard to the amount of the plaintiff's judgment. Block v. Darling, 140 U. S. 234; Hilton v. Dickenson, 108 U. S. 165.

In considering the amount necessary to give the supreme court jurisdiction on writ of error, not only is the amount of the judgment against the plaintiff in error to be regarded, but in addition, the amount of a counter-claim which he would have recovered if his contention setting it up had been sustained. Clark v. Sidway, 142 U. S. 682. The amount in dispute may be determined by the evidence. Sharon v. Terry, 13 Sawy. (U. S.) 387.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff did not claim and could not possibly recover for himself a sum above the necessary five thousand dollars, the supreme court had no jurisdiction. Miller v. Clark, 138 U. S. 223.

Whether the "matter in dispute" exceeds five thousand dollars is determined by the amount claimed and sued for. And where this is sought to be recovered out of a fund, jurisdiction cannot be ousted by having an inquiry instituted by the court as to whether the fund will be sufficient to cover that amount. Clark v. Bever, 139 U. S. 96.

Where a clerk of court is sued on a bond in the penal sum of more than five thousand dollars, but it can be seen from the face of the record that the amount in controversy is less than five thousand dollars, the United States Supreme Court on error to the circuit court is without jurisdiction. U. S. v. Hill, 123 U. S. 681.

An appeal from the decision of the circuit court for the partition of land of uncertain value will be dismissed, unless it appears affirmatively that the land is worth more than five thousand dollars. Parker v. Morrill, 106 U. S. 1.

2. Missouri v. Andriano, 138 U. S. 497.

3. Marsh v. Nichols, 140 U. S. 344; New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks, 142 U. S. 79; De Saussure v. Gaillard, 127 U. S. 216. In Walter A. Wood Mowing, etc., Mach. Co. v. Skinner, 139 U. S. 293, the court, by Brown, J., said: "It is well settled by a long series of adjudications that, to give this court jurisdiction by writ of error to a state court, it must appear affirmatively, not only that a federal question was presented for decision to the highest court of the state having jurisdiction, but that its decision was necessary to the determination of the case; and that it was actually decided, or that the judgment as rendered could not have been given without deciding it." See, to the same effect, Brown v. Atwell, 92 U. S. 327.

But if a case before a state court necessarily involves the adjudication of a federal question, it is not necessary that it should appear affirmatively in the record, or in the opinion of that court, that such a question was raised and decided. Kaukanna Water Power Co. v. Green Bay, etc., Canal Co., 142 U. S. 254.

The supreme court may refer to an opinion of the state court in determining the ground of judgment of that court. The judgment of the highest court of a state may be supported without deciding a federal question. When it does not appear on what grounds it was decided, the supreme court is without jurisdiction in error. Walter A.

(d) Certification of Division of Opinion to the Supreme Court.—The question certified from a lower court to the supreme court must be one of law,¹ not a question of fact nor a mixed question of law and fact.² The certification must be of a single question or a series of distinct questions,³ and it must not be too general,⁴ nor seek the opinion of the supreme court upon the whole case.⁵ It may not be of a matter of mere discretion.⁶

The omission to state in the certificate of division that the question was certified upon request of a party or counsel to the cause is not fatal if the jurisdiction is not challenged.¹ There must be a bona fide difference of opinion; the mere novelty or difficulty of the questions involved does not authorize their certification.²

Wood Mowing, etc., Mach. Co. v. Skinner, 139 U. S. 293; Beaupre v. Noyes, 138 U. S. 397; Kennebec, etc., R. Co. v. Portland, etc., R. Co., 14 Wall. (U. S.) 23; *Delmas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. The practice in case of causes improperly appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States from the highest court of a state is, after the cause has been entered upon the calendar, to file, on a motion day, a motion to dismiss the writ of error, on the ground that it does not disclose any question over which the court has jurisdiction. If no such motion is made, however, the court may, on the hearing on the merits, ex mero motu dismiss the writ of error. Curtis on Jurisdiction of United States Courts (1880), p. 36.

(2) Since the Act of March 3d, 1891—(a) In General.—The Act of March 3d, 1891—commonly known as the Evarts Act—made extensive changes in the jurisdiction of the supreme court.³ It provides that certain cases not before within its jurisdiction should come before it by appeal; that certain other cases should reach it only after appeal to the circuit court of appeals, and subsequent appeal from that court to the supreme court; it takes still other matters from its cognizance, while as to certain questions the jurisdiction is unaffected.⁴

(b) Cases Appealable Directly to the Supreme Court from the Circuit and District Courts.—Appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district or circuit courts direct to the supreme court in the following cases:⁵

In any case in which the jurisdiction of the court is in issue; in such cases the question of jurisdiction alone can be certified to the supreme court from the court below for decision.⁶

Hence an order remanding a case from a federal to a state court cannot be reviewed by writ of error or appeal in the supreme court. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Roberts, 141 U. S. 690.

The Act of March 3d, 1891, while it does not confer upon one party the right to carry a cause before two appellate courts, at the same time does not confer upon him the power to defeat the right of appeal by the other party to the circuit court of appeals, upon the merits, by taking an appeal or writ of error to the supreme court upon the question of jurisdiction of the trial court; and in the case of such separate appeal, the cause will be continued in the circuit court of appeals to await the decision of the supreme court upon the question of jurisdiction. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Glaspell, 49 Fed. Rep. 482.

7. This is an addition to the jurisdiction of the supreme court. States, or the validity or construction of any treaty made under its authority, is drawn in question.¹

In any case in which the constitution or law of a state is claimed to be in contravention of the Constitution of the United States.

The act does not affect the jurisdiction of the supreme court in cases appealed from the highest court of a state.

(e) Cases Coming from the Circuit Court of Appeals.—(1) BY APPEAL AND WRIT OF ERROR.—An appeal or writ of error or review is allowed from the circuit court of appeals to the supreme court in all cases where the matter in controversy exceeds one thousand dollars, beside costs, except the following: cases in which the jurisdiction is dependent entirely upon the opposite parties to the suit or controversy being aliens and citizens of the United States, or citizens of different states; cases arising under the patent laws; cases arising under the revenue laws;² cases arising under the criminal laws; and cases in admiralty.

(2) BY CERTIFICATION.—In cases in which the circuit court of appeals has final jurisdiction, it may at any time certify to the supreme court any questions or propositions of that court for its proper decision. And the statute provides that thereupon the supreme court may either give its instructions on the questions or propositions certified to it, which shall be binding upon the circuit court of appeals in such case, or it may require that the whole record and cause may be sent up to it for its consideration, and thereupon it will decide the whole matter in controversy in the same manner as if it had been brought there for review by writ of error or appeal.³

In any case of which the circuit court of appeals has final jurisdiction, the supreme court may, by certiorari or otherwise, require such case to be certified to for review and determination, in which case it has the same power and authority as if the case had been carried up by appeal or writ of error.⁴

This provision is intended to be taken advantage of only in case of questions of gravity and importance arising.⁵

5. Practice and Procedure.—a. IN GENERAL.—The matter of practice, pleading, and procedure has been already treated under.

1. If a constitutional question is raised, the court will review all the questions in the case and not merely the constitutional questions. Ekin v. U. S., 142 U. S. 651; Horne v. U. S., 143 U. S. 570; Lan Ow Bew, Petitioner, 141 U. S. 583.

other headings of this title. A few special matters, however, remain.

b. APPEALS—(1) Time for Appeal.—In prize cases, the appeal must be taken within thirty days after the rendering of the decree; the supreme court may, however, allow the appeal, if the notice of appeal was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court within thirty days next after the rendition of the decree.¹

Appeals from the court of claims must be taken within ninety days after judgment or decree is entered.²

No judgment, decree or order of a circuit or district court, in any civil action, at law or in equity, may be reviewed in the supreme court, on writ of error or appeal, unless the writ of error is brought, or the appeal is taken, within two years after the entry of such judgment, decree or order; provided, that where a party entitled to prosecute a writ of error or to take an appeal is an infant, insane person, or is imprisoned, such writ of error may be prosecuted, or such appeal may be taken, within two years after the judgment, decree or order, exclusive of the term of such disability.³

Writs of error to, and appeals from, the circuit court of appeals must be taken or sued out within one year after the entry of the order, judgment or decree sought to be reviewed.⁴

(2) Practice on Appeal.—This matter has been treated in a former part of this article.⁵

III. CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS—1. Authority and Organization.—The circuit court of appeals owes its origin to the Act of March 3d, 1891, above referred to. The first meeting of the court was appointed by law for the third Tuesday in June, 1891.⁶

Congress on its creation prescribed that nothing in the act should be construed in any wise to impair the jurisdiction of the supreme court, or of any circuit court in any case then pending.¹

It was held, in construing this clause, that making a case reviewable was not impairing the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and hence that a cause pending at the time of the passage of the act could be appealed to the circuit court of appeals, although it was not appealable before the act, as the jurisdictional amount was not involved.²

2. Officers.—The portions of the act providing for officers for the court are given in the notes.³

If a quorum of judges does not attend on any day appointed for court, any judge who does attend, or if none attend, the clerk, may adjourn the court from day to day.

If during the term on any day there is not a quorum, a judge may adjourn from day to day or without day.

3. "There shall be appointed by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in each circuit an additional circuit judge, who shall have the same qualifications; and shall have the same power and jurisdiction therein that the circuit judges of the United States, within their respective circuits, now have under existing laws, and who shall be entitled to the same compensation as the circuit judges of the United States in their respective circuits.

"Sec. 2. That there is hereby created in each circuit a circuit court of appeals, which shall consist of three judges, of whom two shall constitute a quorum. . . . It shall have the appointment of the marshal of the court, with the same duties and powers under the regulations of the court as are now provided for the marshal of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as the same may be applicable. The court shall also appoint a clerk, who shall perform and exercise the same duties and powers in regard to all matters within its jurisdiction as are now exercised and performed by the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, so far as the same may be applicable. The salary of the marshal shall be $2,500 a year, and the salary of the clerk of the court shall be $3,000 a year, to be paid in equal proportions quarterly. . . .

"Sec. 3. That the chief justice and the associate justices of the supreme court assigned to each circuit, and the circuit judges within each circuit and the several district judges within each circuit, shall be competent to sit as judges of the circuit court of appeals within their respective circuits in the manner hereinafter provided. In case the chief justice or an associate justice of the supreme court should attend at any session of the circuit court of appeals, he shall preside, and the circuit judges in attendance upon the court, in the absence of the chief justice or associate justice of the supreme court, shall preside in the order of seniority of their respective commissions. In case the full court any time shall not be made up by the attendance of the chief justice or an associate justice of the supreme court and circuit judges, one or more district judges within the circuit shall be competent to sit in the court according to such order or provision among the district judges as either by general or particular assignment shall be designated by the court.

"Provided, that no justice or judge before whom a cause or question may have been tried or heard shall sit on the trial or hearing of such cause or question in the circuit court of appeals. . . . The marshals, criers, clerks, bailiffs and messengers shall be allowed the same compensation for their respective services as are allowed for similar services in the existing circuit courts." 26 St. at L. 826.

If no quorum be present, any judge attending may make preparatory orders.¹

The clerk may not practice law; he must take the oath of office, and give bond. He may not permit any original record or paper to be taken from his office without an order of court.²

The marshal and deputies must take the oath of office and give bond.³

All attorneys and counsellors admitted to practice in the supreme court or in any circuit court may be admitted in the circuit court of appeals without fee.⁴

3. Seats and Terms.—Terms of the court are held annually in the several judicial districts at places designated by statute.

Terms may also be held at such other places as the court may designate from time to time.⁵

4. Jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction of the circuit court of appeals is best determined by excluding from the sum total of appealable cases those of which the supreme court has cognizance. As said in a recent case, the Act of March 3d, 1891, "provides for the distribution of the entire appellate jurisdiction of our national judicial system between the Supreme Court of the United States and the circuit court of appeals therein established, by designating the classes of cases in respect of which each of those two courts shall respectively have final jurisdiction."⁶

Section 5 of the Act provides that certain cases may be appealed directly from the circuit and district courts to the supreme court. Then follows section 6, which reads as follows: "The circuit court of appeal established by this act shall exercise appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal or by writ of error final decision⁷ in the district court and the existing circuit courts, in all cases other than those provided for in the preceding section of this act, unless otherwise provided by law."⁸

It has been held that there is no jurisdictional limit on account of the amount involved, but that if a case is otherwise within the appellate jurisdiction, the value of the matter in controversy is immaterial.⁹ The court in appeals in admiralty cases may review questions of both law and fact.¹⁰

The supreme court has held that the words above, "unless otherwise provided by law," were inserted in order to guard against implied repeals, and are to be construed as referring only to laws in force at the time of the passage of the act.¹

The act further provides, "Where, upon a hearing in equity in a district court, or in an existing circuit court, an injunction shall be granted or continued by an interlocutory order or decree, in a cause in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals, an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing such injunction to the circuit court of appeals."²

"The circuit court of appeals, in cases in which the judgments of the circuit court of appeals are made final by this act, shall have the same appellate jurisdiction, by writ of error or appeal, to review the judgments, orders, and decrees of the supreme courts of the several territories as by this act they have to review the judgments, orders, and decrees of the district court and circuit courts; and for that purpose the several territories shall, by order of the supreme court, to be made from time to time, be assigned to particular circuits."³

5. Practice and Procedure—a. IN GENERAL.—The court may make rules, prescribe the form and style of its seal, and the form of its writs and other process.

Costs and fees are the same as those in the supreme court at the time of the passage of the act. The judges have the same powers and duties as to the allowance of appeals and writs of error, and the conditions of such allowance, as the justices and judges in the other courts of the United States, as then existing.

Whenever on appeal, writ of error, or otherwise, a case comes from a district or circuit court, and is reviewed and determined finally, it is remanded to such circuit or district court for further proceedings. The modes of review and regulations as to bonds on appeal are those in force at the passage of the act.⁴

A writ of error from a circuit court of appeals for the review of the judgment of a circuit court may issue from the clerk's office of such circuit court, under the seal of such circuit court, and the signature of the clerk thereof. It need not bear the seal or signature of the clerk of the circuit court of appeals.⁵ The court has

of appeals, declares that "all provisions of law now in force regulating the methods and system of appeals and writs of error" shall regulate appeals and writs of error to that court, yet the act of 1875 does not apply to appeals in admiralty from the existing circuit courts to that court, and the same may be heard without separate findings of fact and of law, and without bills of exceptions, as in appeals from the district court to the circuit court. The Havilah, 48 Fed. Rep. 684.

no power to review a decision refusing to grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, and was for excessive damages.¹

It is provided by rule of court that the practice shall be the same as in the Supreme Court of the United States, as far as the same shall be applicable.² Process is in the name of the President of the United States, and is in like form and tested in the same manner as process of the supreme court.³ All motions must be in writing.⁴ A number of miscellaneous matters of practice are considered in the note.⁵

b. TIME FOR APPEAL.—Appeals from decrees of the district or circuit court granting or continuing interlocutory decrees, must be taken within thirty days from the entering of the order or decree. Other appeals must be taken within six months, unless a lesser time were prescribed by law at the time of the passage of the act.⁶

IV. CIRCUIT COURTS—1. Authority and Organization.—The circuit court system originated in the Judiciary Act of 1789,⁷ was slightly changed in 1844, again altered in 1867, and underwent more radical changes in 1891.⁸ The United States is now divided into nine circuits,⁹ each of which is within the jurisdiction of a circuit court. Each court sits within each district in its circuit at times appointed by law.

2. Circuit Court of Appeals Rule 8.

3. Circuit Court of Appeals Rule 9.

4. Circuit Court of Appeals Rule 21.

5. The rules cover the following matters: Bills of exceptions, rule 10; assignment of errors, rule 11; objections to evidence in the record, rule 12; supersedeas and cost bonds, rule 13; writs of error, appeals, return and bond, rule 14; translations, rule 15; docketing cases, rule 16; docket, rule 17; certiorari, rule 18; death of a party, rule 19; dismissing case, rule 20; motions, rule 21; parties not ready, rule 22; printing record, rules 23, 26 and 35; briefs, rules 24 and 26; oral argument, rule 25; copies of records and briefs, rule 27; opinions, rule 28; rehearing, rule 29; interest and costs, rules 30 and 31; mandate, rule 32; habeas corpus, rule 33; exhibits, etc., rule 34; duties of clerk as to moneys, rule 36.

Where an appeal pending in the supreme court and a cause before the circuit court of appeals can, by reason of their connection, be heard together, and the district and perhaps the circuit court judges are, under Act of March 3d, 1891, disqualified to pass on the case from having heard the same or similar questions in the court below, it is a proper exercise of discretion to certify the questions involved to the supreme court, under section six of the act. Farmers', etc., State Bank v. Armstrong, 49 Fed. Rep. 600.

Where courts' findings are special, the circuit court of appeals cannot inquire whether the evidence supports the special findings of facts, but only whether the facts found are sufficient to support the judgment. Hill v. Woodberry, 49 Fed. Rep. 138.

In the circuit court of appeals, dismissals are provided for if no counsel appears, or no brief is filed for appellant or plaintiff in error, "when the case is called for trial" (rule 23); and also if record has not been printed, "when the case is reached in the regular call of the docket" (rule 23). It is held that the time meant in each rule is not the time of going through the docket to arrange the business of the court, but the time of actual call for trial, and no motion to dismiss on the grounds mentioned can be entertained before that time. Lem Hing Dun v. U. S., 49 Fed. Rep. 145.

The Evarts Act provided for an additional circuit judge in each circuit.² The clerks of the several circuits are appointed by the circuit judges thereof.³ Deputy clerks may be appointed, whose compensation shall be paid and allowed in the same manner as other expenses of the clerk's office.⁴

3. Seats and Sessions.—The terms of the various circuit and district courts are fixed by law. If a term is appointed to begin on a date which falls on Sunday it shall commence on the day following.⁵ If neither of the judges be present at the opening of the term, the court may be adjourned by a written order of either of them.⁶

4. Jurisdiction.⁷—The circuit court formerly exercised both appellate and original jurisdiction. The former, however, was taken away by the Circuit Court of Appeals Act.⁸ The original jurisdiction embraces both legal and equitable suits.⁹

The classes of cases over which jurisdiction is given by various statutes of the United States are as follows:

The act of 1887,¹⁰ as amended in 1888,¹¹ provides, "That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in

U. S. R. S., § 638, provides as follows: "The circuit courts, as courts of equity, shall be deemed always open for the purpose of filing any pleading, of issuing and returning mesne and final process, and of making and directing all interlocutory motions, orders, rules, and other proceedings, preparatory to the hearing upon their merits of all causes pending therein. And any judges of a circuit court may, upon reasonable notice to the parties, make and direct and award, at chambers or in the clerk's office, and in vacation as well as in term, all such process, commissions, orders, rules and other proceedings, whenever the same are not grantable, of course, according to the rules and practice of the court."

4. U. S. R. S., §§ 624, 626.

Special statutes, however, slightly vary the matter of the appointment in the different states.

Where no limitation has been placed upon the expenditures of the clerks of the circuit courts for clerk hire, they are not liable to account for sums necessarily paid out for that purpose, out of the emoluments of their office, when the attorney general has approved such payments. Selby v. U. S., 47 Fed. Rep. 800.

6. See COURTS, vol. 4, p. 461; U. S. R. S., § 672.

The above provision refers to any day on which the court is appointed to sit, whether by provision of statute, by adjournment, or by special appointment. Pitman v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 159.

7. The jurisdiction of the circuit courts has been defined and limited by the acts of Congress, and can be neither restricted nor enlarged by the statutes of a state. Southern Pac. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202.

Mandamus.—Circuit courts can only issue writs of mandamus as ancillary to some other proceeding which shall have established a demand or reduced it to judgment, for the purpose of executing such judgment or enforcing rights sought to be protected in the suit, notwithstanding state statutes make the proceeding for mandamus a civil action between private parties for the redress of private wrongs. Gaves v. Northwest, etc., Assoc., 55 Fed. Rep. 209.

dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of two thousand dollars,¹ and arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made or which shall be

1. In determining the amount necessary to give the court jurisdiction, the amount directly in dispute is alone considered. The fact that the judgment may thereafter act as an estoppel is immaterial. Ross v. Prentiss, 3 How. (U. S.) 772; Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578; Bruce v. Manchester, etc., R. Co., 117 U. S. 514. That the proper amount is involved, must appear affirmatively, in order that the court may have jurisdiction. U. S. v. Pratt Coal, etc., Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 708; Oleson v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 1; Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578. But it may so appear by amendment. Davis v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 32 Fed. Rep. 863.

The amount in dispute is the amount claimed by the plaintiff in good faith, and not that recovered. Peeler v. Lathrop, 48 Fed. Rep. 780; Hilton v. Dickinson, 108 U. S. 165; Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 550.

But where on the face of the pleadings it is evident that a recovery cannot be had of the whole amount of the claim, the amount that could be recovered, and not that claimed, is the matter in dispute. Barry v. Edmunds, 116 U. S. 561. Although where the fact of a valid defense is apparent on the face of the petition, it does not reduce the amount claimed or determine what is the matter in dispute. Schunk v. Moline, etc., Co., 147 U. S. 500.

Where, although more than the jurisdictional amount was originally claimed, it appears that the plaintiff has no right, interest, or title to the claims sued upon, so as to reduce the sum involved to less than the jurisdictional amount, the circuit court will not retain jurisdiction. Chicago Cheese Co. v. Fogg, 53 Fed. Rep. 72.

An admission by the defendant that a part of the demand is due will not affect the jurisdiction. Fuller v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 163.

An exception to the usual rule has been made in case of suits concerning rights, undoubtedly valuable, and yet incapable of exact determination. Thus, the circuit court has been held to have jurisdiction to cancel a contract of marriage which, if allowed to stand, would give the wife an inchoate right of dower in real property of great value, other valuable property rights, and a right to support, even though the amount of its value be neither directly alleged nor ascertainable. Sharon v. Terry, 13 Sawy. (U. S.) 387. But see Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578.

An objection on demurrer that the amount involved is not sufficient to give the circuit court jurisdiction is not well taken, if on its face the bill shows the amount to be sufficient. Hat-Sweat Mfg. Co. v. Porter, 46 Fed. Rep. 757.

In a suit to enjoin the use of a trademark and compel an account of profits, the criterion is not the amount of the profits sued for. Symonds v. Greene, 28 Fed. Rep. 834.

In a suit to set aside the award of arbitrators under policies of insurance issued by different companies, the amount involved is the whole amount of the award, and not the proportionate liability of the several companies, under a provision of the policies limiting such liability to such proportion of the entire loss as the amount of the policy bears to the whole amount of insurance. Hartford Fire Insurance Co. v. Bonner Mercantile Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 378.

Where the object of a suit is to restrain the use of property by a party other than the owner, the right to use such property is the "matter in dispute," and its value determines the question of jurisdiction. Oleson v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 1.

Where, although the entire matter in dispute in the suit exceeds the jurisdictional limit, there are several and separate interests in that sum, each less than the jurisdictional amount, belonging to distinct parties and constituting distinct causes of action, although actually united in one suit and growing out of the same transaction, there is no jurisdiction. Elgin v. Marshall, 106 U. S. 578.

Where, in a suit by the holder of county bonds, the amount is less than two thousand dollars, jurisdiction will not be conferred by the transfer to the plaintiff of other bonds not disputed by the county, and for the redemption of which funds have been provided and notice given; and this is especially so where the real ownership of the bonds is probably in a third person, and they are only transferred for the purpose of obtaining jurisdiction in regard to the other bonds, and the latter are held void by the state courts. Edwards v. Bates Co., 55 Fed. Rep. 436.

The value of the land is the "matter in dispute," under act of Congress, August 13th, 1888 (25 St. at L., p. 434, §1), in a federal court proceeding to set aside certain conveyances as fraudulent and a cloud upon the plaintiff's title. Simon v. House, 46 Fed. Rep. 317.

In ejectment against a city and a street railway company for land claimed as a street, the value of the whole street, and not that part occupied by the railway, is the amount in controversy, especially where the company does not disclaim as to any part of the premises, but defends for the whole. Greene v. Tacoma, 53 Fed. Rep. 562.

In an action on a penal bond to secure the faithful performance of a contract, the amount in controversy is not determined by the amount named as the penalty in the bond, but is the sum actually due by reason of the breach of its condition. Cabot v. McMasters, 61 Fed. Rep. 129.

To determine jurisdiction depending on the amount in dispute, the united interests of several claiming under the same title, and having a common interest in the relief sought, and uniting in the suit to enforce their right, are taken, and not each one of such interests. Shields v. Thomas, 17 How. (U. S.) 3; Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112; Prince v. Towns, 33 Fed. Rep. 161; Davies v. Corbin, 112 U. S. 36; Estes v. Gunter, 121 U. S. 183. But see King v. Wilson, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 555; Woodman v. Latimer, 2 Fed. Rep. 842. But where the interests of complainants in a suit in equity in the United States courts are so far separate that any number of them can proceed with the litigation without joining the others, the interest of each must exceed two thousand dollars to give the circuit court jurisdiction. Rich v. Bray, 37 Fed. Rep. 273; King v. Wilson, 1 Dill. (U. S.) 568; Seaver v. Bigelow, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 210; Terry v. Hatch, 93 U. S. 44; Chatfield v. Boyle, 105 U. S. 234.

Where, in an amended bill, it is alleged that the land is worth $3,000, and that the damages are not less than that amount, the suit for specific performance is within the jurisdiction of the circuit courts. Johnston v. Trippe, 33 Fed. Rep. 530.

In a suit to foreclose as a mortgage a deed absolute in form given to secure a note for $1,000, the amount involved is not the amount of the note alone, where a prior mortgage for $4,000, which one of the defendants seeks by a cross-bill to have foreclosed, is sought to be canceled by the plaintiff. Wolcott v. Sprague, 55 Fed. Rep. 545.

A declaration is sufficient on demurrer to give the circuit court jurisdiction when it contains three counts—one for money had and received for $875, one on a note for $875, and a third for work and labor done for $875—as the aggregate amount alleged to be in dispute exceeds $2,000. Armstrong v. Ettlesohn, 36 Fed. Rep. 209.

In determining whether the amount involved in a bill by a railroad to restrain a multiplicity of suits for alleged discrimination in rates, is sufficient to give a circuit court jurisdiction, the maintenance of the rates of the company is the real subject in dispute, and the object of the bill and the value of such object must be considered. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Kuteman, 54 Fed. Rep. 547.

Where a suit in equity is brought to enjoin the treasurers and sheriffs of several counties, from issuing executions against plaintiff's property, to enforce the collection of a tax based upon an alleged unconstitutional and void assessment, the circuit court has no jurisdiction, where the amount involved in each county is less than $2,000. Walter v. Northeastern R. Co., 147 U. S. 370.

But where a suit is brought to enjoin a state board of appraisers from certifying to the several county auditors amounts assessed upon a corporation under a statute alleged to be unconstitutional, the amount involved is the total amount to be certified to all the counties, less the aggregate amount which such company must pay in the various counties under the laws in force, if such statute is valid, and not the amount of the assessment to be certified to any particular county. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. Rep. 449; Adams Express Co. v. Poe, 61 Fed. Rep. 470.

A bill by a telegraph company to enjoin the collection of a license tax of $500 per annum, required to be paid for the privilege of doing business in a city, alleging irreparable injury in the destruction of the business of the company, made, under their authority,¹ or in a controversy in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners,² or in which there shall be a controversy between citizens of different states,³ in involves more than $2,000. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Charleston, 56 Fed. Rep. 419.

Each of several choses in action, amounting in the aggregate to more than $2,000, need not exceed that sum when sued upon by an assignee, where they have never belonged to a citizen of the same state as the defendant. Chase v. Sheldon Roller Mills Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 625.

Injunction.—In a bill for an injunction, the value of the object to be gained by the injunction is the amount in dispute. Mississippi, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 2 Black (U. S.) 485; Washington Market Co. v. Hoffman, 101 U. S. 112; Whitman v. Hubbell, 30 Fed. Rep. 81. And see Smith v. Bivens, 56 Fed. Rep. 352. The power to issue an injunction is inherent in the original equity jurisdiction conferred upon the courts by section 629 Rev. Stats., and is not restricted by section 5242, providing that no injunction, attachment or execution shall issue against any national bank or its property before any final judgment in any suit, action or proceeding in any state, county or municipal court. Hower v. Weiss Malting, etc., Co., 55 Fed. Rep. 356.

Where the defendant, in a suit in equity to enjoin a nuisance, files an affidavit stating that a continuance of the injunction will damage him many thousand dollars, the circuit court has jurisdiction. Herbert v. Rainey, 54 Fed. Rep. 248. In this case an injunction was sought by an adjoining owner to restrain the erection of coke ovens, and it was held that the suit was brought within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, if the damage to the property might exceed two thousand dollars.

1. Suits come within this clause of the law when their correct decision depends on the construction of the constitution, or United States law, or a treaty. Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 379; Southern Pac. R. Co. v. California, 118 U. S. 112; Starin v. New York, 115 U. S. 257; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 264.

Where a city claims a right to erect gas works under a state statute granting it such power, and the plaintiff contends that the statute impairs the obligation of a contract previously made with the state and city, the circuit court has jurisdiction. Hamilton Gas Light, etc., Co. v. Hamilton, 146 U. S. 258.

This clause gives the circuit court jurisdiction of suits by and against corporations chartered by the United States, other than national banks. Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Denver, etc., R. Co., 1 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 584; Pacific Railroad Removal Cases, 115 U. S. 1; Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 823; 24 St. at L., p. 552; 25 St. at L., p. 433, § 4. See also supra, this title, United States Courts in General—Jurisdiction.

2. The limitation as to amount in dispute necessary to give jurisdiction, does not apply to suits in which the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners. Hence, a suit on a postmaster's bond may be maintained, even though on the face of the declaration less than two thousand dollars is involved. U. S. v. Shaw, 39 Fed. Rep. 433.

Hence, circuit courts have jurisdiction of suits under revenue laws, although less than two thousand dollars is involved. Ames v. Hager, 36 Fed. Rep., p. 129.

It has jurisdiction to pass upon the items of the claim of a United States marshal for fees and disbursements disallowed by the first comptroller of the treasury before March 30, 1887. U. S. v. Harmon, 147 U. S. 268.

A receiver of a national bank, appointed by the comptroller of the treasury, is an officer of the United States, and as such may sue in a circuit court without regard to citizenship or the amount involved. Armstrong v. Ettlesohn, 36 Fed. Rep. 209; Armstrong v. Trautman, 36 Fed. Rep. 275; Fisher v. Yoder, 53 Fed. Rep. 565. But the circuit court has no jurisdiction of a bill against an executor for the payment of a legacy, when all the parties are citizens of the same state, although the assets of the estate have gone into the hands of a receiver of a national bank, and it is also sought to recover them. St. Luke's Church v. Sowles, 51 Fed. Rep. 609; 21 Wash. L. Rep. 422.

3. A controversy between citizens of different states is one in which all the parties on one side are citizens of different states from all those upon the other side. Blake v. McKim, 103 U. S. 336.

which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value aforesaid, or a controversy between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states,¹ or in a controversy between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, or subjects in which the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value aforesaid, and shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except as otherwise provided by law, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offenses cognizable by them. But no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another

And see Mangels v. Donau Brewing Co., 53 Fed. Rep. 513.

Under the Act of March 3d, 1887, the federal courts have no jurisdiction in a suit, where it appears that many of the defendants are from the same state, but have conflicting interests. Covert v. Waldron, 33 Fed. Rep. 311.

The federal circuit courts have jurisdiction over the administration of estates, when the requisite citizenship and other conditions exist. Ball v. Tompkins, 41 Fed. Rep. 486.

A suit in equity contesting a will after its probate in Oregon, is cognizable in the circuit court, where the amount in controversy is sufficient and the requisite citizenship exists. Richardson v. Green, 61 Fed. Rep. 423.

The circuit court is not deprived of jurisdiction of a suit for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate by the fact that one of the purchasers, who it is claimed should be a defendant, is a resident of the same state as the plaintiff, where he is also one of the vendors, is joined as plaintiff, and is willing to comply with his part of the contract. Perin v. Megibben, 6 U. S. App. 348; 3 C. C. A. 443; 53 Fed. Rep. 86.

Under the Louisiana Code, a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage is a civil suit in equity inter partes, and within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, where the parties are citizens of different states. Fleitas v. Richardson, 147 U. S. 538.

A corporation is conclusively presumed to be a citizen of the state which created it, whatever may be the citizenship of the members. National S. S. Co. v. Tugman, 106 U. S. 118; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 112 U. S. 414; Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co., 127 U. S. 265.

As to the citizenship of corporations generally, see the authorities collated in the article CORPORATIONS, vol. 4, p. 184.

As regards the jurisdiction of the circuit court, a national bank is deemed a citizen of the state where it is located. 24 St. at L. 552; 25 St. at L. 433, § 4.

Thus, federal courts have jurisdiction of an action between a national bank located in one state and a citizen of another state. First National Bank v. Forest, 40 Fed. Rep. 705.

Since the enactment of this statute, the jurisdiction of circuit courts over suits by or against national banks can no longer be asserted on the ground of their federal origin, as they are placed in the same category with banks not organized under the laws of the United States. Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Cooper, 120 U. S. 781; Whittemore v. Amoskeag Nat. Bank, 134 U. S. 527.

Where jurisdiction attaches only because of diversity of citizenship, suit may be brought in the district of either plaintiff or defendant. 24 St. at L. 552; 25 St. at L. 433.

A circuit court in Illinois has jurisdiction to remove a cloud upon the title to lands in Iowa, where the citizenship of the parties and the amount involved are sufficient. Renser v. McKay, 54 Fed. Rep. 432.

Where the requisite citizenship does not exist, jurisdiction cannot be conferred by the defendant voluntarily appearing and pleading to the merits. Central Trust Co. v. Virginia, etc., Steel Co., 55 Fed. Rep. 769. See also, on suits between citizens of different states, supra, this title, United States Courts in General—Jurisdiction; Foster's Federal Judiciary Acts of 1875 and 1887, p. 11.

1. See supra, this title, United States Courts in General—Jurisdiction.

in any civil action before a circuit or district court; and no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against any person by any original process or proceedings in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant. But where the jurisdiction is founded only on the fact that the action is between citizens of different states, suit shall be brought only in the district of the residence of either the plaintiff or the defendant;¹ nor shall any circuit or district court have cognizance of any suit, except upon foreign bills of exchange to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of any assignee, or of

A defendant suing in the wrong district waives his right to object by appearing and pleading to the merits. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. McBride, 141 U. S. 127; Ex p. Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 378; Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 327; Betzoldt v. American Ins. Co., 47 Fed. Rep. 705; Purcell v. British Land, etc., Co., 42 Fed. Rep. 465. The Act of March 3d, 1887 (24 St. at L. 552), does not oust the circuit court of jurisdiction of a suit against a New Jersey corporation brought in Massachusetts, which agreed, on condition of being allowed to transact business in Massachusetts, to submit to be sued there, since the right given by this statute is a personal one and can be waived. Consolidated Store Service Co. v. Lamson Consolidated Store Service Co., 41 Fed. Rep. 833. But the fact that a corporation has agreed that process may be served on its officer or agent engaged in its business in a certain estate, does not estop it to set up want of jurisdiction when sued in a federal court by reason of its citizenship and residence in another state. Southern Pac. Co. v. Denton, 146 U. S. 202. See Dinzy v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 61 Fed. Rep. 49. State laws respecting venue do not affect the jurisdiction of circuit courts. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Atlanta, etc., R. Co., 49 Fed. Rep. 608.

"Inhabitant," as used in the Act of March 3d, 1887, ch. 373, § 1, as corrected by Act of August 13th, 1888, ch. 866, is synonymous with "resident," and means the dwelling place where one maintains his fixed and legal settlement, not the casual and temporary abiding place required by the necessities of present surrounding circumstances. Bicycle Stepladder Co. v. Gordon, 57 Fed. Rep. 529.

Where the suit depends on diverse citizenship, the complaint must show that either the plaintiff or the defendant resides within the district. Laskey v. Newtown Mining Co., 50 Fed. Rep. 634.

Under the Act of March 3d, 1887, a suit is properly brought in the district of Vermont when the plaintiff is a citizen of Ohio, and the defendants are citizens of Vermont, New York, and Maine, the object claimed being property in Vermont. Carpenter v. Talbot, 33 Fed. Rep. 537.

And under U. S. Rev. Sta., § 738, giving federal courts jurisdiction of suits to enforce a legal or equitable lien against real or personal property within the district, by publication against a non-resident defendant, a circuit court has jurisdiction of a bill for specific performance of a contract to convey real estate situated within the district, where the parties are citizens of different states, but not of such district. Single v. Scott Paper Mfg. Co., 55 Fed. Rep. 553; 30 Ohio L. J. 3.

A federal court will take jurisdiction when the plaintiff is a resident of the district wherein he brings suit, and the defendant a corporation created by the laws of a foreign state. Rawley v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 305.

A bill to restrain the infringement of a patent filed in Missouri against a citizen of Indiana cannot be maintained. Reinstadler v. Reeves, 33 Fed. Rep. 308.

A circuit court in Missouri has no jurisdiction against a corporation created by and having its principal office in the State of Mississippi, for damages for acts violating the interstate commerce law, though the defendant had an office and agent in Missouri and the plaintiff resides there, and though the petition shows a cause of action at any subsequent holder, if such instrument be payable to bearer, and be not made by any corporation, unless such suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents, if no assignment or transfer had been made."¹ common law. Connor v. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 273.

In a suit to enforce a claim to real property within the jurisdiction of the court, the provision as to citizenship in the district is waived by the voluntary appearance of the defendants and their submission to the jurisdiction. Hatch v. Ferguson, 57 Fed. Rep. 966.

A citizen of Mexico cannot sue a Connecticut corporation in the circuit court for the southern district of California, though the corporation has an office and managing agent in that district. Denton v. International Co., 36 Fed. Rep. 1.

A steamship company incorporated abroad and having its principal office in a foreign country, and whose piers are in New Jersey, where is also its office for the transaction of its industrial operations in America, while its monetary and financial operations are conducted at its agents' office in New York City, which office is advertised as its New York office, is not suable in New York. Hohorst v. Hamburg American Packet Co., 38 Fed. Rep. 273.

The circuit court of New Jersey has no jurisdiction over the commissioner of patents, whose official residence is in the District of Columbia. Illingworth v. Atha, 42 Fed. Rep. 141.

A suit by two persons on a contract entered into by them as partners cannot be maintained in a district of which the defendant and one of the plaintiffs are non-residents. Smith v. Lyon, 38 Fed. Rep. 53.

One who has his business in a judicial district, remaining therein six months in the year, having a house in which he lives and domestics by whom he is served, and leaving during the unhealthy season for health only, is a resident of the district for the purposes of the jurisdiction of a federal court. King v. U. S., 59 Fed. Rep. 9.

The provision prohibiting suit to be brought against any person "in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant," is inapplicable to an alien or a foreign corporation, and they may be sued in any district in which valid service can be made upon the defendant. Re Hohorst, 150 U. S. 653.

Fed. Rep. 323. And see Wachusett Nat. Bank v. Sioux City Stove Works, 56 Fed. Rep. 321.

The evident object of this provision is to prohibit suits in the federal courts by assignees of choses in action, unless the original assignor might have maintained the suit, in all cases except suits on foreign bills of exchange and the promissory notes of corporations made payable to bearer. Wilson v. Knox Co., 43 Fed. Rep. 481; Hudson v. Bishop, 38 Fed. Rep. 680.

The nominal indorser of a negotiable note, who is in reality the maker for whose accommodation it was made, is not an assignor within the meaning of this provision. Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150.

The rule applies where the assignor is a corporation. Thus, if it does not appear of what state the corporation was a citizen, the assignor could not, so far as appears of record, have brought the suit, and it will fail. Brock v. Northwestern Fuel Co., 130 U. S. 341.

In a suit by the assignee of a promissory note payable to the order of the payee, where the circuit court's jurisdiction depends on the citizenship of the parties, it is necessary that the record should show that the payee could have maintained his action. Parker v. Ormsby, 141 U. S. 81.

A suit brought by an assignee to recover damages for a refusal to accept and pay for goods purchased under an oral contract with the assignor, is a suit to recover the contents of a "chose in action," within the statute. Simons v. Ypsilanti Paper Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 193.

And a suit upon county warrants payable to a person named "or bearer," and assigned to the plaintiff, is within the statute. Thompson v. Searcy County, 57 Fed. Rep. 1030.

A note executed for the sole benefit of the payee, by whom it is indorsed to non-residents, who sue the makers thereon, is not within the restriction, as the plaintiffs are payees in fact. Goldsmith v. Holmes, 36 Fed. Rep. 484.

The restriction applies to an assignee by indorsement of a city warrant. Cloud v. Sumas, 52 Fed. Rep. 177.

The assignee of a contract of reinsurance comes within the prohibition

The jurisdiction of suits to redress the deprivation of the equal rights of citizens is expressly preserved.¹ The court has jurisdiction concurrently with the court of claims of suits brought for the collection of money claims against the United States, greater than one thousand and not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and founded upon the constitution or laws of Congress, other than for pensions, or any contract, express or implied, with the government; or for damages in cases not sounding in tort, war claims and claims adversely reported upon or rejected by any authorized court, department or commission prior to March 3d, 1887, excepted.²

of the law. Laird v. Indemnity Mut., etc., Assur. Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 712. As does also the assignee of a guardian's bond. Hudson v. Bishop, 38 Fed. Rep. 680. And the assignee of a judgment. Mississippi Mills v. Cohn, 39 Fed. Rep. 865. Or an account. Chase v. Sheldon Roller Mills Co., 56 Fed. Rep. 625.

But the assignee of a claim for damages for entering on lands and carrying away timber can bring suit, if the requisite citizenship exists. The citizenship of the original parties is immaterial. Ambler v. Eppinger, 137 U. S. 480.

6. U. S. R. S., § 629, provides that the circuit courts shall have original jurisdiction as follows:

First. Of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where it is brought and a citizen of another state; provided, that no circuit court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange.

Second. Of all suits in equity, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are petitioners.

Third. Of all suits at common law where the United States, or any officer thereof, suing under the authority of any act of Congress, are plaintiffs.

Fourth. Of all suits at law or in equity, arising under any act providing for revenue from imports or tonnage, except civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and seizures on land or on waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and except suits for penalties and forfeitures; of all causes arising under any law providing internal revenue, and of all causes arising under the postal laws.

Fifth. Of all suits and proceedings for the enforcement of any penalties provided by laws regulating the carriage of passengers in merchant vessels.

Sixth. Of all proceedings for the condemnation of property taken as a upon the jurisdiction defined in the revised statutes, has not been very fully determined. It has been held, however, that the circuit courts still have jurisdiction, irrespective of the amount involved, of suits under the patent, copyright, and revenue laws.¹

5. Practice and Procedure—a. IN GENERAL.—The several circuit courts have power to make, from time to time, rules of practice not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or the rules prescribed by the supreme court under the authority granted to it in the revised statutes.² Such rules have been adopted in the various circuits.

b. DIVISIONS OF OPINION.—The Revised Statutes provide as prize, in pursuance of section fifty-three hundred and eight, title "Insurrection."

Seventh. Of all suits arising under any law relating to the slave trade.

Eighth. Of all suits by the assignee of any debenture for drawback of duties, issued under any law for the collection of duties against the person to whom such debenture was originally granted, or against any indorser thereof, to recover the amount of such debenture

Ninth. Of all suits at law or in equity arising under the patent or copyright laws of the United States.

Tenth. Of all suits by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under any law providing for national banking associations.

Eleventh. Of all suits brought by any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under the provisions of title "The National Banks," to enjoin the comptroller of the currency, or any receiver acting under his direction, as provided by said title.

Twelfth. Of all suits brought by any person to recover damages for any injury to his person or property on account of any act done by him, under any law of the United States for the protection or collection of any of the revenues thereof, or to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states.

Thirteenth. Of all suits to recover possession of any office, except that of elector of President or Vice President, representative or delegate in Congress, or member of a state legislature, authorized by law to be brought, wherein it appears that the sole question touching the title to such office arises out of the denial of the right to vote to any citizen offering to vote, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; provided, that such jurisdiction shall extend only so far as to determine the rights of the parties to such office by reason of the denial of the right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and secured by any law to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in all the states.

Fourteenth. Of all proceedings by the writ of quo warranto, prosecuted by any district attorney, for the removal from office of any person holding office, except as a member of Congress or of a state legislature, contrary to the provisions of the third section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Fifteenth. Of all suits to recover pecuniary forfeitures under any act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states.

3. Seats and Terms.—For the terms of court, and the times and places of holding them in the several districts, reference must be had to the statute.²

4. Jurisdiction.—The provisions of the revised statutes, in reference to this subject,³ now in force are as follows: The district courts shall have jurisdiction:

First. Of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, committed within their respective districts, or upon the high seas, the punishment of which is not capital, except in the cases mentioned in section fifty-four hundred and twelve, title, "Crimes."⁴

Second. Of all cases arising under any act for the punishment of piracy, when no circuit court is held in the district of such court.

Third. Of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under any law of the United States.⁵

Fourth. Of all suits at common-law brought by the United States, or by any officer thereof, authorized by law to sue.⁶

Fifth. Of all suits in equity to enforce the lien of the United States, upon any real estate for any internal-revenue tax, or to subject to the payment of any such tax, any real estate owned by the delinquent, or in which he has any right, title, or interest.

Sixth. Of all suits for the recovery of any forfeiture or damages under section thirty-four hundred and ninety, title, "Debts Due by or to the United States;" and such suits may be tried and determined by any district court within whose jurisdictional limits the defendant may be found.

Eighth. Of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it; and of all seizures on land and on waters not within admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. And such jurisdiction shall be exclusive, except in the particular cases where jurisdiction of such causes and to discharge judicial duties in the former district, and leave granted by the judge of another district to sue a receiver, the judge of the district being out of the state, is void. American L. & T. Co. v. East, etc., R. Co., 40 Fed. Rep. 182.

Ninth. Of all proceedings for the condemnation of property taken as prize, in pursuance of section fifty-three hundred and eight, title, "Insurrection."

Tenth. Of all suits by the assignee of any debenture for drawback of duties, issued under any law for the collection of duties, against the person to whom such debenture was originally granted, or against any indorser thereof, to recover the amount of such debenture.

Eleventh. Of all suits authorized by law to be brought by any person for the recovery of damages on account of any injury to his person or property, or of the deprivation of any act done in furtherance of any conspiracy mentioned in section nineteen hundred and eighty-five, title, "Civil Rights."

Twelfth. Of all suits at law or in equity authorized by law to be brought by any person to redress the deprivation, under color of any law, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any state, of any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States, or of any right secured by any law of the United States, to persons within the jurisdiction thereof.

Thirteenth. Of all suits to recover possession of any office, except that of elector of President or Vice President, representative or delegate in Congress, or member of a state legislature, authorized by law to be brought, wherein it appears that the sole question touching the title to such office arises out of the denial of the right to vote to any citizen offering to vote, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; provided, that such jurisdiction shall extend only so far as to determine the rights of the parties to such office, by reason of the denial of the right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, and secured by any law, to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in all the states.

Sixteenth. Of all suits brought by any alien for a tort only in violation of the laws of nations, or of a treaty of the United States.

Seventeenth. Of all suits against consuls or vice-consuls, except for offenses above the description aforesaid.

Eighteenth. The district courts are constituted courts of bankruptcy, and shall have in their respective districts original jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy.

The jurisdiction has been extended by subsequent legislation. Thus, the court has been given jurisdiction concurrent with the court of claims of suits other than on war claims or claims rejected prior to March 3d, 1887, where the amount in dispute does not exceed one thousand dollars, and founded upon the constitution or any law of Congress, except for pensions, or upon any regulation of an executive department of the government, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government, or for damages, liquidated or unliquidated, in cases not sounding in tort, in respect of which the party would be entitled to redress against the United States, either in a court of law, equity or admiralty, if the United States were suable.¹ It may take cognizance also of suits to condemn land within the district for national park purposes.² Its criminal jurisdiction now embraces crimes committed upon the Great Lakes,³ and crimes against Indian police and Indian deputy marshals.⁴ Its jurisdiction of violations of the Civil Rights Act is exclusive.⁵ It also has jurisdiction of causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of the Immigration Act.⁶

5. Practice.—The practice in the court has been considered in a former part of the article.²

VI. COURT OF CLAIMS—(See COURTS, vol. 4, p. 461)—1. Its Nature.—The court of claims was “established in 1855, for the triple purpose of relieving Congress and of protecting the government by regular investigation, and of benefiting the claimants by affording them a certain mode of examining and adjudicating upon their claims.”³ “It is required to hear and determine upon claims founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of an executive department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the government of the United States,”⁴ and to exercise such other jurisdiction as Congress may confer upon it.

2. Authority and Organization.—This court was originally created by statute, February 24th, 1855, and consisted of three judges,⁵ but by the Act of March 3d, 1863, two additional judges were provided for and its jurisdiction enlarged,⁶ and by the Acts of March 3d, 1883,⁷ and of March 3d, 1887,⁸ and of March 3d, 1891, its jurisdiction was still further extended.⁹ It has power to establish rules for its government and to regulate its practice and procedure, and may punish for contempt in the manner prescribed by common law, may appoint commissioners, and may exercise such powers as are necessary to carry into effect the powers granted it by law.¹⁰

3. Officers—a. JUDGES.—The judges number five, appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to hold their offices during good behavior.¹¹ From this number of five a chief justice is appointed.¹² Each of them is required to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to discharge faithfully the duties of his office. They receive an annual salary of forty-five hundred dollars, payable quarterly.¹³ Three judges constitute a quorum, but a concurrence of three is necessary to the decision of a case.¹⁴ The judges may administer oaths and affirmations, take acknowledgments of instruments in writing, and give certificates of the same.¹⁵

11. U. S. R. S., § 1075; 26 St. at L. 851.

It is provided, in U. S. R. S., § 1085, that when testimony is taken for the claimant, the fees of the commissioner and the cost of the commission and notice shall be paid by the claimant; but when taken at the instance of the government, such fees, together with the postage incurred by the attorney general, shall be paid out of the contingent fund provided for the court of claims, or other appropriation made by Congress for that purpose.

any regulation of an executive department,¹ or upon any contract, express or implied, with the United States government,²

U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 233, and Bogert v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 18, it is held that the decision of an accounting officer does not bar the right to trial in this court.

The court may entertain a suit for a demand arising under an act of Congress prosecuted by a state against the United States. U. S. v. Louisiana, 123 U. S. 32. Also a suit on a claim for a bounty land warrant, notwithstanding the claim had been presented at the pension bureau and denied. Alire v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 233.

An officer may prosecute a claim for salary allowed by an act of Congress. Moore's Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 139.

An owner of bonds assumed by the United States may maintain an action in the court of claims to collect the amount of the bonds. Morrell v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 422.

If Congress recognizes the validity of a claim and appropriates money for its payment, and authorizes an officer to pay it, a suit for payment may be maintained in the court of claims. Blount v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 274; Huffman v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 55.

A person who has attended as a witness before Congress, cannot recover compensation in an action before the court of claims, Lilley v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 539; neither can a pension agent for services rendered in that capacity, Knapp v. U. S. Dev. Ct. of Cl. 132; neither can the owner of lands taken by the United States under a treaty with the Indians and as trustee for them. Langford v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 338.

Where an officer is directed by statute to examine claims, and to report to Congress, no suit can be maintained on the basis of his report. Huffman v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 55.

This section and also Act of March 3d, 1887 (24 St. at L. 505), give to the court of claims jurisdiction of "all claims" founded on laws of Congress, but this means all money demands. U. S. v. Jones, 131 U. S. 1; U. S. v. Drew, 131 U. S. 21.

A suit may be maintained to recover the amount of an award under a statute giving a share of the penalty to the informer. Ramsay v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 443; U. S. v. Ramsay, 120 U. S. 214.

A suit may be maintained to recover the claims of a naval officer for expenses incurred in traveling under orders, U. S. v. McDonald, 128 U. S. 471; or upon an allowance made by an internal revenue commissioner to a judgment creditor, under U. S. R. S., § 3220, if the collector does not object and set up a claim himself, and provided the commissioner has kept within his jurisdiction. Seat v. U. S., 18 Ct. of Cl. 458.

A suit may be maintained in the court of claims to recover money exacted illegally by a government officer, when payment was necessary to prevent stopping the claimant's business. Swift Co. v. U. S., 111 U. S. 22. See New York Consolidated Card Co. v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 174.

1. Such regulations embrace rules made by the heads of departments under an act of Congress. Harvey v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 38.

An order assigning a clerk to duty is not such a regulation. Harvey v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 38.

The army regulation providing a method for compensating squatters on military reservations for valuable improvements is such a regulation. Mad-dux v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 193.

A mere order of the president or the head of a department is not such a regulation. Harvey v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 38.

2. Jurisdiction is limited to cases of contracts, express or implied, with the government. U. S. v. Smoot, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 36.

An action for secret service during the war, on a contract made with the claimant by the president, is not maintainable. Totten v. U. S., 92 U. S. 105.

Where a commission has had referred to it a claim of a contractor against the government, has audited it, and the contractor received the amount allowed without objection, he cannot afterward bring an action for a further sum under the same claim. U. S. v. Justice, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 535.

A contract to reimburse is implied when the United States takes private property for public use. U. S. v. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 623.

A suit may be brought in the court of claims on a special contract with a patentee for the use of his invention by the government at a stipulated price. Burns' Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 113.

Although the United States disposes of land in violation of a trust, yet the holder of a warrant cannot enforce a claim arising from such breach, for the United States cannot be sued in the court of claims on equitable grounds only. Bonner v. U. S., 9 Wall. (U. S.) 156.

A claim under the revenue laws based on an implied promise to repay money erroneously taken is within this section. Schlesinger v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 16.

The United States is liable for refusing to receive and to pay for what it had agreed to purchase. Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. (U. S.) 269.

No implied contract arises with the United States, upon which an action will lie in the court of claims, unless some consideration moved to the United States; or money must have been received, which they are charged with a duty to pay over; or the claimant must have had a lawful right to the money when it was received. No such implied contract arises with respect to money in the United States treasury as the proceeds of property taken and sold under the act of June 17th, 1862 (12 St. at L. 589). Knote v. U. S., 95 U. S. 149.

Where a parol contract has been wholly or partly performed on one side, the party performing can recover a fair value for his property or his services on a quantum meruit. Clark v. U. S., 95 U. S. 539.

The court of claims has jurisdiction under this provision only in cases ex contractu, and an implied contract to pay does not arise where the government's officer, asserting its ownership, commits a tort by taking possession forcibly of the lands of an individual for public use. Langford v. U. S., 101 U. S. 341; Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall. (U. S.) 269.

An action by a patentee for a reasonable royalty on his patent, which was used by the ordinance bureau of the government, is an action on an implied contract, and not on a tort, and the court of claims has jurisdiction. U. S. v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262. And the action being on a contract for the use, and not for an infringement, of a patent, it may be brought in the court of claims. U. S. v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262.

Money paid by mistake to the government raises an implied contract by the government to repay it. Knote v. U. S., 95 U. S. 149.

Likewise where the government receives money through the fraud of its agent. U. S. v. State Bank, 96 U. S. 30.

Where the officers or agents of the government take property pursuant to an act of Congress, to which the United States lays no claim, just compensation must be made, and an action will lie to secure such compensation. U. S. v. Great Falls Mfg. Co., 112 U. S. 645.

But the court of claims has no jurisdiction to enforce specific performance. U. S. v. Jones, 131 U. S. 1; U. S. v. Drew, 131 U. S. 21.

In a case where a government employé using property in his possession belonging to the government, but for a use different from that for which it was given him, but which foreign use was approved by his superior officer, it was held that there was no implied contract of hiring for government use. Carpenter v. U. S., 45 Fed. Rep. 341.

Where the government disputes the claim, and the claimant accepts a sum in full settlement and gives a receipt in full, it is a bar to an action for what he asserts to be still due. Sweeney v. U. S., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 75; Murphy v. U. S., 104 U. S. 464.

The court of claims has jurisdiction of a claim where one has delivered property to the United States in pursuance of an express contract which is void. He may recover on a quantum meruit. Heathfield v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 213. Also of a claim where property leased by the government is damaged by voluntary waste, against an implied covenant in the lease, while in its possession. U. S. v. Bostwick, 94 U. S. 53.

When Congress specially refers a claim for a breach of contract to the court of claims, the rules of law applicable generally to the adjudication of claims in that court must govern. Tillson v. U. S., 100 U. S. 43.

The court has jurisdiction of an action for royalties which the government contracted to pay for the use of a patented article. U. S. v. Burns, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 246. Also of a suit for the use of a patented invention which it adopted with knowledge that the inventor claimed a patent right to the invention. A contract is implied in such a case. U. S. v. Palmer, 128 U. S. 262; McKee v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 396.

The court of claims was not instituted to try cases of nominal damages. Grant v. U. S., 7 Wall. (U. S.) 331.

The court of claims has jurisdiction of an action to recover money taken from a claimant in payment of a fine imposed by a court having no jurisdiction, Devlin v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 266; and all claims which may be referred to the court by either house of Congress.¹

and of an action by an inventor upon his implied license to the government to manufacture his patented article, McKeever v. U. S., 14 Ct. of Cl. 396; and of a suit to enforce a contract founded on a patent, or of a suit to recover from the government for the use of a patented invention. Morse Arms Mfg. Co. v. U. S., 16 Ct. of Cl. 296.

But the court cannot act where the claimant's rights are incomplete; they must be vested rights. Daily v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 144.

1. Although either house of Congress may confer on the court of claims jurisdiction of a claim for the proceeds of captured property, yet, unless jurisdiction is so conferred by statute, the claim will not constitute a legal cause of action. The statute (U. S. R. S., § 1059) authorizing either house of Congress to refer money claims to the court of claims, is a consent by the United States, that it may be sued in the cases thus referred. The Statute of Limitations (U. S. R. S., § 1069) does not prevent jurisdiction of a captured property case referred by the Senate under Revised Statutes, § 1059. The bar prescribed by the Statute of Limitations is not jurisdictional. Webb v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 487.

Claims, when thus referred by an act of Congress to the court of claims, are subject to all the limitations and conditions imposed in the act referring them. De Groot v. U. S., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 419; Roberts v. U. S., 92 U. S. 41; Ex p. U. S., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 439.

The court of claims will find facts only in a case where the evidence is submitted, and a finding of facts only is asked for by either House of Congress. 22 St. at L. 485, ch. 116.

When the court has found the facts and reported back to Congress, it will not, on motion of either party, return documents or evidence, but it will, when the committee of Congress that referred the case calls for their return, or when the claim is dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Ford v. U. S., 19 Ct. of Cl. 596.

When a claim is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the court will not allow an amended petition to be filed. Dunbar v. U. S., 19 Ct. of Cl. 674.

2. Liquidated or unliquidated demands of every kind may be set off against a claimant. Allen v. U. S., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 207.

The court of claims has jurisdiction to hear and determine a counter-claim by the United States for the proceeds of its property wrongfully sold by an insolvent debtor in a suit by his assignee in insolvency on a contract between the insolvent and the United States. Allen v. U. S., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 207; Macauley v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 693.

The United States cannot set off a judgment in an action by a firm of three persons when the judgment was against two only. Boehm v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 142.

The amount due by a surety on a bond may be set off against a claimant. McKnight v. U. S., 98 U. S. 179; Gratiot v. U. S., 15 Pet. (U. S.) 336.

Upon settling his accounts, an officer of the navy claimed that he was not concluded thereby, and after ward brought suit for a balance which he claimed was due him. The court held that the United States was not bound by the settlement, and for moneys improperly paid him in pursuance of the settlement, could obtain a judgment. McElrath v. U. S., 102 U. S. 426; U. S. v. Burchard, 125 U. S. 176.

The government, having recovered a judgment against A, may take an assignment of a judgment against B from him, and in a suit brought by B upon an award made in his favor by Congress, may set it off. Macauley v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 693. And if the set-off was acquired before notice of the assignment, this right will exist, though B assigned his award to M, who is the party claimant. Macauley v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 693.

If before notice of an assignment of a chose in action a counter-claim is acquired by the debtor, it may be set off against the demand. Macauley v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 693; Brashear v. West, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 608.

Where matters of set-off are pleaded by a defendant in a suit brought by the United States, the refusal of the court below to direct the jury to certify the amount due is not reviewable in the supreme court. Schaumburg v. U. S., 103 U. S. 667.

If the court of claims dismiss a claim for want of jurisdiction, the counter-claim falls with it. The jurisdiction of the counter-claim depends upon that of the claim. Boehm v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 290.

A debtor of the government cannot set off a claim for a debt due him, unless it has been submitted and rejected, except in special cases provided for by statute. U. S. v. Giles, 9 Cranch (U. S.) 214.

Where the petition to the court of claims contains counts for both liquidated and unliquidated damages, if the court has jurisdiction of the claims for liquidated damages, but has not of the claims for unliquidated damages, the court will not dismiss the case. Dennis v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 119.

As to judgments in case of counter-claim, etc., see U. S. R. S., § 1061.

If the court ascertain that the loss was without fault or negligence, it will make a decree setting forth the facts, and the accounting officers will thereupon allow the officer the amount decreed. U. S. R. S., § 1062.

The benefit of this law extends to disbursing officers of the executive departments and is not restricted to the army and navy. Hobbs v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 189. And the words, "without fault or negligence on the part of such officer," in the above section, mean that there was exercised the care and diligence which a prudent man, under similar conditions, would use in the exercise of a public trust or in matters of private concern. Prime v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 209; Murphy v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 212; Whittlesey v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 99; Malone v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 486; Glenn's Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 501; Christian v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 431; Howell v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 512; Holman v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 642; Clark v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 698, affirmed in U. S. v. Clark, 96 U. S. 37; Hobbs v. U. S., 17 Ct. of Cl. 189; Scott v. U. S., 18 Ct. of Cl. 1; Hoyle v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 300.

The words "fault" and "negligence," as used in the statute, are not technical, but must be taken in their common meaning, the former as error or mistake, and the latter as omission. Malone v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 486.

The care required under one set of circumstances may be different from that required under other circumstances. Glenn's Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 501; Malone v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 486.

The provision is intended to be prospective, and give relief where losses may occur, as well as where they have occurred. Glenn's Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 501.

If the officer's responsibility has been discharged, he is not entitled to relief, unless the money at the time of the loss was under his control. Hall v. U. S., 9 Ct. of Cl. 270.

The United States is not bound by a settlement of accounts by accounting officers. McElrath v. U. S., 102 U. S. 426.

An acceptance without objection to the amount of an account by the government is a final adjustment. Murphy v. U. S., 104 U. S. 464.

The power given accounting officers to duplicate lost checks is not exclusive, and does not affect the jurisdiction of the court of claims. Becker v. U. S., 26 Ct. of Cl. 172.

If the expenditure of money for a designated purpose without limitations is intrusted by statute to a public officer, and he exercises his discretionary power in the work, his acts cannot be reviewed so long as he acts within the general scope and authority of the statute. Plummer v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 517.

The failure of a disbursing officer to give a bond, will not prevent him obtaining relief for lost funds. Wood v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 98.

The Statute of Limitations does not run against a disbursing officer who is charged with funds lost, without his fault or negligence, until an account has been stated by the accounting officers. Clark's Case, 96 U. S. 37; Wood v. U. S., 25 Ct. of Cl. 98.

2. "The court of claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the following matters: Of all claims for the proceeds of captured or abandoned property, as provided by the Act of March 12th, eighteen hundred and sixty-

three, chapter one hundred and twenty, entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States,' or by the Act of July 2d, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, chapter two hundred and twenty-five, being an act in addition thereto. Provided, That the remedy given in cases of seizure under the said acts, by preferring claim in the court of claims shall be exclusive, precluding the owner of any property, taken by agents of the treasury department as abandoned or captured, in virtue or under color of said acts from suit at common law, or any other mode of redress whatever, before any court other than said court of claims. Provided also, That the jurisdiction of the court of claims shall not extend to any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damage to, property by the army or navy engaged in the suppression of the rebellion." U. S. R. S., § 1059.

Proceeds of property sold and placed in the treasury to the credit of the "abandoned property fund" can be sued against, although the property was captured before the "abandoned and captured property act" was enacted. Barringer v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 358; Minor's Case, 8 Ct. of Cl. 277. But by the Act of July 2d, 1864 (13 St. at L. 375), not further back than the passage of the Act of July 17th, 1862 (12 St. at L. 589). Moore v. U. S., 10 Ct. of Cl. 375; U. S. v. Pugh, 99 U. S. 265.

In cases referred by Congress, the court of claims has not jurisdiction of claims for the proceeds of abandoned or captured property. Vance v. U. S., 21 Ct. of Cl. 488.

The "abandoned and captured property act" created the only right which any one could have to the proceeds of such property, and provided the only remedy. Haycraft v. U. S., 10 Ct. of Cl. 95.

Suit to recover the proceeds can be sustained only when the property was seized and sold under the circumstances described in the act. The proceeds must have been paid into the treasury. Spencer v. U. S., 91 U. S. 577.

The claimant must establish by sufficient proof that he was the owner of the property and entitled to the proceeds. U. S. v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281.

It will be presumed that the proceeds in the hands of an officer whose duty it was to send them to the treasury, were so sent. U. S. v. Pugh, 99 U. S. 265; U. S. v. Crussell, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 1; Henry v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 389; Silvey's Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 490.

A suit for proceeds may be maintained under this act, although the proceeds were in the treasury before the act was passed. Jenkins v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 464; Terry v. U. S., 8 Ct. of Cl. 277.

If the secretary of the treasury withholds a part of the amount adjudged due a claimant, the creditor can sue in the court of claims. Brown v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 171.

"Appropriation" under this act includes all taking and using of property by the army or navy during the rebellion, not authorized by contract with the government. And the manner of appropriation, whether made by force or by consent of the owner, does not affect the question of the court's jurisdiction; the consideration of any claim, whatever its nature, growing out of such appropriation is excluded. Filor v. U. S., 9 Wall. (U. S.) 45.

Where property was taken during the rebellion by officers of the government, under circumstances which raise an implied contract to make a reasonable compensation for the use, the property having been subsequently returned to the owner, it is not such an "appropriation" as is excluded from the jurisdiction of the court of claims in an action founded thereon. U. S. v. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 623.

Under this "appropriation" proviso, the court of claims has been held to have jurisdiction in the following cases:

Where an officer justifiably seized private property for public use. Grant v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 41; U. S. v. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 623. Where an executive department used private property. Clark v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 145. A claim for hire for a vessel chartered by the government. Bogert v. U. S., 2 Ct. of Cl. 159. Where the war department took property under an implied lease. Waters' Case, 4 Ct. of Cl. 389.

1. Claims Referred by the Departments.—"Whenever any claim is made against any executive department involving disputed facts or controverted questions of law, where the amount in controversy exceeds three thousand dollars, or where the decision will affect a class of cases, or furnish a precedent for the future action of any executive department in the adjustment of a class of cases without regard to the amount involved in the particular case, or where any authority, right, privilege, or exemption is claimed or denied under the Constitution of the United States, the head of such department may cause such claim, with all the vouchers, papers, proofs and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the court of claims, and the same shall be there proceeded in as if originally commenced by the voluntary action of the claimant, and the secretary of the treasury may, upon the certificate of any auditor or comptroller of the treasury, direct any account, matter, or claim of the character, amount or class described in this section, to be transmitted, with all the vouchers, papers, documents and proofs pertaining thereto, to the said court for trial and adjudication; Provided, That no case shall be referred by any head of a department unless it belongs to one of the several classes of cases which, by reason of the subject-matter and character, the said court might, under existing laws, take jurisdiction of on such voluntary action of the claimant." U. S. R. S., § 1063.

"All cases transmitted by the head of any department or upon the certificate of any auditor or comptroller, according to the provisions of the preceding section, shall be proceeded in as other cases pending in the court of claims, and shall in all respects be subject to the same rules and regulations." U. S. R. S., § 1064. See also U. S. R. S., § 1065; 22 St. at L. 485.

When a claim is transmitted by the head of an executive department, the claimant may voluntarily appear and file his petition, or the court, on the defendant's application, will order a citation to issue requiring him to appear and proceed. Bright v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 118.

On an agreed statement of facts, a case may be heard and determined when the statement is certified by the secretary of the treasury to be "correct and sufficient," which both parties agree to admit in evidence. Bronlatour v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 555; Amoskeag v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 99.

If the accounting officers have certified a balance in favor of a claimant, the claim may be referred by the head of an executive department to the court of claims, in all cases in which the claimant could voluntarily bring the same matter before the court; but such certification is neither conclusive nor prima facie evidence of the indebtedness of the government, nor can an action be brought upon accounts or balances so certified. It never could have been intended by Congress that in such cases the United States were to assume the burden of proof to establish the errors of their accounting officers, instead of requiring claimants to prove their whole case. McKnight's Case, 13 Ct. of Cl. 292; Winnisimmet Co. v. U. S., 12 Ct. of Cl. 319.

3. "Whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either house of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or house may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the court of claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or house by which the case was transmitted for its consideration." 22 St. at L. 485. But see the amendatory act, 24 St. at L. 505.

4. "When a matter or claim is pending in any of the executive departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and

(3) Act of 1887.—The Act of 1887² repealed all inconsistent acts, and considerably affected the extent of the court's jurisdiction.

It provides that the court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine :

First. All claims founded upon the Constitution of the United States, or any law of Congress except for pensions, or upon any conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action." 22 St. at L. 485.

There is excepted, however, from the operation of the act, claims growing out of the destruction or damage to property during the rebellion, and claims for the use of land by the forces of the United States at that time.

In Webb v. U. S., 20 Ct. of Cl. 493, the court, by Richardson, J., said : "There is no inconsistency between U. S. R. S., § 1059, and the Bowman Act of March 3d, 1883 (22 St. at L. 485, ch. 116). The two were passed for entirely different objects. By the former, the court takes jurisdiction to hear and determine cases on both the facts and the law, enters judgment, with a right reserved to the parties to appeal to the supreme court, and with a provision that any final judgment against the claimant shall forever bar any further claim or demand against the United States arising out of the matters involved in the controversy. (R. S., § 1093.) Such cases involve the trial of legal rights, to be settled judicially and never to be returned to Congress. It was found that such jurisdiction did not cover all the claims before Congress, and that Congress needed assistance in another class of cases, in which it must itself determine whether or not it would exercise its legislative discretion by giving relief to meritorious parties who had no strict legal rights to stand upon, and which discretion could not properly be conferred elsewhere. In the history of the court (17 Ct. of Cl. 10), published just before the Bowman Act was introduced into Congress, and which was distributed to members of the committees of Congress, it was said, 'There are still numerous claims pressing upon Congress wherein the petitioners appeal for special relief, which the strict rules of law cannot afford them. Claims of this kind are increasing and are a source of much embarrassment to both senators and representatives. It is uncertainty as to real facts that gives rise to most of the difficulty. These Congress, by its committees, cannot investigate and ascertain as they are proved and established in a court of justice. It may and probably will soon become necessary, if it has not already become so, to send such cases to the court of claims for findings of fact, to be submitted to Congress for its determination as to the law or the relief which should be applied to them. With the facts judicially determined, Congress would be able to act intelligently, safely, and readily upon the cases presented.' The Bowman Act follows this suggestion. It is entitled 'An act to afford assistance to Congress,' etc., and, so far as Congress is concerned, applies only to the finding of facts. It could not have been intended to increase the business of Congress in relation to claims by taking from this court the jurisdiction which it then had over those which either house might refer to it for judicial determination on both facts and law, never again to appear for Congressional action. The proceedings of the two acts are different. In the Bowman Act no appeal to the supreme court is provided for, and if there had been it is not probable that it would have been regarded as of any force, since no judgment is entered in cases under its provisions. In other respects there are important differences which do not conflict with each other, but relate to different cases, or have different courses of proceeding. . . . To hold that the Bowman Act repeals anything by implication would be 'establishing an incidental and accidental change of the law beyond the contemplation of the legislature,' which is not justifiable, as we held in Wilcox v. U. S. (12 Ct. of Cl. 495), which the supreme court affirmed, adopting that very language (95 U. S. 661)."

"Whenever it is material in any claim to ascertain whether any person did or did not give any aid or comfort to the late rebellion, the claimant asserting the loyalty of any such person to the United States during such rebellion shall be required to prove affirmatively that such person did, during said rebellion, consistently adhere to the United States and did give no aid or comfort to persons engaged in said rebellion; and the voluntary residence of any such person in any place where, at any time during such residence, the rebel force or organization held sway shall be prima facie evidence that such person did give aid and comfort to said rebellion and to the persons engaged therein." A delay of three years is sufficient to preclude a claimant's right to a new trial. Figh v. U. S., 3 Ct. of Cl. 97.

Newly discovered evidence may give the right to a new trial. Murphy v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 217. But it does not if it could have been discovered by due diligence. *Bramhall v. U. behalf of the United States, grant a new trial, and stay payment of judgment at any time while the claim is pending, or within two years next after final disposition of the case, upon such evidence as shall satisfy the court that fraud or wrong or injustice had been done the United States.¹

While the court of claims cannot delegate its powers, yet it may refer cases with complicated accounts and facts to a special commissioner to state accounts, marshal assets, and adjust losses, and the judgments thus rendered are considered the result of the deliberation of the court, and not of the commissioner alone.²

VII. COURT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS—1. Authority and Organization.—This court was established by Act of March 3d, 1891, for

An error of law which is a ground for appeal, cannot give a right to a new trial, merely because the appeal is more inconvenient. Ealer v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 708. Neither will a new trial be granted because the amount involved is too small to allow an appeal. Deeson v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 227.

If the court of claims has jurisdiction in a case, when it determines that a motion for a new trial was made in time, or not, its decision is not reviewable. Young v. U. S., 95 U. S. 641; U. S. v. Crussell, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 175. Ex parte testimony admitted on the hearing of a motion is sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial. Ayers v. U. S., 92 U. S. 41.

A new trial may be granted after appeal. Ex p. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 664; Ex p. U. S., 16 Wall. (U. S.) 699.

No new trial will be granted for evidence merely cumulative. Silvey v. U. S., 7 Ct. of Cl. 305; Payan v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 56. Nor for the court's omission to find a fact which would not control other evidence in the case. Rhine v. U. S., 15 Ct. of Cl. 59. Nor because the attorney was not apprised by his client of material evidence. Armstrong v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 226.

1. But until an order is made staying the payment of the judgment, it will be payable as provided by law. U. S. R. S., § 1088.

"Final disposition" in this section means final determination on appeal, if an appeal is taken; if none is taken, then its final determination by the court of claims. Ex p. Russell, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 664.

The new trial may be granted within two years after the "final disposition," even though the court's judgment has been affirmed, and the mandate of af-firmance filed. Ex p. U. S., 16 Wall. (U. S.) 699.

The "injustice" in this section means such as is discovered after judgment rendered, and not such as results from judicial error. Child v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 44.

A motion on behalf of the United States need not be disposed of within two years. Bellocq v. U. S., 13 Ct. of Cl. 195.

A new trial will be granted for new evidence when prima facie sufficient. Tait v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 638; Ayers v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 712; Douglas v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 655.

A motion for a new trial on behalf of the United States may be made while an appeal is pending in the supreme court; and, unless the motion is granted and a new trial ordered, that court will not dismiss the appeal because of the motion. U. S. v. Ayers, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 608; U. S. v. Young, 94 U. S. 258.

A new trial will be granted the United States on motion, if it appears prima facie that wrong has been done the government. Douglas v. U. S., 11 Ct. of Cl. 655; Tait v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 638; Ayers v. U. S., 5 Ct. of Cl. 712.

But a new trial will not be granted to the United States, because certain evidence which was not considered material was not offered at the first trial. Ford v. U. S., 18 Ct. of Cl. 70.

If one motion has been denied, a second motion based on the same grounds will not be considered. Child v. U. S., 6 Ct. of Cl. 44.

the settlement of disputes as to certain private titles to land claimed under Spanish or Mexican grants within the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah, and the States of Nevada, Colorado, and Wyoming. The court by the terms of the act will cease to exist Dec. 31st, 1895.¹

2. Officers—a. JUDGES.—The court consists of a chief justice and four associate justices, who must be, when appointed, citizens and residents of some of the states of the United States. They are appointed by the President, to hold office until Dec. 31st, 1895. Any three of them constitute a quorum. Each of them has power to administer oaths and affirmations.²

b. CLERKS.—The court appoints a clerk and a deputy clerk.³

c. MARSHALS.—The court does not have a special marshal, but the duty is imposed by law upon the United States marshal for any district or territory in which the court is held, to serve its process and to attend court, when directed by it to do so, either in person or by deputy.⁴

d. ATTORNEYS—(1) Of the Government.—The President is directed and empowered to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, an attorney to represent the United States in the court.⁵

(2)—*Of Private Suitors.*⁶

e. OTHER OFFICERS.—The court appoints also a stenographer and a Spanish interpreter.⁷

3. Seats and Terms.—Such sessions shall be held as shall be needful for the purposes of the organization of the court. Notice of the times and places must be given by publication in both English and Spanish in one newspaper published at the capital of the state or territory where the court is to be held, once a week for two consecutive weeks, the last of which publications shall be not less than thirty days next preceding the time of the session. Adjournments may be made from time to time without publication. The court may sit within the States of Colorado, Wyoming, and Nevada, and in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah.⁸

6. Court of Private Land Claims Rule No. 1, provides that, "The clerk shall keep a roll of attorneys; any attorney who is a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, or any circuit court of the United States, or of the highest court of the state or territory in which he resides, shall, upon exhibiting his certificate of admission to the clerk, be entitled to have his name entered upon the roll of attorneys, and to appear in any cause pending before the court."

8. 26 St. at L. 854, § 1.

4. Jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction of the court embraces the consideration of private claims to land derived from Spanish or Mexican grants, concessions, warrants or surveys, which the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by treaty with Mexico. Such lands must lie within the States of Nevada, Colorado, or Wyoming, or the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, or Utah. It thus extends to five classes of cases:

First. Proceedings in regard to titles not confirmed by act of Congress at the date of the passage of the act, or otherwise finally decided and made complete and perfect.¹

Second. Proceedings in regard to titles which were complete and perfect at the time the United States acquired sovereignty.²

Third. Proceedings brought on request of the head of the department of public justice, on the ground that the same are in his opinion required by the public interest or the rights of other claimants.³

Fourth. Claims under grants for the establishment of cities, towns or villages by the Spanish or Mexican government.⁴

Fifth. Proceedings against the United States by claimants of lands decreed to claimants, but previously sold to other persons, to recover the value of such lands.⁵

But the jurisdiction is subject to certain limitations: the title must have been lawfully derived from the Spanish or Mexican government; the court must not interfere with just Indian titles; it may not ordinarily confirm grants to mines of precious metals; it may not affect rights allowed by Congress; it may not affect rights between individuals; its decrees do not operate to make the United States liable; they merely release whatever claim it may have; nor may they confirm incomplete grants for more than eleven square leagues of land; they cannot confirm unless all the conditions of such grants have been complied with.⁶ Acting within the above jurisdiction and limits, the court may determine all questions of title, location, extent, and boundaries.⁷ Suits are to be brought in the state or territory where the land is situated; if no regular session is held in a state or territory, suit may be brought in such places as the rules may designate.⁸

Suits involving lands in Wyoming, Nevada, Arizona, or Utah may be brought at either of the places where regular terms are held.⁹

5. Practice and Procedure.—The court may issue any process necessary to the transaction of the business of the court and may adopt necessary rules and regulations.¹⁰ It has the powers of a circuit court to preserve order, secure attendance of witnesses, and punish contempts.

Proceedings begin with a petition and correspond as nearly as may be, both as to procedure and pleading, with the equity practice of the United States.² For the relief granted, the form of decree and minor matters of practice, reference is had to the act and the rules of the court.

VIII. COURTS OF THE TERRITORIES AND OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—(See COURTS, vol. 4, p. 461).—These are not strictly courts of the United States nor a part of the federal judicial system. The territorial courts are organized by Congress in pursuance of the power possessed by it of making all needful rules and regulations respecting the territories belonging to the United States.³

The supreme court of the District of Columbia is a special court, created to exercise certain limited jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of these tribunals is regulated by a large number of statutes of limited application.

I. DEFINITION.—A university is an institution of higher learning consisting of an assemblage of colleges united under one corporate organization and government, affording instruction in the arts, sciences, and the learned professions, and conferring degrees. A college is an organized assembly or collection of persons established by law, and empowered to co-operate for the performance of some special function, or for the promotion of some given object, which may be educational, political, ecclesiastical, or scientific in its character.⁴

Territorial courts are not courts of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. The state courts, and not the federal courts, will be the successors of the territorial courts on the admission of the territory to the union as a state. Beatty v. Ross, 1 Fla. 232.

The expression "courts of the United States," in the act of Congress providing that in the courts of the United States no witness shall be excluded, etc., because a party or interested, does not include the courts of a territory. Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90.

4. Black's L. Dict.

A college, in English law, is a civil corporation, company, or society of men, having certain privileges and endowed with certain revenues, founded by royal license. An assemblage of several of these colleges is called a "university." Black's L. Dict.

"In American law, a college is an in-

II. FOUNDATION AND LEGISLATIVE CONTROL.—Universities and colleges may be founded wholly by the state, in which case they are public corporations subject to the control of the legislature;¹ or they may be founded by private donations, aided or unaided pecuniarily by the government, when they are private corporations, over which the legislature has no control,² stitution of learning, where youth are instructed in the higher branches. Colleges are usually incorporated and endowed, and enjoy certain privileges granted them by charter." Rap. & Law. L. Dict.

The assemblage of the cardinals at Rome is called a college. The body of presidential electors is called the electoral college, although the whole body never comes together. Bouv. L. Dict.

Where a turnpike road was authorized to be laid out from Bowdoin College, it was held that by Bowdoin College was meant, not any particular building, but the land held by the trustees on which to erect suitable buildings to accommodate the students, their instructors and governors. The word "college" is more naturally applied to the place where a collection of students is contemplated, than to the hall or other buildings intended for their accommodation. Stanwood v. Peirce, 7 Mass. 458.

Medical College.—A medical college is not embraced within the terms "literary or scientific college or university." People v. Gunn, 96 N. Y. 317; 6 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 584.

A law treating "of the powers and duties of the trustees of colleges," was held to apply only to literary institutions, to the exclusion of schools for teaching special sciences, such as medicine. People v. Albany Medical College, 26 Hun (N. Y.) 348.

1. University of Ala. v. Winston, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 25; University of N. Car. v. Maulsby, 8 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 257.

In Head v. University of Mo., 47 Mo. 220, Currier, J., said: "The university is clearly a public institution, and not a private corporation. It was established by an act of the legislature, which act commits the government of the institution to a board of curators. The curators were not named in the act, but provision was made for their election by a joint vote of the Senate and House of Representatives. They were removable at the pleasure of the legislature, and had no power to appoint their successors. There are no named grantees in the act, and consequently no parties either to accept or reject the grant. In a word, the state entered into no compact with private parties. The state established an institution of its own, and provided for its control and government, through its own agents and appointees. The act creating the institution, declares that a 'university is hereby instituted in this state, the government whereof shall be vested in a board of curators.' The university is then declared a 'corporation and body politic' and invested with certain powers. These powers are given into the hands of a board which was made subject to the pleasure of the legislature. This is not the way in which a private corporation is brought into being and endowed with corporate franchises. A private corporation involves the idea of private parties and private rights. No such parties or rights were concerned in the institution of the University of the State of Missouri. By establishing the university the state created an agency of its own, through which it proposed to accomplish certain educational objects. In fine, it created a public corporation for educational purposes—a state university." See also Weary v. State University, 42 Iowa 335.

As the California constitution declared that the University of California should continue in the form and character prescribed by certain acts then in force, any attempt by the legislature to transfer the control of the Hastings Law School after its joinder with the university, is unconstitutional. People v. Kewen, 69 Cal. 215.

In England.—Blackstone classes the English universities as lay corporations, and the colleges in and out of the universities as eleemosynary corporations. 1 Bl. Com. 471.

Because a corporation is established for purposes of general charity, or for save under the reservations in the charter or act of incorporation.¹

education generally, does not, per se, make it a public corporation, liable to the control of the legislature. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 518. In this celebrated case, it was held that the charter granted to Dartmouth College by the British crown was a contract, and that an act of the New Hampshire legislature altering the charter in a material respect without the consent of the corporation, was an impairment of the obligation of such contract and unconstitutional.

The legislature has not an unrestrained power of legislation over charters granted to corporations for educational purposes, though a part of the funds be granted by a city or local public. Louisville v. University of Louisville, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 642.

That a college, merely because it receives a charter from the government, though founded by private benefactors, is not thereby constituted a public corporation controlled by the government, is clear beyond any reasonable doubt. Allen v. McKeen, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 276; Phillips v. Bury, 1 Ld. Raym. 8.

In Atty. Gen'l v. Pearce, 2 Atk. 87, Lord Hardwicke said: "The charter of the Crown cannot make a charity more or less public, but only more permanent than it would otherwise be."

"An eleemosynary corporation is a private charity constituted for the perpetual distribution of the alms and bounty of the founder. In this class are ranked hospitals for relief of poor, sick, and impotent persons, and colleges and academies established for the promotion of learning and piety, and endowed with property by public and private donations." 2 Kent's Com. (2d ed.), § 23, p. 274.

The Normal University of Normal, Illinois, is a private eleemosynary corporation, not a state institution, and a legislative act directing it to reconvey a portion of its land to the original grantor, is unconstitutional, as taking the property without due process of law. State Education Board v. Bakewell, 122 Ill. 339.

But where a person bequeathed his estate for the education of poor children, it was held dedicated to public uses, and that a society incorporated for the purpose of administering the fund was a public corporation, whose charter might be revoked and whose property and franchises might be transferred by the state to other agents. Wambersie v. Orange Humane Soc., 84 Va. 446; 28 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 83. And see Prince Williams School Board v. Stuart, 80 Va. 69.

If a medical society, pursuant to an act of the legislature, organizes a medical college and maintains it some years, an act of the legislature separately incorporating the college and vesting in it, without the consent of the medical society, all the rights, powers, and duties formerly vested in the medical society, is unconstitutional. State v. Heyward, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 389.

In California, an application for an order to incorporate a college, under the Act of 1850, will not be allowed when the subscriptions of real estate fail to define the boundaries of the land to be given. In re California College, 1 Cal. 329.

Adoption of College as State Institution.—Where the legislature, in providing for a college, the leading object of which should be to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanical arts, in compliance with the provisions of the act of Congress granting public lands to the several states and territories which might provide colleges for that purpose, passed July 2d, 1862, designated and adopted a corporation formed for literary purposes to hold property in trust for a religious association, as the agricultural college of the state, in which all students should be instructed in accordance with the requirements of said act of Congress, and the corporation accepted such designation and adoption, in pursuance of a requirement of the legislature, it was held that the relations of the corporation to the religious association were not thereby changed; that the state, in consequence of such act and acceptance, was not authorized to alter the charter of the corporation, or interfere with the right of the association to manage property conveyed to the former, as provided in the charter; and that the designation of the corporation as such college neither created a new entity nor changed its character as trustee of the property held by it for the benefit of the association. Liggett v. Ladd, 17 Oregon 89; 27 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 406.

1. See Matter of McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66.

III. VISITATION.—Every founder of an eleemosynary corporation, and his heirs, have a right to visit and inquire into and correct all the irregularities and abuses which may arise in the course of the administration of its funds, unless he has conferred the power upon some other person. The power of visitation is not a power to revoke the gift, to change its uses, or to divest the rights of the parties entitled to the bounty. It is a mere power to control and arrest abuses and to enforce a due observance of the statutes of the charity.¹ But the founder may part with his visitatorial power and vest it in other persons, and when he does so, they exclusively succeed to his authority. No technical terms are necessary to assign over or vest the visitatorial power; it is sufficient if, from the nature of the duties to be performed by the particular persons under the charter, it can be inferred that the founder meant to part with it in their favor, and he may divide it

Charters may be altered, modified, or amended in all cases where the power to do so is reserved in the charter or in some antecedent general law, and a provision in a charter that it shall not be altered in any other manner than by act of the legislature, is equivalent to an express reservation to the state to make any alterations in the charter which the legislature may deem expedient. Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 190.

An act amending the charter of a college, of which the state was an equal joint owner, by providing that the number of trustees be increased, and that the majority of them consist of certain state officers, whereas the majority had previously been elected by the private stockholders, is not an interference with contractual, vested, or constitutional rights of the private stockholders; and the fact that the charter, as originally granted, was amended by an act making the state an equal joint owner, and providing that four of the eleven trustees be state officers, and that seven be elected by the stockholders, does not prevent a subsequent amendment changing the number of trustees and providing that the majority of them consist of certain state officers, the legislative right to amend or repeal the charter having been reserved in the general law under which the college was incorporated. Jackson v. Walsh, 75 Md. 304; 37 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 51.

Legislative Power to Consolidate Colleges.—The legislature may, where power to alter a charter has been reserved or the institutions consent, consolidate two colleges into one corporation, and this power is not changed, varied, or modified by contracts for scholarships made with the trustees of one of the colleges, prior to the consolidation. Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 190.

1. Allen v. McKeen, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 276.

In Phillips v. Bury, 2 T. R. 352, Lord Holt said: "The visitatorial power is an appointment of law, and ariseth from the property which the founder had in the lands assigned to support the charity, and as he is the author of the charity, the law gives him and his heirs a visitatorial power; that is, an authority to inspect the accounts and to regulate the behavior of the members that partake of the charity, for it is fit the members that are endowed, and that have the charity bestowed upon them, should not be left to themselves (for divisions and contests would arise amongst them about the dividend of the charity), to pursue the intent and design of him who bestowed it upon them."

The visitors' power may be limited by the founder, but though limited to certain times, they may visit whenever called in. St. John's College v. Todington, 1 Burr. 158; 1 Ld. Ken. 441.

The power to interpret statutes constitutes a visitor, and it is incidental to the office to hear complaints. Rex v. Ely, 1 W. Bl. 85. They are not tied up to any particular forms, nor are they liable to prohibition for irregularity in their proceedings or informality in their acts, but only for want of jurisdiction. Ely v. Bentley, 2 Bro. P. C. 220. They need not hear parol evidence on among various persons or subject it to any modification or control by the fundamental statutes of the foundation.¹ If the visitor refuses to receive and hear an appeal, the court will grant a mandamus to compel him,² but it cannot afterward review his decision.³

IV. POWERS.—While a university or college can do no act for which authority is not specifically or impliedly granted in its charter or act of corporation,⁴ yet it may, under the general powers conferred upon it, make by-laws and regulations for the an appeal. It is sufficient if they receive the grounds of the appeal, and the answer to it, in writing. Rex v. Ely, 2 T. R. 290.

Where a university is incorporated by charter under a visitor, all matters relating to the internal management of the domus, as to passing resolutions, holding examinations, conferring degrees, etc., are under the exclusive control of the visitor, a court of law or equity having only jurisdiction with respect to matters out of the house, as between the university and third persons. Thomson v. University of London, 33 L. J. Ch. 625; 10 Jur. N. S. 669; 10 L. T. N. S. 403; 12 W. R. 733.

In Bracken v. William and Mary College, 1 Call (Va.) 161; 3 Call (Va.) 573, it was held that a statute of the visitor's discontinuing a grammar school connected with the college, and putting down the professorship connected therewith, and abolishing the salary of the professor, was valid.

1. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 675; Philips v. Bury, 2 T. R. 352.

The visitatorial power is a hereditary founded in property and valuable in the intendment of law; and where it is vested in trustees, there can be no amotion of them from their corporate capacity, and no disturbance or interference with the just exercise of their authority, unless it is reserved by the statutes of the foundation or charter. As managers, however, of the revenues of the charity, they are not beyond control, but are subject to the general superintendence of a court of chancery for any abuse of their trust in the management of it. Allen v. McKeen, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 276.

In England, if no special visitor is appointed by the founder, the right of visitation, in default of his heirs, devolves upon the king, to be exercised by the great seal. Rex v. St. Catherine's Hall, 4 T. R. 233.

The appointment of a visitor may be collected from the general tenor of the statutes. St. Johns College v. Todington, 1 Burr. 158; 1 Ld. Ken. 441.

Visitatorial power may be delegated generally or specially. Rex v. Ely, 1 W. Bl. 85.

Visitors—Removal.—The medical college of Virginia is a public corporation. Visitatorial authority is vested in the state, and is to be exercised by the legislature. The governor has power to fill vacancies in the board of visitors, by virtue of provisions of an act of the assembly, but he cannot remove members of the board. Lewis v. Whittle, 77 Va. 415; 5 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 271.

2. Rex v. Ely, 5 T. R. 475. And see Rex v. Worcester, 4 M. & S. 415.

But where it is doubtful who is the visitor of a college, the court will not grant a mandamus. Rex v. Ely, 1 Wils. 266; 1 W. Bl. 52. See also Reg. v. Hertford College, 3 Q. B. Div. 693; 47 L. J. Q. B. 649; 39 L. T. 18; 27 W. R. 347.

3. Ex p. Buller, 1 Jur. N. S. 709.

4. A college founded and established by the regents of the university in a particular place, has not the power to establish a school as a branch of such college, and to appoint professors to take charge of the same in a place different from that in which the college is located. People v. Geneva College, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 211.

In Geneva College Medical Inst. v. Patterson, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 61, it was held that the charter of Columbia College did not give the president of the college authority to erect a medical school as a body corporate, though the chancellor of the English universities had the power, and the charter of Columbia said the college was to have all the rights, powers, and privileges of the English universities.

If the charter of a university provides that one-third of its stock be expended for grounds and buildings, the balance to be kept as a permanent fund, and the interest to be used to maintain, sustain, and support it, and requires that the interest on the stock shall be paid solely in tuition at the usual rates of tuition therein, the institution has no authority to distribute its revenues amongst its shareholders, but it has authority to make its tuition free. White v. Butler University, 78 Ind. 585.

It was clearly contemplated by the founders of Hillsdale College, by its articles of association, and by the terms of the deed to it of the land occupied by the college, that it should be carried on as a unit; and no power is conferred upon the board of trustees to create separate schools or colleges. Separate departments may be organized, but they must all belong to, and be a part of the college, and the trustees have no power to convey the title to any part of said land to any person or institution for the purpose of carrying on a separate school. Hillsdale College v. Rideout, 82 Mich. 94.

The board of trustees of Ohio University have power to lay out into lots the portion of the land marked as commons on the town plat of the town of Athens, and dispose thereof for the benefit of the university. Crippen v. Ohio University, 12 Ohio 97.

Sending of Delegates to Convention.—Under the New York Rev. Sts., Geneva College is not entitled to send a delegate to a meeting of the State Medical Society. People v. New York Medical Society, 18 Wend. (N. Y.) 539.

Salary of Professor.—The trustees of the College of the city of New York have no right to pass a resolution directing that a professor's salary be continued for six months after his death and be paid to his widow, and such claim is properly rejected by the auditor. People v. Jackson, 85 N. Y. 541, reversing 23 Hun (N. Y.) 568.

Under the Nebraska law of 1879, salaries of the officers and professors of the State University for the years 1879, 1880, are payable out of the general fund. State v. Liedtke, 9 Neb. 469.

1. Proper heating and lighting of the college halls being necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of the institution, the board of regents may, under the general authority conferred upon them, enact a by-law charging each student in attendance his proportionate share of the expense therefor. State v. Wisconsin University, 54 Wis. 159.

Regulations adopted by persons in charge of an educational institution are analogous to by-laws enacted by municipal and other corporations, and both will be annulled by the courts when found to be unauthorized, against common right, or palpably unreasonable. Ang. & Ames on Corp., § 357; Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d ed.), § 369; People v. Medical Soc., 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 570; People v. Medical Soc., 32 N. Y. 187; State v. White, 82 Ind. 278; 42 Am. Rep. 496.

A college has no right to adopt by-laws injuriously affecting the rights of others under prior contracts, by annexing conditions not contained in the contracts. Illinois, etc., College v. Cooper, 25 Ill. 133.

Regulations as to Admission.—For regulations governing the admission of students, see infra, this title, Admission and Government of Students.

2. As a body corporate, a university or college may, through its board of trustees, and within the limits prescribed by its charter, receive such grants of real or personal property as may from time to time be given for the purpose of enabling it to carry out the objects of its incorporation. Louisville v. University of Louisville, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 642; Auburn Theological Seminary v. Cole, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 361.

A limitation on the power to hold property is a limitation on the power to take, for a corporation may only take what it can hold, and heirs and next of kin of a testator who attempts to give property to a university in excess of the limitation, may assert the invalidity of the gift, and the question is not affected by the fact that subsequent to the death of the testator the limitation on the power of the university to take was removed by the legislature. Matter of McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66, affirming 45 Hun (N. Y.) 354.

A power to "acquire" real property includes a taking by devise. Santa Clara Female Academy v. Sullivan, 116 Ill. 375.

The provisions of the New York Rev. Stat., limiting the amount of property which incorporated colleges may take, are not restricted to colleges chartered by the regents, but apply as well to those created by special charters. Matter of McGraw, 111 N. Y. 66.

Where the question was the amount of property owned by Cornell University, the validity of a gift to it being disputed on the ground of its being in excess of the limitation imposed by statute, it was held that certain western lands and contracts, and endowment fund must be reckoned as part of its property, but not the college land-scrip fund held by the state, and that the value of the university grounds and buildings thereon should be estimated for the purpose only for which they were used. McGraw v. Cornell University, 45 Hun (N. Y.) 354.

The powers granted by the charter of the Farmers' College of Ohio give the right to receive a subscription to an endowment fund for which a subscriber was to receive instruction for one pupil perpetually and free of any charge for tuition therefor. Farmers' College v. Cary, 35 Ohio St. 648.

1. But colleges and universities have no power to confer degrees or grant diplomas unless it is expressly given by the legislature. Case of Medical College of Philadelphia, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 445; People v. Geneva College, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 211. In delivering the opinion of the court in this last case, Savage, C. J., said: "Corporations can exercise no powers but such as are granted expressly or incidentally. The defendants are a corporation for the purpose of instructing pupils in the arts and sciences. They have power to confer degrees which are evidence of the proficiency made by their pupils; they have power, of course, to appoint tutors and professors to teach those branches of learning which will qualify pupils for receiving diplomas. These are franchises, and cannot be exercised by a corporation without legislative authority. It is not denied that an individual may instruct pupils, and may employ teachers under him, and may call them professors, and may also give a certificate or diploma. But a diploma or degree of doctor of medicine from an individual, will not give its possessor a right to practice in this state as a physician; a diploma or degree from a college does give that right. The individual who confers a degree does not profess to act by legislative authority; the corporation does. The degree of the individual confers no privilege or immunity upon the pupil; the degree of the corporation does confer a privilege. Hence the same act, when done by an individual, may be no franchise, yet is such when done by a corporation."

A medical college organized under the Vermont Rev. Laws, § 3664, which provides that persons may associate together and have the powers of a corporation for the purpose of establishing and maintaining literary and scientific institutions, cannot confer the degree of M. D. No such authority is expressly given by the statute, nor is it fairly inferable therefrom. Townsend v. Gray, 62 Vt. 373. Powers, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in this case, said: "No express power to confer degrees can be found in the statute under which this medical college is organized, and hence the power to confer degrees must be classed as incidental to the general powers of a corporation formed for the purpose of maintaining a literary or scientific institution, if it exists at all. It would hardly do to say that literary or scientific institutions have such power upon any theory that without it they cannot answer the ends of their creation. . . . The power to confer degrees not being conferred explicitly by the statute, and not being necessary to enable a literary or scientific institution to carry forward studies of a literary or scientific character, clearly does not exist at all." And see Case of Medical College, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 445.

Power to confer degrees cannot be given in a charter granted a college by a Pennsylvania court of common pleas. In re Duquesne College Charter, 2 Pa. Dist. Rep. 555.

Where a college is empowered to grant a degree, and the mode of making such grant or proving the same is not specially pointed out, a vote by such body that the degree be granted is an execution of the power, and a duly authenticated copy of the vote is sufficient proof of it. Wright v. Lanckton, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 288.

Honorary Degrees.—A statute providing that any person who should be graduated a doctor of medicine in B institution should be entitled to all the rights and privileges granted to the medical graduates of Harvard College, and sue and be sued.¹ It cannot change its location where it has accepted contributions on the condition that it should be permanently located at a specified place, and an injunction will lie to restrain it;² but it may, with the consent of the legislature, change its name.³ In the absence of a special contract, it acquires no right to appropriate the result of the literary labors of one of its professors while in its employ.⁴

V. ADMISSION AND GOVERNMENT OF STUDENTS.—The right of admission cannot be enforced when there is not sufficient room in the university, and may be postponed until the applicant has made suitable proficiency in the preliminary studies; but it is a right which the trustees are not authorized to materially abridge and which they cannot, as an abstract proposition, rightfully deny.⁵ The trustees may absolutely prohibit any connection between Greek letter fraternities and the university, and prohibit the attendance of students upon the meetings of such fraternities or other secret college societies, or from having any active connection with them so long as the students remain under the control of the university; but they cannot make membership in such societies a disqualification for admission as a student.⁶ Where one has does not apply to one who has received only the honorary degree of doctor of medicine without having been educated at the institution. Wright v. Lanckton, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 288.

1. The trustees may sue by their corporate title without setting out their individual names. Legrand v. Hampden Sidney College, 5 Munf. (Va.) 324.

In a suit by a university which has, with the assent of the legislature, changed its name, it is sufficient, in alleging the change, to aver that it was made by a vote of the directors within the time limited by the act, without stating the names of the directors, the number of votes cast, etc. Hazelett v. Butler University, 84 Ind. 230.

Where two colleges have been consolidated into one corporation by a valid act of the legislature, neither of the original corporations can thereafter sue for any cause of action. Pennsylvania College Case, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 190.

2. Injunction to Prevent Removal.—Those who contribute to a fund on condition that a literary and theological seminary shall be located permanently at a specified place, and in consideration thereof, and which is accordingly located there permanently, have a right to apply to the supreme court for an injunction to prevent an illegal and unauthorized removal of the seminary to another place. Hascall v. Madison University, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 174.

Location.—If a location of a state college is fixed by the constitution, the location can be changed only by an amendment of the constitution. State Institutions, 9 Colo. 626.

3. Change of Name.—An act which allows a university to change its name by a vote of its trustees in a limited time, is not unconstitutional as amending the charter, creating a new corporation, or being a local or special law. Hazelett v. Butler University, 84 Ind. 230.

4. Literary Work of a Professor.—An observatory or college cannot, unless special agreement is made, acquire the right to appropriate the results of literary labors, as an author, of a professor during his employment, although he uses the facilities afforded him by the college. Peters v. Borst (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 789.

5. State v. White, 82 Ind. 285; 42 Am. Rep. 496; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36; 17 Am. Rep. 405; Foltz v. Hoge, 54 Cal. 28. In this last case it was held that it was the intention of the California Act of March 14th, 1878, creating the Hastings Law School in the University of California, that the law school should affiliate with and be governed by the laws applicable to the university, and that an applicant for admission to the law school could not be rejected solely on the ground that she was a woman.

Am. Rep. 496. In this case a student had been refused admission to Purdue University unless he took the following pledge: "I do solemnly promise that I will disconnect myself as an active member of the Sigma Chi Fraternity during my connection with Purdue University." Niblack, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The possession of this great power over a student after he has entered the university does not justify the imposition of either degrading or extraordinary terms as a condition of admission into it. Nor does it justify anything which may be construed as an invidious discrimination against an applicant on account of his previous membership in any one of the Greek fraternities, conceding their character, objects and aims to be what they were averred to be in the complaint. . . . The pledge tendered by President White to Hawley carried with it the implication that membership in the Sigma Chi Fraternity might properly be treated as a disqualification for admission as a student in the university, a doctrine wholly inadmissible in its application to Purdue University, or to any of the other public schools or colleges of the state. If mere membership in any of the so-called Greek fraternities may be treated as a disqualification for admission as a student in a public school, then membership in any other secret or similar society may be converted into a like disqualification, and in this way discriminations might be made against large classes of the inhabitants of the state, in utter disregard of the fundamental ideas upon which our entire educational system is based. Membership in an inherently immoral society or fraternity might perhaps be urged against the admissibility of a student, upon the ground that such relation to such a society or fraternity tended to establish a want of moral character or moral fitness in the applicant, and in that view the allegations of the complaint as to the character, objects and aims of the Sigma Chi society and other kindred Greek fraternities became material and ought not to have been struck out. Our conclusion is that so much of regulation No. 3, adopted by the faculty, as may be construed to impose disabilities on persons already members of the Greek fraternities, and as requires a written pledge as a condition of admission, is both ultra vires and palpably unreasonable, and hence inoperative and void, and that the pledge tendered to Hawley was one which the faculty had no legal right to demand as a condition of his admission." It will be seen that the court draws a distinction between the right to expel a student for disobedience of the rules of the institution after he has entered, and the refusal of admission, unless he pledges obedience to those rules, regarding which Wood, J., in a dissenting opinion, says: "The proposition is put forward, seemingly as pivotal, that the admission of students is one thing, and the government of them after admission is quite another thing, and on the strength of this it is said that the authorities in relation to the government and control of persons after they have been admitted have no direct application to the question involved in the case. As applicable to the case in the record, the distinction seems to me to be unsubstantial and immaterial. If the moment a student has passed the portal of the institution he is bound to obey a prescribed rule of the college, he may, in all reason, be required, before he is permitted to enter, to promise obedience. The final remedy for disobedience is expulsion, and, if there may be an expulsion for disobeying, there may be exclusion for refusing to promise compliance with a proper regulation. . . . If the faculty, in their wisdom or as a result of their experience, have determined that an express promise exacted of all alike is a more efficient means of securing good order and good behavior, the courts cannot safely, or with propriety, undertake to review their decision."

In People v. Wheaton College, 40 Ill. 186, it was held that the rule of an incorporated college forbidding its students joining any secret society, is not unreasonable, and that a student might be expelled for joining a secret society in violation of such rule.

1. If a student has paid his tuition fee and received a certificate which entitles him to all the privileges of the course of study, his right to demand instruction is not restricted to the term at which he entered. A demand for having the right to send a limited number of free students to a university, may send them to any department of the university.¹

Students may be required to attend religious exercises,² and a student who, between the time of his final examination and the day of conferring decrees, raises a disturbance, may be either refused his degree or expelled.³

In many of the states statutes have been enacted providing that credit shall not be given to students under age without the consent of their parents or guardians.⁴

instruction, if made within a reasonable time, is sufficient. Iron City Commercial College v. Kerr, 3 Brew. (Pa.) 196.

Scholarships.—A certificate of permanent scholarship issued by the trustees of a college, under the provisions of its charter and by-laws, by which the holder, in consideration of money paid, becomes entitled to the tuition of one pupil in perpetuo, is a valid and binding contract conferring upon the holder the right to send any fit person within his option to the college as a pupil to be educated, subject to the usual regulations of the institution, free of tuition, and the refusal of the corporation to permit the holder of the certificate the benefit thereof by denying him the right to appoint a pupil is a breach of the contract, for which damages may be recovered. Howard College v. Turner, 71 Ala. 429.

The contract created by the purchase of a perpetual scholarship cannot be impaired by a by-law annexing conditions not contained in the contract. Illinois, etc., College v. Cooper, 25 Ill. 133.

Under the statute authorizing the selection of scholars for scholarships in Cornell University from the public schools of the state, normal schools are not included, and students in them are not eligible. People v. Crissey, 45 Hun (N. Y.) 19.

1. McDonald v. Hagins, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 525. In this case it was held that the right of each county in the state to send two students to the Indiana University, to be instructed free of tuition, included the right to free tuition in the law department, as well as in the other departments of the institution.

2. A rule of a university requiring all students, not especially excused, to attend religious exercises, is not in conflict with the constitutional provision that no person shall be required to attend or support any ministry or place of worship against his wishes. North v. University of Illinois, 137 Ill. 206.

3. In People v. New York Law School, 68 Hun (N. Y.) 118, Follett, J., said: "That there should be some power vested in the faculties of schools and colleges to repress disorderly conduct will be conceded by all. It cannot be a student, having passed all examinations necessary for degree, can, before graduation, excite disturbance, and threaten injury to the school or college, without being amenable to some punishment. No course would seem open except to forthwith expel him or refuse his degree. . . . To hold that dissatisfied students in the colleges and schools of this state can review the discretion of faculties in cases when the facts justify the exercise of discretion, would be most unwise. We see no reason why the right to discipline a student is not as great between the final examination and the graduation as before, and if we can control the action of the faculty in this case (it was an appeal from an order of the special term granting peremptory mandamus against the college faculty commanding them to grant the relator his degree), why may we not be called upon to supervise it in the case of expulsion or suspension of students during their college course?"

But a college, after specifying in its circular the fees and qualifications necessary to entitle a student to a degree, cannot, after he has complied with such terms, arbitrarily refuse him his examination and degree. People v. Bellevue Hospital Medical College (Supreme Ct.), 38 N. Y. St. Rep. 418.

4. In Massachusetts, such a statute was held to be constitutional, but it was decided that no penalty was incurred by the tradesman if the college faculty had failed to make rules regarding the giving of credit to students. Soper v. Harvard College, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 177; 11 Am. Dec. 159. To the same effect

VI. DONATIONS AND SUBSCRIPTIONS—1. Government Aid.—The state may aid universities and colleges by appropriations of public money,¹ grants of public land,² or by exempting its property from taxation,³ and an act directing the personal estate remaining unclaimed in the hands of an executor or administrator for seven

The legislature may direct the levy and collection of a certain tax for the benefit of the state university, and the university is entitled to all moneys collected under the levy. People v. Auditor Gen'l, 19 Mich. 13.

2. If an act of Congress donates land for the endowment of a university, and the state accepts it upon the condition of the grant, the fund can only be controlled by the action of the political department of the government. State v. Vicksburg, etc., R. Co., 51 Miss. 366.

The Act of Congress March 26th, 1804, making provision for the disposal of public lands in the Indiana Territory, conferred no right on the trustees of Vincennes University to the township of land preserved by that act for the use of a seminary of learning. State v. Vincennes University, 2 Ind. 293.

The state is not restricted to one college in the use of money received from the sale of public lands appropriated by Act of Congress, August 30th, 1890, to the various states for the more complete endowment and maintenance of colleges for the benefit of agricultural and mechanical arts, established in accordance with the Act of Congress, July 2d, 1864, of which Sections 4 and 5 provide for at least one college in each state. It is for the legislature to determine to whom the fund shall be paid, and the treasurer and receiver general have no right to pay it out until directed to do so by the state. Massachusetts Agricultural College v. Marden, 156 Mass. 150.

By an act incorporating the Ohio State University, the trustees were required to have the public lands with which they were intrusted for the benefit of the institution, appraised by three freeholders, and were authorized to lease the lands for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, reserving the rents of six per cent. per annum. McVey v. Ohio University, 11 Ohio 134.

Under an act of Congress donating public lands to several states and territories, which may provide colleges for the benefit of agricultural and mechanical arts, and the New York statute accepting the same, the state, as trustee, is not liable to insure the beneficiary under the acts (Cornell University) five per cent. on the amount of the trust fund arising from the sale of the lands or the land-scrip irrespective of the rate which the state is enabled to receive by investing the bonds of a character named in both the state and federal legislation, but such sum only as is actually received as interest, where it has been unable to invest in bonds at par bearing five per cent. People v. Davenport, 117 N. Y. 549.

The acts of the legislature of Alabama, 1821, 1822, providing for a sale of the university lands, imposed an absolute forfeiture of the lands as a penalty for failing to make punctual payment of the purchase-money; and it was held that the title of a purchaser of such lands was purely equitable, and that the fee simple remained in the trustees of the university until the whole purchase-money was paid; so that a failure to discharge the installments at the time due, created an absolute forfeiture and vested the whole title immediately in the trustees and discharged the vendee's bonds. University of Alabama v. Winston, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 17.

3. Harvard College v. Kettell, 16 Mass. 204. And see TAXATION, vol. 25, p. 165.

Under the colonial law of 1650, providing that all lands, tenements, or revenues of Harvard College not exceeding in value five hundred pounds per annum should be exempt from taxation, it was held that the lands acquired by the college before their income amounted to five hundred pounds would never be liable to taxation so long as they were owned by the college, and that they were equally exempt from taxation in the hands of the lessee. Hardy v. Waltham, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 108.

years, to be paid over to the literary fund, has been held constitutional.¹

2. Subscriptions—(See also SUBSCRIPTIONS, vol. 24, p. 326).—Subscriptions to the funds of universities and colleges are valid obligations upon which an action may be maintained.²

VII. DISSOLUTION.—A literary corporation may be dissolved by

1. University of North Carolina v. Maulsby, 8 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 257. In this case it was held that the University of North Carolina is a public institution, a body politic, founded by the state on the public funds, and for a general public charity; and that an administrator is an officer appointed by the state in the exercise of a political trust to take charge of dead men's estates; and that getting his office and the possession of the assets from public authority, he must execute the office and account for and deposit the property under the direction of the law. It was, therefore, held to be competent for the legislature to enact that an administrator should, after a reasonable time, pay an unclaimed surplus of the estate, either to the university or other person charged by law with the keeping of the same, for the benefit of creditors and next of kin; it merely changing the fund from one agency of the state to another without changing the trust.

But the provisions of the North Carolina Act of 1874-1875, ch. 236, enacting "that all dividends heretofore declared, or which shall hereafter be declared, by any company, corporation or association, whether chartered or not, which shall not be recovered or claimed by suit by the parties entitled thereto for five years after the same were or shall be declared," shall be paid by the corporations or companies to the trustees of the university, are unconstitutional and not warranted by art. 9, § 6, of the state constitution. University v. North Carolina R. Co., 76 N. Car. 103; 22 Am. Rep. 671.

2. Farmers' College v. McMicken, 2 Disney (Ohio) 495; Farmers' College v. Cary, 35 Ohio St. 648; Ladies' Collegiate Institute v. French, 16 Gray (Mass.) 196; Farmington Academy v. Allen, 14 Mass. 172; 7 Am. Dec. 201. But see Phillips Limerick Academy v. Davis, 11 Mass. 113; 6 Am. Dec. 162; Bridgewater Academy v. Gilbert, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 579; 13 Am. Dec. 457.

The implied promise of the promisee to hold and appropriate the funds subscribed, in conformity with the terms and objects of the subscription, is a sufficient legal consideration for the promise of the subscriber. Ladies' Collegiate Institute v. French, 16 Gray (Mass.) 196.

A gratuitous subscription to pay certain money to a particular stated fund, to be raised for the endowment of certain new professorships of a college, becomes a fixed legal obligation as soon as the college has performed its undertaking, and raised a required amount of reliable subscriptions. Such subscription is a promise to the college, to do an act if the college will perform a prescribed duty on its part, and if accepted, the contract is complete. Farmers' College v. McMicken, 2 Disney (Ohio) 495.

Where the subscription is upon condition that the college shall remain in the town where it is then located, and in case of removal the subscription shall become void and the money be refunded, and that the college shall within one year accept the subscription, and by vote order the subscription paper entered upon its records, and the conditions are complied with, the promise is founded upon a legal consideration and is binding on the subscriber. Williams College v. Danforth, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 541.

Promissory Note—Consideration.—An agreement by the agent of the trustees of a college that the college "will hold its doors open upon all moral subjects," is a sufficient consideration for a promissory note given to the trustees. Hammond v. Shepard, 40 How. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 452.

Where a subscription to the fund was made after the incorporation of the body who were its trustees, and afterward a promissory note was given, purporting to be for value received, payable to the same party, and referring expressly to the subscription and purposes of it as the consideration of the note, and those purposes were in process of execution, the note was held to be founded on a sufficient consideration and binding on the promisor.

either the forfeiture,¹ or voluntary surrender of its franchise.² The power to decide upon the advisability of a voluntary dissolution rests with the president and trustees.³

UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY.—(See AFFRAY, vol. 1, p. 315; RIOT, vol. 21, p. 408; ROUT, vol. 21, p. 436.)

An unlawful assembly is a disturbance of the peace by three or more persons who assemble together with an intention to do an unlawful act which, if done, would make them rioters.⁵

Amherst Academy v. Cows, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 427; 17 Am. Dec. 387.

1. Where the charter of a college provided that it should have a course in agriculture, but the general course should be controlled by the trustees, it was held that the collegiate franchise was not forfeited by the partial decline of the agricultural department because the students refused to take that course, when it appeared that there was a professor of the department assisted by competent instructors. State v. Farmers' College, 32 Ohio St. 487.

Quo warranto lies to forfeit a college charter, when it appears that for a long time the college has not performed any of its functions for which it was incorporated, and its property is exempt from taxation under the constitution, which was in force when it was chartered, but would not be under a subsequently adopted constitution. Edgar Collegiate Institute v. People, 142 Ill. 363.

2. Where the act of incorporation of a college provides no method by which it may be reincorporated or dissolved, it may dissolve itself by a voluntary surrender of its franchise. People v. College of California, 38 Cal. 166. It was held in this case that upon the dissolution of the college, its property, after payment of its debts, vested in the state.

By Act of the Legislature.—Neither subsequent legislation nor the Alabama Constitution of 1868 dissolves the corporation created by the Alabama Act of 1820, called the "Trustees of the University of Alabama." University of Ala. v. Moody, 62 Ala. 389.

3. In People v. College of Cal., 38 Cal. 166, Crockett, J., said: "It was and is for the president and trustees to decide whether the public interest will be subserved by dissolving the corporation and diverting its property, after the payment of its debts, to the support of a new and kindred institution, to be established under more auspicious circumstances and with a more liberal endowment. It would be an extraordinary casus omissus in the law if the managers of a literary institution without a sufficient endowment to render it effective, were compelled against their convictions and judgments to maintain it in its feeble, sickly condition, when by a surrender of its franchise and devoting its property in aid of a new institution of learning, a great public good might be accomplished."

4. Contents Unknown.—As to the words, "contents unknown," describing goods in a bill of lading, see BILL OF LADING, vol. 2, p. 227.

5. 4 Bl. Com. 146; Hawk. P. C., ch. 65, § 9.

If persons assemble together for a purpose which, if executed, would make them rioters, but, having assembled, do nothing, and separate without carrying their purpose into execution, it is nevertheless an unlawful assembly. Rex v. Birt, 5 C. & P. 154; 24 E. C. L. 252.

Unlawful assemblies, routs, and riots are three allied disturbances of the public peace. If the assembly moves forward toward the execution of its unlawful design, it is a rout. An actual execution of the design is a riot. Hawk. P. C., ch. 65, § 9. The statutes of some of the states, e. g., Maine and Wisconsin, attempt to maintain the common-law distinction between unlawful assemblies, routs and riots. In Bonneville v. State, 53 Wis. 680, it was held, however, that a complaint under the Wisconsin Rev. St., § 4511, was not bad in omitting to specify the particular unlawful act intended by the assembly, though, at common law, such omission probably would have been fatal. See 2 Arch. Crim. Pl. 590, and note; Reg. v. Gulston, 2 Ld. Raym. 1210; Reg. v. Soley, 2 Salk. 594.

Under the Texas statute governing this offense (Pen. Code, art. 279), it was held in McGehee v. State, 23 Tex. App. 330, that a conviction might be had under an indictment charging an unlawful assembly with force and arms for the purpose of intimidating a railway conductor from running a train. And see, on the general subject, and as illustrating the distinction between an unlawful assembly and a riot, Rex v. Blisset, 1 Mod. 13; Rex v. Cox, 4 C. & P. 538; 19 E. C. L. 516; State v. Stalcup, 1 Ired. (N. Car.) 30.

Any assembly of persons attended with circumstances calculated to excite alarm, is an unlawful assembly. Reg. v. Neale, 9 C. & P. 431; 38 E. C. L. 176. Any assembly of a great number of persons which, from its general appearance and accompanying circumstances, is calculated to excite terror, alarm and consternation, is generally criminal and unlawful, and all parties joining in such assembly, disregarding its probable effect and the alarm and consternation that are likely to ensue, and all who give countenance and support to it, are criminal parties. Rex v. Hunt, 1 Russ. C. & M. 388. And see Rex v. Hunt, 3 B. & Ald. 566.

Any meeting assembled under such circumstances as, according to the opinion of rational and firm men, are likely to produce danger to the tranquillity and peace of the neighborhood, is an unlawful assembly. And in viewing the question the jury should take into consideration the hour at which the parties met, and the language used by the persons assembled and by those who addressed them, and then consider whether firm and rational men, having their families and property there, would have reasonable ground to fear a breach of the peace, as the alarm must not be such as would frighten any foolish or timid person, but must be such as would alarm persons of reasonable firmness and courage. Reg. v. Vincent, 9 C. & P. 91; 38 E. C. L. 48.

But where parties assembled for a lawful purpose and with no intention of carrying it out unlawfully, but with the knowledge that their assembly would be opposed, and with good reason to suppose that a breach of the peace would be committed by those who opposed it, it was held that they could not be convicted of an unlawful assembly. Beatty v. Gillbanks, 9 Q. B. Div. 308. In this case the appellants were members of the Salvation Army, who assembled for the purpose of forming a parade and holding a public meeting, with the knowledge that there was an organized band of persons who would seek to dispute the passage of the "Army" through the streets, and that a disturbance of the peace would probably result. Field, J., in delivering the opinion in this case, said: "The charge against them is, that they unlawfully and tumultuously assembled, with others, to the disturbance of the public peace and against the peace of the queen. Before they can be convicted it must be shown that this offense has been committed. There is no doubt that they, and with them others, assembled together in great numbers; but such an assembly, to be unlawful, must be tumultuous and against the peace. As far as these appellants are concerned there was nothing in their conduct when they were assembled together which was either tumultuous or against the peace. But it is said, that the conduct pursued by them on this occasion was such as, on several previous occasions, had produced riots and disturbance of the peace and terror to the inhabitants, and that the appellants, knowing when they assembled together that such consequences would again arise, are liable to this charge. Now, I entirely concede that every one must be taken to intend the natural consequences of his own acts, and it is clear to me that if this disturbance of the peace was the natural consequences of acts of the appellants, they would be liable, and the justices would have been right in binding them over. But the evidence set forth in the case does not support this contention; on the contrary, it shows that the disturbances were caused by other people antagonistic to the appellants, and that no acts of violence were committed by them.

... What has happened here is that an unlawful organization has assumed to itself the right to prevent the appellants and others from lawfully assembling together, and the finding of the justices amounts to this,—that a man may be convicted for doing a lawful act if he knows that his doing it may cause another to do an unlawful act. There is no authority for such a proposition, and the question of the justices, whether the facts stated in the case constituted the offense charged in the information must, therefore, be answered in the negative." And see Reg. v. Clarkson, 66 L. T. N. S. 297.

A magistrate is not justified in forcibly dispersing a meeting, merely upon the ground that he believes, and has reasonable and probable cause to believe, that it is held with an unlawful intent. Unless the meeting be itself unlawful, the plea justifying the assault, upon the ground that it was committed by a magistrate in the dispersion of a meeting, must either allege as a fact that the meeting was unlawful, or state facts from which its unlawfulness can be inferred. O'Kelly v. Harvey, L. R., 10 Ir. 285.

In People v. Most, 128 N. Y. 108, affirming 8 N. Y. Supp. 625, the defendant, Herr Most, was indicted for participating in an unlawful assembly in violation of section 451 of the New York Penal Code, which provides that whenever three or more persons, being assembled, attempt or threaten any act tending toward a breach of the peace, or any injury to person or property, or any unlawful act, such assembly is unlawful and every person participating therein is guilty of a misdemeanor. The meeting in question took place the day before the hanging of the Chicago anarchists, and to protest against their execution; the defendant in his speech denounced the government and officers of the law and the judges concerned in the trial, advised his hearers to arm and be ready for the revolution "not far distant," and declared that they would avenge the blood of their comrades, and that the governor of Illinois would not be spared in the general destruction. He referred to the "police blood-hounds" and exclaimed, "God help them if they are found at our socials." The audience exhibited, by their cheers and appearance, warm approval of these sentiments, and when the speaker said the day of revolution was not far distant, one of them said excitedly, "Why not to-night, for we are ready and prepared?" It was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict convicting the defendant, under the statute.

1. In Indictment.—In an indictment, the term "unlawfully" has been held not equivalent to "willfully," State v. Hussey, 60 Me. 410; Rex v. Davis, 1

Leach 556; Rex v. Reader, 4 C. & P. 244; 19 E. C. L. 367; nor to "knowingly." See KNOWING, vol. 12, p. 522.

Where an offense must be "unlawfully" committed, to charge that it was "willfully" committed, omitting the term "unlawfully," is fatal. Reg. v. Fife, 17 Ont. 710.

Feloniously.—The term "feloniously," in an indictment, has been held equivalent to "unlawfully." See CRIMINAL PROCEDURE, vol. 4, p. 752; INDICTMENT, vol. 10, p. 598.

Unlawfully and Maliciously.—In State v. Massey, 97 N. Car. 465, the words "unlawfully and maliciously," in an indictment, were held not equivalent to the statutory words "wantonly and willfully." The court, by Merrimon, J., said: "The term 'unlawfully' implies that an act is done or not done, as the law allows or requires; but the term 'wantonly' implies turpitude—that the act done is of willful, wicked purpose. The term 'willfully' implies that the act is done knowingly and of stubborn purpose, but not of malice."

Unlawful Purposes and Acts of a Corporation.—The word "unlawful," as applied to the purposes and acts of a corporation, is not used exclusively in the sense of malum in se or malum prohibitum. It is also used to designate powers which corporations are not authorized to exercise, or contracts which they are not authorized to make, or acts which they are not authorized to do—or, in other words, such acts, powers, and contracts as are ultra vires. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co., 130 Ill. 269. See also ULTRA VIRES, vol. 27, p. 351.

Unlawfully, Illegally, Wrongfully.—The term is synonymous with "illegal," see ILLEGAL, vol. 9, p. 879; and "wrongful," when used with reference to a cause of action for negligence. Wells v. Sibley (Supreme Ct.), 9 N. Y. Supp. 344; Dickinson v. New York, 92 N. Y. 584. But in a statute prescribing the remedy to obtain possession of personal property unlawfully obtained, the term "wrongfully" has been held not to be synonymous with "unlawfully." Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Payne, 103 Ind. 183. See also Howard County v. Armstrong, 91 Ind. 528; Durham v. Montgomery County, 95 Ind. 182; Henry County v. Murphy, 100 Ind. 570. But see INDICTMENT, vol. 10, p. 547.

UNLIQUIDATED.—See LIQUIDATE, vol. 13, p. 845; LIQUIDATED DAMAGES, vol. 13, p. 847.

UNLOAD.—See LOAD, vol. 13, p. 973.

UNMARRIED.—This term frequently occurs in deeds of trust and wills, and has been the subject of judicial construction. Its primary meaning is, never having been married.² But the term is a word of flexible meaning, and "slight circumstances, no doubt, will be sufficient to give the word its other meaning," of "not having a husband, or wife, at the time in question."³

UNOCCUPIED.—(See also OCCUPY, vol. 17, p. 33).—See note 4.

UNPAID.—See note 5.

Unlawfully Inflicting Grievous Bodily Harm.—In construing the term "unlawfully," as used in an English statute directed against a husband "unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm upon his wife," the question arose whether "unlawfully" was to be given the wide general meaning which the term has when applied to acts which, if done by co-conspirators, are indictable. Stevens, J., said: "Unlawfully is used exceptionally in a wide general sense as regards conspiracy; but its ordinary import is an act which is forbidden by some defined law, and does not embrace that which is merely immoral." It was held that an act which would give a right to a judicial separation would fall within "unlawfully." Reg. v. Clarence, 22 Q. B. Div. 23. See CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY, vol. 4, p. 598.

1. The word "unless," in a clause in a marine policy, such as "free from average unless general," has the same meaning as "except." Wilson v. Smith, 3 Burr. 1556; Price v. Insurance Co., 57 L. J. Q. B. 459. See also MARINE INSURANCE, vol. 14, p. 402; GENERAL AVERAGE, vol. 8, p. 1293.

So, in a deed, "unless" has the same meaning as "except" in creating a condition precedent. In re Dickinson, 51 L. J. Ch. 736.

2. Clarke v. Colls, 9 H. L. Cas. 601; Dalrymple v. Hall, 50 L. J. Ch. 302; 16 Ch. Div. 715; Blundell v. DeFalbe, 57 L. J. Ch. 576; 58 L. T. 621; Heywood v. Heywood, 30 L. J. Ch. 155; 29 Beav. 9; In re Sergeant, 54 L. J. Ch. 159; 26 Ch. Div. 575; Norris v. Barber, W. N. (73) 180; Re Thistlethwayte's Trust, 24 L. J. Ch. 712.

When a legacy is given to a daughter, who at the date of the will has never been married, and the gift is conditional upon the legatee being "unmarried" at a given time, the word "unmarried" may properly be construed "a spinster," and not "a widow." Williams on Executors 1102, citing Re Saunders, 3 K. & J. 156.

A gift to an "unmarried" person does not mean that he is to remain unmarried. Jubber v. Jubber, 9 Sim. 503; Hall v. Robertson, 23 L. J. Ch. 241; 4 De G. & M. 781; Williams on Executors 1282.

"So long as she continues unmarried" is not equivalent to "during widowhood," and a divorced woman, if remaining unmarried, continues entitled. Knox v. Wells, W. N. (83) 58.

3. Clarke v. Colls, 9 H. L. Cas. 601; Pratt v. Mathew, 25 L. J. Ch. 409, 686; 22 Beav. 328; 8 De G. M. & G. 522; 27 L. T. 74, 267; Mitchell v. Colls, 29 L. J. Ch. 403; Johns, 674; Day v. Barnard, 30 L. J. Ch. 220; 1 Dr. & Sm. 351; In re Sanders' Trusts, L. R., 1 Eq. 675.

4. In Tax Cases.—As used in a statute regulating taxes, the term "unoccupied" has been held equivalent to "untenanted." State v. Reinhardt, 31 N. J. L. 218. It applies to land having no visible occupant, State v. Hoffman, 30 N. J. L. 346; and not to land occupied by the servant of the owner. State v. Reinhardt, 31 N. J. L. 218.

In Fire Insurance Policies.—See FIRE INSURANCE, vol. 7, p. 1037; OCCUPY, vol. 17, p. 33; VACANCY.

due upon the note. Reid v. Southworth, 71 Wis. 290. In construing a similar provision, Orton, J., in Sloan v. Anderson, 57 Wis. 123, said: “The power of attorney does not authorize the confession of judgment before the note is due, or for more than is due upon it. The language, ‘for such amount as may appear to be unpaid thereon,’ does not give such authority by the necessary meaning of the word ‘unpaid,’ or by any meaning that can be forced by its context.” In Reid v. Southworth, 71 Wis. 290, the court said: “The word ‘unpaid’ is more commonly and properly applied to a debt due, than a debt undue.”

Unpaid Rent.—In a statute giving the right of distress for “rent unpaid,” by “rent unpaid is meant nothing more than arrears of rent—that is, rent behind in payment, although due.” Weiss v. Jahn, 37 N. J. L. 96.

1. “Unreasonable Delay.”—The terms “unreasonable delay,” as used with reference to the time within which a vendee might accept or refuse the goods, and refusal to accept within a “reasonable time,” have been said to be substantially alike. “Beyond a reasonable time is unreasonable delay. If the delay is not reasonable, it is unreasonable.” Pratt v. Peck, 70 Wis. 620. See also REASONABLE TIME, vol. 19, p. 1089.

2. Unsound.—See generally IMPLIED WARRANTY, vol. 10, p. 85; WARRANTY.

Unsound Mind.—See TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY, vol. 25, p. 970; INSANITY, vol. 11, p. 107.

3. Unsuitable Means.—As to the term “unsuitable means,” used in limiting attempts to commit crime, see CRIMINAL LAW, vol. 4, p. 665.

4. As to whether “until” is exclusive or inclusive of the date to which it refers, see TILL, vol. 26, p. 2; TIME (COMPUTATION OF), vol. 26, p. 3.

In the following cases the term was held inclusive of the date: Kerr v. Jeston, 1 Dowl. N. S. 538; Knox v. Symmonds, 3 Bro. C. C. 358; Pugh v. Leeds, Cowp. 714; Dickens v. Wagner, 3 Dowl. 535; Backhouse v. Meller, 4 H. & N. 116; Rex v. Navestock, Burr. S. C. 719; Rogers v. Cherokee Iron, etc., Co., 70 Ga. 717; Houghwout v. Bordonbin, 18 N. J. Eq. 315; Kendall v. Kingsley, 120 Mass. 95.

In the following cases the term was held exclusive of the date: Rogers v. Davis, 8 Ir. L. R. 399; Rex v. Stevens, 5 East 250; Newman v. Beaumont, Owen 50; Nichols v. Ramsel, 2 Mod. 280; Wicker v. Norris, Cas. Temp. Hardw. 116; Bemis v. Leonard, 118 Mass. 502; 19 Am. Rep. 470; Atkins v. Boylston F. & M. Ins. Co., 5 Met. (Mass.) 439; 39 Am. Until the Summer or Fall.—An agreement to extend the time of payment “to the summer” of a given year, means until the first day of the first summer month, June; and an agreement to extend the time “until the fall,” means the first day of September. Courts take judicial notice of the seasons. Abel v. Alexander, 45 Ind. 523; 15 Am. Rep. 270.

1. In a New Jersey act providing for proceedings when a public highway should be unused for five years, “unused” was held to signify “abandoned” by the public. Freeholders v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 45 N. J. L. 85. See also ABANDONMENT, vol. 1, p. 1; HIGHWAYS, vol. 9, p. 362.

2. In Duddell v. Simpson, 2 Ch. 102, Turner, L. J., in referring to the earlier cases on the ordinary English clause in conditions of sale, enabling a vendor to rescind the contract if he should be “unable or unwilling” to answer the purchaser’s requirements, said: “These cases have settled, and, I think, very wisely settled, that the word ‘unwilling,’ in a condition of sale of this description, is not to be considered as giving an arbitrary power to the vendor to annul the contract.” But though that passage was cited to Bacon, V. C., in Re Dames, 27 Ch. Div. 177, he held that the word “unwilling” was as potent as the word “unable;” that nobody was entitled to ask why he was unwilling; if he refused to comply with the requisition, that was enough. In re Dames, 29 Ch. Div. 626; In re Terry, 32 Ch. Div. 14. And the result seems to be that though “unwilling” means “reasonably unwilling,” and does not justify a vendor in capriciously translating it into “I will not,” yet in rescinding the contract he is not bound to give his reason for his unwillingness to complete it, and the onus of proving his caprice or mala fides is on the purchaser. In re Glenton, 53 L. T. 434; In re Starr-Bowkett Bldg. Soc., 42 Ch. Div. 375; Woolcott v. Peggie, 15 App. Cas. 42.

Lying Up.—See LIEN, vol. 13, p. 627.

4. Upon in the Sense of Over.—As to “upon” in the sense of “over,” as applied to a grant of rights in streets to railroads, see OVER, vol. 17, p. 294. The term does not confine the road to the level grade of the street. In a statute authorizing a railroad company to construct its railroad across, along, or upon any stream of water, watercourse, street, highway, etc., it was held that the word “upon” did not necessarily mean upon the common grade of the street; but that by the statute the company was authorized to lay its road along any street at or above or below the common level of the existing or changed surface of the street. It was said, however, that the statute did not authorize the occupancy by a railroad for its exclusive use of the entire street or of such considerable portion of it as would substantially prevent the use of it by the general public. Arbenz v. Wheeling, etc., R. Co., 33 W. Va. 1.

Upon Equivalent to When.—In a contract where money is payable in installments, and it is agreed that a deed shall be given “upon” the payment of the whole amount of the purchase-money, the word “upon” is equivalent to “when.” Adams v. Williams, 2 W. & S. (Pa.) 227.

Improvement Upon Land.—The breaking of land with a plough is not an improvement “upon” land, such as will entitle the person doing the breaking to a mechanic’s lien therefor. Brown v. Wyman, 56 Iowa 452.

5. A warrant of attorney given by two persons, authorizing an attorney to appear to an action to be brought “against us,” and confess judgment “against us,” will not authorize the confession and entry of a judgment against one of them, even though the other be dead at the time judgment is entered. Hunt v. Chamberlin, 8 N. J. L. 336.

I. DEFINITION—1. The Words Not Technically Synonymous.—The words “usages” and “customs” are generally used synonymously, both in legal writings and in popular language. It will be found, however, in making a systematic study of the law relating to “usages” and “customs,” that they cannot be used as entirely correlative terms. “Custom,” for example, means “usage” in the expression “custom of the trade;” but “usage” does not mean “custom” in the expression “custom of gavelkind.”

2. The Meanings Stated.—A custom is said to be such a usage as by common consent and uniform practice has become the law of the place, or of the subject-matter to which it relates. It is a law established by long usage. Usage, on the other hand, is an established method of dealing adopted in a particular place, or by those engaged in a particular vocation or trade, which acquires legal force because people make contracts in reference to it.¹

1. Bouv. Law Dict., p. 463; Black's Law Dict., p. 312. A usage or practice of the people, which by common adoption and acquiescence, and of long and unvarying habit, has become compulsory, and has acquired the force of a law with respect to the place or subject-matter to which it relates. A law, not written, established by long usage and the consent of our ancestors. See Bracton, fol. 2. If it be universal, it is common law; if particular to this or that place, it is then properly custom. 3 Salk. 112. Similarly in Burrill's Law Dict., Anderson's Law Dict., and Abbott's Law Dict.

In Wilcox v. Wood, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 349, it was said: “The distinction between a usage of trade and a common-law custom, has not always been observed. A custom is something which has, by its universality and antiquity, acquired the force and effect of a law, in a particular place or country, in respect to the subject-matter to which it relates, and is ordinarily taken notice of without proof.” Morningstar v. Cunningham, 110 Ind. 328; 59 Am. Rep. 211. “Custom is that length of usage which has become law. It is a usage which has acquired the force of law. Hursh v. North, 40 Pa. St. 241. A general custom is the common law itself, or a part of it.” Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464; 10 Am. Rep. 407.

The Century Dictionary defines the word as follows: “The settled habits of a community such as are, and have been, for an indefinite time past, generally recognized in it as the standards of what is just and right; ancient and general usage having the force of law. Some writers use the word without qualification as meaning only general customs—that is, such as are prevalent throughout the nation—and some as meaning only local or particular customs, such as obtain only in a particular class, vocation, or place. In modern use, custom is more appropri-

3. "Custom" in the Sense of Law.—In a succeeding paragraph reference is made to custom as a source of law; as an example, the custom of merchants has become the law merchant; what was at one time custom has become law; the custom of allowing days of grace has become established as a law. It is therefore obviously improper to use the word custom when referring to something that has ceased to be a custom. Whenever a custom rises to the dignity of a law it should no longer be called a custom.¹

4. Confusion of Ideas.—The use of the word in several notable instances has given rise to much confusion of thought. As an example, by an immemorial practice in the county of Kent, England, all the sons succeed to their father's inheritance; whereas in other parts of England only the eldest son thus succeeds. This ate to immemorial habitudes, either general or characteristic of a particular district and having legal force, and usage to the habitudes of a particular vocation or trade."

Distinguished from Prescription.—In 2 Greenleaf on Evidence (15th ed.), § 248, it is said: "Custom is unwritten law, established by common consent and uniform practice from time immemorial; and it is local, having respect to the inhabitants of a particular place or district. It differs from prescription in this: that prescription is a personal right, belonging to one or a few persons, by particular designation, as, for example, the owners of a certain parcel of land. The term usage, in its broadest sense, includes them both; but is ordinarily applied to trade; designating the habits, modes and course of dealing, which are generally observed, either in any particular branch of trade, or in all mercantile transactions."

1. In Clarke's Brown on Usages and Customs, this improper use of the word is noticed. In speaking of the custom of merchants, it is said in Section 13: "So far as it has been judicially ascertained and established, so far as it has become the acknowledged law of the land, it has, it seems to us, ceased to deserve the name of custom, just as much as gavelkind or borough-English. . . . The usages of particular trades, when not restricted to some particular limits, but extended to the realm at large, cannot with propriety be considered as customs in the technical sense of that term. A usage of immemorial observance, which has received judicial sanction, becomes part of the general law of England. These seem to us to be undeserving of the appellation customs.

Custom seems to us to be applicable to the law before it has been recognized as law."

In Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh (Va.) 632; 30 Am. Dec. 510, it was said: "In England, where they have particular customs, the custom of the county in which the land lies is as much the law of that county, as the common law is the law of the other parts of the country, where they have no such particular custom. The particular custom prevents the application of the common law to the county or district in which the custom prevails, by showing that the common law, as to this subject, never had any existence in that county or district."

In Scales v. Key, 11 Ad. & El. 819; 39 E. C. L. 240, it was held that a custom, proved to have existed from time immemorial till 1689, must be taken to exist still, if there is no further evidence proving or disproving its existence. "There are three ways in which the custom might be gotten rid of: First, by act of Parliament. Secondly, according to the constitution of the city of London, by act of the common council. Thirdly, if there were acts shown to have been done since 1689, sometimes according to the custom, and sometimes contrary to it, that would be evidence for a jury that the custom had not existed down to the present period. That has not been shown here; and the custom is not to be destroyed because there are no instances of the practice since 1689."

So in Hammerton v. Honey, 24 W. R. 603, it was said that as a custom is a local law, it cannot be gotten rid of except by statute; but long continued non-usage is strong evidence of the custom never having existed.

practice in Kent is known as the custom of gavelkind,¹ but it has long since ceased to be a mere custom ; it has become the law of Kent. It is recognized as a law by itself because it is different from, and contrary to, the general law of England. Hence in this case, it may be stated that a custom may be contrary to the general law ; and, in so far as the word custom refers to the custom of gavelkind, the statement is correct, because while it is a valid custom it is contrary to the general law. But, as we will observe in a succeeding paragraph, customs that are contrary to the general law are void.² A custom, as of gavelkind, is contrary to the general law and is valid ; but a custom, as of agents or of vendors, contrary to the general law, is on that account void. There thus appear to be contradictory rules,³ but the contradiction arises only because we use the word custom, in the first instance, in the sense of the law of Kent, and, in the second instance, to mean a business mode of dealing or usage. We must therefore decide in which sense we shall use the word, and then use it only in that sense, if we are to keep clear of confusion.

In Green v. Reg., L. R., 1 App. Cas. 513, it was held that as a rule, existing customs or rights are not to be taken away by mere general words in an act of parliament. "But without words especially abrogating them, they may be abrogated by plain directions to do something which is wholly inconsistent with them. And this may be the case though the act is a private act of Parliament, and though the particular custom may have been confirmed, years before, by a verdict in a court of law."

1. 1 Bl. Com., pp. 66, 67.

2. See infra, this title, A Usage Must Not Be Contrary to Law.

3. The failure to distinguish between these two uses of the word has caused Mr. Lawson, in his work on Usages and Customs, § 225 et seq., much difficulty in reconciling the decisions upon the subject ; and indeed they cannot be reconciled if the different meanings are not regarded. Mr. Lawson says in section 225 : "It was no objection to a common-law custom that it was contrary to the common law of the land ; otherwise the customs of gavelkind or borough-English, which are directly opposed to the law of descent ; the custom of Kent, which is inconsistent with the law of escheats, and many other customs in conflict with common-law rules or maxims, could not have been recognized. In general, too, evidence of a usage of trade is not inadmissible because it is contrary to the principles of law governing such cases ; for it is obvious that if proof of a usage could be rejected because it established something different from the law, no custom would ever be proved, because if it were not different, it would be a part of the law." And in section 226 : "This being so plain, it is somewhat startling to find a large number of cases in the reports in which the principle is broadly laid down that a usage or custom in opposition to an established rule of law is void and of no effect. In Eager v. Atlas Ins. Co., 14 Pick. (Mass.) 141 ; 35 Am. Dec. 363, Wilde, J., said : 'Now, it seems to me very clear that no particular usage opposed to the established principles of law can be sustained.' In Warren v. Franklin Ins. Co., 104 Mass. 518, Chapman, C. J., said : 'This being the rule of law as to damages, the custom of a particular port could not vary it.' In Bargett v. Orient Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 385, Bosworth, J., said : 'No usage can exist or be proved by which the liabilities of parties to a written contract will be greater or less than the settled law of the state has adjudged them to be.' In Schieffelin v. Harvey, Anth. N. P. (N. Y.) 76, Thompson, J., said : 'The established principles of law cannot be controlled by custom.' In Minnesota Cent. R. Co. v. Morgan, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 217, Miller, J., said : 'No custom can be established which contravenes a well-settled principle of law.' In Raisin v. Clark, 41 Md. 158 ; 20 Am. Rep. 66,

There is also in some parts of England the custom of borough-English, by which the youngest son inherits the estate of his father in preference to all his elder brothers; and there are several other customs in different counties, which have become the law of those particular localities.¹

5. How the Words Are Used in this Article.—It is thus apparent that the word "custom" is used in two senses: one as meaning a local law, as the custom of gavelkind; the other as meaning a modern usage of trade. In discussing the local laws of England and the local common-law customs, the word "custom" is alone appropriate, and should be exclusively used. On the other hand, when the modern methods of business dealing—usages—are

Miller, J., said: 'A usage in contravention of a well-settled and salutary rule of law cannot be sustained by courts of justice.'

1. See BOROUGH-ENGLISH, vol. 2, p. 480.

In Clements v. Scudamore, 1 P. Wms. 63, it was held that in pleading a special custom, the nature of it must be set forth, but not so of borough-English, or any custom which the law regards. "Wherever this custom of borough-English has obtained, the youngest son is there placed in the room of the eldest, who inherits by the common law; and there is no difference in the course of descents, but that the custom prefers the youngest son, and the common law the eldest. All the lands in England were at first and before the conquest, in nature of gavelkind, and descended equally to all the issue. The common law takes notice of these customs of gavelkind and borough-English."

The Pennsylvania Cases.—The Pennsylvania cases distinguish more sharply than any others between the meaning of the words "custom" and "usage." In these cases "custom" is generally used as signifying a local law; very much as borough-English was a local law in England; a "custom" is required to possess the common-law attributes, such as that it must be so ancient "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." "Usages" are restricted to what may be more plainly called "modern usages of trade;" but the distinction is not always closely observed.

In Hursh v. North, 40 Pa. St. 241, to avoid the bar of the Statute of Limitations, the court below admitted evidence to show a usage or practice of the plaintiffs to sell on credit without such terms being expressed. The appellate court said: "It was not pretended that any general custom existed in the country to this effect, or any special custom affecting either the particular locality or trade. A custom is something which has the force and effect of law; is law by the usage and consent of the people. But it must be uniform and universal within the sphere of its action, and so ancient 'that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.' 1 Bl. Com. 68-74; Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 212; Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts (Pa.) 179. It was nothing like that which the plaintiff's testimony tended to prove. If it had been, it will be conceded that the custom would have been the law of the contract, and both parties would have been bound by it. It was not this, however, which the testimony was offered to prove, but the practice and usage of the firm in regard to giving credit. Now, as this was not good, as a custom, according to the definitions, it did not, ex proprio vigore, bind."

In Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sander-son, 94 Pa. St. 302; 39 Am. Rep. 785, which was an action for damages for injuries to property caused by water pumped from a mine, the court said of the defendant: "It could not justify its action on the ground that the customary mode of disposing of water, pumped from mines in the coal regions, was to allow it to follow into the adjacent natural water-courses, as such usage lacked the necessary age to establish a general custom, and such a custom would not only be unreasonable, but unlawful. As a general custom, it lacks the necessary age, for the beginning of deep coal mining, in the regions above named, is quite within the memory of men yet living. Wanting this, it fails in a particular essential to the establishment of such custom."

In Jones v. Wagner, 66 Pa. St. 430; 5 Am. Rep. 385, it was said that a usage under consideration, we may either use the word "custom" or "usage;" for in this connection the two words are synonymous. In reading this article these distinctions should be kept in view. In the succeeding paragraphs treating of the older English law, the word "custom" is alone used. In the larger portion of the article, relating to the modern usages of trade, the words "custom" and "usage" are employed as synonymous.

II. CUSTOMS IN THE OLDER LAW.—Customs are said to be: First, general, or those which prevail throughout the whole kingdom, country, or state; and Second, particular, or those which prevail in a particular place or among a particular class.

1. General Customs—The Common Law.—Such customs are said to regulate the procedure of courts, the rights of persons under contracts, the acquisition and transfer of property, the determination of criminal acts, and many other legal rights, remedies, and obligations. Recognized and adopted by courts of justice, these customs became rules of universal application and force, and all men are conclusively presumed to know them.¹ The decisions of to mine without the observance of the duty to provide support for the surface above, must have been so ancient and uniform in the region in which the property is situated, as to amount to a custom or usage capable of controlling the rule of the common law cited above, and of becoming the law itself. One element of such a custom would be, that it is so ancient "that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." This could not be, and was hardly pretended of the locality in question.

In Corcoran v. Chess, 131 Pa. St. 356, the plaintiff alleged, and called witnesses to show, a custom that mason work was to be measured by the rule contended for by him. The court said: "The evidence, however, failed to prove any such custom. It was at most a mere usage of the trade, neither ancient nor general enough to acquire the force of custom. Had there been such a custom, the parties must be presumed to have known of it, and to have contracted in view of it. In other words, the law would write such custom into their contract. It is not so with a mere usage of trade, recent in its date and not general in its application. The parties cannot be presumed to have contracted upon the faith, and with knowledge, actual or constructive, on the part of the defendants, of such usage; and their acquiescence therein must be shown before they can be affected by it."

In Ulmer v. Farnsworth, 80 Me. 500, the court said: "It requires the citation of no authorities to show that to give a custom the force of law, among other things, it must be universal and its origin in point of time so far back 'that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.' This custom is at best but a local one and is confined to 'a particular business or employment,' and so recent in its origin that its beginning is within the memory of some of the witnesses."

In Nolte v. Hill, 36 Ohio St. 186, it was said that although the terms "custom" and "usage" are frequently used as synonymous, this is a confusion liable to lead into grave error. "Custom is the thing to be proved; usage is the evidence of it. A custom when properly established has the force and effect of law as between the parties, and it is as improper to ask a witness what is the custom as it would be to ask him what is the law. The witness may testify as to what is in fact the usage, and as to all the circumstances and incidents, but it is for the court to determine as a question of law, whether such usage shall have the force and effect of a custom." And see also Ackerman v. Shelp, 8 N. J. L. 125; Allen v. Stevens, 29 N. J. L. 509; Stevens v. Paterson, etc., R. Co., 34 N. J. L. 532; 3 Am. Rep. 269; Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh (Va.) 632; 30 Am. Dec. 510; Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457. 1 Bl. Com. 73.

judges upon these customs, together with the writings of the old authors of repute, are the evidence of the common law.¹

A discussion of these general customs would be a discussion of the established principles of the common law, and would therefore be entirely beyond the scope of this article.

2. Particular Customs—a. IMPORTANCE OF AND RULES GOVERNING PARTICULAR CUSTOMS.—Nor are the particular customs of the older English law of much practical importance to us. These local customs were the outgrowth of peculiar conditions of life, especially of the feudal system of land tenure. Many of the customs related to the rights of common for the recreation of the people, the pasture of cattle, etc. Others pertained to ancient methods of business as practised by the guilds of the larger towns. But although these local customs are in themselves of no value to us, the legal rules governing them have had a direct influence upon the development of the modern law of usages, and it is therefore necessary for us briefly to consider them. They are set forth by Blackstone,² who says that to make particular customs good they must be ancient.³ He says too that such customs, to be good,

1. Chiefly Glanville, Bracton, Britton, Fleta, Hengham, Littleton, Statute, Brooke, Fitzherbert, Staundford and Coke; 1 Bl. Com. 72. See Crabbe's and Reeve's Histories of Common Law.

2. 1 Bl. Com. 76, etc.

The reader will bear in mind that these rules are mentioned at this point only in connection with common-law customs, and out of respect to the usual method of discussing the subject. The rules relating to usages of trade will be found at length, infra.

3. A custom must be ancient; that is, it must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. If it can be shown to have commenced, it is void as a custom. Of course, it must have had a beginning, but if its beginning can be discovered, then the individual who originated the custom can be ascertained, and one man will be the maker of the law, which is impossible. But if there is no evidence of its beginning, it will be presumed to have existed during the whole period of legal record. 1 Bl. Com. 76. The time "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary" has been judicially determined to mean the year A. D. 1189, the beginning of the reign of King Richard the First. As America was not discovered at that time, no custom which requires immemoriality to establish it can exist here. In Ocean Beach Asso- ciation v. Brinley, 34 N. J. Eq. 438, it is said: "The first requisite of a good custom is that it shall have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. For which reason no custom can prevail against an express act of Parliament, since the statute itself is a proof of a time when such custom did not exist. 1 Bl. Com. 76; Bac. Abr., tit. 'Custom,' A. Customs similar to those of gavelkind and borough-English, cannot exist here, for they cannot have the antiquity necessary to their validity." Ackerman v. Shelp, 8 N. J. L. 125; Allen v. Stevens, 29 N. J. L. 509.

In Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh (Va.) 632; 30 Am. Dec. 510, it is said: "Any practice or usage, however general, introduced into this country since its settlement, and in opposition to the common law, can have no force on the ground of custom, because it lacks the essential ingredient of a good custom—it is not immemorial." And in Delaplaine v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457, it was said: "That a custom, to displace the common law, must be immemorial, and that the time of legal memory runs back to the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion, are maxims of such ancient, universal, and familiar acceptance in the English law that it is now quite too late to controvert their correctness. It has been made the subject of regret and complaint that the time of legal memory was not shortened by the courts of law, upon the same reason which led to the reduction of the period of limitation, yet that it remained unchanged is everywhere conceded. This court has disaffirmed the existence of any customary law in Virginia." For an interesting account of the origin and history of "legal memory," see the note to Cassidy v. Stewart, 2 M. & G. 437.

1. A Custom Must Be Continued.—"If a custom ceased and recommenced, its new beginning would be within the memory of man. But an interruption which is to prove valid as against a custom, must be an actual interruption of the usage, and not simply an interruption of the possession of the right." 1 Bl. Com. 77.

In Clarke's Browne on Usages and Customs, § 16, it is said, following Blackstone: "One of the common illustrations will make this clear. If the inhabitants of a parish have a customary right to water their cattle at a certain pool, a mere discontinuance of the practice for ten years would not destroy the custom, although it would add to the difficulties of proving its existence. If, however, the right be discontinued for a single day, that would prove the non-existence of any asserted custom analogous with the right."

2. A custom must be compulsory, otherwise it loses the imperative character of law; that is, when it is established as a custom, it must be binding upon all, and not left to the option of every man whether he will conform to it or not. A custom that all the inhabitants shall be rated toward the maintenance of a bridge will be good; but a custom that every man is to contribute thereto at his own pleasure is idle and absurd, and indeed no custom at all. 1 Bl. Com. 78; Lawson's Usages and Customs, § 11; Clarke's Brown on Usages and Customs, § 28.

3. Customs Must Be Consistent With Each Other.—One custom cannot be set up in opposition to another. For if both are really customs, then both are of equal antiquity and both established by mutual consent. If two customs are contradictory, it is evident that they cannot both have been established by mutual consent. 1 Bl. Com. 78.

The allegation of one custom is not to be met by the allegation of another custom, inconsistent with the first, but rather by the denial of the existence of the first as a custom. Clarke's Brown, § 28. If one man alleges that by custom he has the right to have windows looking into another's garden, the other cannot claim a right by custom to stop up or obstruct those windows; for these two contradictory customs cannot both be good, nor both stand together. He ought rather to deny the existence of the former custom. 1 Bl. Com. 76. The cases upon this point are Aldred's Case, 9 Rep. 58 b; Kenchin v. Knight, 1 Wils. 253; Parkin v. Radcliffe, 1 B. & P. 282.

4. A Custom Must Be Certain.—Thus, a custom that land shall descend to the most worthy of the owner's blood is void; for how shall this worth be determined? A custom to pay two pence an acre in lieu of title is good; but a custom to pay sometimes two pence and sometimes three pence, as the occupier of the land pleases, is bad for its uncertainty. Dane's Abr., ch. 26, § 5; Millechamp v. Johnson, Wilses 205; Bell v. Wardell, Wilses 202; Steel v. Houghton, 1 H. Bl. 51; Rex v. Ecclesfield, 1 B. & Ald. 360; Lloyd v. Jones, 12 Jur. 657; 17 L. J. C. P. 206; 6 C. B. 81; Selby v. Robinson, 2 T. R. 758; Tanistry's Case, Dav. 32; Blewett v. Tregonning, 3 Ad. & El. 554; 30 E. C. L. 151; Wilkes v. Broadbent, 1 Wils. 63; Salisbury v. Gladstone, 9 H. L. Cas. 692; Wilson v. Wilses, 7 East 121; Clayton v. Corby, 5 Q. B. 415; 48 E. C. L. 413; Peppin v. Shakespear, 6 T. R. 748; Duberley v. Page, 2 T. R. 391; Valentine v. Penny, Noy 145; Dean of Ely v. Warren, 2 Atk. 189; Hayward v. Cunningham, 1 Lev. 231; Hayward v. Cunningham, 1 Sid. 354; Manchester v. Vale, 1 Saund. 28.

5. A Custom Must Be Acquiesced in.—Not subject to contention and dispute. For as customs owe their origin to common consent, their being immemorially disputed is a proof that such consent was wanting. 1 Bl. Com. 77.

6. A Custom Must Be Reasonable.—Or rather it must not be unreasonable; which is not always, as Sir Edward Coke says, to be understood of every unlearned man's reason, but of artificial and legal reason. 1 Bl. Com. 77; Clayton v. Corby, 5 Q. B. 415; 48 E. C.

b. MANOR CUSTOMS—CITY OF LONDON CUSTOMS.—In the English reports there are also found many particular customs of manors, in regard to the respective rights of landlord and tenants, rights of pasturage, etc.¹ Besides these there were a large number of local customs of the city of London, relating to a great variety of matters. None of these are of particular importance to the American lawyer, but from a historical standpoint some of them are interesting. This is especially so with some of the customs Bloom*, 3 Wils. 458; cases in Dane's Abridg., ch. 36, art. 2, § 1; Salisbury v. Gladstone, 9 H. L. Cas. 692, an important case; Bishop of Winchester v. Knight, 1 P. Wms. 406; Dean of Ely v. Warren, 2 Atk. 189; Hix v. Gardiner, 1 Bulst. 195; Drake v. Wigglesworth, Wills 654; Winchester v. Willies, 11 Mod. 48; Taylor v. Devey, 7 Ad. & El. 409; 34 E. C. L. 131; Rockey v. Huggins, Cro. Car. 220; Vaughan v. Atwood, 1 Mod. 202.

A custom may be good, though the particular reason of it cannot be assigned. Thus, a custom in a parish that no man shall put his beasts into the common until the third day of October, would be good; and yet, it would be hard to show the reason why that day in particular is fixed upon rather than the day before or after. Smith v. Tyson. 1 P. & D. 307; 1 N. & P. 784; 9 Ad. & El. 408, is an instructive case upon this subject. The court of exchequer chamber held not unreasonable a custom for all victuallers to erect booths on a common, parcel of the waste of a manor, selected by the lord for holding fairs yearly, and to place posts and tables there, during a certain period of every year. Tindal, C. J., said: "To give validity to a custom, which has been well described to be 'an usage which obtains the force of law, and is in truth the binding law within a particular district, or at a particular place, of the persons and things which it concerns' (see Le Case de Tanistry, Davy's Rep. 32), it must be certain, reasonable, immemorial, and continued without interruption. Of these requisites the only one which is brought in question now is, whether the custom is reasonable or not. . . . A custom is not unreasonable merely because it is contrary to a particular maxim or rule of the common law, as the custom of gavelkind and borough-English, which are directly contrary to the law of descent, or the custom of Kent, which is contrary to the law of escheats; nor is a custom unreasonable because it is prejudicial to the interests of a private man, if it be for the benefit of the commonwealth, as the custom to turn the plough upon the headland of another, in favor of husbandry; or to dry nets on the land of another, in favor of fishing, and for the benefit of navigation. But a custom that is contrary to the public good, or injurious or prejudicial to the many, and beneficial only to some particular person, is repugnant to the law of reason, for it could not have had a reasonable commencement."

So in Salisbury v. Gladstone, 9 H. L. Cas. 692, it was said: "When it is said that a custom is void because it is unreasonable, nothing more is meant than that the unreasonable character of the alleged custom conclusively proves that the usage, even though it may have existed immemorially, must have resulted from accident or indulgence, and not from any right conferred in ancient times on the party setting up the custom."

1. As an instance of the customs in regard to tithes, see Clarke v. Clarke, 2 Y. & C. 245, where the court decided that the reasonableness of setting out every tenth turnip instead of tenth heap of turnips for the parson, must depend upon whether, by that mode of of the city of London, from which may be traced several branches of our present common law.¹

III. THE NATURE AND CHARACTERISTICS OF USAGES—1. Distinctions Between Usages and Technical Customs—a. USAGE A MODE OF DEALING.—Reference has been made to the fact that the word "custom" in its strict technical sense means a law, whereas "usage" is a mode of dealing; and that this technical meaning of the word "custom" must not be confused with its other meaning as synonymous with the word "usage." This distinction will be made still clearer by reference to the extracts in the note.²

Various customs of manors are mentioned in these cases: Gard v. Callard, 6 M. & S. 69; Richardson v. Capes, 4 D. & R. 512; Richardson v. Walker, 4 D. & R. 498; *Cort v. 2. In Hammerton v. Honey, 24 W. R. 603, Jessell, M. R., said: "Now, what is a custom? A custom, as I understand it, is local common law. It is common law because it is not statute law; it is local law because it is a law of a particular place as distinguished from the general common law. Now, what is the meaning of local common law? Local common law, like general common law, is the law of the country as it existed before the time of legal memory, which is generally considered the time of Richard I. Therefore, when people allege a custom, they allege that which they call a custom as having been the law of the place before the time of legal memory."

In Robinson v. Mollett, L. R., 7 H. L. 802, Baron Cleasby said: "These usages of trade must not be confounded with local customs or usages connected with land, or the various rights belonging to it, or with modes of election to public offices, and matters of that nature. These have the force of law independent of persons consenting to them, and they are fixed and certain and cannot be changed. But the usages of what is called the London tallow market have no legal obligation, except so far as persons expressly or impliedly consent to them."

In Hall v. Nottingham, 1 Exch. Div. 1, Cleasby, B., said: "I believe the proper meaning of the word 'custom,' as applied to a matter of this description, is something that has the effect of a local law."

"This distinction, indeed, between the general custom of merchants, which is part of the law of the realm, and the particular usages of certain particular businesses, was not, it seems, so clearly marked in former times as it is now; thus we find Buller, Justice, saying, 2 T. R., p. 73, that, 'Within the last thirty years (his lordship spoke in 1787) the commercial law of this country has taken a very different turn from what it did before. Before that period we find that, in courts of law,

b. USAGE NEED NOT BE ANCIENT.—A custom in its sense of law was required to be so ancient that “the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.” A usage, however, need only be old enough to be well established in the trade or place.¹ The all the evidence in mercantile cases was thrown together; they were left generally to a jury, and produced no established principle. From that time we all know the great study has been to find some certain general principles which shall be known to all mankind; not only to rule the particular case then under consideration, but to serve as a guide for the future.” Note to Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 2 Smith’s Lead. Cas. 594.

1. In Sleight v. Hartshorne, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 531, Chancellor Kent said: “Where the term ‘usages of trade’ is made use of, it admits of an application, either to the general usages of trade which compose the law of merchants, of universal authority among commercial men in civilized societies, and forming one of the constituent parts of the laws of this state, as the general law of the land, or to usages of local origin, or prevailing in a particular branch of trade. The former are considered in the nature of those positive laws of which every member of the community is presumed to be connasant, and which are resorted to as known and established tests of contracts in all cases arising under them. The other depends upon the usage of the persons engaged in the traffic to which they apply, the knowledge of which is not legally imposed on the community, but derives its binding force from the supposed knowledge of the persons engaged in that particular species of traffic, at the place, or in the trade in which it obtains. The latter may be proved by witnesses.”

In Cole v. Skrainka, 37 Mo. App. 427, it was held that a usage of trade, defining the meaning of a term or expression, need not be ancient; it is sufficient, if it has existed for such time as to establish an intention, on the part of the contracting parties, to use the expression in the sense thus defined. “In regard to the objection, that the usage was not sufficiently long continued to create a custom, it might be observed that the evidence tends to show that the usage is as old as the adoption of the eight-inch block pavement in controversy, and no usage can be older than the thing to which it refers. This is not a question of custom by which third parties are sought to be charged but the question of the meaning of a term employed by the contracting parties. If the meaning of the term was well understood between the contracting parties, it is immaterial whether such usage was one day or one thousand years old.”

In Rindskoff v. Barrett, 14 Iowa 101, it was said: “Mr. Parsons says, and truly, that the word embraces very many degrees of the same meaning. One extreme is that ancient, universal and well-established custom, which is in fact, law. The other is a manner of doing a particular thing in a small neighborhood, or by a small class of men, for a few years. Whatever it is, if it falls within the reason of the rule which makes it a part of the contract, it amounts to a custom. If established, the length of its duration is not very material.”

In Blin v. Mayo, 10 Vt. 56; 33 Am. Dec. 175, it is said that by the usages and customs of business is not understood to be meant such customs as, from their long continuance, have become part of the common law, but such customs and usages as are generally regarded and adopted by the persons doing business in the vicinity, and with reference to which contracts are made.

In 2 Parsons on Contracts, p. 540, it is said: “It is obvious that the word ‘custom’ is used in many senses, or rather that it embraces very many different degrees of the same meaning. By it may be understood, either that ancient and universal, and perfectly established custom, which is in fact law; or only a manner of doing some particular thing, in a small neighborhood, or by a small class of men, for a few years; or any measure of the same kind of meaning within these two extremes.” See also Cooper v. Berry, 21 Ga. 526; Smith v. Rice, 56 Ala. 417; Wall v. East River Ins. Co., 3 Duer (N. Y.) 264; Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (U. S.) 539; Buford v. Tucker, 44 Ala. 89; Carlisle v. Wallace, 12 Ind. 252; 72 Am. Dec. 207; Alabama, etc., Rivers R. Co. v. Ridd, 35 Ala. 209; Hall v.

only requirement for its validity in this respect is its existence long enough to be generally known, so that contracts are made in reference to it.¹

2. The Basis of Their Legal Force.—The fundamental principle upon which the entire law of usage is based is that a usage becomes a part of the contracts of parties. It is only on this account that a usage has any legal effect. The whole theory of usages rests upon the presumption that parties, in making a contract, do so with the intention that the usages of the place or trade should be regarded as part of the contract. It is as a part of a contract that a usage is to be judged.²

Storrs, 7 Wis. 253; Newbold v. Wright, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 195.

1. In Thompson v. Hamilton, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 426; 23 Am. Dec. 619, it was argued that the usage was not ancient; the court said that was immaterial. The question is, whether the parties contracted with reference to it, and in this view, the fact of its being well established, so as to be generally known to persons engaged in this course of business, is of importance, but not its antiquity.

In Sewell v. Corp., 1 C. & P. 392; 11 E. C. L. 432, the plaintiff, a veterinary surgeon, sued for attendance and medicines furnished to the defendant's horse. A witness was asked whether to his knowledge it was the custom to pay veterinary surgeons for attendance as well as medicines. It was objected by the defendant's counsel that this could not constitute a custom, being modern. Best, C. J., said: "They do not mean a custom whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; but if there is a general usage applicable to a particular profession, parties employing an individual in that profession are supposed to deal with him according to that usage. You may cross-examine as to the extent of that usage. With respect to veterinary surgeons, I know of no law that applies to them particularly. If there is no contract, they must go on a quantum meruit. There is a usage for a broker to have commission. If there is a usage here, it is evidence to regulate the claim."

In Williams v. Gilman, 5 Me. 276, the court said: "The counsel for the defendant treated this usage among printers and booksellers as a custom, such as we find described in our law-books, and have contended that, to be valid, it must have existed for time immemorial, uninterrupted, definite, reasonable, etc. We apprehend that the law of local customs is not applicable in this case. The usage relied on has nothing local in its nature; it relates to a certain class of people spread through the country, and to the peculiar business in which they are employed."

In 2 Greenl. on Ev. (15th ed.) 251, it is said that in regard to the usages of trade, it is not necessary that they should have existed immemorially; it is sufficient if they be established, known, certain, uniform, reasonable, and not contrary to law.

In Smith v. Wright, 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 43; 2 Am. Dec. 162, it was said that the usage has been against the allowance of average to goods placed on the deck of a vessel. "This is proved to be the case, from the testimony of several insurance brokers and merchants, of long standing among us; some of whom carry it back as far as thirty years; a period, however, too short, it is said, to establish a usage. The true test of a commercial usage is its having existed a sufficient length of time to have become generally known, and to warrant a presumption that contracts are made in reference to it."

2. In Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. (Va.) 493; 18 Am. Dec. 726, it was said: "An established usage (says Chief Justice Gibbs, in Lucas v. Dorrien, 2 Com. L. Rep. 105), constitutes the common understanding of parties in their dealings; and on the foot of that common understanding, they are supposed to contract."

In Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704; 55 Am. Dec. 374, it was said that customs are at most but a part and parcel of the contract and are only binding because they are a part of the contract.

In Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 37, it was said that the theory of the law of usage rests upon the presumption, that in certain transactions the parties did not intend to expressly stipulate the whole of the contract by which they designed to be bound, but that they intended to contract with reference to the known usages upon the subject, and that those usages were to be regarded as part of the contract.

In Walker v. Barron, 6 Minn. 508, it was held that proof of particular customs is generally allowed to aid courts and juries in arriving at the intention of parties, when they perform acts or make contracts that are susceptible of more than one meaning. It is to place the court in the position occupied by the party, and surround it with the same influence that operated or might have operated upon him when acting. "It is only because the custom is supposed to have influenced the parties who act within the sphere of its operation that it is admissible at all."

In Schooner Reeside, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 567, Story, J., said: "The true and appropriate office of a usage or custom is, to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intentions of parties, and to ascertain the nature and extent of their contracts, arising not from express stipulations, but from mere implications and presumptions, and acts of a doubtful or equivocal character. It may also be admitted to ascertain the true meaning of a particular word, or of particular words in a given instrument, when the word or words have various senses, some common, some qualified, and some technical, according to the subject-matter to which they are applied."

In Linsley v. Lovely, 26 Vt. 123, it was held that the office of a usage is strictly one of exposition, and is allowable to be given in evidence as one means of arriving at the intention of the parties; and can never be received to thwart it, when it is clearly and fully expressed.

In Van Hoesen v. Cameron, 54 Mich. 609, it was held that parties contracting are supposed to do so with reference to the known usages and customs which enter into and govern the subject-matter to which the contract relates, and all contracts made in the ordinary course of business, without particular stipulations to the contrary, are presumed to be made in reference to the usages and customs which exist.

In Branch v. Palmer, 65 Ga. 210, a draft was drawn, with bill of lading attached, when the cotton was shipped on the cars, and the court allowed evidence to show that such was the universal custom of the trade. "Our own code embodies the substance of the common law, as construed by our own earlier decisions on the doctrine in respect to customs of this sort, and the effect thereof upon contracts. Section 4 of the code declares, under paragraph 1, which is on the subject of 'Laws of Force in this State,' that, 'The custom of any business or trade shall be binding only when it is of such universal practice as to justify the conclusion that it became by implication a part of the contract.' So that it will be seen that the custom of a trade is admissible, not as ordinary parol evidence, but as law, entering into the contract just as any other law does. It is not dependent on the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to vary a writing, nor inconsistent therewith, but upon the ground that the law makes the custom part of the contract, and when the custom is so universal as to become the law of the trade, it becomes by implication a part of the contract, and the contract is to be construed thereby, just the same as if it had been inserted therein."

In McCulsky v. Klosterman, 20 Oregon 108, it was said: "In all contracts as to the subject-matter of which known usages prevail, the parties proceed on the tacit assumption of such usages, but commonly reduce into writing the particulars of their agreement, but omit to specify those known usages which are included as of course by mutual understanding."

In Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33; 29 Am. Rep. 349, it was held that where there is a well-known usage which obtains in trade, it will be presumed that all who engage in that business, where it prevails, contract with a view to it, unless they exclude the presumption by their contract.

In McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264, it was held that a custom so long persisted in as to be known and practiced by a community, is the law of the particular business in which it exists; and the presumption arises that it is in the view of parties who contract about its subject-matter.

In Johnson v. Concord R. Co., 46 N. H. 213; 88 Am. Dec. 199, it was said that if the usage had ceased at the time the contract was made, the reason of the rule as to usage fails; a contract is not ordinarily deemed to have been made with reference to an abolished usage.

This idea runs through all the cases, and will be found to be present in the extracts in the notes to every division of this article.

3. Usage Cannot Create a Contract.—A usage presupposes a contract to which the usage relates. The office of the usage is to show the true meaning of the parties in making their contract. It is only in connection with contracts that usages can exist. It is, therefore, held that a usage can only apply to a contract previously existing; usage cannot of itself create a contract. Usage, in other words, cannot make a contract where there is none. It cannot of itself establish a liability, or prove the existence of a contractual relation. Hence, before offering evidence of a usage, it is necessary to prove the existence of the contract to which the usage is sought to be attached; and if there is no such contract, the usage is irrelevant.¹

4. Irrelevant if Not in Minds of Parties.—Inasmuch as a usage derives its effect from the fact that it enters into and becomes

In North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co., 1 Fed. Rep. 522, the court said that a rule or custom of miners must not only be established or enacted, but must be in force at the time and place of the location. "It does not, like a statute, acquire validity by the mere enactment, but from customary obedience and acquiescence of the miners. It is void whenever it falls into disuse, or is generally disregarded."

In Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consolidated Min. Co., 11 Fed. Rep. 666, it was similarly held, that to be of any validity, a rule or custom of miners must not only be established or enacted, but must be in force at the time and place of the location. It ceases to be operative whenever it falls into disuse, or is generally disregarded.

1. In Harper v. Calhoun, 7 How. (Miss.), 203, it appeared that it was customary for the bank in that case to take assignments of stock in payment of debts; but the court held that the existence of this custom did not amount to a contract. "The custom of a bank may be proven for the purpose of interpreting a contract, but it is no evidence to establish one, when an express contract would be necessary."

In Leach v. Perkins, 17 Me. 462; 35 Am. Dec. 268, the court said that usage may be admitted to explain the intention of the parties in making a contract, but it is not to be received to establish the right, or to prove the origin of the relation, by which the parties become responsible to each other.

In Ulmer v. Farnsworth, 80 Me. 500, the plaintiffs were the owners of a lime quarry in which they had a pump, used to drain their quarry from water accumulating therein. The defendant owned another quarry adjacent to the plaintiffs', there being one quarry between them. It was alleged that water accumulated in the defendant's quarry, and running through the one intervening, came upon that of the plaintiffs and was pumped up by them. It was to recover compensation for this service that this action was brought, the plaintiffs alleging that the defendant received benefit from it, as it prevented the injurious accumulation of water in his own quarry. The court said: "The plaintiffs rely upon an alleged custom or usage in that neighborhood by which, under like circumstances, the parties receiving this incidental benefit have recognized a liability to pay a certain specified sum. It is claimed that this usage of itself raises an implied promise on the part of the defendant. But usage or custom cannot be received to establish a liability, or to prove the origin of the relation by which the parties became responsible to each other. Such a usage may have an application to a contract previously existing, but cannot of itself create one."

In Bowe v. Hyland, 44 Minn. 88, it was held, in reference to a usage in connection with the renting of farms, that before evidence could be given to show the custom of renting farms upon shares in the locality in which this one was situated, it was incumbent to show that the farm had been rented in this part of the contract of the parties, it is apparent that if the parties did not, in fact, contract with reference to the usage, it cannot be invoked as a part of the contract.¹ A fortiori, if the way. Evidence of a usage or custom cannot be received to establish the making or existence of a contract. It can only have an application to a contract previously existing.

In Moore v. Eason, 11 Ired. (N. Car.) 568, which was an action of ejectment by a landlord against the tenant, the defendant, in order to show that the tenancy had expired at the alleged demise, offered to prove that it was the general usage in the locality for all leases to expire on December 31st. The court said the evidence was admissible not to establish a contract, but to add an incident to it. "Parol evidence may be admitted to show a custom or usage of a place, where a contract is entered into for the purpose of annexing incidents to, and explaining the meaning of terms used in it. But before the incident can be annexed, the contract itself, as made, must be proved. The incident cannot be used to establish the contract."

In Tilley v. Chicago, 103 U. S. 155, it appeared that the authorities of Chicago offered prizes for the best plan of a public building about to be erected. The plaintiff was awarded one of the prizes and was paid the amount. There was no further contract between the parties. The plans thus paid for were subsequently adopted for the building, but were not used. The plaintiff sued for superintending the construction of the building, alleging that by the usage of architects, in the absence of a special contract, the superintendence of the construction of a building belonged to the architect whose plans were adopted. The court held that there was no contract whatever between the parties as to superintending the work. "But it was complained that the evidence offered to prove the custom of architects was excluded. We think it was rightly excluded. Proof of usage can be received only to show the intention or understanding of the parties in the absence of a special agreement, or to explain the terms of a written contract. In all cases where evidence of usage is received, the rule must be taken with this qualification: that the evidence be not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the contract. The inference from these principles is inevitable, that unless

In Savings Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, W., an attorney at law employed by C. to examine and report on the latter's title to a lot of ground, gave over his signature, a certificate stating that C.'s title to the lot was good and unincumbered. A savings bank with whom W. had no contract or communication, relying upon this certificate as true, loaned money to C., taking a deed of trust upon the lot as security. It appeared that C. in fact had no title to the lot, a fact which W. could have ascertained by reasonable care in his examination. The money loaned was not paid and C. became insolvent. The savings bank sued W. for the loss sustained. Testimony was introduced tending to show that there is a local usage in the District of Columbia, that the attorney examining the title of an applicant for a loan, shall be considered as also acting for the lender of the money, and complaint was made that the court below did not submit that evidence to the jury, with proper instructions. Evidence of usage is not admissible to contradict, or vary what is clear and unambiguous, or to restrict or enlarge what requires no explanation. But the court held, that where there is no contract, proof of usage will not make one, and it can only be admitted either to interpret the meaning of the language employed by the parties, or where the meaning is equivocal or obscure. And in National Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 692, the court said: "Usage cannot make a contract where there is none." Similarly in Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 679. And see Sanford v. Rawlings, 43 Ill. 92.

1. In McAllister v. Barnes, 35 Mo. App. 668, it was held that evidence of a usage among neighboring merchants, whereby one holding a claim against an individual partner in another firm, and purchasing goods of that firm, would be treated as taking them in liquidation of his claim, with the consent of the other partners, was properly refused when, in the transaction under consideration, there was nothing to show that either party at the time relied upon such usage, or contracted with reference thereto.

party asserting the usage did not know of its existence at the time the contract was made, it cannot be relied upon by him.¹

5. Contract on Subject of Usage Excludes Usage.—If parties make a special contract in relation to a matter which would otherwise be determined by usage, it follows that they intended to exclude the operation of the usage; since otherwise they would not make the special contract. Therefore, whenever it appears that an agreement has been made upon a particular point, and the controversy is as to the terms of that agreement, such terms cannot be shown by proof of the usage respecting them. In other words, the special agreement excludes the usage.²

To render a local usage in a particular market different from the general custom binding on persons dealing in such market, it must appear that they intended to comply with such usage. Lewis v. Metcalf (Kan. 1894), 36 Pac. Rep. 346.

1. In Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Fair, 112 Mass. 354, it appeared that the person attempting to prove the usage did not know of its existence at the time the contract was made. He could not therefore have contracted with reference to it, and cannot take advantage of it. See also Kinne v. Ford, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 194; Dann v. London Brewery Co., L. R., 8 Eq. 155; Mohawk Bank v. Broderick, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 133; 27 Am. Dec. 193.

2. In Windland v. Deeds, 44 Iowa 98, it was held that both parties in that case having alleged the existence of a contract between them, it is not competent to show a usage in the neighborhood where they resided, respecting the matters provided for by the contract.

In Edwards v. Goldsmith, 16 Pa. St. 43, it was held that in an action by a broker, to recover compensation fixed by a special contract to sell certain real estate on ground rent, it was not competent for the defendant to prove the usual rates charged by brokers for services of a like character.

In Main v. Eagle, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 619, it was held that where in an action to recover for work, labor and commissions, on the sale of a ship, there is evidence of an express agreement between the parties, specifying the conditions upon which commissions shall be allowed; it is not competent to prove, that by the usage of brokers, commissions are allowable, although the conditions are not complied with.

In Stebbins v. Brown, 65 Barb. (N.

Y.) 274, which was an action upon an account for board and lodging, it was held not competent to meet evidence on the part of the defendant tending to show an express agreement that absences should be deducted from the charges for board, by proof that it is the custom of hotels not to allow such deductions. The claim of the defendant, as well as his right to the deduction, standing upon the alleged agreement, such agreement, if made, can neither be disposed of, nor altered by proof of custom.

In Smith v. Barringer, 37 Minn. 94, it was held that upon an issue in an action between two real-estate brokers as to whether there was an agreement between them to divide the commissions for a certain sale, evidence of a usage among real-estate brokers, that two making a sale, divide the commissions equally, unless a different arrangement is made, is not admissible.

Other similar cases are Loneragan v. Courtney, 75 Ill. 580; Bowe v. Hyland, 44 Minn. 88.

In Emery v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 138 Mass. 398, it was held that evidence of a usage to require a written application for marine insurance, is incompetent for the purpose of meeting evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to prove an oral contract of insurance. The plaintiff sought to escape from the effect of the provision in the policy, "no risk to be binding until accepted by the company and indorsed herein," by proof of an oral contract; and the defendant, while denying that such an oral contract had been made, sought to confirm its view by calling a witness, familiar with the customs and usages of the business of marine insurance in Boston, and asking him the question, "whether there is any usage as to the matter of making written applications for marine in-

6. Acts of Accommodation or Indulgence. — Usages must be distinguished from mere acts of accommodation or indulgence. Many things are done in the course of trade by way of favor, which cannot be held to constitute a usage entering into the contracts of the parties. The fact that such acts have constantly been done, not in obedience to duty or contract, but as a matter of form, cannot compel their continuance. Thus, a bank may constantly discount a customer's commercial paper, without establishing a binding usage to do so; merchants may accept checks in payment in lieu of cash, or may receive paper currency in lieu of coin, without raising a usage to prevent their insisting upon their legal rights whenever they wish to assert them. None of these acts of accommodation or indulgence can be said to form part of the contract between the parties.¹

insurance." The question was excluded. "The fact that contracts of insurance are usually in writing, and expressed in the form of policies, is a matter of common knowledge, and needs no witness to prove it, and it might have been, and doubtless was, assumed on the trial of the present case. . . . A usage that an oral contract, if made, is considered invalid, would be plainly repugnant to law, and void. In the present case, the evidence of usage was offered, not in aid of the construction of a contract, but to support the position that no contract whatever had been made. . . If a contract had in point of fact been made as alleged, it was of no consequence whether it was according to general usage or not. . . . The plaintiff's case proceeded with a full recognition of the fact that it was necessary for him to show a contract not according to the usual course of the defendant's dealing; and direct testimony was introduced, on both sides, upon the precise point whether an oral contract of insurance had been made or not. There is nothing to show that any restriction was put upon any inquiry as to the defendant's own usage. It is no legitimate confirmation of the defendant's position, under such circumstances, to show that other insurance companies usually require applications for marine insurance to be in writing, as a condition of making the contract. This fact, if proved, would have no legal tendency to show that these parties did not make a contract orally. The plaintiff was not bound in law by such custom, if it existed. Whether other parties were, or were not, in the habit of making their contracts in a particular form, was nothing to him.

An oral contract was lawful; and the evidence was properly confined to the question whether this particular oral contract had been made, as testified by the plaintiff, without going into the general inquiry, whether other parties were accustomed to make such contracts. The issue being whether a particular contract had, or had not, been orally made, as it might lawfully be, evidence that contracts in that form were unusual was not admissible to meet and control evidence that such a contract had in fact been made. To hold otherwise would be to extend the office of a usage beyond any known precedent."

1. In Citizens' Bank v. Grafflin, 31 Md. 507, the court said: "Because the plaintiffs had been constant customers of the bank, which had discounted for them many like drafts, and immediately sent them on for acceptance, was no just reason to compel the bank to pursue a like course in the future. The concession of such a favor, though repeated in sundry instances, ought not to be construed to operate as imposing upon the bank the imperative duty of its constant repetition, and as conferring upon the plaintiffs the absolute right to demand and insist upon its continuance."

In Metcalf v. Weld, 14 Gray (Mass.) 210, the court said: "There are many usages of trade which have nothing to do with the contracts of parties. It is very customary for merchants to pay their debts by checks upon a bank, and this may be very well known to persons who deal with them, and yet no one is bound to receive a check in discharge of a promise to pay money. It may be a custom in some kinds of business to pay workmen in orders for goods; or in goods kept for sale by their employer; or not to pay wages punctually at the time they are due; and the fears or necessities of the laborer may induce him to yield to the custom, and accept payment in a manner, or at a time, convenient to the employer; but it would hardly be contended that such a custom could be regarded in determining the legal effect of a written agreement."

7. Habit Does Not Constitute Usage.—The habit or usual practice of particular persons, or of persons in a particular trade, does not in itself constitute a usage. Habit is not a matter of legal cognizance; it is only when it has grown into a usage, with the essential characteristics of a usage, that it can be considered as such. Habit lacks the generality requisite for a usage, nor can it be said that a mere habit necessarily enters into the contemplation of parties in making their contracts.¹

In Lord v. Burbank, 18 Me. 178, the court said: "However common it may be for persons in receiving payments to waive their strict rights, and make use of a paper currency, the law does not recognize such usage as binding upon any person, and when anyone insists upon his legal right to receive gold and silver only in payment, the law will uphold him in the exercise of that right, although it may appear to be an unexpected exercise of it, and not in conformity to the accustomed course of transacting business between parties in such circumstances."

In Lewis v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 44 Conn. 72, in which a custom was alleged to exist by which the assured were entitled to pay premiums after the specified date, the court said: "All that could be claimed from the custom was, that the company or its agents were in the habit of waiving strict payment at the day in some cases, when there had been no change in the health or condition of the insured. This being so, there would be nothing that would bind the company to waive strict payment in any case, but they would be at liberty in all cases to insist upon strict performance."

In Brent v. Cook, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 268, it was held that the fact that it was the custom of the vendor of goods to wait twelve months with those who made accounts with him for goods, will not be sufficient proof of a contract to do so with a particular individual, especially when it does not show that the purchaser had dealt with the merchant before and knew his custom. "We apprehend that the proof means nothing more than that the appellants were in the habit of indulging their customers for twelve months for the goods purchased by them, and not that there was a mutual implied agreement between them and their customers that the goods were sold and bought upon this credit."

In Norton v. Heywood, 20 Me. 359, it was held that where a contract in relation to land is explicit in its terms, and gives no authority to cut timber thereon, testimony to show that the owner had permitted others, under similar contracts, to cut timber without considering them as trespassers, is inadmissible to prove a license from the owner to cut timber in the case on trial.

In Madden v. Blain, 66 Ga. 49, it was said that for a physician to defend against an action for another physician's services, on the ground of a custom among physicians not to charge each other, it must appear that that custom was of such universal practice as to justify the conclusion that it became, by implication, a part of the contract. "This seems to have been a sort of courtesy among physicians, and not of universal observance, or extending to all cases." See also Somerby v. Tappan, Wright (Ohio) 570; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Boal, 15 Ind. 345; Farlow v. Ellis, 15 Gray (Mass.) 229.

1. In Anewalt v. Hummel, 109 Pa. St. 271, which was an action by a landlord against his tenant to recover the value of certain hay and stubble belonging to the landlord, which the tenant, on entering into possession of the demised farm, had found thereon and converted to his own use, the defendant offered evidence to prove that it was a custom among farmers in the neighborhood to allow the tenants the use of such produce. The testimony was limited to that of four farmers, who testified that such was their practice in dealing with their tenants. Of this testimony the court said: "The evidence of the custom was too weak and inconclusive to submit to the jury. The most that it amounted to was the practice of a very limited number of farmers in dealing with their own tenants, while there were other farmers in the same neighborhood who had never heard of any such practice, and who did not follow it themselves. It needs but a moment's reflection to see that this would not make a custom binding upon the entire farming community in the absence of an express contract upon the subject-matter."

8. Usages Must Be Certain and Uniform.—A usage must be certain and uniform; otherwise it would not afford a safe guide for the

In Fisher v. Campbell, 9 Port. (Ala.) 210, in which a usage was alleged, giving overseers power to make purchases on behalf of their employers, it was proved that it was customary for overseers to purchase things necessary for their farms, etc. "It will scarcely be contended, that such a usage as this exists, so as to have the force of law, and be binding on employers generally; and if not, it proves nothing more than that some planters are in the practice of sanctioning such purchases; but it by no means follows that others, who have not assented to it, are bound by it."

In Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Jay, 61 Ala. 247, it was held that the mere act or habit of a railroad company, in paying for medical services rendered to employes injured in its service, does not necessarily establish a custom of such business; before it can have that effect it must be shown to have been so generally known and so well settled as to raise the presumption that the services were rendered in reference to it.

In Mason's Ben. Soc. v. Baldwin, 86 Ill. 479, it was held that proof that in certain instances known to the witness a forfeiture of insurance policies was not exacted, is not sufficient to show a usage to waive such forfeitures.

In Doughty v. Paige, 48 Iowa 483, it was held that the custom of the attorneys of a certain county to hold themselves responsible for sheriff's fees, in cases wherein they were employed, did not subject an attorney to liability therefor, in the absence of an express agreement, or of proof that the attorneys were accustomed to pay for such services regardless of the responsibility of their clients.

In Adams v. Morse, 51 Me. 497, it was held that evidence that "there has always been a custom at a certain saw-mill and other mills in the neighborhood to leave the slabs as belonging to the mill, the owners of the logs never claiming them," does not establish a legal right in the mill to the slabs sawed.

In Gronstadt v. Witthoff, 15 Fed. Rep. 265, the court held that a custom or usage to dispense with the rule as to the time when vessels' lay days begin to run, must be so fixed, uniform, and well understood, as to be presumed to form a part of the contract. Such a usage is not made out by evidence that, in the majority of cases, merely certain kinds of cargo are discharged on lighters for the mutual convenience of the consignee and the vessel, where it also appears that it is not unusual to discharge upon the dock, and that plenty of docks were available.

In Johnson v. Concord R. Co., 46 N. H. 213; 88 Am. Dec. 199, it was held that evidence that conductors upon the Concord Railroad, in violation of their instructions from the corporation, had, after the adoption of such a rule in various instances, allowed tickets to be used contrary to its provisions, is not competent to show a usage on the part of the corporation in conflict with the rule, if such instances are not shown to have come to the knowledge of the governing officers of the corporation.

In McClure v. Cox, 32 Ala. 617, it was held that the "universal practice and understanding of persons employed in navigating" a particular river, does not, per se, constitute a custom. It merely substitutes the habit of boatmen for a custom of trade.

In Austill v. Crawford, 7 Ala. 335, it appeared that it was very common in the trade, for factors, in making large sales of cotton for different persons, to sell the same at an aggregate price and to apportion the price, or sum received, among the persons to whom the different crops belonged, according to the relative value of each crop. The court did not think this was a usage, such as would be binding on the planter, and said: "The language of conduct of parties relying upon it, and could not be presumed to enter into their contracts.¹ Instances of uncertainty are seen in cases where an alleged usage varies at different times, or fixes no definite rule as to its operations; or leaves room for the exercise of individual opinions, or in any other manner fails to provide a definite and constant rule of conduct.²

the bill of exceptions is, that it was very common in the trade, but that a few factors in Mobile would not do so. This is certainly not proof of a usage of trade."

1. Certainty and Uniformity.—Wood v. Wood, 1 C. & P. 59; 11 E. C. L. 312.

2. In Corcoran v. Chess, 131 Pa. St. 356, a usage of a local bricklayers' association to apply to work, a method of constructive measurement, which varied from month to month, almost from day to day, was rejected as having no element of certainty.

In Oelricks v. Ford, 23 How. (U. S.) 49, the usage of brokers alleged was, that margins put up by a purchaser to cover an advance in the price of the commodity must be reasonable; but no rule by which the reasonableness of the margin can be determined was shown. This was held void for uncertainty. "As to the precise limit or character of the custom claimed, the opinions of the witnesses are various and indefinite. The margin, they say, must be reasonable, but the pretended usage contains no rule by which a reasonable margin may be determined. It is said the amount may be referred to merchants. But there is no evidence that this is a part of the custom, or that any such mode of adjusting it ever occurred in the trade."

In Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408; 22 Am. St. Rep. 471, the question was as to a usage in regard to an attendance fee upon a vessel in distress. There was no custom as to any certain amount, but the fee must be a reasonable fee. "In our opinion, a custom is not invalid because it does not fix the amount of the fee for every case. If the custom is certain that it must be a reasonable attendance fee, that is sufficient. If custom had undertaken to fix the same fee for every case, it would not have been a good custom." To the same effect is Mills v. Colchester, L. R., 2 C. P. 476.

In Fellows v. New York, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 249, it appeared that by one comptroller, and down to the year 1858, interest on advances to contractors was exacted to the date of the confirmation of the assessment, as an invariable custom, but the adoption of a different rule thereafter by his successors left the question open to discussion and doubt. There was therefore no certain usage.

In Thorn v. Rice, 15 Me. 263, it was held that where the usage of a bank, in relation to giving notice to an indorser, is so loose and variable, and so different from what the law requires, as to leave it uncertain whether any notice was given to the indorser at any time or place, or put into the post office for him, such indorser is not bound by such usage by doing business with the bank.

In Ninis v. Nelson, 43 Fed. Rep. 777, the court rejected a custom that the agent of a ship in distress shall receive an attendance fee in his discretion. It appeared that the charge was not shown to be certain. Sometimes it was charged, sometimes not charged. No custom, also, could be good where all the discretion was on one side.

In Sewell v. Corp., 1 C. & P. 392; 11 E. C. L. 432, the usage claimed, was to pay veterinary surgeons for attendance when there was not too much medicine required; this was too uncertain.

In Wood v. Wood, 1 C. & P. 59; 11 E. C. L. 312, it was alleged that there was a usage that a purchaser of cloth had three days within which he could notify the seller that he would keep the goods; some of the witnesses named three days as the time, others a week, and one a month. This was held invalid on account of its uncertainty.

In Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 37, a usage was set up that merchants delivered to purchasers goods sold as cash without demanding the cash when the purchaser was considered good. The court said: "This is not a usage, which must be something fixed, certain, and universal. One man may think the purchaser good, when his next neighbor may think otherwise; and this is said to be a usage!"

In Catlin v. Smith, 24 Vt. 85, and Steward v. Scudder, 24 N. J. L. 96, us-

9. Usages Must Be General.—A usage must be general, by which is meant that the method of dealing must be the universal method of those engaged in the business in the place where the usage exists.¹ In this sense a usage may be general in a particular town, ages of commission merchants on sales for cash to wait two, three or four days for their money, were likewise rejected.

In Union R., etc., Co. v. Yeager, 34 Ind. 1, the usage alleged was that in cash sales, payment might be made afterwards; no two of the witnesses agreed as to what time was allowed; it varied from three to twenty-five days; it was in force one month, but not the next. The usage was not established.

In Wallace v. Morgan, 23 Ind. 399, a usage was claimed among commission merchants in Indianapolis that flour, not suitable for the local market, might be forwarded to New York for sale. The court held the usage void for uncertainty, because it was impossible to determine exactly what grade of flour was, or was not, subject to its operation, leaving each factor to determine for himself to what grade the usage applied.

Other cases stating or illustrating the rule that a usage must be certain and uniform are: Desha v. Holland, 12 Ala. 513; 46 Am. Dec. 261; Sweet v. Leach, 6 Ill. App. 212; Crawford v. Clark, 15 Ill. 561; Cadwell v. Meek, 17 Ill. 220; Bissell v. Ryan, 23 Ill. 566; Turner v. Dawson, 50 Ill. 85; Illinois Masons' Ben. Soc. v. Baldwin, 86 Ill. 479; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Boal, 15 Ind. 345; Rindskoff v. Barrett, 14 Iowa 101; Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana (Ky.) 501; 30 Am. Dec. 696; Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105; 18 Am. Rep. 200; *Foley v. 1. Usage Must be General.—In Jelison v. Lee, 3 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 368, in which the existence of a usage was in question, the court said: "Some of the testimony would seem quite decisive to show that such a usage has grown up in parts of England, if not on the Continent, within the last quarter of a century. But this is contradicted by other witnesses, though fewer in number. It is said by others still not to be a settled usage anywhere, but resisted and irregular, and others testify to its being unreasonable and extortionate wherever practiced. My own opinion, on the whole evidence is, that it is by no means proved in cases precisely like this, that the usage is tolerated."

In Couch v. Watson Coal Co., 46 Iowa 17, the question was whether the defendant was negligent in not providing coverings to the cages in the mine shafts. A witness who had worked in other coal mines for many years, testified that coverings were used in the shaft in which he had worked. This was incompetent to prove a custom in such mine, much less in the defendant's mine.

In Berkshire Woollen Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 417, a hotel keeper in Boston was sued by a guest for money stolen from his room; the hotel keeper set up a usage of the hotels of Boston requiring guests to deposit money in the office safe. Two hotel keepers proved that they had printed regulations to that effect posted in the rooms of their hotels; two others testified that they did not have such printed regulations. As to the usage of the guests of these four hotels some deposited their money in the safes; others did not. The court held that no or in a particular trade in that town.¹ Or, on the other hand, general uniform custom could be established by this evidence.

In Champion v. Wilson, 64 Ga. 184, the court said: "Our code declares that 'the custom of any business or trade shall be binding only when it is of such universal practice as to justify the conclusion that it became, by implication, a part of the contract;' but this cannot mean, as the court charged, that it must have been followed 'in every transaction of this sort.' For then one act of one broker would defeat a custom universal but for that act. Nor does it mean 'the whole—every one,' as the court reiterates; but it means, what it says, of such universal practice as to imply that the trade would understand that it went into the contract. It must be rather more than general—much more than the habit of a majority; but not absolutely unbroken by one single transaction of one tradesman. Such a rule would defeat every custom."

Similarly the same court said in Desha v. Holland, 12 Ala. 513; 46 Am. Dec. 261: "It is not indispensable to the validity of a usage of trade that it should be universally acquiesced in, for this would be to annul all customs as to those who were unwilling to abide by them. Instead of sharing the force of law and being of general obligation, they would depend for their operation upon the gratuitous assent of every person against whom they were invoked."

In Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206; 93 Am. Dec. 184, the court, by Cooley, J., said: "The testimony of witnesses shows that the question of shortage is frequently the subject of dispute. Capt. Elsie says: 'The custom is sometimes acquiesced in by the captains of vessels, and sometimes disputed. If the shortage is small, they generally pay it; if it is large, they generally dispute it, and leave it to be settled by the owners.' Mr. Stephenson, the general freight agent of the defendants, says: 'I have known captains to refuse to pay the shortage, but we always have the freight in our own hands before we settle. We invariably refuse to pay the captains until the two principals are agreed.' Capt. Montgomery, after testifying that the custom is universal, says: 'I have known the question of shortage disputed at least a hundred times.' Several other witnesses give evidence that the custom is general, but the impression which the whole evidence leaves in our minds is, that the deduction of shortage is submitted to when the carrier concedes that it is his fault, or where the amount is not beyond what is usual and incident to transportation, but that it is disputed in other cases. A custom varying the common law must be clearly proved; but we do not find clear evidence in this case that ship-owners concede their liability to have deductions made from freight earned for the value of property receipted for by mistake. That the railway companies assert the right, is fully shown; but it must be generally assented to, as well as asserted, before the custom can be established."

In Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581, it was held that the known and received usage of a particular trade, and the established course of commercial dealings under it, are tacitly annexed to the terms and become part of a commercial contract. "And yet, even a number of banks, or commercial firms or houses in a large commercial city cannot, by their practice, establish a commercial usage, so as to make it binding on the trading community generally. The established custom or usage of a trade is undoubtedly the law of the trade. But to make it binding, it must be certain, uniform, reasonable and general, and of long standing, or, at least, of such long standing as to have become generally known, recognized, and acted on by the trade, so as to raise a fair presumption that the parties in entering into their engagements did so with a silent reference to the usage, and a tacit agreement that their rights and responsibilities should be determined by it."

1. In Wayne v. Steamboat General Pike, 16 Ohio 421, the owners of the boat claimed that there was a general and well-established usage by which a contract of lading, to deliver goods to a person residing at Memphis, means a delivery to S. & Co., owners of a wharf-boat lying in the stream opposite to the town, who, by said usage, are the general agents of all consignees residing at Memphis. The proof did not show that any such usage as that contended for was understood generally, at either

Memphis or Cincinnati, nor that it had been universally the custom. Several merchants of Cincinnati engaged in shipping goods to Memphis, had never heard of such a usage. The other merchants speak of S. & Co. refusing to receive goods of boats that would not make their bills good. "The most that could be made of the evidence, and all that it established, was, that steamboats have been, for several years, in the practice of landing goods at places upon the river where wharf-boats are stationed, with the keepers of the wharf-boat, and intrusting them with the duty of the delivery to the consignee, and then passing on without further care than to secure their freight. And that where the goods have eventually come to the proper hands, and no difficulty has occurred, no one has made any complaint. This, instead of proving a custom which is to control the terms of a bill of lading, and become a part of the law of the contract, is proving a very loose practice, which cannot terminate the responsibility of the carrier."

In Robertson v. Wilder, 69 Ga. 340, it was held that individual habits of dealing do not make a universal custom which by implication enters into the contract and forms a part thereof, nor will a deviation from the universal custom in particular instances impair or destroy its validity as such. Therefore, the fact that wharfingers of the port of Savannah, in competing for trade, frequently made contracts for less rates than those allowed either by law or by usage, does not make a universal or binding custom, which by implication enters into a wharfinger's contract.

In Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581, it was held that to constitute a usage that the copy of a bill of lading attached to a draft for the price of a cargo purchased and shipped by the drawees in Philadelphia, on account of, and in the names of, the drawees in Baltimore, to be delivered at Boston, is not to be detached from it by the drawees on the presentation and acceptance of the draft, but is to remain attached to it until the payment of the draft, it must be recognized and acted on as such in both of the cities first mentioned.

In Walsh v. Frank, 19 Ark. 271, an instruction as to the general custom of merchants upon the Mississippi and its tributaries, when the evidence before the jury was as to the custom of the merchants of three only of the important commercial cities within the district of country designated, was held erroneous.

In Richardson v. Goddard, 23 How. (U. S.) 44, the question was whether the proof disclosed a custom in the port of Boston forbidding a carrier to unload a vessel on a day appointed by the governor of Massachusetts as a general fast day, and compelling the carrier to observe it as a holiday, there being no statute of the state forbidding the transaction of business on that day. The court said that no such custom was proved: "The testimony shows this, and no more: That some persons go to church on that day; some close the windows of their warehouses and shops, and either abstain from work or do it privately; some work half a day, and some not at all. Public officers, school boys, apprentices, clerks, and others who live on salaries or prefer pleasure to business, claim the privilege of holiday, while those who depend on their daily labor for their daily bread, and cannot afford to be idle, pursue their occupations as usual. The libellants appear to have had no conscientious scruples on the subject, as they received goods from other ships, and some from this. But the testimony is clear that, however great the number may be who choose to convert the day into a voluntary holiday for idleness or amusement, it never has been the custom that vessels discharging cargo on the wharves of Boston ceased on that day; that, like the canon law regarding church festivals and holidays of other countries and former ages, the custom of Boston, if it amount to anything more than that every man might do as he pleased on that day, did not extend to vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or forbid the carrier to continue the delivery of freight on that day."

In Pevey v. Schulenburg, etc., Lumber Co., 33 Minn. 45, it was held that proof that persons doing two-thirds of a particular business at a certain place had adopted a peculiar usage in respect thereto, it appearing that the other persons doing business at that place did not conform to that usage, is insufficient to constitute the usage a local or particular custom. "There was wanting that generality of usage at the place where the custom is alleged to have been established which is necessary to the existence of a custom. Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (U. S.) 539; Janney v. Boyd, 30 Minn. 319."

there may be a general usage,¹ as, for example, of bankers, through-

In Porter v. Hills, 114 Mass. 106, it was likewise held that the fact that many persons, or a majority of persons engaged in a particular business, practice a particular method, does not establish a custom. The practice must be universal.

1. In American Ins. Co. v. Neiberger, 74 Mo. 167, proof that there was a custom observed by ten or twelve insurance companies to insert a particular clause in their policies was held not admissible to establish a similar custom on the part of other companies.

In Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543, it was held that if boats on a particular river, or a particular boat on that river, sometimes gave bills of lading containing an exemption from loss by fire, and at other times bills of lading containing no such exemption, then no such usage is established, for want of uniformity. And even if in a majority of cases, bills of lading contain such clauses of exemption, still the usage is not sufficiently proven as to make it the law of the contract between the parties.

In Lewis v. Marshall, 7 M. & G. 729, two witnesses stated, that the usual practice of the shipping trade was to consider steerage passengers as cargo, and their passage-money as freight; but stated no instance of such construction in their own knowledge, and added, that the guarantee in question was an unusual one. This evidence was held insufficient to prove a general usage of trade.

In Decatur Nat. Bank v. Murphy, 9 Ill. App. 112, the evidence failed to prove the existence of a general and uniform custom among the bankers where the transaction in controversy occurred, to make immediate examination of checks brought in for exchange, and the return of such as are dishonored. "There were but three banks in Decatur, and if any such requirements existed, there ought certainly to be great unanimity in respect thereto among the officers of these three banks."

In Sturges v. Buckley, 32 Conn. 265, a usage was set up by the defendant. The court below charged that it must be one that was followed in all cases by all persons in the same business along the same route, and must have been so long established that the plaintiff and all persons living in his vicinity might be presumed to have known of it and to have acted upon it as they had occasion.

In Gleason v. Walsh, 43 Me. 397, it was held that a usage may be general and still confined to a particular city, district, town or village. Van Ness v. Packard, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 137; Clark v. Baker, 11 Met. (Mass.) 188; 45 Am. Dec. 199; Williams v. Gilman, 3 Me. 276; Emmons v. Lord, 18 Me. 351; Perkins v. Jordan, 35 Me. 23; Thompson v. Hamilton, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 426; 23 Am. Dec. 619.

In Adams v. Otterback, 15 How. (U. S.) 530, the usage relied on, and under which notice to the indorser was given, had been adopted by the bank two years before the note in question was discounted, but it seems only four cases had occurred under it. "No public notice was given at the time of its adoption, and no presumption can arise from the facts stated, that the indorser could have had notice of the usage. It is said, if a bank may establish a usage, it may change it; and that there must be a beginning of acts under it. This may be admitted, but it does not follow that a usage is obligatory from the time of its adoption. To give it the force of law, it requires an acquiescence and a notoriety, from which an inference may be drawn that it is known to the public, and especially to those who do business with the bank. But to constitute a usage, it must apply to a place, rather than to a particular bank. It must be the rule of all the banks of the place, or it cannot consistently be called a usage. If every bank could establish its own usage, the confusion and uncertainty would greatly exceed any local convenience resulting from the arrangement."

In Svendson v. Wallace, 46 L. T. N. S. 742, several witnesses were called, who gave evidence to the effect that for sixty or seventy years the practice of average adjusters had been as stated by the defendants; but that, in consequence of the decision in Atwood v. Sellar, 42 L. T. N. S. 644, some average adjusters had altered their mode of adjustment in such a case. The question, therefore, is, whether this could be said to be such a mercantile custom as must be read into the contract and bind the parties. It has not the general characteristics of a custom, and appears only to be the practice of skilled men who

10. Usages Strictly Construed.—Usages are to be strictly construed;² that is to say, the court will allow them only to operate upon a case that is clearly covered by them. As a usage is admissible because it forms a part of the contract of the parties, it will be given full effect in respect to contracts subject to its operation, but will not be allowed to extend further.³

11. Views of Courts as to Extending the Scope of Usages.—The views of various courts and judges have differed widely as to the adopted the practice because it was the law. That is not a custom.

Other cases stating or illustrating the rule that a usage must be general are: Fulton Ins. Co. v. Milner, 23 Ala. 420; Burr v. Sickles, 17 Ark. 428; 65 Am. Dec. 437; *Walsh v. desirability of extending the functions of usage.¹ The extracts in the notes illustrate the views of certain judges who do not

In Ely v. New Haven Steamboat Co., 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 207, it was held that where the contract, in terms, or as affected by the usage of trade, is to deliver goods at a wharf, notice to the consignee of their arrival, is not necessary. "If usage requires notice to be given to the consignee, the fact that the store of the latter was closed the whole of the day on which the goods arrived, and until after they had been destroyed, will excuse the carriers from giving such notice. They are not bound to go beyond the usage, and seek the consignees elsewhere than at their place of business."

In Overman v. Hoboken City Bank, 31 N. J. L. 563, it was held that customs and special usages of trade which narrow and confuse the operations of the general rules of law, should be construed strictly, and not be extended to persons who are not clearly proved to have acted under them. Hence, proof of usage by banks, which are members of the clearing-house in the city of New York, in regard to the return of checks drawn on banks in the city, is not applicable to checks drawn on banks at a distance.

In Metcalf v. Weld, 14 Gray (Mass.) 210, the plaintiffs, seamen, entered into shipping articles with the defendants, owners of a vessel, by which they were entitled to receive a stipulated sum as advance wages. The defendants offered evidence tending to show that it is the custom in the port of Boston, where the plaintiffs were shipped, for owners of vessels to obtain their seamen through a shipping agent, and to pay the advance wages agreed in the shipping articles to the shipping agent; and that such shipping agent pays the same to the boarding-house keeper who brings the seamen to him; and the boarding-house keeper pays or accounts for the same to the seamen. It was shown that the money, at the time of the shipment, was not paid by the defendants to the shipping agent, but was charged to the defendants by him on his books, and the amount, together with his own charges, was paid to the agent on a subsequent settlement of the defendants' account with him. The court said: "Was the payment proved to have been made according to custom? . . . The evidence did not show that it had been complied with. The money was not even paid by the owners to the shipping agent at the time it was due, but was charged by him in account. It does not appear that the plaintiffs had any relations to a boarding-house keeper, or that the advance wages have ever been paid to any one for their use. If any boarding-house keeper, authorized by them to receive the money, had actually received it, so that it had gone in any manner to their use, the defense might have been placed upon the ground of agency. But it certainly cannot be maintained that the defendants can discharge themselves by a mere transfer of their obligation to their own agent."

1. In Wilcocks v. Phillips, 1 Wall. Jr. (C. C.) 63, Baldwin, J., said of usage: "Its influence is universal. It attaches to nations and to individuals. It creates obligations. It interprets laws. . . . The ancient, established, uniform, and known custom of persons engaged in any trade makes a law for that trade, though it is not applicable to other trades. It is their way of doing business. It is the rule to which all who enter that trade are understood to consent. It makes, supplies, and construes their contracts. Known and settled usages ought to be respected by courts and juries, unless such usages are against the laws or policy of the country."

In Clark v. Baker, 11 Met. (Mass.) 188; 45 Am. Dec. 199, the court said: "These usages differ essentially from those more general customs which are known and exist as part of the general law of the land, and which are observed and applied without being established by evidence offered in each particular case. These local usages may be of comparatively recent origin, and may be limited to a single city or village. Learned jurists have often expressed their regret at the extension of this species of evidence, and especially that as to usage of a local and limited character, as impairing in favor such extension;¹ the views of those who hold the contrary are more practically shown by the great volume of cases in which usage has been received to determine the rights of parties. For whatever may be said upon the subject, as a matter of abstract some degree the symmetry of the law, and tending to uncertainty and embarrassment in the administration of justice; and also liable to the serious objection that the knowledge by the party to be affected by it, of the existence of such usage, is a mere legal presumption which may often be unfounded in reality, although such usage is established by what is deemed competent legal evidence. Notwithstanding these objections, such local usages have been held admissible by the judicial tribunals as competent to explain and qualify the contract, and give to it an effect materially different from that which the general law would have done in the absence of all evidence of such usage."

1. Views of Judges Who Look with Disfavor on the Extension of the Functions of Usages.—In Dykers v. Allen, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 497; 42 Am. Dec. 87, it was said: "To allow the usages of Wall street to control the general law in relation to any matter might result in the establishment of principles not always in accordance with sound morals. I prefer that legal principles should have a universal application, and that contracts should receive the same interpretation in the thronged and busy mart of a commercial metropolis that they do elsewhere."

In Cox v. O'Riley, 4 Ind. 368; 58 Am. Dec. 633, the court said: "Were the courts by their decisions to encourage the growth of these local usages, originating generally in lax business practice or mistaken ideas of law, they might become as great an evil, a source of as much want of uniformity in the law, as was the local legislation of the past."

In Harper v. Pound, 10 Ind. 32, it was said: "To permit the temporary or indolent usages of each locality to control contracts, would be to make contracts conceived in the same language, and relating to the same subject-matter, one thing in one place and another in another. This would create a body of local laws far more intricate and embarrassing in judicial investigations than the local statutes with which the state was formerly inundated. The recognition of these local usages is, as a general rule, contrary to the public policy of the state. Our constitution and judicial decisions are hostile to local legislation and local customs."

In Stover v. Whitman, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 417, the court said: "Miserable will be our condition, if property is to depend, not on the contract of the parties, expounded by established principles of law, but on what is called the custom of particular places; so that we may have a different law in every town and village in the commonwealth."

In Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206; 93 Am. Dec. 184, Judge Cooley said: "Special customs are so liable to create confusion of legal rules in directions not contemplated in their adoption, that they are admitted into the law with great reluctance; and it is not often a hardship to parties to reject a custom, so long as they are left free to make their own bargains, and can incorporate it in their contracts if they see fit to do so."

In Sawtelle v. Drew, 122 Mass. 228, it was said: "A custom, within the meaning of the law, if general, is incorporated into and becomes a part of every contract to which it is applicable; if local, of every contract made by parties having knowledge of or bound to know its existence. It must be definite, precise, and unvarying. That is, not necessarily a custom, which is merely the ordinary mode of doing business; nor is a general habit or practice a custom. There is a great variety of things, which, in the ordinary transaction of business, are habitual and usual, but which are in no sense customs which, in law, are incorporated into and become parts of the contract entered into. When, therefore, there is offered to be proved a custom which is a part of the contract, it becomes necessary to look carefully to the exact language of the tender."

In Berkshire Woolen Mills v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 420, the court said: "The rights of parties must be determined by law, and not by any vague and undeterminate and partial usage of particular persons or places. A strict adherence to this principle is essential to a sound and consistent administration of justice. A departure opinion, it is apparent that the importance of usage as a branch of law is more and more recognized, and the tendency, as illustrated by the decided cases, is plainly in the direction of extending their scope. In so far as this extension serves to make plain and enforce the unexpressed intentions of the parties, the results can only be beneficial. The only dangers, in the opinion of the writer, are two, viz.: Firstly, an extension of the rule of presumptive knowledge, by which a party is presumed to know and contract with reference to a usage of which he may, in fact, be ignorant; and Secondly, a restriction of the right of parties to contract from it would work great injustice. No man could know what were his rights or his duties, if they were to be determined by loose evidence of some particular, indefinite, and partial usage."

In Trueman v. Loder, 11 Ad. & El. 597; 39 E. C. L. 178, Lord Denman, C. J., said: "If a legislator were called to consider the expediency of passing a law upon this subject, the conclusion at which he would arrive is hardly open for a doubt. He would decide at once that the written contract must speak for itself on all occasions; that nothing should be left to memory or speculation. There is no inconvenience in requiring parties making written contracts to write the whole of their contracts, while, in mercantile affairs, no mischief can be greater than the uncertainty produced by permitting verbal statements to vary bargains committed to writing. But the nature of this explanatory evidence renders it peculiarly dangerous. Those who have heard it must have been struck with the hesitating strain in which it is given by men of business, and their wish to secure the correctness of their answer by referring to the written documents. Again: What can be more difficult than to ascertain as a matter of fact, such a prevalence of what is called a custom of trade, as to justify a verdict that it forms a part of every contract? Debate may also be fairly raised as to the right of binding strangers by customs probably unknown to them; a conflict may exist between the customs of two different places; and, supposing all these difficulties removed, and the custom fully proved, still it will almost always remain doubtful, whether the parties to the individual contract really meant that it should include the custom."

In Bolton v. Colder, 1 Watts (Pa.) 360, Gibson, C. J., said: "Nothing should be more pertinaciously resisted than these attempts to transfer the functions of the judge from the bench to the witness stand, by evidence of customs in derogation of the general law, that would involve the responsibilities of the parties in rules whose existence, perhaps, they had no reason to suspect before they came to be applied to their rights. If the existence of a law be so obscure as to be known to the constitutional expositors of it only through the evidence of witnesses, it is no extravagant assumption to take for granted that the party to be affected was ignorant of it at the time when the knowledge of it would have been most material to him; and to try a man's actions by a rule with which he had not an opportunity to become acquainted beforehand is the very worst species of tyranny."

In Schooner Reeside, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 567, Story, J., said: "I own myself no friend to the almost indiscriminate habit, of late years, of setting up particular usages or customs in almost all kinds of business or trade, to control, vary, or annul the general liabilities of parties under the common law, as well as under the commercial law. It has long appeared to me, that there is no small danger in admitting such loose and inconclusive usages and customs, often unknown to particular parties, and always liable to great misunderstandings and misinterpretations and abuses, to outweigh the well-known and well-settled principles of law. And I rejoice to find that, of late years, the courts of law, both in England and in America, have been disposed to narrow the limits of the operation of such usages and customs, and to discountenance any further extension of them."

And in Donnell v. Columbian Ins. Co., 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 367, Story, J., said: "I am among those judges who think usages among merchants should be very sparingly adopted as rules of court by courts of justice, as they are often founded in mere mis-as they please, resulting from an extension of the doctrine that a usage contrary to law is void, it being the right of all men to impliedly adopt, in their mutual dealings, rules different from those which the law would otherwise apply.

12. Usages as a Source of Law.—It would be beyond the scope of this article to trace the history of the common law, by showing how it has largely developed from a multitude of ancient usages. It is only possible to refer in the notes to the growth of the mercantile law from the usages of merchants.¹ This origin is espe-take, and still more often in the want of enlarged and comprehensive views of the full bearing of principles."

Other cases expressing similar views are Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704; 65 Am. Dec. 374; Partridge v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 15 Wall. (U. S.) 573; Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457.

1. Growth of Mercantile Law from Usages of Merchants.—In Consequa v. Willings, 1 Pet. (C. C.) 225, it was said that when a usage is so established as to leave no reasonable doubt of its existence, it becomes a part of the law; and the court will decide upon it as such, without requiring it to be again proved. "Most of the usages of trade have at some period been proved as matters of fact, and when sufficiently established, they have grown into laws. The rate of interest in China, for instance, is so well established to be twelve per centum, that the court would not require it to be proved."

In Connor v. Robinson, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 354, the court said: "The history of our jurisprudence abundantly shows that the law merchant is for the most part made up of rules originally framed and acted upon by the merchants for their own convenience and the benefit of trade, which, with the sanction of the courts of justice, have become the settled law of the land, and as binding on the citizen as any other rule of law; and it is from this source that the rules for the interpretation of mercantile contracts are principally derived. Every trade, art, and profession has a language in some degree peculiar to itself, and it is only by reference to the general understanding of those who are accustomed to use it that we arrive at the meaning. This process of law-making is perhaps the most unexceptionable. A rule prescribed by the legislature is necessarily arbitrary, and it is out of the question to expect that every possible case upon which it may operate could be anticipated. It is liable, therefore, sometimes to operate injuriously, and it is only tolerated because it is productive of the greater good. Rules formed by usage are the work of time; they must be understood and acted upon by common consent, before they become binding, and the imposing interest of those upon whom they operate is a sure guaranty that they will not be permitted to operate unequally. The introduction of new articles of commerce, and any new source of enterprise which is opened to the merchants essentially different from those which have preceded, must give rise to customs and usages suited to their peculiar character; and as there are none more interested than those immediately concerned in the particular trade to establish those that are reasonable in themselves and precisely suited to the occasion, there is no reason why they should not be at liberty to prescribe rules for its government. These, it is true, have not the force of the law until they have received the sanction of the courts of justice, and in that way become a part of the general law; but they are received as evidence, and serve to explain what was intended by the parties."

In Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704; 65 Am. Dec. 374, it was said: "Custom, long acquiesced in, and sanctioned by judicial decision, has given us the systems of laws known as the common law and the law merchant. These systems are judicially taken notice of, and are not the subject of proof. Hogan v. Reynolds, 8 Ala. 59. These systems, then, may be declared to have obtained the dignity of law. Local customs, or particular usages, can claim no such eminence."

In Brandao v. Barnett, 12 Cl. & F. 805, Lord Campbell said: "Those customs which have been universally and notoriously prevalent among mercially interesting in the history of negotiable instruments.¹ Usages which at an earlier time were required to be proved as facts, have now, by judicial recognition and adoption, become the established rules of law.² In our own country instances are not chants, and have been found by experience to be of public use, have been adopted by it (the law merchant) upon a principle of convenience and for the benefit of trade and commerce; and where so adopted it is unnecessary to plead and prove them."

By the custom of Pennsylvania, a book-account for goods sold, bears interest from the end of six months after the sale and delivery. Adams v. Palmer, 30 Pa. St. 346. And see Koons v. Miller, 3 W. & S. (Pa.) 271; Watt v. Hoch, 25 Pa. St. 411.

1. In Goodwin v. Roberts, L. R., 10 Exch. 346; 44 L. J. Exch. 162, Chief Justice Cockburn said: "It is true that the law merchant is sometimes spoken of as a fixed body of law, forming part of the common law, and, as it were, coeval with it. But, as a matter of legal history, this view is altogether incorrect. The law merchant thus spoken of with reference to bills of exchange and other negotiable securities, though forming part of the general body of the lex mercatoris, is of comparatively recent origin. It is neither more nor less than the usages of merchants and traders in the different departments of trade, ratified by the decisions of courts of law, which, upon such usages being proved before them, have adopted them as settled law, with a view to the interests of trade and the public convenience, the court proceeding herein on the well-known principle of law that, with reference to transactions in the different departments of trade, courts of law, in giving effect to the contracts and dealings of the parties, will assume that the latter have dealt with one another on the footing of any custom or usage prevailing generally in the particular department. By this process what before was usage, only unsanctioned by legal decision, has become engrafted upon or incorporated into the common law, and may thus be said to form part of it." On appeal, the last cited judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords, 1 App. Cas. 476, though the meaning of the phrase, the "law merchant," was not specially adverted to in the opinions.

In Wood v. Watson, 53 Me. 300, the court said: "Mercantile usage has established the damages on bills on London, in case of dishonor, in Massachusetts, as determined in Grimshaw v. Bender, 6 Mass. 157, and, in this state, Snow v. Goodrich, 14 Me. 235, at ten per cent., instead of re-exchange. This usage forms a part of the law of the state. It had been of so long continuance, that, in 1809, when the judgment of the court in Grimshaw v. Bender, 6 Mass. 157, was pronounced, Chief Justice Parsons said that its origin could not be ascertained. It must, therefore, be deemed a part of the law merchant, and as obligatory as any portion of the common law, until it shall be modified or changed by the legislature."

2. In Erie R. Co. v. Ackerson, 33 N. J. L. 34, the court said that from a very early period, it has been the practice in this state to collect legal interest on a judgment, by means of an indorsement on the execution, and the right to do this must be regarded as the common law of New Jersey, become so by the same usage that has permitted the sheriff, with the consent of the plaintiff, to allow the goods levied on to remain in the possession of the defendant for almost an indefinite period.

In Bonham v. Charlotte, etc., R. Co., 13 S. Car. 267, the court said: "It is true that the court takes notice of the general customs of the country; but that does not imply that the usages of business, as a general rule, lay within the judicial notice of the courts. Those customs that have been incorporated as part of the common law, as defined by adjudicated cases, are, beyond question, subjects of judicial notice without proof in point of fact. It is not to be denied that customs may and do become so incorporated that have had their origin since the period of time to which the common law looks as the test of antiquity. It may well be questioned whether any modern custom becomes incorporated in the common law until it has been established as a matter of fact by judicial authority. The change of the status of such a question from one of fact to one of law, is by gradual and almost insensible steps."

wanting of local usages in the various colonies or states which have since developed into binding legal principles.¹ The law of the road, and various rules of maritime law are familiar examples of this development.²

IV. PROOF OF USAGES—1. Law and Fact for Court and Jury.—Proof of a usage of trade involves questions both of law and fact.³

In Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S. 412, it was held that the usages and customs prevailing in the province of Louisiana, affecting the alienation of lands, are to be respected in considering the rights of grantees of the former government. Usages long established and followed have to a great extent the efficacy of law in all countries. They control the construction and qualify and limit the force of positive enactments. In Spain and in her dependencies great weight is given to such usages in the adjustment of rights of property.

In Hall v. U. S. Ins. Co., 5 Gill (Md.) 484, the court held that stockholders in chartered companies, bound to pay installments as called for upon notice from such companies, are affected by notices published in the newspapers where the companies transact their business. The substitution of such newspaper publication, in lieu of personal notice, has so long been a universal usage, and of a notoriety equal to that of newspapers themselves, that the custom of doing so has become a part of the law of the land.

1. In Hoagland v. Wurts, 41 N. J. L. 175, it was held that the legislative right to order low lands to be drained, at the expense of the owners, rested entirely on ancient custom, and could not be deduced from the power to legislate, unless, in the particular case, the lands were so situated or conditioned as to make their reclamation a matter of direct public concern. In this state, ancient usage sanctions legislation that provides for the drainage of low lands at the expense of the owners. But such legislation, to be valid, must conform to the usage upon which the right to legislate is founded. The right to appoint methods for the draining of meadows has been a branch of legislation that has existed in this state from the earliest times, and has been so frequently exercised and acknowledged, that it has become a part of the local common law.

In Proprietary v. Jennings, 1 Har. & M. (Md.) 92, the court said that the custom of surveyors, when the courses and boundaries in a grant do not agree, is to disregard the course and run to the boundary; and that boundaries or calls are to be gratified at the expense of course and distance is a settled principle of construction.

In Griffith v. Griffith, 4 Har. & M. (Md.) 101, it was said that at common law the wife was entitled to a third part of the personal estate of the husband; and a bequest made to her by the husband, was not considered in lieu and exclusive of her dower; but she would take both. According to the custom of the city of London, if the husband devised a part of his personal estate to his wife, she was concluded by the bequest and deprived of her customary right, unless it appeared by his will that he intended she should have both. "Our acts of assembly are grounded on the custom of London. The acts passed relating to attachments, are allowed to be founded on the custom of London, and these acts concerning the dower of the wife, from their analogy to the custom of London, in that respect, I presume were grounded on that custom." See also Hussey v. Jacob, Ld. Raym. 86; Leckbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 73; Magill v. Brown, Bright 346; Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. (U. S.) 317; Stone v. Rawlinson, Miller 561; Benson v. Chapman, 8 C. B. 967, note; 65 E. C. L. 966; Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr. 1216; Vallejo v. Wheeler, 1 Cowp. 143; Kruger v. Wilcox, Am. Bl. 252.

2. In Drew v. Steamboat Chesapeake, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 33, the court said, in regard to a general custom for vessels to pass each other to the left: "Such custom is a part of the law of the land; and a departure from it occasioning collision will render the party liable, unless the other party, by reasonable effort, might have prevented it; and each party should act upon the presumption that the other party will adhere to the custom."

3. Law and Fact.—Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581; Sullivan v. Jernigan, 21 Fla. 264; Chicago Packing, etc., Co. v. Tilton, 87 Ill. 548; Pryce

It is a question of law, what is sufficient usage to bind the parties; that is to say, for how long a time, at what places, and with what degree of uniformity it must have been observed. Therefore, whether a given state of facts establishes the usage claimed to exist is a question of law for the court; whether such a state of facts has been proved is a question for the jury.¹

2. Must Be Proved as Any Other Fact.—A usage must be proved as any other fact in evidence; courts take no judicial notice of a usage.² Nor can its existence be left, without proof by witnesses, to the private information of jurors.³

3. Number of Witnesses—a. ONE SUFFICIENT IF NOT CONTRADICTED.—Notwithstanding certain early cases to the contrary, it is now settled that the testimony of a single witness is, as a matter of law, sufficient to establish the existence of a usage. The

v. The Empress, 3 West L. J. 174. In Lewis v. Marshall, 7 M. & G. 729, the court said: "The acknowledged rule is this: If the evidence offered at the trial by either party is evidence by law admissible for the determination of the question before a jury, the judge is bound to lay it before them, and to call upon them to decide upon the effect of such evidence when offered. Whether that evidence is of that character and description which makes it admissible, is a question for the determination of the judge alone, and is left solely to his decision."

NOTICE, vol. 12, pp. 163-166; Eager v. Atlas Ins. Co., 14 Pick. (Mass.) 141; 35 Am. Dec. 363; Gordon v. Little, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 557; 11 Am. Dec. 632; Snowden v. Warder, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 101; Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 2 Md. 217; Ward v. Everett, 1 Dana (Ky.) 429; Senac v. Pritchard, 4 La. 160.

The burden of proof of establishing a usage or custom is upon the party asserting it. Sultan v. 3000 Empty Oil Barrels, 15 Fed. Rep. 618; The John H. Cannon, 51 Fed. Rep. 46; Thomas v. Hooker Colville Steam Pump Co., 28 Mo. App. 563; Hall v. Storrs, 7 Wis. 253; Caldecott v. Smythies, 7 C. & P. 808.

A custom or usage cannot be proved by showing that the one sought to be charged with liability because of such custom has acted in accordance therewith in dealing with third persons. Swain v. Thompson, 6 Misc. (N. Y.) 209; 56 N. Y. S. R. 524; 26 N. Y. Supp. 536.

3. In Green v. Hill, 4 Tex. 465, the court below said: "I am not familiar with this custom of merchants in settling with insurance officers, or what are the liabilities of insurers in case of partial loss. I see on the jury planters and merchants, who doubtless are familiar with transactions of this kind; you will apply the rules of the same to the nature of this kind of transaction." On appeal this was disproved, and the court said: "The custom was not dependent on the knowledge any particular juror might have of such custom. If this were permitted, each juror might assume to know of his personal knowledge what the custom was, and no two of them agree."

fact that only a single witness testified, affects merely his credibility. The existence of a usage being a matter of fact to be decided by a jury, it may be proved as any other fact.¹

b. INSUFFICIENT IF CONTRADICTED.—But if the testimony of a single witness as to the existence of a usage be contradicted by the testimony of another witness, the court will hold, as a matter of law, that the proof is not legally sufficient to establish its existence.²

If it was supposed that such knowledge was possessed by any one or more of the jurors, it was perfectly competent to make witnesses of such jurors; they would then be in the hands of each party, to ascertain the means of acquiring a knowledge of such fact on the part of the juror. The oath of a juror will not permit him to find a verdict on what he may think he knows, of himself; because then he would be passing on evidence known to himself, and not to his fellow jurors." See also Tyson v. Laidlaw, 18 La. 380.

1. Number of Witnesses.—In Robinson v. U. S., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 363, the court said: "It is objected that the usage was proved by a single witness. But we cannot assert as a rule of law governing proof of usages of trade that if a single witness have a full knowledge and long experience on the subject about which he speaks, and testifies explicitly to the antiquity, duration and universality of the usage and is uncontradicted, the usage cannot be regarded by the jury as established." This may be taken to overrule a contrary decision in a circuit court in the case of Barclay v. Kennedy, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 350.

In Jones v. Hoey, 128 Mass. 585, the court said: "Notwithstanding the dictum in Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen (Mass.) 353; 90 Am. Dec. 196, there can be no doubt, at the present day, that the circumstance that but one witness testifies to a usage is important only as bearing upon the credibility and satisfactoriness of his testimony in point of fact, and does not affect its competency or its sufficiency as matter of law."

In Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 76 Pa. St. 411, the court said that the law prescribes no certain number of witnesses to establish the fact of usage, although the concurring testimony of a large number may increase the probability of its being generally known.

In Vail v. Rice, 5 N. Y. 155, it was held that the testimony of one witness is sufficient to establish a commercial usage, if his means of knowledge are abundant and his testimony full and satisfactory. Qualifying Wood v. Hickok, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 501.

In Partridge v. Forsyth, 29 Ala. 200, the court said: "Some of the authorities assert the doctrine, in terms more or less positive, that one witness is insufficient to prove a custom. Halwereson v. Cole, 1 Spears (S. Car.) 321; 40 Am. Dec. 603; Cunningham v. Fonblanque, 6 C. & P. 44; 25 E. C. L. 274; Wood v. Hickok, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 501. But these citations are not sustained by any satisfactory argument, and are at war with the analogies of the law. We cannot lay it down as a positive rule that more than one witness is required to prove the existence of a custom or usage. No statute has prescribed such a rule, and we are not able to perceive a necessity for so radical a departure from general principles." Compare Price v. White, 9 Ala. 563; Jewell v. Center, 25 Ala. 498; Smith v. Rice, 56 Ala. 417. To the same effect are Wootters v. Kauffman, 67 Tex. 488; Thomas v. O'Hara, 1 Mill (S. Car.) 303; Mars-ton v. Bank of Mobile, 10 Ala. 284.

In other cases the evidence of a single witness to prove a usage has been admitted without objection. Sewell v. Corp., 1 C. & P. 392; 11 E. C. L. 432; Cohea v. Hunt, 2 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 227; 41 Am. Dec. 589; Miller v. North America's Ins. Co., 1 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 470; Citizens' Ins. Co. v. McLaughlin, 53 Pa. St. 485; Pittsburg v. O'Neill, 1 Pa. St. 342; Bissell v. Ryan, 23 Ill. 566.

2. In Parrott v. Thatcher, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 426, it was held that a usage of a particular business is not sufficiently proved by the testimony of only one witness in support of it, where another witness equally familiar with the business denies it, and where other witnesses on the subject might be had. Therefore, where the plaintiff's case depended on their proving the usage of a particular business, with which many persons were conversant, and they offered only one witness to prove it,

c. TWO WITNESSES DESIRABLE.—In practice it is always desirable to have at least two witnesses to prove the usage, unless its existence is admitted; for if the testimony of one only is offered, and is contradicted, the usage is not proved; and, moreover, on appeal, the court would probably not disturb the verdict of a jury denying the existence of a usage proved by one witness only.¹

4. Qualifications of Witnesses.—In order to render a witness competent to testify to the existence of a usage, it must appear that he personally knows of its existence as a fact.² This knowledge may be acquired from personal experience in the business to which the usage relates, or in any other manner, which entitles him to speak with accuracy. If it appears that the witness knows of the practice of individual persons only, or that he has not been in a position to know of the general course of business, or that he only recently learned of the alleged usage, he cannot be considered competent.³ But it is not necessary that the witness should be and the usage was denied by a witness for the defendants, who had the same means of knowledge as the plaintiff's witness, a verdict found for the plaintiffs was set aside and a new trial granted. To the same effect, see Wootters v. Kauffman, 67 Tex. 488; Robinson v. U. S., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 363.

1. Homar v. Graves, 1 Mill (S. Car.) 308; Treadway v. Sharon, 7 Nev. 37.

2. Qualifications of Witnesses.—In Hamilton v. Nickerson, 13 Allen (Mass.) 351, a witness, who had been for twenty-seven years engaged in a certain business, was allowed to testify as to what he believed to be the custom in that business. The other witness testified that all the absolute knowledge he had on the subject was from his own business; that he could state what he believed the general custom to be from an extended knowledge of the business and of the custom, but could not state individual cases; and that he knew it in the way men generally gather knowledge. The court held that both witnesses were competent. "The existence of a custom or usage of trade could be proved only by the evidence of those who had such knowledge of the practice and course of business as to create in their minds the belief or conviction of its existence. The factum probandum was not a single isolated act or occurrence, but the result or conclusion derived from a series of similar acts or circumstances, creating and establishing in the mind of the witness a conviction or belief of the complex whole or comprehensive fact, to the existence of which he was called upon to testify. In such case belief is knowledge, and constitutes direct and primary evidence. Indeed, the existence of a usage could not well be proved by showing particular instances of transacting business in a certain way. . . . The witness stated his belief of the existence of the usage as derived from a knowledge of the business for a long series of years. In regard to such a matter, a distinction between knowledge and belief is altogether too nice and metaphysical to be introduced into the rules of evidence by which justice is to be practically administered."

3. In Standard Oil Co. v. Swan, 89 Tenn. 434, the witness did not show that he was acquainted with the usage and custom of well-appointed and well-managed concerns. He only knew of the conduct of one, without explaining his relation to it.

In Hale v. Gibbs, 43 Iowa 380, a witness who was called to testify respecting a custom of trade, showed that his knowledge of it was not later than a year before the time of giving his testimony. His evidence was held to be incompetent.

In Smith v. Rice, 56 Ala. 417, it was held that a custom among planters, in relation to the manner of receiving supplies from merchants who advanced to them, could not be established by the testimony of a single witness, who only stated that he knew what had been the custom among his neighbors in relation to the matter since 1868, a period of several years.

In Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543, it engaged in the business to which the usage is attached; thus, a usage among banks may be proved by a person having knowledge of bankers' usages, although not himself a banker or connected with a bank.¹

5. Form of Question to Witness.—The proper form of question to be put to a witness, when it is desired to prove a usage, is indicated in the note. As the question may have to be defended, on appeal, in the form in which it is put, it is important that it should be carefully expressed.²

was held that by way of establishing a usage in shipping on a certain river, it was competent for a witness to testify as to what had been his habit and custom in shipping on all the boats on said river, as well as on the particular boat upon which the loss occurred which was the subject-matter of controversy.

1. In Wilson v. Bauman, 80 Ill. 493, the court held that where the plaintiff proved by witnesses a custom that the employment of an architect to make plans and designs for a building; carried with it an employment to superintend its construction, it was error to refuse to allow the defendant to show there was no such custom, except by witnesses who were architects. Such custom must be as well known to builders and contractors as to architects, and does not require special skill or science to know of its existence.

In Griffin v. Rice, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 184, it appeared that the witnesses, although not employed in the banking business, were dealers with the banks, and had knowledge of the ordinary course of dealing with them. "There is no necessity for showing a man to be an expert in banking, in order to prove a banking usage. He should know what the usage is, and then he is competent to testify, whether he be a banker, or employed in a bank, or a dealer with banks. There is no reason why a dealer should not have as much knowledge on such a subject as a person employed in a bank." And see Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 482.

In Gregg v. Garverick, 33 Kan. 190, it was held that it was not necessary that a witness should be a commission merchant, in order to prove the custom or usage of such merchants. If he knows what the usage is from dealing with such commission merchants, he is competent to testify to it.

In Kermott v. Ayer, 11 Mich. 181, it was held that the relative value of foreign and American currency is a question of commercial usage, and may be proved by anyone acquainted with the usage.

In Wear v. Sanger, 91 Mo. 349, it was held that the custom of the Creek nation in the Indian Territory, as to the right of an Indian woman when married to a white man, to hold in her own right what property she had before marriage, is a question of fact to be proved as any other fact, and is properly submitted to the jury for their determination. One acquainted with the customs of the Creek nation although not a lawyer, is competent to testify as to the same.

In Shackleford v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 37 Miss. 202, it was said that usages must be proven by witnesses who have had frequent and actual knowledge of the usage about which they testify.

In Drew v. Steamboat Chesapeake, 2 Doug. (Mich.) 33, it was held that a general custom of navigation, e. g., for vessels to pass each other to the left, may be proved by the testimony of persons skilled in navigation.

In Evans v. Commercial Mut. Ins. Co., 6 R. I. 47, it was held that the usages of iron merchants as to adjusting losses on policies on iron might be proved by insurance brokers as well as by iron dealers. See also Camden v. Cowley, 1 W. Bl. 417; Gallup v. Lederer, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 282.

2. Form of Question.—In Robinson v. Chittenden, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 133, it was held that the question, "Is it not customary for persons who take receipts for goods on board of a ship to procure bills of lading therefor?" and the question, "Is it not customary for the manifest of the ship to be made up from the bills of lading?" are not suggestive of a custom amounting to a usage of trade, although it may have been customary to do both the acts mentioned for the convenience of the carrier.

6. Not Provable by Opinions.—Usages being a fact, and to be proved as a fact, it follows that the existence of a usage cannot be established by the mere opinions of witnesses as to what the law is, as applied to the case in hand.¹ It often appears that what is supposed to be a usage of trade, is merely the general opinion of persons as to their rights and liabilities under certain

In Steamboat Albatross v. Wayne, 16 Ohio 513, it was held that a question propounded to a witness in this form: "What do you know, if anything, of any custom of trade in delivering goods at Memphis by steamboats different from the usage of other ports on the Mississippi river?" was in proper form.

In Dwight v. Badgley, 60 Hun (N. Y.) 144, it was held that the establishment of the existence of a general custom by evidence should have preceded the question which was put to the witness, and before such custom was established the witness could not properly be called upon to give a statement as to what the custom was. Harris v. Tumbridge, 83 N. Y. 93; 38 Am. Rep. 398.

In Kershaw v. Wright, 115 Mass. 361, it was held that on the issue whether an alleged commercial usage exists, a witness may be asked to describe how, under the usages in force, a transaction like the one in question would be conducted by all the parties thereto, from its inception to its conclusion.

In Park v. Piedmont, etc., L. Ins. Co., 48 Ga. 601, a witness was asked, "Do you know of any usage or custom in the life-insurance business as to the commutation of renewals?" It was said on appeal that the proper form would have been, "What is the general or universal usage and custom in the life-insurance business as to the commutation of renewals?"

See also Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 392; Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana (Ky.) 501; 30 Am. Dec. 696; Ecker v. Moore, 2 Chand. (Wis.) 85; Flynn v. Murphy, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 378; Dodge v. Favor, 15 Gray (Mass.) 82; Patterson v. Crowther, 70 Md. 124.

1. Usage Not Provable by Opinion.—In Hall v. Benson, 7 C. & P. 711; 32 E. C. L. 702, a witness was asked whether there was any general course of business as to the matter in dispute. Tindal, C. J., interrupted, saying: "Is there any course of business? Let your mind revolve over instances. I am not asking you whether it is just and proper, but whether there is any prevailing course of business. Either you know such a course of business or you do not. If you do not, say so."

In Mills v. Hallock, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 652, the court said: "A custom must be proved by evidence of facts and not by mere speculative opinions, by means of witnesses who have had frequent and actual experience of the custom. The testimony of those who speak from report only, and not from particular instances within their own knowledge, if receivable at all, is of no weight."

In Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 482, the court said: "The inquiry is not after the opinion of traders and merchants in respect to the law upon a given mercantile question, but after the evidence of a fact, to wit: the usage or practice in the course of mercantile business in the particular case. Independently of this usage, merchants are no more permitted to testify to the commercial law than other individuals."

In Haskins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 514, the court said: "Usage is a matter of fact, not of opinion. Usage of trade is a course of dealing; a mode of conducting transactions of a particular kind. It is proved by witnesses testifying of its existence and uniformity from their knowledge obtained by observation of what is practised by themselves and others in the trade to which it relates. But their conclusions or inferences as to its effect, either upon the contract or the legal title or rights of parties, are not competent to show the character or force of the usage. Neither is it competent for them to testify what is the understanding of others in regard to its effect. The understanding of a community, or of a class, as to a legal effect or an implication of law, is not a valid usage; and evidence to prove it is not competent to determine legal rights under contracts."

Similarly in Austin v. Williams, 2 Ohio 61, it was held that the opinions of witnesses are not admissible to constitute a usage. Or, as expressed in facts; such opinion cannot constitute a usage. Merchants may consider themselves as having certain rights in certain cases, and may think of the matter as being a usage of their trade; but a usage is a mode of conducting business, a course of dealing, and cannot from its nature be the subject of opinion. It must be a method of dealing with certain facts, and not a conclusion as to the rules of law pertaining to those facts.¹

Steamboat Albatross v. Wayne, 16 Ohio 513: "A witness can only testify to facts, not to inferences deducible from facts." So in Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408, it was said that custom is not a question of opinion, but of fact, and cannot be proved by the opinion of witnesses that it ought to be so and so; it must be proved that the custom exists.

In Shackelford v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 37 Miss. 202, it was held that customs and usages must be proven by evidence of facts, and not by mere speculative opinions.

In Fletcher v. Seekell, 1 R. I. 267, it was said that usage was made, not by opinions, but by the usual acts and conduct of men in a given class of cases.

In Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408; 22 Am. St. Rep. 471, it was said that a custom allowing commissions to the person in charge of the ship on disbursements not made by him, cannot be proved by the opinions of witnesses that such person is entitled to the commissions, whether he makes the disbursement or not.

In Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 215; 34 Am. Dec. 289, the court said: "The custom of merchants, or mercantile usage, does not depend upon the private opinions of merchants as to what the law is, or even upon their opinions publicly expressed, but it depends upon their acts. The inquiry is not into the opinions of traders and merchants as to the law upon a mercantile question, but for the evidence of a fact, viz.: the usage or practice in the course of mercantile business in the particular case."

In Gallup v. Lederer, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 282, it was said: "To prove the existence of a custom, something more than the judgment or the conclusion of the witness called to support it is required. A custom is the result of usage, and can only be properly shown by proof of the usage from which it may be claimed to be derived. The inquiry in such cases is not after the opinions of traders and merchants in respect to the law upon a mercantile question, but for the evidence of a fact, to wit: the usage or practice in the course of mercantile business in a particular case."

In Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr. 1216, the court said: "You may examine witnesses to prove a particular course of trade, or other matters in the nature of facts, but not to show what the law is. Nothing could be more dangerous than to fix the law upon the opinions of particular men." And see also, to the same effect, Hawes v. Lawrence, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 193; 4 N. Y. 345; Carvick v. Vickery, 2 Dougl. 653; Ruan v. Gardner, 1 Wash. (U. S.) 145; Winthrop v. Union Ins. Co., 2 Wash. (U. S.) 7; Pfeil v. Kemper, 3 Wis. 318.

1. In Oelricks v. Ford, 23 How. (U. S.) 49, the court held that whether a usage of the kind set up existed in the trade in Baltimore, was a question of fact to be proved by persons who had a knowledge of it from dealing in the article. Opinions of persons as to what rights they might exercise in their own business fall far short of any legal proof of the fact, especially when they admit that there was no general usage of the kind known to them.

In The John H. Cannon, 51 Fed. Rep. 46, the question was as to the existence of a local usage in the port of Baltimore by which, in case of jettison of a lumber cargo lawfully carried on deck, the vessel and freight are exempted from contributing in general average. There was no witness called who could remember an instance in which the question had been mooted, and the alleged usage applied to decide it. Mr. C., an experienced average adjuster, member of a long-established firm in that business, is the principal witness, and he states that he thinks it is the usage, because he has no recollection of ever having made such an allowance in adjusting such a loss, and does not remember of ever hearing of such an allowance in the port of Baltimore.

7. Nor by Instances.—To establish a usage of trade it is not sufficient to prove certain particular instances. The usage must be positively established as a fact, and not left to be drawn as a matter of inference from individual transactions.¹

8. Nor by Single Instance.—And à fortiori, a usage cannot be

The other witnesses have no knowledge of any instance in which a loss of this class has been the subject of adjustment, and speak of the usage very much from what they have heard from Mr. C. "It would seem that what is spoken of as a usage was, in fact, rather the prevailing belief among underwriters and adjusters in Baltimore, that the general law did not recognize the right to contribution for jettison of a deck cargo of lumber. It was rather a local understanding of the general law than a local usage of trade."

In Cox v. O'Riley, 4 Ind. 368; 58 Am. Dec. 633, the court said: "It must also be a usage relating to matters of fact, and not to modes of thinking as to the law. In this case the proof is simply that the wharfingers, at Evansville, after notice given, were accustomed to consider themselves as not responsible. This amounts to nothing." Other authorities to the same effect are Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 95 Pa. St. 348; 40 Am. Rep. 662; Garey v. Meagher, 33 Ala. 630; Main v. Eagle, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 619; Southwestern Freight, etc., Co. v. Standard, 44 Mo. 71; 100 Am. Dec. 255; Cunningham v. Fonblanque, 6 C. & P. 44; 25 E. C. L. 274; Syers v. Bridge, Dougl. 509; Cox v. O'Riley, 4 Ind. 368; 58 Am. Dec. 633; Bissell v. Ryan, 23 Ill. 566; Slgsworth v. McIntyre, 18 Ill. 126; Mills v. Hallock, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 652; Chenery v. Goodrich, 106 Mass. 566; Hagerty v. Scott, 10 Tex. 525; Bryant v. Kelton, 1 Tex. 434; Shackleford v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 37 Miss. 202; Robinson v. Chittenden, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 133; Bishop v. Clay Fire, etc., Ins. Co., 45 Conn. 430.

1. Usage of Trade Not Provable by Particular Instances.—In Cope v. Dodd, 13 Pa. St. 33, in order to establish a usage it was endeavored to prove particular instances from which a usage might be inferred. The court refused the offer. "A usage which is to govern a question of right, should be so certain, uniform and notorious, as probably to be known to and understood by the parties, as entering into their contract, U. S. v. Duval, Gilp. (U. S.) 356, and it cannot be proved by single isolated instances. Dean v. Swoop, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 72." And see Amblor v. Phillips, 132 Pa. St. 167.

In Flatt v. Osborne, 33 Minn. 98, the court held that the evidence of the usage of two companies within the knowledge of the witness was insufficient to support a finding by the jury of a general usage or custom binding on the plaintiff, in the absence of evidence of any actual knowledge on the subject by him. Janney v. Boyd, 30 Minn. 319; Taylor v. Mueller, 30 Minn. 343; 44 Am. Rep. 199.

So also it is held that particular instances of a certain practice in a bank, do not establish a usage, Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend. (N. Y.) 215; 34 Am. Dec. 289; nor instances in one or two banks other than the one concerned in the alleged usage. Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 501.

In Martin v. Delaware Ins. Co., 2 Wash. (U. S.) 254, a witness testified that he had known two instances of a certain deviation by a vessel; but this did not make a usage. And in Trott v. Wood, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 444. Story, J., said that to constitute a usage it was not enough that a few instances could be produced.

In Herring v. Skaggs, 73 Ala. 446, it was said that a custom is a fact, and is capable of proof as any other fact. It may be proved by evidence of facts and instances in which it has been acted upon, but it is not proved by evidence, that it was acted upon in a few particular instances of dealing; nor is such evidence "admissible to establish its existence. Three isolated instances of sales made in the course of three or four years are not sufficient or competent evidence to establish a usage of trade, by which the rights and liabilities of parties are to be measured and determined, to the exclusion of the known and settled principles of law. Usages of trade are not recognizable, unless they have the essential elements of certainty, notoriety and continuity, bringing themselves home to the knowledge of those who are concerned in the trade or business to which they may pertain."

established from a single instance. One act cannot prove a usage.¹

9. Nor by Exchange Rules.—Rules adopted by commercial organizations have been offered in evidence to establish the existence of usages. But the rules of a “produce exchange,” or “real estate exchange,” or “clearing-house,” or other similar institutions, can have no force, as against a person not a member thereof, or who did not contract with reference to such rules.² Hence it is 148, it was held that the evidence did not tend to establish a usage. The only proof offered upon the subject was that of a few particular cases or special transactions.

In Lowry v. Read, 3 Brew. (Pa.) 452, it was said: “It would, therefore, be next to impossible to show that, under a constitution of a society which has been less than two years in existence, there could have grown up a usage in regard to the exercise of a right of suspension of grand chancellors of the order, which, by virtue of the usage, appertained to the office of supreme chancellor, as a right. To make good this assertion, it was necessary to have shown cases sufficiently numerous to establish a usage, in which the power had been exercised and acquiesced in by the order. To be able to cite a few instances in which a supreme chancellor had suspended a grand chancellor by his decree, would not establish a usage. For the general principle, see Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts (Pa.) 178; Collings v. Hope, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 150; Stultz v. Dickey, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 287; 6 Am. Dec. 411; Parrot v. Thacher, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 426; U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 1; Winthrop v. Union Ins. Co., 2 Wash. (U. S.) 7.”

In Ambler v. Phillips, 132 Pa. St. 167, it was held that before a mere usage of trade, or a custom, can become so firmly imbedded in the law as to govern the rights of parties, it must be so uniform and notorious as probably to be known to and understood by the parties entering into the contract. Corcoran v. Chess, 131 Pa. St. 356. Such a usage or custom cannot be established by single, isolated instances, continued and acquiesced in by all acting within its operations. Cope v. Dodd, 13 Pa. St. 33; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264. So established, parties may be presumed to have acted with reference to it. See also Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 483.

1. One Act Cannot Prove a Usage.—

In Duvall v. Farmers' Bank, 9 Gill & J. (Md.) 31, evidence to establish a particular usage of a bank was rejected, when the officer by whom the usage was offered to be proved, spoke of but a single case of the kind referred to.

In Willcuts v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co., 81 Ind. 300, the court held that a custom, that a payment of the premium may be made in a different manner from that provided in the policy, cannot, even upon a demurrer to the evidence, be inferred from a single act. The fact that the insurance company in one instance allowed credit to the insured for a claim for services, and accepted the balance of the premium in money, does not warrant the inference of a custom to accept pay in services. “It would be a strained and violent inference which would lead to the conclusion from one act alone, that a custom existed. A single transaction, occurring at the very threshold of the dealings between parties who have put their contract in writing, cannot be deemed proof of a custom.”

2. Rules of Exchanges.—In The Innocenta, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 410, the question was as to an alleged usage of the port of New York, limiting the time within which a vessel in this port must receive cargo from a lighter to two days. “‘The Produce Exchange,’ an organization of merchants, has adopted a rule somewhat to this effect; but no such association can, by a rule, make a custom of the port, however the members of it may, as between themselves, bind themselves to observe the rule. This is matter of contract. But to make a custom of the port, the rule must be so generally known and acknowledged and acted upon, as virtually to be applied by the whole of that part of the business community which it would affect.”

In Overman v. Hoboken City Bank, 30 N. J. L. 61, the court, in effect, said: Without stating that the association held that such rules cannot per se establish a usage. As between the members of such bodies, the rule may be considered to enter into their contracts, but not so with outsiders contracting with outsiders or with members.¹

10. Quantum of Proof Required.—It is said that the evidence offered to prove the existence of a usage should be clear and dis-called the "clearing-house" is an institution authorized by special legislation, or any authority existing in such association, in any way, to alter or modify the law merchant in regard to checks or commercial papers, such association cannot be held to have power to make usages or rules to bind those who are not parties to its organization. Its usages and rules, if not in conflict with law, may, by the implication of tacit adoption in the contracts of members, bind them in the same way that a general usage of trade may bind those who deal with reference to it, and who are therefore held impliedly to adopt it. But those who are not bound by such usages, and have not contracted with reference to them, have no right to avail themselves of them to create an obligation against those who are parties to their adoption, and bound by them inter sese only.

In Kershaw v. Wright, 115 Mass. 361, on the issue whether a usage exists in a city to inspect a certain kind of provisions, the court held that evidence that the rules of a chamber of commerce, having the power given to it by its act of incorporation to appoint an inspector of provisions, and one of the purposes of which was declared to be "to establish and maintain uniformity in the commercial usages of the city," said nothing about the kind of provisions in question, while they provided for the inspection of many other kinds, is admissible to show the non-existence of the alleged usage.

In Blake v. Stump, 73 Md. 160, an action by real-estate brokers for commissions, the question was as to whether commissions should be charged upon the entire value of property, when part of the purchase-money remained on mortgage. The court said: "The rule of the real-estate exchange is that 'commissions shall be chargeable on the entire principal or value of the property,' if any 'part of the purchase-money remains on mortgage or redeemable ground rent;' and some witnesses testified that it was the custom to calculate commissions on the basis of a fee value if mortgage rested on the property, or a lease was taken. It is very certain that the rules of the brokers' exchange cannot be allowed to control. Taliaferro v. First Nat. Bank, 71 Md. 218. It is a question of public and notorious usage, and whether such usage was reasonable and proper."

In Greeley v. Doran Wright Co., 148 Mass. 116, it appeared that the usage of the exchange, to settle all transactions between members on or before fifteen minutes past two o'clock of the afternoon of the day following that of a bargain and sale, had no relation to the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendants. The defendants, who were members of the petroleum exchange of New York, bought oil for the plaintiff on a margin, and closed the transaction at 12:30 on the following day, because the plaintiff had failed to respond with margins at that time on notice. "The plaintiff was not a member of the exchange, neither did he buy petroleum of the defendants. He employed the defendants as brokers and members of the exchange to buy petroleum for him on a one per cent. margin. No evidence appears in the exceptions connecting this usage of the exchange with the dealings of brokers with their customers, or with the transaction between these parties." Evidence of the usage of the exchange was therefore rejected.

In Waugh v. Seaboard Bank, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 283, it was held that in the absence of any agreement to that effect between the parties, and there being no evidence that the party sought to be bound thereby was a member of the exchange, the rules or customs of the petroleum exchange and clearing house connected with it, in regard to the payment of storage charges, on a sale, or transfer of oil or oil certificates, are immaterial, and have no relation to, nor any binding effect upon, the parties, or the subject-matter of the contract.

tingent, and that courts should strictly scrutinize the proof.¹ But it is not essential that all the witnesses should entirely agree as to its existence or scope; if the evidence be legally sufficient to establish it, the court will leave the question to the jury.²

11. Not Proved When the Evidence Is Conflicting.—As was stated in a preceding paragraph, whether a given state of facts establishes the usage claimed to exist, is a question of law for the court. And when the court sees that by reason of conflict of opinion as to the scope or prevalence of the alleged usage, the

1. Quantum of Proof Required.—In The John N. Cannon, 51 Fed. Rep. 46, it was said: "As to the usages of average adjusters, which do not contravene any general principles of law, but merely regulate the details of their application, it requires much less evidence to support a usage than to prove a local usage opposed to the principles of the general law. These remarks indicate with what strictness courts should scrutinize the proof by which it is endeavored to fasten an exception upon the general law by setting up a local usage."

In Adams v. Pittsburg Ins. Co., 76 Pa. St. 411, it was said that to establish the custom, the evidence by which it is proposed to prove it, must be clear, uncontradictory and distinct. Custom is usage so long established and so well known as to have acquired the force of law. It is obvious, therefore, that a custom not only can, but must, be so proved as to leave no doubt upon the mind with reference to its nature and character. Doubt must be wholly eliminated from the evidence adduced or the custom is not well proved."

In Drake v. Hudson, 7 Har. & J. (Md.) 399, it was held that usage or custom may be proved by parol, whether arising under a public written law or not. Livingston v. Maryland Ins. Co., 7 Cranch (U. S.) 539.

In Mackenzie v. Dunlop, 8 Macq. H. L. Cas. 26, it was held that a mercantile usage is provable by the multiplication or congregation of a great number of particular instances, showing a given course of business, and a general established understanding respecting it.

In Cook v. Fiske, 12 Gray (Mass.) 491, it was held that the testimony of certain ship-brokers that they never knew of a case in which the broker's commissions had been paid when no charter-party had been executed, and that so far as they knew, it was not the custom of ship-brokers to charge a commission under such circumstances, is not such proof of a custom as will prevent the plaintiff ship-broker from recovering his commissions.

In Alabama, etc., Rivers R. Co. v. Kidd, 35 Ala. 209, it was held that the fact that a railroad company had been, for about a month, in the habit of depositing in a particular warehouse freight that was not consigned to any named person, without any proof that this was generally known, or that a party dealing with the company had notice of it, is not sufficient to establish the custom as an element of a particular contract.

2. In Dickinson v. Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 66, the court said that to prove a valid usage or custom, it is not essential that all the witnesses should agree; if they differ as to its existence in the same place or in all places, this presents a question for a jury.

In Farnsworth v. Chase, 19 N. H. 535; 51 Am. Dec. 206, it was held that the usage in question was a usage binding on the plaintiffs, if it be proved to be uniform, known and established, and whether it be so, is a question of fact for the jury, although there may be contradictory evidence on the point.

In Winsor v. Dillaway, 4 Met. (Mass.) 221, a contradictory evidence was offered as to the existence of a usage on which the plaintiff relied to support his action; the jury were instructed that if it was proved that the usage existed, and that the defendant knew it existed, the plaintiff was entitled to recover; the jury thereupon returned a verdict for the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff had no just cause of exception to such instruction.

In Burroughs v. Langley, 10 Md. 248, it was said that notwithstanding that the evidence as to the prevalence of the custom was all on one side, the question should have been submitted to the jury.

evidence is not legally sufficient to establish its existence, the jury will not be called upon to consider it. The cases in the notes are illustrations of unsuccessful attempts to establish usages.¹

1. Conflicting Evidence.—In Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 76 Pa. St. 411, the question was as to the existence of a custom that the captain of a steamboat had authority to bind the owners by giving a premium note for insurance. Four witnesses gave their evidence. One testified that the custom is for an owner and the captain to insure for all the owners, the captain signing the premium note. Another stated simply that it was customary for the captain to execute the note; but whether under authority of one or all of the owners he did not say. The third, that it was customary for the captain to insure for the boat and owners, but added upon cross-examination that he knew of no case where the captain was not directed by the owner. The fourth, that it was the custom for the captain to insure for the owners, as in this case. "From this testimony it is impossible to say what the custom or usage is, if indeed any such exists."

Turner v. Dawson, 50 Ill. 85, was somewhat similar. The plaintiffs sought to prove a usage of merchants in Chicago to make certain charges. But no two of the four witnesses examined on the custom testified alike, and hence the court held it not proven.

In The Innocenta, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 410, the court said: "In this case, of the four witnesses called on this question, who were familiar with the trade in question, two were shown to have no knowledge of any existing custom of the port outside of the rule of the 'produce exchange,' and the strongest witness to its existence doubted its actual application as a usage to a case where, from the nature of the cargo to be received, it could not be taken on board within the period of two days. Yet to be worth anything as a custom, it should have been proved that it is actually applied and enforced where, but for the custom, the time allowed would be unreasonably short."

In Sweet v. Leach, 6 Ill. App. 212, defendants were wholesale merchants in the city of Chicago, and plaintiff was employed by them as salesman for the year 1877. During the year he lost some time by sickness, and defendants paid him all his salary except a certain amount deducted for the time lost. In reply to the defense for lost time, plaintiff, on the trial, offered evidence of an alleged custom of the trade to make no deduction from the salaries of salesmen for the time lost by sickness. It was neither ancient, nor, so far as the proof shows, general, uniform, or well known. The plaintiff called numerous witnesses, salesmen in wholesale houses, who testified to instances of payments having been made to traveling salesmen when disabled by sickness, and some of them also testified as to the existence of a custom among wholesale dealers to make such payments; but they failed to show that the custom was uniform or generally known and acted upon. On the other hand, a large number of leading wholesale merchants of the city were called as witnesses, all of whom denied the existence of any such custom. Defendants both testified that they had no knowledge of any such custom at the time they employed plaintiff, or during the time he was in their service. They had been in business in Chicago many years, as had also the other wholesale dealers who were called as witnesses, and if there had been a general custom, such as was claimed by plaintiff, they would have known it. "The most that can be fairly claimed, taking the proof all together, is that in given instances no deduction was made from the salary of salesmen for lost time occasioned by sickness; but there is no ground for claiming that these instances had been so frequent and uniform, or so long continued, as to have ripened into a general custom."

In Hinton v. Coleman, 45 Wis. 165, it appeared that the only witness who testified to the existence of the custom in question was the plaintiff himself. On the other hand, there were three other witnesses, apparently equally competent and having equal opportunities for knowing of the existence of such custom, if it existed, who said there was no such custom. The court said that it was clear that such evidence did not establish the existence of the custom claimed. See also Dickinson v. Poughkeepsie, 75 N. Y. 66; Scudder v. Bradbury, 106 Mass. 422; Upton v. Sturbridge Cotton Mills, 111 Mass.

When those who would know of a usage, if one existed, know nothing of it, or when those professing to know it, are unable to agree as to its terms, it is apparent that nothing is shown meeting the requirements of the law.¹

V. KNOWLEDGE OF USAGE—1. In General.—The question as to when it is necessary to show knowledge of a usage on the part of a person sought to be affected by it, is one of frequent occurrence. All men are conclusively presumed to know the general customs of the land—that is, the common law. In respect to these, therefore, it is of course unnecessary to offer proof of a party's knowledge.² But the practical questions regarding usages do not relate to these general customs, but to the particular usages of various trades and localities. It is in respect to these usages that the question of knowledge becomes important.

Bearing in mind that the only theory upon which usages are admitted in any case is that parties in making contracts, do so with the intention that the usages relating to the subject of their contract should enter into the contract and form part of it, it is apparent that the parties must have known of the usage in order to contract with reference to it. They could not contract with reference to a usage of which they were ignorant. So in all cases the law admits a usage upon the assumption that the parties knew of it.³

2. Knowledge May Be Actual or Presumptive.—Such knowledge may be either actual or presumptive. The law may require

1. In The Harbinger, 50 Fed. Rep. 941, it was held that a custom is not shown to be established at a port, where the testimony of the witnesses who aver that the custom exists is met by an almost equal number of witnesses with equal facilities of knowing, who testify to never having heard of such custom.

In Lewis v. Ship Success, 18 La. Ann. 1, it was said: "When the question is of a custom or usage, and it is not known to those who, from business and connections, have the best means of knowing it, the ignorance of it is, in some sense, positive testimony of its non-existence."

that actual knowledge of the usage should be shown, or may conclusively presume a knowledge where, in fact, none actually exists.¹ We must, therefore, consider in what cases actual knowledge must be shown, and in what cases presumptive knowledge

1. In Park v. Viernow, 16 Mo. App. 383, the court said of the usage in that case: "It must be shown to be so general and well established that the parties must be presumed to have had knowledge of it and to have contracted with reference to it. Martin v. Hall, 26 Mo. 386. It must be either directly known to the parties, or else so general in its character that knowledge of it may well be presumed. Southwestern Freight, etc., Co. v. Stanard, 44 Mo. 82; 100 Am. Dec. 255. Or, applying to this case the language of the supreme court in another case, it may be said that, 'If the plaintiff had no personal knowledge that it existed, it would be necessary to show that it was so universal and notorious that it was presumed that all were conversant with it.' Walsh v. Mississippi Transp. Co., 52 Mo. 438."

In Dodge v. Favor, 15 Gray (Mass.) 82, it was held that no exception lies to the admission of evidence of a custom existing in a trade, without direct evidence that it was known to the opposite party, if the party offering it contends that he can prove, from all the evidence in the case, that it must have been known to him, and that question is argued and submitted to the jury under proper instructions in the matter of law.

In Eager v. Atlas Ins. Co., 14 Pick. (Mass.) 141; 25 Am. Dec. 363, it was said that the fact that a local usage, as well as general usages of trade, may materially affect the construction of a contract, cannot be denied; but to have this effect such usage must appear to be so well settled and of so long a continuance, as to raise a fair presumption that it was known to both contracting parties, and that the contract was made in reference to it. Such a presumption is the only basis on which any local or particular usage can be sustained, so as to effect the construction of a contract. The usages or customs of particular places are not binding, unless the parties contract in reference to them.

In Bodfish v. Fox, 23 Me. 90; 39 Am. Dec. 611, it was said that the true question for the consideration of the jury in such case, is, whether the usage was so generally known and acted upon that the parties, from that and the other facts and circumstances proved, must be presumed to have had reference to it; as in such case it would become, as it were, a part of their agreement, and binding upon them.

Brokers and Agents.—In Harrell v. Zimpleman, 66 Tex. 292, it was held that where a custom exists among real-estate agents and their customers, which entitles the agents to commissions on the sale of lands placed in their hands, whether the sale is made by them or others during the period it is under their control, such custom amounts to a contract, when it is known to their customers.

In Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, the action was to recover a balance alleged to be due, growing out of certain sales for future delivery. The court held that a custom among brokers not to perform the original contracts of sale actually made, but to deliver equal quantities of grain or its market value, in fulfillment of contracts of purchase made by them for others, does not bind the seller without evidence that he had knowledge of it. The question is, there being no evidence that Irwin and Davis had any knowledge of the exist-is sufficient. The importance of the element of knowledge in the law of usages seems, in some cases, to be underestimated. But in others, the courts have given due weight to the matter, as will appear from the extracts in the note.¹ The presumption of ence of these customs, whether they were bound by them. The relation between the parties to this litigation was that of principal and agent; and the defendants in error, acting as brokers, in executing the orders to sell, undertook to obtain, and, as they allege in their declaration, did obtain a responsible purchaser; so that the plaintiff in error would, upon the contract of sale against such purchaser when disclosed, have been entitled to maintain an action in case of default in his own name. Although the broker guaranteed the sale, it was not a sale to himself; for, being agent to sell, he could not make himself the purchaser. The precise effect, therefore, of the custom proved was, that at the time of the settlement, in anticipation of the maturity of the contracts, the brokers, by an arrangement among themselves, by a process of mutual cancellation, reduced the settlement to a payment of differences, exchanging contracts, so as to substitute new purchasers and new sellers respectively for the balances. The question is not whether, in a given case, without the assent, express or implied, of the principal, this change of his rights and obligations can be effected (for that proposition is not doubtful), but whether the fact of his transacting business through a member of the exchange, without other knowledge of the custom, makes it part of his contract with the broker. The principle of this decision seems to us to be incontrovertible, and applies in the present case. The ground of the action is, that the defendants in error, at the request of Irwin and Davis, had made certain contracts for the sale and future delivery of grain; that these contracts were made in the name of the brokers, on which therefore they were personally liable, but in which Irwin and Davis were the principals; that the latter were bound to perform them, or to place in the hands of their brokers means of performance within the proper period, or to indemnify them against the consequences of non-performance; that Irwin and Davis in all these particulars became in default, and the plaintiffs were required to perform out of their own means, which they did by purchasing grain for delivery at the market price, or paying the difference between that and the contract price. The custom proved was offered to show this performance and consequent loss; and in doing so it disclosed that the brokers did not perform the original contracts of sale actually made, but delivered equal quantities of grain, or its market value, in fulfillment of contracts of purchase made by them for others, and which, by the process of mutual exchange authorized by this custom, had come into their hands for that purpose. This exchange and substitution, and payment of differences to effect it, working as it does a complete change in the nature of the seller's rights and obligations, cannot be made without his assent, and that assent can be implied only from knowledge of the custom which it is claimed authorizes it.

In Blake v. Stump, 73 Md. 160, which was an action by a real estate broker for commissions, the rate of which was based upon an alleged usage in Baltimore, the court said: "To bind the defendant to any such rule, it must appear to have been of such public notoriety that he must be presumed to have knowledge of it, and therefore dealt expecting to be bound by it."

In Smith v. Hess, 83 Iowa 238, which was a counterclaim by defendant for commissions for the sale of real estate, the court held that though there was evidence of a custom in the neighborhood that commissions at a certain rate should be allowed, there was no presumption that the plaintiff knew of the custom, or that the parties contracted in reference thereto, where the alleged usage was left uncertain by the evidence.

1. In Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464; 10 Am. Rep. 407, the plaintiff contracted to furnish materials and do the work in certain plastering for defendant at so much per square yard, and then charged him for the full surface of the wall, without deducting for doors, windows, etc., alleging a usage of plasterers to that effect. The defendant had no knowledge of such a usage. Folger, C. J., said: "There are many cases in which the language used would seem knowledge is the only basis upon which a usage can be sustained so as to affect the construction of a contract; and the usage becomes binding only upon that presumption.¹

3. Usages of Carriers.—The usages of particular carriers, in so to indicate that the existence of a usage of a trade, profession or locality having been shown, the presumption indisputable arises that the parties did contract in reference to it. Thus, in Sewell v. Corp, 1 C. & P. 392; 11 E. C. L. 432, Best, C. J., says: 'If there is a general usage applicable to a particular profession, parties employing an individual are supposed to deal with him according to that usage.' So in Pittsburg v. O'Neill, 1 Pa. St. 342, it is said: 'All trades have their usages; and when a contract is made with a man about the business of his craft, it is framed on the basis of its usage, which becomes part of it, except when its place is occupied by particular stipulations.' It is apprehended that this form of expression means only this: that the facts and circumstances of the case are such, that the usage is of so long continuance, so well established, so notorious, so universal and so reasonable in itself, as that the presumption is violent that the parties contracted with reference to it, and made it a part of their agreement. There are cases, too, where such form of utterance has been used in which both parties were of the same trade or kind of business; and, therefore, the usage proven was of the technicalities of their calling, of which it was held they might not profess ignorance. . . . Doubtless, if a custom is ancient, very general, and well known, it will often be a presumption of law that the party had knowledge of it. See Clayton v. Gregson, 5 Ad. & El. 302; 31 E. C. L. 342. It would seem, however, that upon principle, for a party to be bound by a local usage, or a usage of a particular trade or profession, he must be shown to have knowledge or notice of its existence. For upon what basis is it that a contract is held to be entered into with reference to, or in conformity with, an existing usage? Usage is engrafted upon a contract or invoked to give it a meaning, on the assumption that the parties contracted in reference to it; that is to say, that it was their intention that it should be a part of their contract, wherever their contract in that regard was silent or obscure. . . . Frequent are the expressions in the later authorities that, where the usage is of a particular trade or locality, it must appear that it was known to a party before he is bound by it, so as to make it a part of his contract. . . . We have seen that there are usages which have become so general and so universally received and acted upon, as that they have become a part of the common law, and no one can be heard to profess ignorance of them. But it is equally true that there are usages so restricted as to locality, or trade, or business, as that ignorance of them is a valid reason why a party may not be held to have contracted in reference to them."

1. In Isaksson v. Williams, 26 Fed. Rep. 642, the court said that the very existence of the alleged usage, and the customary omission of certain words of limitation in the contract in controversy, when that limitation is intended by the resident parties, "suggests no little suspicion that this practice is maintained, if it did not originate, from a willingness to mislead and to take advantage of foreign masters of vessels who are ignorant of the usage, and in consequence accede to lower freights. At best, the usage is but a usage of persistent carelessness and inaccuracy in expression, or else of intentional misrepresentation. In any aspect, it is directly calculated to deceive those who are ignorant of it, because it serves as a material limitation on the natural import of the contract. It is therefore entitled to no favor, and can have no legal support, except upon proof that both parties had knowledge of the usage, and contracted in reference to it."

In Caldwell v. Dawson, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 121, the court said: "There is a strong and increasing disinclination of the courts to allow the general laws of the country to be varied by proof of local usages. Such a usage is binding only on the ground that the party sought to be charged, contracted with reference to it. It must appear that he had actual knowledge of it, or the evidence must be such as to clearly authorize the presumption that he had knowledge of it. The fact that one party had knowledge of the usage, and supposed it would enter into the contract, is not far as such usages tend to limit the common-law liability of the carrier, can be valid only against those who have knowledge of such usages, and assent to them. These usages are chiefly those regulating the mode of delivery of merchandise.¹

sufficient, nor can it enter into the contract, though both parties had knowledge of it, if it appears they did not contract with reference to it."

So, in Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana (Ky.) 501; 30 Am. Dec. 696, the same court said, that a usage must be generally known, or it might thwart, rather than carry into effect, the intention of the parties, or impose an obligation upon one which he never intended to take upon himself.

1. In North Penn. R. Co. v. Chicago Commercial Bank, 123 U. S. 727, it was held that when a railroad company receives live-stock for transportation, and delivers the property safely to the next connecting line, from which it finally passes into the possession of the connecting company on whose line the point of destination is, the latter company is bound to deliver the property there to the consignee or to his order, if they are made known to it on receiving the freight; and it is not released from that liability by reason of a practice or custom to deliver all such freight to a drove-yard company without requiring the production of the bill of lading or receipt, or other authority of the shipper, knowledge of the practice or custom not being brought home to the holder of such receipt, bill of lading, or other authority.

In Packard v. Earle, 113 Mass. 280, it was held that a usage on the part of expressmen to leave packages at a way-station, and to substitute a notice of the arrival of the goods for a personal delivery, could not bind the consignor unless known to him.

In Torrance v. Hayes, 2 U. C. C. P. 338, the plea was that according to the custom and usage of forwarders and carriers existing at Toronto, consignees are authorized to pay wharfingers the amount due from them to such forwarders and carriers, for the forwarding and carrying of their goods. It was, however, held by the court that assuming the alleged custom to be valid, notice thereof to the plaintiff, if not acquiesced therein, should be alleged.

In The Mary Washington v. Ayres, 5 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 692, the carrier landed certain merchandise at its wharf, and there being no one to receive it, placed it in its warehouse on the wharf, where it was injured before its removal by the consignees, who had no notice of its arrival. The court, by Chase, C. J., held the carrier liable, and said that if exceptions are to be made on the ground of usage to the general rule in regard to delivery and notice, the usage must be proved to be known to the consignee. "In the present case the respondents allege that it was not their practice to give notice to consignees; but, instead of giving such notice, to deposit goods in their warehouse, where the consignees were expected to call for them, on learning from their correspondents, or otherwise, of their arrival. They insist that this arrangement was for the benefit of the owners of the goods, and was understood and agreed to by them. The evidence does not sustain this claim. It shows clearly enough the practice of the respondents, but it does not show any understanding on the part of the owners of the goods that the respondents were to be relieved from their responsibility as carriers until its actual delivery, or its equivalent deposit in their warehouse, with information conveyed to the owners in some way that their goods had arrived. The warehouse arrangement was rather for the convenience of the carriers than of freightors or consignees."

In Croucher v. Wilder, 98 Mass. 322, it was held that if the master of a vessel hires a berth for her at a wharf, without notice of any rule of that wharf concerning the mode of discharging cargoes different from the usage at similar wharves in the same port, a stevedore whom he employs to discharge his cargo may do so according to such usage, and, if prevented by the wharfinger, may maintain an action against him for damages. "If an agreement is made by virtue of which something is to be done in a city or town, and the same act or service is uniformly done or performed in a certain way, by persons of like occupation in that place, it is just and reasonable to suppose that the intention of the parties was that it should be done in that way and in no other. Hutton

4. Usages Between Employer and Employee.—In the relation of the employer and employee, it has been held that no usage of the employer is valid against the employee, unless known by the latter at the time of entering the service. The usage must have been a

v. Warren, 1 M. & W. 475; Potter v. Moreland, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 384; Putnam v. Tillotson, 13 Met. (Mass.) 517; Lamb v. Parkman, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 351. . . . In the absence of any evidence to prove any notice to the master of the vessel of the existence of any special rule as to the mode of unloading cargoes at the wharf at which he had hired a berth, or any knowledge by him of such a rule, before or at the time the bargain was completed, the agreement for the use of the wharf would draw with it such incidents of such a contract as usually attach to it in the port of Boston. He would have a right to discharge his cargo, or to contract with another person to perform the service, in the mode and by the use of means which were ordinarily adopted in unloading vessels at wharves in the city, provided the usage was reasonable and proper, and adapted to the business to which it related."

In McMillan v. Michigan Southern, etc., R. Co., 16 Mich. 79; 93 Am. Dec. 208, the court said: "Knowledge in plaintiffs of defendant's usage to make restrictive contracts cannot control the present case. Knowledge of such usage can in no case of the kind be allowed force beyond that which could be given to notice of an intention on the part of the carrier to restrict his liability, brought home to the party in any other mode; and we have already seen that the force of such notices is exceedingly circumscribed. And it can hardly be seriously claimed that the plaintiffs, by accepting restrictive contracts in some cases, have thereby debarred themselves from insisting upon their common law rights thereafter."

In Pitre v. Offutt, 21 La. Ann. 679; 99 Am. Dec. 749, it was held that a steamboat engaged in carrying cattle and other live stock from different parts of the country to New Orleans for market, is responsible for the loss of the cattle while on board, when it has occurred through carelessness or negligence. "It is no defense, in case of loss while the stock is on board, for the boat to show a custom to the effect that they took no risk in case of losses of this kind. To make the defense good that such a custom prevailed, it must be shown that the shipper had full knowledge of the custom at the time of shipment, and that he delivered the stock on board with reference to the custom."

In Farmers', etc., Bank v. Champlain Transp. Co., 16 Vt. 52; 18 Vt. 131, the defendants, common carriers on Lake Champlain, received a package of bank bills to be carried from B. to P., addressed to the cashier of the bank at P. They delivered the bills to the wharfinger of the wharf at P., at which place their boat touched; the package was stolen from the wharfinger. In an action for its loss, it was held to be competent for the defendants to prove that it was their uniform usage to deliver such packages of money to the wharfinger, without giving any notice to the consignee, and moreover that to constitute a valid defense it was not necessary to show that the plaintiffs had actual knowledge of this usage. Upon the first point, the court held that the usage of carriers may be received to show when their liability ceases, as well as when it commences. Upon the second point, as to notice, the court said: "It is not necessary to prove that the plaintiff had personal knowledge of the usage in order to make it available to the defendants. The case of Van Santvoord v. St. John, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 157, has a direct bearing upon the case at bar. The doctrine of that case is, in substance, this: that where goods are delivered to a carrier, marked for a particular place, without any directions as to their transportation and delivery, except such as may be inferred from the marks themselves, the carrier is only bound to transport and deliver them according to the established usage of the business in which he is engaged, whether the consignor knew of such usage or not. With the reasoning and authority of that case we are well satisfied. It is founded in good sense and is sustainable upon principle. The case at bar was put to the jury by the county court upon the supposition that, in order to enable the defendants to avail themselves of the usage upon which they relied as a depart of the contract of employment, and this assumes that the employee had knowledge of the usage when making the contract. If, however, he was in fact ignorant of the usage, it could not have entered into the contract, and hence can have no weight.¹

5. Usages in Contracts for Labor and Services.—So also in contracts for labor and services, a usage not known to one of the parties, cannot authorize any charges or justify any acts as a part of the contract.²

6. Usages of an Individual.—In regard to the usage of a particular individual, it may be said that no person without knowledge of such usage can be bound by it in his dealings with the individual. It would be unfair to hold that the business usage of a particular bank, or merchant, or manufacturer, or hotel-keeper, could fense, the jury must find that the plaintiffs had knowledge of such usage. This, we think, was clearly erroneous, and for this error the judgment of the county court is reversed."

Knowledge of Agent.—The owner of goods shipped by an agent is chargeable with notice of a usage of the carrier with which the agent is chargeable. Robertson v. National S. S. Co., 139 N. Y. 416.

1. In Stevens v. Reeves, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 198, it appeared that it was a rule in a certain factory in A, and some neighboring factories, that no person employed should leave their service without giving a fortnight's notice of his intention to quit. A weaver who did not know of this rule worked in the factory without any agreement as to the terms of service. He left the factory without giving any previous notice. "There was no stipulation for any particular time of service, so that there is no express or implied contract that he would remain for any certain time, unless such contract is to be implied from what is set up in evidence as a usage of this and the neighboring factories. In order to make this a part of the contract, as the usage supposed is a particular one, and not a general custom, it should have appeared that the defendant knew of the usage when he entered upon the work or before he left it. This is required in order to give effect to a particular usage so as to operate upon a contract. It is so with the usage of banks, and all other usages not of so general a nature as to furnish a presumption of knowledge. There is no evidence of knowledge in this case; on the contrary, it appeared that the defendant was a stranger in the county and that no notice of it was posted up among the rules and orders of the factory."

In Collins v. New England Iron Co., 115 Mass. 23, there was evidence of a custom in a trade to have printed rules and regulations requiring workmen to give notice a certain number of days before leaving, and to work out the time, or else to forfeit the wages due. This was held inadmissible, unless the party seeking to avail himself of the custom offers to show that the other party knew of it. "The custom which the defendant offered to prove cannot affect the plaintiff unless he had knowledge of it. As the defendant did not offer to show that the plaintiff knew of such custom, the court properly rejected the evidence of its existence." Other cases are Bradley v. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co., 30 N. H. 487; Collins v. New England Iron Co., 115 Mass. 23; Harmon v. Salmon Falls Mfg. Co., 35 Me. 447; 58 Am. Dec. 718; Morrison v. Allardyce, 2 Scotch Sess. Cas. 387; Marhan v. Elliott, Hume 393.

2. In Ambler v. Phillips, 132 Pa. St. 167, the plaintiff, by a written contract, agreed to do certain excavating for fifty cents per cubic yard. The work was measured by the plaintiff, not by the actual number of cubic yards, but by a rule adopted by a local bricklayers' association, which was designated as a "constructive measurement." It was not alleged that the defendants knew of any such rule. The court said: "It is almost needless to say that the defendants cannot be bound by a rule of the bricklayers' association of which they had no knowledge."

So, in Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana (Ky.) 501; 30 Am. Dec. 606, an action for services in building a house, the plaintiff claimed that the usage was to have any effect upon the rights of a person dealing in ignorance of such usage.¹ But if the usage be known and assented to, and compute the contents of walls having doors, windows, and other openings as if they were solid. The court said: "Now, to make a custom or usage of trade obligatory, it must be sufficiently ancient to be generally known. . . . If not so ancient as, by intendment of law, to be generally known, if it could avail at all, it certainly should not do so, without it was brought home to the contracting obligator by actual notice. Otherwise, it might be made an instrument in the hands of the craftsmen of the trade, to delude the unwary. We cannot understand that the custom or usage was of sufficiently long standing, or general prevalence, as to imply that Kendall had knowledge of it; nor was there any proof of express notice."

In Scott v. Maier, 56 Mich. 554; 56 Am. Rep. 402, it was held that a usage of architects if unknown to customers, will not entitle them to pay for preliminary sketches and estimates on the basis of a percentage on their own estimates. The only claim the architects could have would be for such time as was actually spent in their work, with the fair understanding that they should be paid for so much as they did. But no custom of architects can be received to fix it on any such basis as is here set up. Such a custom, if it prevails, can bind no one who is not made in some way aware of and assenting to it. It is too unreasonable to stand alone. It would put every employer at the mercy of an architect's extravagance in taste and license of guessing at estimates which have nothing to measure them.

In Celluloid Mfg. Co. v. Chandler, 27 Fed. Rep. 9, a usage was claimed by defendant, an attorney employed by the plaintiff, that docket fees and fees allowed for travel and attendance should be taken and treated by the solicitor or attorney as his own. This usage was not shown to prevail generally, but appeared from the evidence to be confined to a few states. It was not shown to exist in the community where the complainant resided, nor was it shown that complainant had any knowledge of such usage in the communities where the services were to be rendered. It was held that under this state of facts the complainant could not be held bound by any such usage.

1. In National Bank v. Burkhardt, 100

U. S. 686, the court approved a ruling of the court below that when a deposit is made in a bank without anything being said about it, the law makes the deposit a debt against the bank in favor of the depositor. The bank sought to establish a usage to return deposits which were found not to be good and charge them against the depositor. There was nothing to show that the depositor knew of this usage of the bank. The court held that the proposition submitted by the bank was fatally defective in not including as one of its terms that the depositor knew of the special and particular usage mentioned. Without such knowledge the usage was entirely ineffectual. Moore v. Voughton, 1 Stark. N. P. 487.

In Keogh v. Daniell, 12 Wis. 163, the above case was followed in regard to a usage in the city of Milwaukee.

In Berkshire Woolen Mills Co. v. Proctor, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 420, it was held that a usage at an inn, for the guests to leave their money or valuables at the bar, or with the keeper of the house or his clerk, otherwise the landlord would not be responsible for their loss, is not binding upon a guest, unless he has actual knowledge or notice of it. "Proof of knowledge is required to give effect to any and all particular usages, not of so general a nature as to furnish a presumption of knowledge. There certainly can be no legal presumption that every traveler who alights at an inn has knowledge of the particular usages of that particular inn, of which there is no notice in any way given to him."

In Saint v. Smith, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 51, it was held that, in the absence of a special agreement, a livery-stable keeper has no lien, by the general law, upon a horse delivered to him to be fed and kept. "Nor can such a lien be created by the force of any usage prevailing in a particular town or city. But to acquire the force of law, such usage or custom must have been established, and have become general, so that a presumption of knowledge by the parties can be said to arise."

In Wormersley v. Dally, 23 L. J. Exch. 219, it was held that the rule of law, as to importing into the terms of a tenancy the custom of the country, does not admit of evidence of the usage of a particular estate, or the property of a particular individual, however extensive it may be, unless it is shown that the tenant was aware of it.

Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Fair, 112 Mass. 354, was an action to recover the price of goods sold, and it appeared that upon the bill of parcels accompanying the delivery of the goods, was the clause, "terms cash, five per cent. off;" the defendant introduced evidence of the plaintiff's usage to allow other parties upon similar sales a credit of thirty days. "The evidence was not offered to show a general usage of trades binding upon the parties without proof of knowledge. Its purpose was to prove a custom or practice of the plaintiff in its dealings with others. Evidence of a particular custom or course of dealing of an individual is admitted upon the ground that, being known to both parties, it is presumed that they contracted in reference to it, and it therefore enters into and forms part of the contract." In this case, however, the evidence was rejected, as it appeared that the defendant himself was not at the time aware of the usage of the plaintiff, and could not therefore have bought the goods in reliance upon this usage.

So in Loring v. Gurney, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 15, it was held that a usage of an individual, which is known to the person with whom he deals, may be given in evidence, as tending to prove what the contract was between the parties. But the usages of individuals cannot affect their contracts, unless it appears that the usage was known to the persons with whom they contracted. "The usage is an independent fact, which, if proved, could not avail the plaintiffs, unless they could also bring a knowledge of it home to the defendant."

In Bliven v. New England Screw Co., 23 How. (U. S.) 420, the plaintiffs ordering goods of the defendants, knew of the usage of the defendants to supply orders as fast as the article could be made, and according to a list kept in a book, there being a demand for the goods in excess of the supply, this evidence showed that the plaintiffs were chargeable with notice of the defendants' custom to fill their contracts only in the order in which they were accepted. The court said that the custom of a party to deliver a part of a quantity of goods contracted to be delivered, though invariable, cannot excuse such party from a full compliance with his contract, unless such custom is known to the other contracting party, and actually enters into and forms a part of the contract. "Mere knowledge of such a usage would not be sufficient, but it must appear that the custom actually constituted a part of the contract. But when it appears that such custom was well known to the other contracting party as necessarily incident to the business, and actually formed a part of the contract, then it may furnish a legal excuse for the non-delivery of such a proportion of the goods as the general course of the business and the usage of the seller authorize, for the reason that such general usage, being a part of the contract, has the effect to limit and qualify its terms."

In Hyde v. St. Louis Book, etc., Co., 32 Mo. App. 298, it was held that one selling goods to be paid for on delivery is not bound by a custom of the purchaser to take goods "on sale only," unless it be shown that he had knowledge of such custom.

In Stevens v. Smith, 21 Vt. 90, it was held, that proof of the custom of the defendant to deduct from the weight of iron purchased by him that which, upon trial, was found unsuitable for use, would not avail the defendant, it not appearing that the plaintiff had knowledge of such customs at the time of the sale, and there being no evidence of any such general usage.

In Stout v. McLachlin, 38 Kan. 121, it was held in an action by machine manufacturers against mill-owners for machines furnished which the defendants denied being ordered, that it would make no difference, even if the plaintiffs had adopted a custom by which they charged all mill-owners for the machinery ordered by millwrights or contractors, required in changing or repairing mills, unless they also show that such custom was known to the mill-owners, and that they contracted for such repairs with reference thereto.

In Hyde v. St. Louis Book, etc., Co., 32 Mo. App. 298, it was said that a party is not bound by the private business custom of one with whom he deals, unless it be shown that he had knowledge of such custom at the time of his dealing.

In Womersley v. Dally, 26 L. J. Exch. 219, it was held that the rule of law as to importing into the terms of a dealings are had with such knowledge and assent, the usage impliedly forms a part of the contract between the parties, and is therefore binding.¹

This is well illustrated by the rule in respect to interest charges made by a vendor against a purchaser.² If the usage of a particular vendor is to charge interest on accounts after the expiration of a certain period, the validity of such usage, as against the purchaser, will depend upon whether or not the usage was known to the purchaser and assented to by him. If the usage was not known, it did not form a part of the contract, and therefore cannot sustain the charge of interest;³ but if it was known and acquiesced in by the purchaser, it formed a part of the contract and is binding.⁴

7. Usages in Contracts of Insurance.—In numerous actions upon policies of insurance, the usages of particular insurers, or the local tenancy the custom of the country does not admit of evidence of the usage of a particular estate or the property of a particular individual, however extensive it may be, in the absence of knowledge of the custom by the tenant. It was argued that the usage was admissible on the same principle as that on which evidence of the "custom of the country" is admitted.

1. In Nonantum Worsted Co. v. North Adams Mfg. Co., 156 Mass. 331, it was said: "Evidence by the plaintiff of its custom of dealing, and that the defendant knew it, is admissible."

In Norris v. Fowler, 87 N. Car. 9, it was held that the usage of one in conducting his own business, if known to the party dealing with him, is competent evidence of the terms of the contract between them. "It tended to show his general usage, or habit of trade, and thus afforded some evidence of the terms of his contract with the plaintiff. His manner of dealing with others being a fact or circumstance from which the extent or purport of his agreement in this instance may be made out, and consequently the evidence with regard to it was pertinent. See also the cases cited under the following section.

2. See Trotter v. Grant, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 413; Fellows v. New York, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 249; Liotard v. Graves, 3 Cai. (N. Y.) 226; Rayburn v. Day, 27 Ill. 46; Ayers v. Metcalf, 39 Ill. 307; Turner v. Dawson, 50 Ill. 85; Loring v. Gurney, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 15; Barclay v. Kennedy, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 350; Wood v. Smith, 23 Vt. 706; Langdon

v. Castleton, 30 Vt. 285; Birchard v. Knapp, 31 Vt. 679.

3. In Wood v. Hickok, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 501, it appeared that there was no evidence that the defendants knew that it was the uniform custom of the plaintiffs to charge interest after ninety days, and it appeared that no charge of interest had ever been made in any of the accounts rendered to the defendants except the last, nor was the length of credit stated in any of them. There was nothing, therefore, from which the defendants were bound to infer that any interest would be claimed from them as long as the account remained open and unliquidated.

In Sugart v. Mays, 54 Ga. 554, it was held that where the question is as to whether a particular transaction was a loan with an absolute deed to land taken as security, and bond for titles given by the lender, it is not competent to prove that the alleged lender's custom and practice were to lend on such security, there being no evidence suggesting such a prior course of dealing between him and the present alleged borrower.

In Goodnow v. Parsons, 36 Vt. 47, it was held that the plaintiff's practice or custom in this respect would not take the case out of the operation of the ordinary rule, or become binding upon the defendant, until the defendant was informed of it, and would then be applicable only to the subsequent dealings between them.

4. In Reab v. McAlister, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 109, it was held that a merchant or manufacturer whose uniform custom it was after a limited period of insurance usages of particular places, have been set up in defense of the demands of the insured. In perhaps all the cases, the usages have been disallowed unless the insured was shown to have knowledge of them. The insured is entitled to have the policy interpreted in accordance with the general principles of law, unless his contract was made with reference to a particular usage.¹

credit, to charge interest upon articles sold or manufactured by him, might charge interest accordingly to those who were in the habit of dealing with him with a knowledge of such custom.

In Meech v. Smith, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 315, it appeared that it was the uniform custom of all those engaged in the same business to charge interest. It was the custom of the plaintiff to charge it; he had charged it in former accounts against the defendant, and it had been paid without objection, before the contract was made on which this suit was brought.

In Fisher v. Sargent, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 250, it was held that in an action for goods sold, the jury may allow interest on the account, upon proof of a custom among merchants to charge interest in similar cases, with the knowledge of the defendant.

In Esterly v. Cole, 3 N. Y. 502, it was held that an agreement for interest may be inferred from the course of dealing between the parties; as where interest has before been charged and allowed under the like circumstances. Also where the creditor has a uniform practice of charging interest, which was known to the customer at the time of the dealing. And where there is a general usage in any particular trade or branch of business to charge and allow interest, parties having knowledge of the usage are presumed to contract in reference to it; and if the usage does not conflict with the terms of the contract, it will be deemed to enter into and constitute a part of it. Knowledge of the usage may be established by presumptive as well as by direct evidence. It may be presumed from the fact that both parties are engaged in the particular trade or branch of business to which the usage relates; and also from other facts, as the uniformity, long continuance, and notoriety of the usage.

In Mayes v. Power, 79 Ga. 631, it was held that evidence that it was the universal custom of the intestate to lend money in this way, without taking any note for it, was inadmissible; but evidence that the intestate had previously dealt with the defendant in the same way, was competent.

In Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Pendleton, 115 U. S. 339, on an issue whether demand of payment of a draft had been waived by the payees in order that they might communicate with the drawer, it was held that evidence of the custom and usage of the bank holding it, if offered in support of the evidence (not objected to) of the cashier of the bank of his conviction and belief (founded on such custom and usage) that the draft had been so presented, comes within the rule which allows usage and the course of business to be shown for the purpose of raising a prima facie presumption of fact, in aid of collateral testimony; and, taken together, they are sufficient to be presented to the jury. "The public character of the business of a bank, the strict regulations under which its business is usually transacted, the care required of its officers and agents in performing their duties, bring the case fully within the operation of the rule which allows usage and the course of business to be shown for the purpose of raising a prima facie presumption of fact in aid of collateral testimony. We have no hesitation in holding that the evidence offered was competent to corroborate the testimony of the cashier."

In Veiths v. Hagge, 8 Iowa 163, it was held that if it be the creditor's custom, known and acquiesced in by the debtor, to charge interest, or if such be the uniform usage of the trade, such facts, if proved, are evidence of an agreement, and interest will be allowed. Meech v. Smith, 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 318; Williams v. Craig, 1 Dall. (U. S.) 313.

1. Insurance Usages.—In Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 452, which was an action upon a policy of insurance, the court held that evidence of a local custom amongst insurers, not communicated to the insured, or of such notoriety as to afford any presumption of knowledge on his part, is not admissible. "The general principles of law, he is taken to know; and he has a right to have the contract interpreted and enforced by them, unaffected by any local custom, unless it plainly appears that such custom was understood by the parties, and the contract made in reference to it. Chase v. Washburn, 1 Ohio St. 252; 59 Am. Dec. 623." See also Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905.

In the following cases evidence of the usages of insurance companies were rejected, because the particular usage was not known to the assured. These cases, also, all state the general rule as above explained.

In Luce v. Dorchester Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 105 Mass. 297; 7 Am. Rep. 522, evidence of its agent that it was its custom to charge extra premiums on occupied dwelling houses.

In Taylor v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 13 Gray (Mass.) 433, evidence of a usage to require, as proof of death, a certificate from the deceased's attending physician.

In Washington Fire Ins. Co. v. Davison, 30 Md. 91, evidence of a usage in the office of the company that the term "carpenters," in a policy, referred to the employment and work of carpenters in erecting or adding to buildings insured.

In Illinois Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. O'Neille, 13 Ill. 89, evidence of a usage in their office to require notice of additional insurance to be given by the insured.

In Hill v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 10 Hun (N. Y.) 26, evidence that the words "standing detached," in a policy, meant, "among insurance men generally," that the subject of insurance should be at least twenty-five feet from external exposure.

In Goodall v. New England Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 25 N. H. 169, the testimony of the president as to the practice of the company in requiring applications for consent to additional insurance to be in writing.

In Rankin v. American Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 619, a usage of the company to require a survey of the goods damaged by the port wardens, as a preliminary proof of the loss.

In Stebbins v. Globe Ins. Co., 2 Hall (N. Y.) 632, it was held that evidence of a usage at New York, that, upon the occurrence of any circumstance by the act of the insured after effecting the insurance, whereby the risk is increased, the insured should give notice thereof to the insurer, so that he might have the option of continuing the policy or of annulling it, could not be received to alter the legal effect or alteration of the contract.

In Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 452, evidence of a local usage among insurers in the county where the property destroyed was situated, to reject an application for insurance on a building which had previously been fired by an incendiary, or to charge a higher premium thereon.

In Schwartz v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 18 Minn. 448, a custom of the company not to deliver or send policies to agents for delivery, except upon the condition that the person whose life was insured was in good health.

In Williams v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 50 Iowa 561, a usage of the company as to the mode of adjusting losses.

In Glendale Woolen Co. v. Protection Ins. Co., 21 Conn. 19; 54 Am. Dec. 399, a usage of the insured, not known to the insurer, in relation to keeping a watchman on the premises, was rejected.

In Cobb v. Lime Rock Fire, etc., Ins. Co., 58 Me. 326, the court held the insurer not bound by a certain customary construction of certain terms in the policy, not having known of such usage.

In Hermann v. Niagara Fire Ins. Co., 100 N. Y. 412, it was held that a clause in the policy declaring that any person other than the assured procuring the policy should be deemed an agent of the assured, not of the company, "in any transaction relating to this insurance," did not constitute the agents procuring the policy continuing agents, or make the notice to them binding upon the plaintiff. The plaintiff resided in New York; the property insured was in Troy. "The local custom in Troy, that notice of cancellation may be given to the broker who procures the insurance, was unknown to the plaintiff, and in so far as it assumes to make the broker an agent of the insured to receive notice of cancellation, although he had no such authority in fact, it is an attempt to override the legal construction of the contract, and was inadmissible to control it."

In Adams v. Manufacturers', etc., Ins. Co., 17 Fed. Rep. 630, it was held that evidence that it was customary for the agent who procures a policy of insurance on the one side, and the local agent who grants it, to receive notice of the cancellation of policies,

In addition to the cases in the United States, the English decisions hold that persons insured with Lloyd's insurance offices in London are not bound by the usages at Lloyd's, unless the contract of insurance is made with knowledge of such usages.¹

8. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser.—Usages prevailing among merchants in various trades can have no validity as against those who buy in ignorance of the existence of such usages. Purchasers are entitled to rely upon the letter of their contracts, and cannot be affected by usages known only to vendors.²

and notify each other in regard thereto, was admissible if proved by the most clear and unequivocal evidence, and be brought home to the actual knowledge of the party who is to be bound by it. "It purports to make an agent for the respective parties whom they have not made for themselves. The policy provides that the defendants may cancel the policy by notice. This, of course, means notice to the plaintiff; and notice to the authorized agent of the plaintiff must be notice to him. To make S, the plaintiff's agent for this purpose the usage is invoked. If there is such a usage, it provides for a fictitious or arbitrary notice; as much so as if publication in a certain newspaper or proclamation at some public exchange were the mode of notice. . . . A usage which adds to or varies the contract must be proved to be known to the party sought to be bound by it; and this should clearly be the case where an artificial agency is to be made out. . . . We find that the addition of an arbitrary authority to a person other than the principal, to receive a notice which is to annul the contract, should be proved by the most clear and unequivocal evidence, and be brought home to the actual knowledge of the plaintiff or defendant who is to be bound by it."

1. Usages at Lloyd's.—In Ward v. Harris, 8 L. R. Ir. 365, it appeared that, in accordance with a well-known custom of Lloyd's, any money which might become due under the policy was payable at Lloyd's, and not elsewhere. The plaintiff alleged that he had no notice or knowledge of that custom before effecting the policy. The court held that, having no such notice or knowledge, the plaintiff was not bound thereby; and that the defendants were bound to pay the amount due on the policy to the plaintiff in Belfast. "It has been established by several cases, Gabay v. Lloyd, 3 B. & C. 797;

10 E. C. L. 229; Scott v. Irving, 1 B. & Ad. 606; Sweeting v. Pearce, 9 C. B. N. S. 534; 99 E. C. L. 532, that the usages of Lloyd's as to the mode of construing policies, or as to the mode of settlement between insurance brokers and the insurers, were not binding on the insured, unless known to him and assented to by him. In the present case the plaintiff denies that he knew of this alleged usage. But it is argued that the London brokers, through whom the policy was effected, must have known of this usage, and that their knowledge must be imputed to the plaintiff, and he must be deemed to have assented to the usage. But the plaintiff gave general authority to the agent to effect an insurance on his vessel, and not an insurance at Lloyd's in particular; and I do not think that he can be held bound by the knowledge of the broker's sub-agent of his agent, he himself being ignorant of the usage."

In Bartlett v. Pentland, 10 B. & C. 760; 21 E. C. L. 163, it was held that as to a supposed usage at Lloyd's, the usage in a particular place, or of a particular class of persons could not be binding on other persons, unless those other persons are acquainted with the usage and adopt it.

2. Usages Between Buyer and Seller.—In Ransom v. Masten (Supreme Ct.), 4 N. Y. Supp. 781, it was held that a custom among dealers in lamp-black to deal in packages weighing only a half-pound as a pound will not bind a consumer buying of a trader by the pound, unless it appears that the former dealt with reference to that custom. The custom permits the vendor to sell half a pound as the equivalent of a pound. "Such a custom may be well known among traders, but it is one which apparently benefits the trader at the expense of the consumer, and manifestly would not be tolerated by the latter unless attended by advantages which would be compensatory of his actual

9. Usages of Particular Places.—When the usage is a local one, that is, the usage of particular persons in a particular place, it can be operative only in respect to those persons who are shown to have knowledge of it. There can be no presumption that a stranger is cognizant of a usage prevailing in a particular place; and therefore there can be no presumption that he contracted in reference to it. Hence, in order to make such a usage effective, it must appear that it was known.¹ loss in quantity. To bind the latter by such a custom it ought to appear that he dealt with reference to it."

In Scott v. Whitney, 41 Wis. 504, an action for lumber sold, the court said: "The lumber sold being, at the time of sale, piled in a certain city in another state, evidence of a custom in that city that when lumber had been estimated in the pile, the seller should deduct from the estimate one-half the sheeting contained therein, was inadmissible without proof that the custom was known to the parties, or had existed so long as to warrant a presumption that they contracted with reference to it."

In Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 684; 20 Am. St. Rep. 329, it was held that a custom of trade in the city of Augusta, by which, contrary to the general law of the state, acceptance of corn in bulk and paying for it after inspection are considered as waiving or releasing all claims upon the seller to answer for any defects of quality, is not binding, except upon those who have recognized it in their own transactions, and thus adopted it for their own dealings.

In Gallup v. Lederer, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 282, the defendant was asked whether, at the time of the sale, there was a custom among brokers to sell goods in their own name and receive pay therefor. This evidence was properly excluded. "It was not proposed to prove a general custom upon that subject, but simply a custom of brokers, which might very well be unknown to all other persons. To render a custom valid and binding upon a party to a transaction included within it, the proof should show it of such long continuance, or general application, as reasonably to warrant the conclusion that it was known to the party designed to be affected by it, or that he had actual knowledge or notice of its existence."

A local custom or usage recognizing and upholding a rescission of a contract of sale made through a broker, by the action of the purchaser and such broker, will not affect the seller. Kelly v.

Kauffman Mining Co. (Ga. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 363.

1. Usages at Particular Places.—Strong v. King, 35 Ill. 9; 85 Am. Dec. 336; Mason v. Franklin F. Ins. Co., 12 Gill & J. (Md.) 468; Parkhurst v. Gloucester Mut. Fishing Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 301; 1 Am. Rep. 105; 97 Am. Dec. 100. And see Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. (U.S.) 515; Walker v. Barron, 6 Minn. 508; Barnes v. Ingalls, 39 Ala. 193; Natchez Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 2 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 340; 41 Am. Dec. 592; Reynolds v. Continental Ins. Co., 36 Mich. 131; Nichols v. De Wolf, 1 R. I. 277; Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581; Ober v. Carson, 62 Mo. 209.

In Cobb v. Lime Rock F., etc., Ins. Co., 58 Me. 326, the court said: "A usage may be local or general. But if local, the contracting parties are not bound by the usages of other places, unless they are referred to or made part of the contract. It is immaterial what may be the usage or the construction given to particular words in Boston, they will not affect a contract at Rockland, Maine, unless a similar usage or the same construction to the same words is shown to exist there, if the contract is there made. The usage must be definite and brought home to the knowledge of the parties to be affected, or so general and well established that there must be ground to presume the parties had knowledge of it, or that they were bound to be informed of it."

In Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408; 22 Am. St. Rep. 471, the court said that where a custom is universal or general, every person who makes a contract is presumed to know the custom, and it enters into the contract and binds him; "but we are inclined to think that where it is a purely local custom, like this, a person who resides in Europe, and who, so far as the evidence discloses, has never been to the particular locality before, is not bound, unless he has knowledge of the custom. Carver on

In Coffman v. Campbell, 87 Ill. 98, it was held that proof of a particular usage among commission merchants in Chicago, in respect to the acceptance of drafts, not extending to bankers, nor to a foreign state where a draft is negotiated, fails to establish any binding usage as defined in Bissell v. Ryan, 23 Ill. 566, in which it was said that a usage must be generally known and established, and so well settled and so uniformly acted upon, as to raise a fair presumption that it was known to both contracting parties, and that they contracted with reference to it and in conformity with it.

In Kirchner v. Venus, 12 Moo. P. C. 361, it was held that evidence of the usage of a particular place, to add to or in any manner to affect the construction of a written contract, is admitted only on the principle that the parties who made the contract were both cognizant of the usage, and are presumed to have made the agreement with reference to it. No such presumption arises, if one of the parties is ignorant of such usage or custom.

In Chateaugay Co. v. Blake, 144 U. S. 476, it was held that a local usage cannot affect the meaning of the terms of a contract, unless it is known to both contracting parties.

In Rindskoff v. Barrett, 14 Iowa 101, it was held that when the custom is general, there is a presumption of knowledge on the part of the contracting parties; if local, knowledge must be shown before it will avail to affect the contract.

In Bradley v. Wheeler, 44 N. Y. 500, it is said, though not perhaps absolutely necessary to be said in the decision of the case, that local custom could not affect the plaintiffs without proof that they had knowledge or notice of it.

In Higgins v. Moore, 34 N. Y. 425, it is said (with the same qualification, it is to be received, however): "The usage being local, its existence must be clearly proved to have been known to the plaintiffs at the time."

In Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 383, it is said that usage is used as a mode of interpretation, on the theory that the parties knew of its existence, and contracted with reference to it; and that the conduct of the parties in that case showed clearly that they did not know of this custom, and could not therefore have dealt with reference to it.

In Marshall v. Perry, 67 Me. 78, the court said: "The usage was local. If not known to the parties, it could in no event affect their rights and liabilities. The only evidence on the part of the plaintiff, tending to show that the parties had knowledge of the usage, was that in regard to its universality. There was evidence by defendants tending to show that they had no knowledge of it. If the usage was one that could affect the rights and liabilities of the parties, the jury should have been instructed to give it no effect, unless they found, from the whole evidence, that it was known to the defendants when the contract was made."

In Sawtelle v. Drew, 122 Mass. 228, it was held in an action for breach of an agreement in writing to hire the plaintiff's house, where the defense was that the plaintiff failed to cleanse the house as he agreed, that evidence "that a universal custom and usage prevailed in the locality in which said house was situated, by force of which a lessor was required to cleanse a leased house before the lessee entered into possession of it," is inadmissible, in the absence of evidence that the plaintiff knew of such custom and usage. "We are of opinion that the offer was of so peculiarly a local custom as to require the defendant to prove the plaintiff's knowledge of it."

In Bentley v. Doggett, 51 Wis. 224; 37 Am. Rep. 827, it was held that it was immaterial what the private orders of the principal were to the agent, or that he furnished him money to pay the charges in controversy, so long as the person furnishing the service was in ignorance of such facts. "In order to relieve himself from liability, the principal was bound to show that the plaintiff had knowledge of the restrictions placed upon his agent, or that the custom to limit the powers of agents of this kind was so universal that the plaintiff must be presumed to have knowledge of such custom."

In Sewells Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 171, which was an action for damages done to a bridge, caused by the defendants putting a large quantity of logs into the river and negligently running the same against the plaintiff's bridge, it was held that evidence of the usage and custom in running logs in the State of Maine, was incompetent. "What custom and usage may have tolerated or sanctioned in Maine, in the particular manner of the running of logs, could not be held binding in New Hampshire, unless it had been adopted here and become so general as to be known and established."

In Coquard v. Bank of Kansas City, 12 Mo. App. 261, it was held that evidence of a custom among brokers of one place, is inadmissible as against the defendant, a resident of another place, when unaccompanied by an offer to show that the latter knew of the custom and contracted with reference to it.

In German-American Ins. Co. v. Commercial F. Ins. Co., 95 Ala. 469, it was held that a custom among underwriters in New York City to class certain stores as distinct buildings for purposes of insurance, and to insure them severally as separate risks, is not binding on an insurance company domiciled in Alabama, without proof that the latter had knowledge of such custom when a contract was made with another company for reinsurance in that city.

In Byrne v. Massasait Packing Co., 137 Mass. 313, which was an action for the breach of a written contract, made by an agent of the defendant in another state for the sale of goods to the plaintiff, it was held that evidence of a custom among dealers in such goods in Massachusetts to accept or reject contracts made by their selling agents is inadmissible, in the absence of evidence that such a custom was known in the place where the contract was made, or that any notice of it was given to the plaintiff.

In Plaice v. Allcock, 4 F. & F. 1074, it was held that in order to prove that a particular usage exists in a trade carried on at A, evidence that the usage prevails at B when the same trade is carried on, is admissible, provided B is in the vicinity of A, and there is an interchange of the trade in question between the two places.

In McMillan v. Michigan Southern, etc., R. Co., 16 Mich. 112, the court held a usage irrelevant, because the proof related to "dealings between the parties to this suit at Detroit, and to usages understood by the plaintiffs there, while the contracts here in question were in each instance made with consignors at a distance, and in most cases by other railroad companies whose usages do not seem to be uniform."

In Stringfield v. Vivian, 63 Mich. 681, the court said: "There was evidence aimed at showing that New York wholesale houses had a custom of retaining dishonored drafts to their debtors from whom they received them. But this was a foreign bill, drawn and indorsed in Michigan, and payable in Chicago. It is difficult to see how New York business usages could apply to such an instrument."

In Mears v. Waples, 3 Houst. (Del.) 581, the court said: "It does not follow that, because a custom or usage is recognized as obligatory in Philadelphia or New York, that it is recognized as such in Baltimore or New Orleans, or has any force or effect in these latter cities. The custom or usage in one state may not be the same in another. The states of the Union, in regard to commercial purposes, stand in the relation of foreign states toward each other, so that a custom or usage in one state is not necessarily binding or obligatory upon persons engaged in the same trade in another state."

In Mason v. Franklin F. Ins. Co., 12 Gill & J. (Md.) 468, it was held that a policy of insurance against fire, upon a vessel building in the port of Baltimore, and for a specified period, is not controlled in its operation by proof of usage in other ports of the Union. Such usage could not be considered as entering into the views of the parties in the present contract.

In Natchez Ins. Co. v. Stanton, 2 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 340; 41 Am. Dec. 592, it was held that the usages of the insurance offices at New Orleans, Louisiana, cannot affect the insurance offices at Natchez, Mississippi.

In Parkhurst v. Gloucester Mut. Fishing Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 301; 1 Am. Rep. 105; 97 Am. Dec. 100, it was held that a usage of the marine underwriters of Boston to expressly except barratry of the master from the risks which they assume on any vessel, whenever the assured is her owner, could not import such an exception by implication into a policy of marine insurance underwritten at Gloucester.

In Cobb v. Lime Rock F., etc., Ins. Co., 58 Me. 326, it was held that the usage or the construction given to particular words in Boston, Massachusetts, will not affect a policy of insurance upon a vessel made at Rockland, Maine, con-

10. Usages Where the Parties Are Not in the Same Trade.—There can be no presumption that the usages of a particular trade are known to persons not in that trade. Hence, in order to bind an outsider, his knowledge of the usage of the particular trade must be shown; as otherwise the usage could not have entered into the contract.¹

11. Proof of Knowledge of Usage—a. QUESTION FOR JURY.—In some cases it is difficult to prove a person's knowledge of a

taining the same words, unless a similar usage or the same construction is shown to exist in the latter place. "The construction of a policy is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made."

In Allen v. Lyles, 35 Miss. 513, it was held that where the inquiry was as to the custom of merchants in a particular place, it is incompetent to show that the alleged custom does or does not exist in other localities; and hence, when the defense relied on was an alleged custom of merchants in Cincinnati, to insure all goods shipped to their customers, unless otherwise ordered, it was incompetent to show what was the custom of merchants in that respect in New Orleans, New York, etc. "The custom of merchants on a particular subject, will affect such transactions only as take place in the locality where it is shown to exist; and hence, when a duty is alleged to be imposed, or an exemption allowed, by the custom of merchants in reference to a particular transaction, the custom must be shown to exist in the place where the transaction was concluded."

In Anglesey v. Hatherton, 10 M. & W. 218, the court held that on the question as to the existence of a custom in a particular manor, evidence of a like custom in an adjoining manor, though within the same parish and leet, is not admissible.

In Steamboat Albatross v. Wayne, 16 Ohio 513, it was held that a local custom at Memphis regulating the mode of delivering goods there, is not binding on shippers at Cincinnati, unless known to merchants and shippers there.

In Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 140 U.S. 565, it was held that a local custom cannot affect a contract made elsewhere.

1. In Brown v. Strimple, 21 Mo. App. 338, it was said that evidence of a custom of a particular class is inadmissible in construing a contract made with one not of that class, unless he is shown to have had notice of the custom at the date of the execution of the contract. Walsh v. Mississippi Transp. Co., 52 Mo. 434; Coquard v. Bank of Kansas City, 12 Mo. App. 261.

Again, in Long v. Armsby Co., 43 Mo. App. 253, the same court said: "Evidence showing that by the local usage a term possesses a special commercial sense is inadmissible when both parties to the contract in which the term is employed are not of the same trade or kind of business. In such case there is no presumption that both parties contracted with reference to such local usage and made it a part of their agreement. There is a distinction, therefore, between a case of this sort and one where both of the contracting parties are engaged in the same kind of trade or business. The distinction is noted in many of the local usage cases."

In Keavy v. Thuett, 47 Minn. 266, the defendants did not attempt to show an understanding or custom as to the use of the terms so well established and so notorious that the plaintiffs ought to have known them, and, perhaps as a consequence, bound thereby; nor did they propose to show a special understanding or custom in reference to the terms in existence among persons engaged in a different line of business, of which the plaintiffs had knowledge. The offer was simply to show a usage in the live-stock trade, of which the plaintiff, who was not in that trade, had no knowledge. The usage was therefore rejected. The plaintiffs were not dealers in live stock, a fact which seems to have been overlooked by the counsel when undertaking to show an established custom existing among that class of business men.

So in Van Hoesen v. Cameron, 54 Mich. 609, it was held that a custom among horse dealers that a warranty shall not extend to latent defects, cannot be shown to affect a horse trade with a man who was not accustomed to dealing in horses.

But in Fleet v. Murton, L. R., 7 Q. B.

126, M. and W., fruit brokers in London, being employed by F., a merchant in London, to sell for him, gave him the following contract note, addressed to F.: "We have this day sold for your account to our principal" . . . tons of raisins. (Signed) "M. and W., brokers." The principal having accepted part of the raisins, and not having accepted the rest, F. brought an action on the contract against the defendants and sought to make them personally liable by the custom of the trade. On the trial, in addition to evidence of a custom in the London fruit trade that if brokers did not give the names of their principals in the contract they were held personally liable, although they contracted as brokers for a principal, they offered evidence of a similar custom in the London colonial market. It was held that the latter was also admissible, being evidence in a similar trade in the same place, and as tending to corroborate the evidence as to the existence of such a custom in the fruit trade. Cockburn, C. J., said: "I own I entertain somewhat more doubt as to the admissibility of evidence of a similar custom in other trades than the particular trade which was the subject-matter of this contract. This case seems to me to go further than the case of Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug. 510, which related to the admissibility of evidence of custom in the trade of Newfoundland as applicable to the custom of the trade in Labrador. Labrador had been recently annexed to Newfoundland and the trade in each was of the same description, it being a trade that related to fishing. By the terms of the contract (a policy of insurance), the ship was to be at liberty to call at Newfoundland, and it might be fairly inferred by the persons entering into a contract with reference to the trade of Labrador that what was the custom of the trade of Newfoundland would extend to the trade of Labrador. But this case goes further. . . . If there exists a custom to the effect that the agent makes himself liable, under given circumstances, in a large and extensive trade, like the colonial trade, it makes it more probable that in the fruit trade in the Mediterranean, or elsewhere, a similar custom would obtain. . . . There is no doubt that it would be useful in elucidating the truth; and, therefore, on general principles, I think the evidence was admissible." Blackburn, J.: "What was proved was this: that the trades were very closely allied to each other. All brokers are very closely connected with each other; they all deal with merchants, and with much the same merchants in the general way of business; and they buy and sell, sometimes fruit, sometimes wool, and sometimes other things. And it struck me where the question was, Does a broker in the fruit trade, if he does not disclose his principal's name, incur a personal liability in consequence? That it would be proper evidence for a jury to consider and weigh that such a custom existed in other trades, and that in those other trades the broker did incur a personal liability." Mellor, J.: "I am of the same opinion. . . . I cannot help thinking that the evidence was relevant to this case, and admissible on the ground that, showing, as it did, what was the custom in other trades, though not so analogous, no doubt, to the trade in question, as was the trade in Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug. 510, it tended to show the probability, that in the fruit trade as well as in the colonial trade the broker did, under given circumstances, undertake a similar responsibility." And see also Falkner v. Earle, 3 B. & S. 360; Milward v. Hibbert, 3 Q. B. 120; 43 E. C. L. 659; Plaice v. Allcock, 4 F. & F. 1074.

In Harris v. Tumbridge, 83 N. Y. 92; 38 Am. Rep. 398, it was said that a custom or usage in a business will not bind the parties to a contract, unless it appears that they had knowledge of its existence, or that it is so general that they must be presumed to have contracted with reference to it.

In Martin v. Maynard, 16 N. H. 165, it was said that a usage of a particular trade could not be given in evidence to show the true construction of a contract, unless it was further shown that the party to be affected by the usage was conversant with it or in some way chargeable with notice of it.

In Moore v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 3 Mich. 23, it did not appear from the facts found, nor from anything of record, that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the particular manner in which the defendant company transacted its business. "If the defendants seek to modify this contract by a custom, they must show that both parties acted in reference to it. It is analogous to those cases where a party seeks to avoid an implied legal obligation by a particular usage or custom. To do that so as to make the general law usage. If there is any evidence of the existence of knowledge, the jury must pass upon its weight and decide whether the party did, in fact, know of the usage.¹

b. PREVIOUS COURSE OF DEALING.—In such cases the previous course of dealing between the parties is very material, and may often clearly show knowledge of the usage, even in the face of a denial of such knowledge by the party sought to be charged.²

yield to a particular one, it is essential that he should not only show the particular custom and usage to exist, but he should show enough to warrant the presumption that both parties acted in reference to it."

In German-American Ins. Co. v. Commercial F. Ins. Co., 95 Ala. 469, the court said: "Proof of local usages will not raise up a presumption of a knowledge of their existence on the part of one engaged generally in the business to which they pertain in a certain city, at least where the domicile of a party sought to be charged is elsewhere; or, in other words, that, in order to create even a prima facie presumption that a party has knowledge of a usage incident to a particular business about which he is engaged, the usage must be shown to be a general one in that business, in such sort as that it would be unreasonable to suppose he was ignorant of it."

In Isaksson v. Williams, 26 Fed. Rep. 642, the court said: "If a usage is general, both parties are presumed to know it and to contract in reference to it. If it is special, and confined to a particular business, or has reference to a particular port only, there is no such presumption; and it is manifest that it would be unjust to admit it in order to restrict the natural meaning of a written contract, except upon proof that both parties were aware of the particular usage and intended to be governed by it. Even if, as respects a special custom in a particular trade, or between particular ports, there is a presumption that parties who are engaged in that trade contract in reference to the particular custom, this presumption is at best but a prima facie one, liable to be rebutted by proof that it was unknown to the party against whom it is set up; and, on that being proved, no weight ought to be given to it."

1. Compare supra, this title, Proof of Usages. In Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 558, it was held that evidence that the indorser of a note was frequently at a certain bank, transacting business there, and that he frequently paid notes there, was sufficient proof of his being conversant with the usage of the bank to give notice to promisors to pay at the bank, instead of sending the notes to them and demanding payment.

In Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408; 22 Am. St. Rep. 471, it was held that where, as in that case, upon taking charge of the vessel, the shipping firm informs the master that, by the custom of the port, custody, commission, and attendance fees are charged in such cases, and the master makes no protest, it cannot be said that the master was ignorant of the custom when he made the contract.

In Mott v. Hall, 41 Ga., 117, the court said: "If, as the witness stated, it had been the universal practice for thirty years for clerks to make notes for necessary expenses, and to make contracts by direction or authority of the captain for building or repair accounts, we think the owners of this boat are presumed to have had knowledge of that custom, and to have given the clerk of their boat, by implication, authority to make such contracts as were universally made by other clerks of other boats running on the same river."

In Walsh v. Frank, 19 Ark. 270, it was held that when a special custom at the place of shipment, different from the general custom, is proved; and the question is, whether the purchaser had knowledge of the special custom, and contracted in reference to it, the previous course of dealing between the same parties—such as the order, shipment and receipt of several invoices of goods, without any charge for insurance—is sufficient evidence from which the jury may infer knowledge of the special custom.

Burden of Proof.—The burden of proof is upon a party to a contract, seeking to avoid being bound by a notorious and uniform usage to show his ignorance of it. Robertson v. National S. S. Co., 139 N. Y. 416.

2. In 2 Parsons on Contracts, pt. II, § 9, p. 544, the point is well

12. When Knowledge Is Presumed.—There are various instances in which it has been held that knowledge of a usage will be imputed to a party, although he may not, in fact, have actually been informed of it.¹

This is, of course, the rule with regard to the general customs or principles of the common law, which are presumed to be known of all men. But some of the cases go to the extent of holding that persons in a particular trade, are charged with notice of all the usages prevailing in that trade, and cannot be heard to deny that they had no knowledge of such usages. In the insurance business, for example, it is settled that insurance companies are bound to inform themselves of the usages of the particular business insured, and that there is a conclusive presumption of such knowledge.²

It cannot be laid down as an established rule of law, that this expressed and illustrated: "As a general rule, the knowledge of a custom must be brought home to a party who is to be affected by it. But if it be shown that the custom is ancient, very general and well known, it will often be a presumption of law that the party had knowledge of it; although, if the custom appeared to be more recent, and less generally known, it might be necessary to establish by independent proof the knowledge of this custom by the party. And one of the most common grounds for inferring knowledge in the parties, is the fact of their previous similar dealings with each other. The custom might be so perfectly ascertained and universal, that the party's actual ignorance could not be given in proof, nor assist him in resisting a custom. If one sold goods, and the buyer, being sued for the price, defended on the ground of a custom of three months' credit, the jury might be instructed that the defense was not made out, unless they could not only infer from the evidence the existence of the custom, but a knowledge of it by the plaintiff. But if the buyer had given a negotiable note at three months, no ignorance of the seller would enable him to demand payment without grace, even where the days of grace were not given by statute."

1. In Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 239, the usage was to present negotiable paper for payment on the fourth instead of the third day of grace. Fitzhugh indorsed certain paper made negotiable at the bank. The court held that he was a dealer with the bank and said that the next inquiry was, Is he bound to take notice of the usage, and will the law presume his knowledge of it? The argument was, that he was placed in a situation to know, and was therefore presumed to know. There are usages analogous to this, which have been resorted to in the interpretation of contracts, where it will be found from the authorities, the party has been deemed to be bound without personal or special knowledge. Such, among others, is the case of Noble v. Kennoway, 2 Doug. 511, where the distinguished judge, who pronounced the opinion of the court on the construction to be given to a policy of insurance, said: "Every underwriter is presumed to be acquainted with the practice of the trade he insures, and that, whether it is recently established or not. If he does not know it, he ought to inform himself; it is no matter if the usage has only been for a year." See supra, this title, Knowledge May Be Actual or Presumptive.

2. In Fulton Ins. Co. v. Milner, 23 Ala. 420, it was held that the insurer will not be allowed to repudiate a custom in reference to which he is presumed to have contracted, and under which the insured had a right to expect that his loss, if any occurred against which he was protected by the terms of the policy, would be adjusted and settled. "To give validity to a usage of this kind, it is not necessary that it should extend to the whole state; if it is generally known and acted upon in the port, city or town in which the policy is given, it will be sufficient. In this case, the usage is shown to be not only general, but universal, both with insurers and insured in the city of Mobile. And as the parties do business in that city, and this policy was effected there, they must be presumed to have known of its existence, and to have contracted in reference to it."

In Howard v. Great Western Ins. Co., 109 Mass. 384, it was said that, "In contracts of a commercial nature, a reference usage is implied. Clark v. United F., etc., Ins. Co., 7 Mass. 369; 5 Am. Dec. 50. When the meaning of a word, used to designate an article of trade, is to be fixed by proof of mercantile usage, it may be by the usage of the trade among merchants dealing particularly in that article. Underwriters insuring by certain words are bound to know the mercantile meaning of the words, and are liable according to that meaning. Astor v. Union Ins. Co., 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 202. The presumption is, that they mean to deal according to the general usage, if any exists, in relation to the subject-matter. It may be local, but must be in force among persons engaged in the trade."

In Vallance v. Dewar, 1 Camp. 503, the action was upon a policy, and in giving it an interpretation, Lord Ellenborough adjudged, that a usage which was notorious must be presumed to be equally within the knowledge of both parties; and if a usage be general, though not uniform, the underwriters are bound to take notice of it.

In Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 2 Md. 217, it was held that a usage of universal prevalence becomes a part of the existing law, and is to be noticed ex officio by courts of justice; but a particular usage must be supported by proof, and where well established it is as obligatory as the general law. Where a particular usage is presumed to be in the knowledge of the party, it enters into the contract and becomes part of it, and must be regarded in the interpretation of it. The proposition that a usage must be general in order to bind the parties, applies exclusively to cases where the knowledge of the parties and their intention to adopt the usage are inferred merely from the fact of its existence, but when their knowledge or intentions are established by other direct or circumstantial proof, their contract will be governed by the usage, however local or partial, in reference to which it is proved or presumed to have been made.

Other Cases.—In Patterson v. Crowther, 70 Md. 124, the court said: "A usage of universal prevalence becomes a part of the existing law, and is to be noticed ex officio by the courts of justice; but a particular usage has a circumscribed and limited application, and must be supported by proof. Where it is well established, it is as obligatory on the objects of its operation as the general law." Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 248. Unless it is of such great notoriety that knowledge and adoption of it may be presumed, it must be proved to be known to the party whose contract is to be brought within its operation. In Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 239, on the proof in the case showing an established and notorious usage of the banks in the District of Columbia, to allow four days of grace on promissory notes, it was held that where a party indorsed a note for the purpose of being discounted at one of these banks he must be presumed to know the usage, and that his contract must be considered as made in reference to it, and not under the general law which allowed three days of grace. In Powell v. Bradlee, 9 Gill & J. (Md.) 277, this court approved of a ruling which left it to the jury to find the fact of usage, and to decide whether the delivery of certain goods had been made in reference to it. And in regard to the custom set up in Burroughs v. Langley, 10 Md. 250, a similar opinion was given. In Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 2 Md. 241, it was said: "The proposition that a usage must be general in order to bind the parties, refers exclusively to the cases in which the knowledge of the parties and their intention to adopt the usage, are inferred merely from the fact of its existence; but when their knowledge or intentions are established by other direct or circumstantial proof, their contract will be governed by the usage, however local or partial, in reference to which it is proved or presumed to have been made."

In Lyon v. George, 44 Md. 295, L. & S., appellants, employed G., appellee, as agent to sell their glassware in Baltimore City and the District of Columbia. The suit was for commissions alleged to be due to G. It was admitted that the rate of commission to be allowed was five per cent., but the appellants claimed that this was chargeable only on goods ordered through the appellee or sold by him, while he insisted, that he was also to be entitled to a commission on all goods sold by conclusive presumption extends to any other business than that of insurance. But in the various trades there is a prima facie presumption of knowledge on the part of those engaged in the trade, of such usages as prevail in it.¹ Where the usage is them in the territory of his agency, whether through his intervention or not. To sustain his claim, the appellee offered proof that he was the sole agent of the appellants in the city of Baltimore and the District of Columbia; that he had made sales of their goods to several dealers in those places, and that commissions had been allowed and paid by them to the agent, who immediately preceded him in their employment, upon all their glassware sold in the territory of his agency, whether the order went directly from him or not. He then offered to prove that there was a uniform custom and usage, among manufacturers of glassware, to allow their local agents commissions both upon goods ordered directly through such agents, and upon goods ordered by buyers, living in the territory of the agent, directly from the manufacturer. The court said: "The objection to the admissibility of the evidence, that its offer was not accompanied with an offer to prove that the usage was known to the plaintiffs cannot be sustained. The defendant was under no legal obligation to offer such proof. The contract was entered into with a member of the plaintiff's firm, since dead, and the knowledge of the usage, on his part, when the agreement to employ the defendant as agent was made, will be presumed in law. This doctrine is so strongly recognized in the case of the Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 Har. & G. (Md.) 248, that it may now be considered a settled question in this state, and it is unnecessary to refer to other cases in support of it."

In Lowe v. Lehman, 15 Ohio St. 179, the court said: "It is not error, in such case, to instruct the jury, that if they find such custom to have been certain, uniform, and generally acquiesced in, in the city where the parties resided, and where they made the contract, they may interpret the contract in the light of the custom, although the custom was of only seven years' standing, and although the plaintiff had not actual notice of its existence."

In Janney v. Boyd, 30 Minn. 319, it was said: "A usage, to be binding simply as such, must be established, general, and uniform, as applicable to the particular business with reference to which it is sought to be set up. It must be the mode in which persons in that line do their business, so that the law will presume knowledge of it. Porter v. Hills, 114 Mass. 106; Trott v. Wood, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 443; Dodge v. Favor, 15 Gray (Mass.) 82; Hall v. State, 48 Ga. 607."

1. In Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35, it was said that such customs as are universally known to exist, enter into, and form a part of every contract to which they are applicable, although not mentioned nor alluded to in the contract, and the courts will take judicial notice without proof, of a custom which is so universal and of such antiquity that all men must be presumed to know it. "Of this character, is the custom of banks to allow their depositors to withdraw their funds in parcels. Courts will not pretend to be more ignorant than the rest of mankind, but will recognize and act upon it. The general rule is, that the creditor cannot divide up his demand against the debtor and require the latter to pay it in parcels. But everybody knows, and the courts no less than commercial men, that an exception to this rule exists as to deposits in banks. It has been so long and so universal a custom with bankers to receive deposits from time to time, as the convenience of the depositor may require, and to allow him to draw out his funds on checks, in parcels, in such sums as he sees fit, that the mere fact of opening a deposit account with a banker implies a contract on the part of the banker, to allow the depositor to withdraw his deposits in parcels."

In Burnham v. Boston Marine Ins. Co., 139 Mass. 399, it was said: "Usage is a fact; and, if it is a particular usage, it must be known to the parties, and, if a general usage, it must be so well established and known that it must be considered that parties reasonably well acquainted with the trade or business either knew it, or ought to have known it."

In Hardeman v. English, 79 Ga. 387, it was held that to make proof of a custom as such proper testimony, it general, in the technical sense, this presumption is certainly a reasonable one. The cases in the notes illustrate the principle in a practical way and reference should also be made to the paragraphs stating the rule that a usage should be general.¹

VI. A USAGE MUST BE REASONABLE—1. In General.—A usage

should appear by the proof itself that such custom is a general one, and that it is so well known and recognized within the sphere of its operation, as to be usually considered a part of all contracts made in that particular locality, in business transactions to which such custom relates. "A custom, for instance, which was observed and practised in the usual course of their dealings by all warehousemen in the city of Macon, and which was well known and understood generally by persons sending cotton to such warehousemen, would be one of which proof could be properly introduced on a trial of this kind. But evidence of the alleged custom of a particular firm in its dealings with its own customers should not primarily be allowed."

1. In Herring v. Skaggs, 73 Ala. 446, it was held that a custom from which the authority to make warranty or representation may be implied, must be a usage of sellers, so well settled, notorious, and continuous, as to raise a fair presumption that it was known to the buyer and seller, and that sales were made in reference to it.

In Boyd v. Graham, 5 Mo. App. 403, it was held that to support a recovery on the ground of negligence in failing to comply with an alleged business custom, it must appear that the custom was general and well established, so as to raise a presumption that the defendant knew it, or that he had actual knowledge of it.

In Sturges v. Buckley, 32 Conn. 18, the defendant was engaged in the business of forwarding farmers' produce by a railroad running into New York, and selling it on commission. He took of the plaintiff a quantity of cider in barrels, disposed of it with the barrels, and returned other barrels equal in number and value. These the plaintiff refused to receive and brought trover for the original ones. It was held that a custom existing among forwarders of produce, by that and other roads and by vessels to New York, of leaving the barrels with their contents in such case, and returning other barrels equal in number and value, was a general custom, of which the plaintiff would be presumed to have knowledge. The plaintiff contended that, "Evidence of a particular custom is inadmissible without proof of actual knowledge of it by the party to be affected. This leads to an inquiry as to the character of the usage in question. And however difficult it may sometimes be to distinguish between the two kinds, the usage relied upon in this case is undoubtedly of the class of general customs. It is described as such in the notice. It pertains to a very important kind of business, employing many persons, existing over a large extent of country, and centering in the city of New York. Various cases have come before this court wherein a custom has been held to be binding on a party without actual notice, and in none has the usage been more palpably a general one than in the present instance."

In Ocean Steamship Co. v. McAlpin, 69 Ga. 437, it was held that the custom of a business or trade is binding when it is of such universal practice that it becomes by implication a part of the contract. To render a custom thus binding, it is not necessary to show that it "was in the minds of both parties," before it becomes a part of the contract. The custom, as testified to by the defendant's witnesses, was in substance, that carriers, in consideration of the low rate of freight, were not responsible for the condition or quality of perishable articles on arrival, but that the custom did not restrict the carrier's liability for negligence. The plaintiff testified that he knew of no usage of the port as to the liability of common carriers for vegetables, and shipped the peas in contemplation of no such usage. The addition to the charge requested in this case to the effect that the custom must have been in the minds of both parties, "would import that this presumption could not arise, unless at the time of making the shipment, the custom or usage was in the minds of both the shipper and the carrier; indeed, this charge asserts that it must be in the minds of both the parties before it can be deemed a part of the contract. This qualification destroys the implication which the law raises, that a universal custom enters into and forms a part of the contract."

must be reasonable; ¹ otherwise it is void. But instead of saying that a usage must be reasonable, it is more accurate to say that it must not be unreasonable.² Usages are presumed to be reasonable. A usage is therefore good, unless it is shown to be bad.³ In considering a usage, the courts do not so much determine whether it is supported by satisfactory grounds, as whether it is necessarily unreasonable. If the usage is not actually unreasonable, it is reasonable. A person asserting a usage need not assign good reasons for its existence; it is enough if it cannot be shown to be unreasonable. In other words, the question to be decided in a particular case is not whether the usage is reasonable, but whether it is unreasonable.⁴

1. It must be reasonable, not against the law or public policy, nor opposed to any express term of the contract, and must be so general and well known as to justify the presumption that the parties knew of it and contracted in reference to it. Buyck v. Schwing, (Ala. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 48.

2. 1 Bl. Com. 77.

3. Indeed some judges have thought that no unreasonable usages could grow up in modern times.

In Baxter v. Rodman, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 435, it was said in reference to a usage in the whaling trade: "Perhaps there could be no better evidence of the reasonableness of a custom than its antiquity and uninterrupted prevalence. This is a custom coeval with the trade in which it is made."

In McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 376; 8 Am. Rep. 264, it was thought that it was not likely that any unreasonable practice would grow into a usage.

In Barksdale v. Brown, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 517; 9 Am. Dec. 720, the court said: "We frequently say that a usage to be binding must be reasonable; but I very much doubt whether this is not a mistaken view of the subject, and drawn from a supposed but not real analogy between commercial usages and common-law customs. I doubt whether there can be a commercial usage which can be deemed so palpably unreasonable as not to be binding. A usage so unreasonable cannot grow up. That it is a usage is itself a proof of its reasonableness, so irrefragable that no abstract reasoning can explain it away."

In Cox v. Charleston, etc., Ins. Co.,

3 Rich. (S. Car.) 331; 45 Am. Dec. 771, it is said of a general usage: "Proof of a general custom furnishes a strong reason why we should regard it as reasonable. It must be sanctioned by general concurrence in its use for several years before it can be said legally to exist. From proof of it as the general custom of the trade we are bound, at least prima facie, to conclude that it is reasonable."

In Mulliner v. Bronson, 14 Ill. App. 355, the court said: "In regard to usages of trade, men engaged in any particular line of business are generally as capable of exercising an intelligent judgment as to what is reasonable in the manner of transacting their business among themselves, as are courts and juries; and if a well-established usage is found to exist among them, it ought not to be rejected as unreasonable without full inquiry into the reasons upon which it rests." Similar expressions are found in other cases.

In Crocker v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. (Mass.) 79, it was said: "If it is done in the manner in which men of ordinary care and skill, in similar departments, manage their own affairs of like kind, this is one strong ground to hold it reasonable, and to warrant the admission of evidence of usage. What is common and usual, under given circumstances, is evidence tending to show what is reasonable."

4. In a preceding paragraph (supra, this title, Customs in the Older Law—Particular Customs), we quoted in part the words of Blackstone, Com. 77, in reference to the unreasonableness of particular common-law customs: "A custom may be good, though the particular reason of it cannot be assigned; for it sufficeth if no good legal reason can be assigned

2. Reasonableness a Question of Law for the Court.—Whether a usage is reasonable or not, is to be determined as a matter of law by the court and not by the jury.¹

against it. Thus, a custom in a parish that no man shall put his beasts into the common till the third day of October, would be good; and yet it would be hard to show the reason why that day in particular is fixed upon rather than the day before or after. But a custom that no cattle shall be put in till the lord of the manor has first put in his, is unreasonable and therefore bad; for peradventure the lord will never put in his, and then the tenants will lose all their profits." This equally applies to the usages of trade. Jones v. Waters, 5 Tyrwhitt 361, is an illustration of the manner in which courts determine the reasonableness of a custom, i. e., not by determining that it is good, but by deciding whether it is positively bad. In that case there was a custom within a borough and corporate town, that the town-crier should have the exclusive right to proclaim by the sound of a bell, the sale of all goods brought within the borough to be sold by auction there. Lord Abinger, in holding this not to be a bad custom, said: "It appears to us that there are no legal grounds upon which we can say that such a custom must be bad. It may have had a good commencement, and as it probably existed long before the art of printing was known, must have been formerly a much greater benefit to the public than at present. We see no reason to prevent the corporation from appointing a town-crier. We cannot affirm that a custom conferring on him the exclusive privilege of proclaiming by sound of bell all sales by auction about to take place within the borough, is bad in law."

In Miller v. Eschbach, 43 Md. 1, the court said in reference to a church custom attacked as unreasonable: "It cannot be expected that the courts will hold such a custom and usage to be bad, because it may be abused, and upon that ground declare it to be inapplicable and void."

In Macy v. Whaling Ins. Co., 9 Met. (Mass.) 354, it was said: "When a question is first presented as to giving legal effect to a usage proved to exist, where its binding force or its admissibility is denied by one of the parties to the cause, a court will not enforce or sanction it unless it be reasonable and convenient, and adapted, not only to increase facilities in trade, but to the promotion of just dealings between parties."

In Seccomb v. Provincial Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 305, the court said: "If a usage leads to consequences which are absurd, or which could not be fairly presumed to have been contemplated by the parties, the presumption is repelled which the law might otherwise make, that it was intended to be adopted as part of the contract. Therefore, courts of law will not enforce unreasonable or absurd usages, however uniform and well known. Parties, in framing their contracts, have a right to disregard them, and cannot be held to have entered into written stipulations with any reference to them."

In Robinson v. Mollet, L. R., 7 H. L. 802, the court said: "When considerable numbers of men of business carry on one side of a particular business, they are apt to set up a custom which acts very much in favor of their side of the business. So long as they do not infringe some fundamental principle of right and wrong, they may establish such a custom; but if, on dispute before a legal forum, it is found that they are endeavoring to enforce some rule of conduct which is so entirely in favor of their side that it is fundamentally unjust to the other side, the courts have always determined that such a custom, if sought to be enforced against a person in fact ignorant of it, is unreasonable, contrary to law, and void."

1. In Bourke v. Kneeland, 4 Mich. 336, it is said: "Whether a custom of merchants sought to be established is unreasonable or otherwise, is a question of law for the court; but user, which is the evidence of custom, is a matter for the jury, which the court will submit or not, as it shall find the custom reasonable, and not illegal, or otherwise." To the same effect are Mussey v. Eagle Bank, 9 Met. (Mass.) 306; Bowen v. Stoddard, 10 Met. (Mass.) 381; Smith v. Tyson, 1 P. & D. 307; Bastard v. Smith, 2 M. & Rob. 129; Rockey v. Huggans, Cro. Car. 220; Chicago Packing, etc., Co. v. Tilton, 87 Ill. 547; Bodfish v. Fox, 23 Me. 90; 39 Am. Dec. 611; Codman v. Armstrong, 28 Me. 91; Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105;

In considering the question of reasonableness, or the contrary, the reader must remember that the judges are guided in rendering their decisions by their individual ideas of morality, public policy, the necessities and conveniences of business, etc. It is not strange therefore, that the cases should not entirely agree upon such points. Moreover, business methods may change with business development, and what is unreasonable at one time may, at another time, by reason of the adoption of new methods, become very reasonable. The whole matter is one of judicial opinion on business and other questions not entirely legal; and what one judge may think of the reasonableness of a certain usage, can scarcely have the usual weight of a judicial authority to bind another judge who considers the usage under changed conditions.

3. Usages of Banks.—A usage of incorporated banks to honor the occasional overdrafts of customers in good standing is said to be unreasonable;¹ and so is a usage, in collecting drafts for non-resident parties, to surrender the drafts to the drawees at maturity, and, relying upon the good credit of the drawees, to take in exchange their checks in settlement;² and a usage of banks not to rectify mistakes after the person leaves the room is palpably bad.³ But it is easy to understand that a usage requiring every depositor in a savings bank to produce his pass-book when demanding payment of a deposit, is reasonable and valid.⁴

18 Am. Rep. 200. But in Mulliner v. Bronson, 14 Ill. App. 355, the court questioned whether the reasonableness of a usage was to be determined by the court or the jury. And in Paxton v. Courtenay, 2 F. & F. 131, Keating, J., at nisi prius left it to the jury to decide whether the usage was fair and proper and such as reasonable, honest, and righteous men would adopt.

1. In Lancaster Bank v. Woodward, 18 Pa. St. 357; 57 Am. Dec. 618, the court said: "If the officers might pay checks, which are properly drafts on funds deposited, when there were no funds of the drawer on deposit, the capital of banks would be liable to perversion to purposes, and in modes, that were never contemplated, either by the legislature, or the stockholders. That the practice of paying overdrafts has prevailed to some extent is quite likely, and it may be true that boards of directors have in some instances sanctioned it; but it has no authority in sound usage or in law."

2. In Whitney v. Esson, 99 Mass. 308; 96 Am. Dec. 762, the court said: "In this case it is agreed that it is a common practice for holders of drafts to accept the check of the drawee in exchange for the draft, though it is not claimed to be a general established usage. It is undoubtedly true that men who keep bank accounts are accustomed to give checks for their debts, and in most cases their standing is such that these checks are taken by their neighbors as readily as cash. This may make a common practice among men who are dealing on their own account, in respect to such dealings; but such a practice falls short of a usage applying to the collection of drafts for absent parties. And it is not a reasonable usage that one who collects a draft for an absent party should be allowed to give it up to the drawee, and sacrifice the claim which the owner may have on prior parties, upon the mere receipt of a check which may turn out to be worthless."

3. In Gallatin v. Bradford, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 209, the court said: "If such a custom does exist, it is contrary to law and ought not to meet with the sanction of a court of justice. The law declares that money received through mistake shall be refunded. Such a custom in banking institutions may be an evidence of avarice, but not of the practice of justice."

4. Warhus v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 67.

4. Usages of Carriers.—In the law of carriers, the usages passed upon by the courts have been principally those asserted by the carrier against the customer, especially in reference to the delivery of goods.¹

1. In Christian v. First Div. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 20 Minn. 21, it was held that a regulation requiring a consignee to receipt for grain belonging to him weighed for him in a delivery bin, before taking the same from such bin, and before he can ascertain, except from the defendant's statement, whether the quantity of grain receipted for is there or not, is unreasonable and void. "It would give the carrier the unjust advantage of forcing the consignee to admit that to be true, the truth of which he has no means of ascertaining. The enforcement of such a regulation would be neither more nor less than a species of duress in spirit, if not in letter. It would attach to the consignee's right to the possession of his property a condition which we have no hesitation in pronouncing to be not only unreasonable, but tyrannical."

In Reed v. Richardson, 98 Mass. 216; 93 Am. Dec. 155, a usage that in order to constitute a delivery of goods by the carrier, it is necessary for a receipt to be given by the consignee or his agent, and that until then the liability of the carrier continues, was held to be unreasonable and void. "The usage would relieve parties from responsibility for property consigned to them, although there might be evidence offered that the property had been received by the consignee or his agent. It is too plain for argument that no usage can be valid or be recognized, the effect of which is to shut out legal and competent evidence of any facts material to the trial of an issue. It is unreasonable because it imposes on a carrier the burden of procuring an act to be done by another person, the performance of which he has no power to compel or enforce, or which from design or accident on the part of others it may be difficult or impossible for him to cause to be accomplished."

In Blossom v. Champion, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 554, there was a custom at the port of New York to deliver bills of lading for merchandise shipped for transportation, only to the party holding the receipt of the master or agent of the vessel, which is usually signed and handed to the lighterman or carman at the time of the shipment. The custom appears to be not unreasonable. It does not invalidate the custom because the vessel cannot be compelled to give receipts, or the shipper to take them. The shipper may still insist that he will ship only by such vessels as will give receipts, and the vessel may also refuse to receive freight, unless the shipper will receive receipts, or conform to the custom. It is a custom that tends to the protection of the shipper, as well as the shipowner.

In Kohn v. Packard, 3 La. 224; 23 Am. Dec. 453, it was held unreasonable that a notice published in three newspapers in a city, of the time and place of landing goods, should be sufficient to place them at the risk of the consignee. In McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264, there was a custom that a railroad company should deliver freight on the platform of minor stations, whose business would not justify a warehouse, to be received there by the consignee on discharge from the car. This was held to be a reasonable custom.

In Sullivan v. Thompson, 99 Mass. 259, the defendant carrier delivered an express package addressed to the plaintiff, to a clerk in the office of the government bakery where the plaintiff was employed. This delivery was made in accordance with a usage that all packages addressed to any of the parties employed at the bakery should be delivered to one of the clerks in the office, taking his receipt, without notice to the consignee. It was held that this was a reasonable usage. The court said that all the reasonable usages of express companies "would enter into their contract and become a part of it, and their liability would be limited by such usages. These usages consist in methods of doing business; and when a party employs them to carry a package, and asks for no special stipulation, his implied proposal is that they shall carry and dispose of the package in the same manner as they are accustomed to do with such packages, provided it is reasonable; and this is the proposal which they impliedly accept, and it constitutes the contract, except so far as it is varied by express stipulations. The usage

Others are usages tending to limit the liability of the carrier toward the passenger,¹ usages limiting the time during which claims for damages against the carrier may be made,² and various may relate to the delivery of goods. The usage of the defendant in this respect is stated in the report. The only question that can arise respecting it is, whether it is reasonable. This must depend somewhat upon the character of the property to be delivered. If it were a heavy article, of no great value, and which might safely be left exposed, it might be reasonable to leave it on the premises where the consignee resides, in an exposed position. On the other hand, if it were a package of money, or article of similar value, it might not be reasonable to deliver it even at the office or counting-room of the consignee without putting it in the care of some reliable person. In the present case it was a box of clothing. It was delivered within business hours at the office of the government bakery, which was the only part of the bakery where the defendants' agents could go, to a government clerk there employed, who alone occupied the office and had charge there, and who received the parcel for the plaintiff and gave a receipt therefor. This was in conformity with the well-known usage of the managers of the bakery and with the usage of the defendants. Considering the nature of the property and the circumstances, the court are of opinion that the usage was not unreasonable, and that the defendants fulfilled their contract if they delivered the box in conformity with it."

1. In Macklin v. New Jersey Steamboat Co., 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y. C. Pl.) 229, the court said: "It seems, that regulations forbidding a passenger who pays an extra price for a state-room or private chamber, from taking his baggage with him into it, except at his own risk, is not a reasonable regulation, so far as it would apply to light baggage or hand satchels containing articles required for present use in travel."

In Central R., etc., Co. v. Anderson, 58 Ga. 393, the court held unreasonable a custom of a railroad company not to be responsible for the conduct of its agents in regard to the contents of chartered cars, of which the agents held the keys.

In Miller v. Pendleton, 8 Gray (Mass.) 547, which was an action against a ferryman for the loss of a horse and wagon by his neglect to put up the chain at the end of his boat, the court rejected as evidence a custom at other ferries on the same river to put up the chain at the request of passengers, and not otherwise. The usage sought to be proved would not be a good usage; it would make the safety of the passenger depend upon his own conduct, and not on the care and vigilance of the ferryman.

In Law v. Botsford, 26 Fed. Rep. 651, it was held that a custom to deduct from the freight earned the value of any deficiency between the quantity delivered and that stated in the bill of lading, and that the carrier shall not be permitted to show that he delivered all he received, is unreasonable and invalid. "It is a custom which has been repeatedly held void by the courts, and one which has been submitted to by shipmasters because the amount of shortage is usually too small to justify the expense of litigation."

In Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206; 93 Am. Dec. 184, the court, by Cooley, J., decided the same question as to an intermediate carrier in the same way, holding the custom to be unreasonable. "If the custom in question were confined to vesting in the intermediate consignee the same power to refuse to pay freight in cases in which the owner would be justified in doing so, it would not exceed the reasonable province of a mercantile usage. But it goes very much further when it makes the bill of lading conclusive in favor of the intermediate carrier, and allows him to make deductions for supposed deficiencies, not in fact existing, which the owner himself would not be required to make."

2. In Browning v. Long Island R. Co., 2 Daly (N. Y.) 117, a usage of a railroad company requiring all claims against it for damages, by reason of loss or injury to goods transported by it, to be made within ten days after the delivery at the station, was held to be unreasonable. As a regulation, it would be unreasonable, as more than ten days might elapse before a party knew of the loss of his property. Similarly in Memphis R. Co. v. Holloway, 4 Law & Eq. Rep. 425, a usage of others, of a more or less miscellaneous character, and growing out of the contract of carriage.¹

5. Usages Between Employer and Employee.—The relation of master and servant, or employer and employee, imposes certain legal rights and obligations, which cannot be annulled by any usage to the contrary; and any such usage established in disregard of such obligations is unreasonable and void. For example, where the employer is entitled to the exclusive service of the employee for the former's benefit and advantage, a usage violative of that right is unreasonable.² Similarly, a usage for an employee a railroad company requiring claims for losses to be made at the time goods are delivered.

1. In Loveland v. Burke, 120 Mass. 139; 21 Am. Rep. 507, the court held that it is competent for a carrier, in defense of an action for injury to goods, in their delivery, by the breaking of the requisite apparatus, to show a local usage that such apparatus is to be furnished by the consignee of the goods; and, if such usage is shown, the carrier is not liable for injury to the goods, occasioned by a latent defect in the apparatus furnished by the consignee. This usage was not unreasonable in itself, nor was it in contravention of any rule of law.

In Jelison v. Lee, 3 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 368, a usage for a consignee of a vessel, who was also owner of the cargo, to charge a commission on the freight paid by himself to the captain was held unreasonable, and therefore not binding. Such a usage is not just in a case like this, where neither service, risk, nor duty is performed, to earn commissions. A debtor in all cases might as well charge commissions for paying his own debts.

In Turnbull v. Citizens' Bank, 16 Fed. Rep. 145, it was alleged that according to the usage of the port of New Orleans, it was the business of the ship to deliver a cargo of iron where the custom-house authorities designated. Such a usage is not reasonable, for the customs authorities might designate a particular pair of scales, or a particular warehouse, for the government weighing.

In Clark v. Gifford, 7 La. 524, it was held that no usage of steamboats and towboats, that the first coming alongside of a ship, on a signal made for steam, has thereby an absolute towage contract to tow the vessel into the port of New Orleans, is binding, when such custom has only prevailed five or six years, among those having an interest in establishing it. "It would be an extraordinary occurrence in legislation, established by custom and usage, to give to a few steamboat captains, and the owners of towboats, authority to make laws, in consequence of a usage which relates solely to their own interests, of a duration of not more than five or six years, to have a binding force on the owners of vessels over the whole world."

Other usages among carriers are as follows: In Emery v. Dunbar, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 408, a usage was held unreasonable that freight paid in advance should not be recovered back, even though not earned. In Clark v. Gifford, 7 La. 524, a usage was rejected which required persons making a lawful use of waters as a highway, to yield to others who were using them unlawfully. In Stone v. Rice, 58 Ala. 95, the court could not uphold as reasonable a usage allowing a steamboat carrier to put goods out on the river bank, without protection, when the landing to which they had been consigned had been destroyed.

In Bertelot v. Part of Cargo of Brimstone, 3 Fed. Rep. 661, it was held that the custom of a port to stop discharging cargoes of brimstone when there is a high wind is not unreasonable.

2. In Stoney v. Keyport's Farmers' Transp. Co., 17 Hun (N. Y.) 583, the defendant ran a freight boat, receiving country produce, selling it, and returning the proceeds to the customers, less the freight and commissions. The plaintiff was hired by the defendant to act as freight salesman on the boat for one year. He was discharged, because he had opened a business of the same kind on the boat, selling produce for customers, and retaining the commissions for himself. A custom or usage allowing the plaintiff to conduct such a business would be unreasonable in itself, for it to make an extra profit out of his employer without the latter's consent.¹ Other instances are given in the note.²

The above instances are usages held unreasonable as against the employer. Examples are also to be found where the employee is guarded against attempts to enforce unreasonable usages against him.³

6. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—In the relation of landlord and tenant, the courts have rejected as unreasonable, a usage that the tenant might use certain property of the landlord's with-would be inconsistent with his duties. The defendant was entitled to the exclusive service of the plaintiff in the business in which he was employed, for its own advantage and benefit, and to allow him to engage in a similar business on his own account, and to bring his interests into competition with those of the defendant in which he was employed, would be unreasonable and unjust.

1. In Kedian v. Hoyt, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 145, the court quotes Wharton on Agency, §§ 238, 240, as follows: "In undertaking his employment, the agent pledges his integrity and his fidelity to his principal; and it is a fraud upon his principal to attempt to make use of his position to promote his own advantage, at the expense of his principal, and any usage by which an agent claims to appropriate such profits is nefarious and fraudulent, and as such will be repudiated by the courts."

In Wadley v. Davis, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 500, a custom that a person employed to cut staves from another's bolts has a right to take, and appropriate to his own use, the clippings, corner-pieces, and culls, without the consent of the owner, was held not to be sustained. Such a custom is not only not in harmony with law, but is manifestly against public policy. To allow a mechanic or artisan, who works up the materials of another, to keep so much of such materials as is not used for the benefit of the owner of the materials, is to array his interests in direct opposition to those of his employer. Such a custom, as a custom, binding upon the owner of the property, is unreasonable, contrary to public policy, and cannot have the sanction of law. A different principle was applied in McDonnell v. Ford, 87 Mich. 198, in which evidence of a custom among contractors and builders to charge, for each man working on a job taken by the day, an advance over the price paid him by the contractor, was held admissible; it appearing that the men were general employees of the contractors, and that their labor was worth the price charged therefor.

2. In Sweet v. Leach, 6 Ill. App. 212, the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as salesman for a year. During the year he lost some time by sickness, and the defendants refused to pay for the time lost. The plaintiff offered evidence of a custom of the trade to make no deduction from the salaries of salesmen for time lost by sickness. This was held to be unreasonable. If the custom contended for in the present case was binding, it would follow that an employer must pay for the entire period of time covered by the contract of hire, however small might be the amount of services rendered. Such a custom would be void for unreasonableness, and it is not to be supposed that any business man, of ordinary prudence, would contract for the services of a salesman in reference to it.

In Cooper v. Purvis, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 141, a custom that if a female slave, hired by the month or week, should be delivered of a child during the term, the hirer should be allowed the sum of ten dollars, was thought very unreasonable.

In Bean v. Bolton, 3 Phila. (Pa.) 87, a custom for sawyers to ship the lumber intrusted to them, and by them converted into logs, to lumber factors to be sold, in order to realize money to pay for the sawing, without the owner's consent, was held unreasonable. A custom that those who have a lien for work may sell the property on which it rests after a demand of the debt and a reasonable notice of the time and place of sale, may perhaps be good; but under the custom alleged here no man could send his logs to a saw-mill without the risk of having them sent for sale to a distance, without giving him an opportunity to pay the sawyer what he owed and resume possession of his property.

3. In Nolte v. Hill, 36 Ohio St. 186, out paying for it ; also one that imposed on the tenant, in favor of the landlord, an obligation which did not arise as matter of law from their relation to each other. These and other instances are given in the note.¹

H. employed N. to underpin his house, to protect it against injury from the excavation of a cellar then being dug on an adjacent lot by the owner thereof ; but before N. commenced work under his contract, the house was injured by the excavation. The local custom which was injected into this contract, which in terms bound the defendant to underpin the plaintiff's building, and nothing more, obligated him also to contract with the excavator of the cellar upon the adjacent lot, so that the excavating of the cellar and the underpinning of the plaintiff's house should be wrought together ; and the failure to make such arrangement with the excavator, whether he was willing or unwilling to enter into the arrangement, would constitute a breach of the defendant's contract. Such a custom, however uniform and long continued, should be declared unreasonable, and therefore of no binding force.

In Metcalf v. Weld, 14 Gray (Mass.) 210, it was held that a custom of a particular port that seamen's advance wages, due under shipping-articles, shall be paid to the shipping agent, to be paid by him to the boarding-house keeper bringing the seamen, for their benefit, is unreasonable, and does not bind the seamen, although known to them at the time of signing the articles. "It is a custom for one of the contracting parties to put himself under the tutelage or guardianship of a particular class of men, and interferes with his right to the direct control and enjoyment of the fruits of his own labor. It seems to require that the sailor should be in the charge of some boarding-house keeper, and either be in debt to him or bound to deal with him for the future. Unfortunately, this is too often the actual fact. The power which the keepers of boarding houses for seamen practically exercise over their customers is liable to great abuse, and we cannot think it wise or salutary that it should receive any extension or encouragement. A custom is not reasonable which allows a payment by the owners to their own agent, with a payment by him to some boarding-house keeper to whom the sailor is under no legal obligation, and may not choose to constitute and trust as his agent. A principle nearly analogous was applied in the case of Bowen v. Stoddard, 10 Met. (Mass.) 381."

1. In Anewalt v. Hummel, 109 Pa. St. 271, the court held unreasonable a custom that an incoming farm tenant is entitled to the hay and stubble found on the premises. It was so wholly unreasonable that it could not be set up as a defense. It was a custom that the tenant might use the property of his landlord without making compensation. The tenant might with equal propriety have set up a custom that his landlord should pay his debts or give him his share of the crops.

In Bradburn v. Foley, 3 C. P. Div. 129, a custom was alleged that the out-going tenant of a farm should look exclusively to the incoming tenant, and not to the landlord, for compensation for seeds, tillage, etc. This was held unreasonable because it imposed upon the out-going tenant, as his debtor, a person not of his choosing, and exonerated the landlord from his liability.

In Tucker v. Linger, L. R., 8 App. Cas. 508, a farm was let under an agreement reserving to the landlord "all mines and minerals, sand, quarries of stone, brick earth and gravel pits." A local custom allowed tenants of farms let in this manner, to take away the flints that were turned up in the ordinary course of good husbandry, and to sell them for their own benefit. If the flints were not turned up and removed, such farms could not be properly cultivated. It was held that the custom was reasonable and valid.

In Watherell v. Howells, 1 Camp. 34, the action was on the case in the nature of waste against his late tenant, for ploughing up certain strawberry beds. The defense was that the strawberry roots which had been grubbed up were the property of the defendant, and that he had a right to dispose of them as he thought fit. In support of this, evidence was given of a general practice of appraising and paying for strawberry beds as between an incoming and an out-going tenant ; and the fact was established that the defendant had paid to the person who assigned to him the lease of the ground a sum of money for these very strawberry beds, which were valued to him with the other stock upon the premises. But Lord Ellenborough said, that though by custom the tenant might remove some things which by the general law, as affixed to the freehold, belonged to the landlord, this could never extend to enable him to sterilize the soil. Strawberry beds might have been appraised in the manner described, because people rather than suffer mischief from another, would sometimes pay him a sum of money to observe the law.

7. Usages Between Principal and Agent.—In the relation of principal and agent, various usages have been held to be unreasonable and others have been allowed. The cases embrace usages tending to violate the duties imposed by law upon agents for the benefit of their principals;¹ usages to enlarge the agent's authority beyond that given him by his principal;² usages respecting the

1. In Fuller v. Robinson, 86 N. Y. 306; 40 Am. Rep. 540, the defendant was permitted to prove, by persons engaged in the tobacco trade, that, by the custom and usage of that business, no reliance is placed by manufacturers and sellers of cigars upon the representations of brokers employed to sell, in respect to the credit of purchasers. This was held to be error. The broker was bound to the utmost fidelity in the business of his employers. His relations to them were such, that naturally, his representations in respect to the commercial credit and pecuniary ability of his customers, would carry weight and influence. The custom and usage which was allowed to be shown, proceeds upon the theory, that a broker in the tobacco trade, is unworthy of the confidence of his employer, and that this is so well understood, that it has become the rule of the relation between them, that the employer ignores and disregards the representations of the broker, upon the vital question of the financial credit of customers, although the representation was made in the course of his duty.

Other usages passed upon by the courts are these: An unreasonable usage by which an insurance agent is entitled, for three years after the end of his employment, to receive commissions from the company on the renewal premiums on all policies obtained by him. Castleman v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Bush (Ky.) 197. A reasonable usage for commission merchants to give a credit of six months, crediting the amount of sales to the principal, charging back to the principal debts lost without negligence on the part of the commission merchants, and to be indulgent in collecting from country purchasers. Dwight v. Whitney, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 179.

In Wallace v. Morgan, 23 Ind. 399, it was held that a local custom authorizing the local factor in his own discretion, without the assent or knowledge of his principal, to ship goods consigned to him, for sale in his own market, to a factor of his own choosing, unknown to the principal, in a different and distant market, is unreasonable. The legal inference, arising from consignments to a local factor is, that he is to sell to the best advantage in the local market where he is doing business; this rule is violated by the usage set up. To ship the goods consigned to him for sale in his own market to a factor of his own choosing, unknown to his principal, in a different and distant market, at his principal's risk, and, in case of loss, without any responsibility upon himself, is unreasonable and void.

But in Wallace v. Bradshaw, 6 Dana (Ky.) 382, a somewhat different view was adopted. "It is not unreasonable, or unjust," said the court, "that a commission merchant, receiving goods on general consignment from a distant owner, and making advances therefor, should, in consideration of the interest he has acquired in the goods, and for his own safety, be authorized, under certain circumstances, at his discretion, and for the benefit of himself and the consignor, to ship the goods to a more advantageous market, or one which may in good faith be presumed to be so; and especially when, as the evidence conduced to prove, a sale at New Orleans (the residence of the commission merchant) might not have indemnified them for their advances."

2. In Dodd v. Farlow, 11 Allen (Mass.) 426; 87 Am. Dec. 726, it was held that a merchandise broker can have no implied authority, from the usage of trade, to warrant goods sold by payment of commissions to agents;¹ usages as to the powers of masters of vessels to sell the cargo or vessel;² and other instances.

8. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser.—Numerous usages in the relation of vendor and purchaser have been held to be unreasonable, and others have been decided to be proper. The

him to be of merchantable quality. "It is conceded that the broker who made the contract in this case had no express authority from the principals to warrant the articles sold to be of merchantable quality. Nevertheless, such a warranty was inserted in the sale note delivered to the plaintiffs by the broker. It was contended that an authority to make such warranty is derived from the usage of trade. But we are clearly of opinion that the alleged usage is unauthorized by law, and cannot be regarded as valid. It is unreasonable, and so contrary to the ordinary rules by which the relation of principal and agent is regulated, that it cannot be presumed to have been in contemplation of a vendor in employing a broker to make a sale of merchandise. Even if the usage was known to the vendor, he would have a right to disregard it, and to disavow a contract made in conformity to it. Seccomb v. Provincial Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 314. We have very great doubt whether a usage can be regarded as reasonable which invests an agent with power to bind his principal by a contract into which the latter had not, by any word or act, either express or implied, of his own, authorized the agent to enter. The effect of the usage in question is not merely to give authority to a person acting as broker for another to make a sale in the ordinary way with the usual stipulations and incidents of such a contract; but it extends the authority of the agent and invests him with power to insert a special agreement, which fastens on the vendor a liability not usually included in a sale of chattels in the regular course of business."

In Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 372, a usage was held bad that a man without authority from the owner, or his consent or knowledge, and without knowing whether he wishes to sell or not, may dispose of land and thereby bind the owner.

1. In Loud v. Hall, 106 Mass. 404, it was held that a general usage of a seaport, that if the seller of a ship there accepts the services of a broker, who introduces him to and brings him into negotiation with the ultimate buyer, and who is ready to continue his services until a sale is effected, he shall pay the broker a commission, whether or not the sale is completed through his agency, is a reasonable usage, and binds such a seller, notwithstanding his residence elsewhere and ignorance of the usage. There is nothing unreasonable in allowing a commission to be recovered for such services accepted and rendered, independently of the question whether the sale is finally effected by the same or by another broker.

In Green v. Wright, 36 Mo. App. 298, the court held that it cannot be declared, that a custom whereby real-estate dealers receive commissions on all sales made by them for others, but receive nothing for their services when no sales are made, is unfair, unreasonable, or in violation of any legal right. It seems entirely reasonable that men engaged in such an employment should undertake to effect sales of property on the condition of receiving a commission upon the proceeds of the sale in the event of success, and of receiving nothing in the event of failure.

In Winsor v. Dillaway, 4 Met. (Mass.) 221, the court did not express any opinion on the reasonableness of the custom alleged for ship-brokers to receive a commission of the seller of a vessel, when they introduce a purchaser to him, without being employed in the negotiation.

2. In Bowen v. Stoddard, 10 Met. (Mass.) 375, it was held that the relation between the master of a vessel and the owners is not such that they thereby become liable as acceptors of bills of exchange, drawn on them by him in a foreign port, for supplies furnished to the vessel. A usage to accept such bills cannot charge the owners as acceptors; for a usage, to be legal, must be reasonable as well as convenient, and that usage cannot be reasonable, which puts at hazard the property of the owners at the pleasure instances cannot be satisfactorily classified. All that can be said is, that any usage between a vendor and a purchaser which is unjust, or tends to wrongdoing, or leads to bad results, will be rejected; while those of different character will be approved.¹

of the master, by making them responsible as acceptors on bills drawn by him, and which have been negotiated on the assumption that the funds were needed for supplies or repairs.

In Clark v. Humphreys, 25 Mo. 99, the court followed Bowen v. Stoddard, 10 Met. (Mass.) 375, and held that a custom that a master of a boat, by a bill of exchange on the clerk of the same boat, may bind the owners for any sum he may see fit to draw, would be so inconvenient and unreasonable that no wise system of law could sanction it. Prudent men would scarcely consent to become owners of vessels under such a state of law. There is no hardship in this, for if it is necessary that a master should have such authority, it is a very easy matter to confer it on him by express words. The owner then, knowing in whom he confided, would not be in danger of being ruined by the acts of his agents.

In Hewett v. Buck, 17 Me. 147; 35 Am. Dec. 243, a custom that the master of a vessel may purchase a cargo on account of the owners, without their authority, was rejected.

In Henshaw v. Clark, 2 Root (Conn.) 103, a practice that a master may sell the vessel without the owner's authority was disapproved as unjust and impolitic.

In Bryant v. Commonwealth Ins. Co., 6 Pick. (Mass.) 131, it was held that a usage for the master of a standard vessel, to sell the cargo, without necessity, is void. The usage could not have any lawful commencement or continuance, in any case where there was no necessity to make the sale. It was against common faith and honesty. Necessity will only authorize the sale. A usage to sell without necessity would be void. It would be of no more validity, than would be a usage for the master and people to turn pirates when the vessel should take the ground.

In The Middlesex, 11 Law Rep. N. S. 14, the court did not believe there was any usage which made wharfingers the agents of the consignees to accept consignments for them; and if such a usage were proved, it could not admit that it was a reasonable or lawful usage. It would be inconsistent with the nature of the employment, and would lead to too much confusion of rights to be tolerated.

1. In Haskins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 514, it was held that a usage that no title passes upon an ordinary sale and delivery without actual payment of the consideration, would require all such transactions to be construed as mere bailments or mandates. "The inevitable uncertainty of all titles to goods transmitted from hand to hand in the usual methods of sale and purchase, and the embarrassments to which commercial transactions would be constantly exposed from the operation of a usage which would so restrict the effect of a contract of sale apparently executed by delivery, are sufficient to justify, if not to require, its rejection as unreasonable. Seccomb v. Provincial Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 305."

In Chicago Packing, etc., Co. v. Tilton, 87 Ill. 547, there was a usage of the Chicago Board of Trade giving the buyer the privilege, on cash sales, of having the goods inspected at his own expense; but if he took them without inspection, he took them at his own risk. This does not seem to be an unreasonable rule, if confined to a certain class of cases. Where two parties are each speculating in produce, where the vendor does not seem to have better means of knowledge as to the condition or quality of the article sold than the vendee has, it seems very reasonable that if the vendee, having the means of inspection, chooses to accept the goods without inspection, his mouth should forever after be closed. But where the vendor apparently occupies a position where he is reasonably supposed to know the condition and quality of the goods sold, and where the vendee might reasonably rely upon such supposition, it would seem a very unreasonable rule.

In Henkel v. Welsh, 41 Mich. 664, the court, in approving a usage that the storing of herring when receiving it, without immediate examination, does not waive objections to quality, said: "Indeed, a usage that should require a dealer at his peril to open and inspect every package before receiving it would be so burdensome and unreason-

9. Miscellaneous Unreasonable Usages.—Numerous other usages of various kinds have been considered by the courts and held to be unreasonable, or the reverse. The cases are collected in the notes. It is impossible to classify them logically. They embrace able that we might well say no one could be bound by it. It would be fixing a condition to a business which would almost preclude its successful management."

In Randall v. Kehlror, 60 Me. 37; 11 Am. Rep. 169, it was held that it was proper to show there was a custom among flour merchants of Portland, that if, after sale, flour proves musty and unsound, it is no sale, and the vendee has the right to rescind the sale and return the flour. The custom is not an unreasonable one.

In Paxton v. Courtenay, 2 F. & F. 131, which was an action against executors for work done and materials furnished by the plaintiff as an undertaker. Evidence was tendered of a usage in the undertaking business, that undertakers in each funeral charge the entire original cost of certain articles used (gloves, bands, etc.), although they might be used at other funerals. The court held that a custom or usage of trade must, to be binding, be reasonable, and is not so if it is such as honest and right-minded men would deem unfair and unrighteous. The jury brought in a verdict for the defendants.

In Schnitzer v. Oriental Print Works, 114 Mass., 123, evidence was held admissible to prove a custom that, upon a sale of berries in bags by sample, the sample represents the average quality of the entire lot, and not the average quality of the amount contained in each bag taken separately. The plaintiff contended that there was a custom in Boston that if the average quality of an entire lot of berries sold corresponded with the sample, the purchaser was bound to take them, although some bags were better than, and some inferior to, the sample. The court admitted the evidence, and said: "We cannot see that, as matter of law, a custom in a particular trade, to regard a sample as representing the average quality of an entire cargo or lot of merchandise, may not have a reasonable foundation, and be a good and valid custom entering into the contracts of parties. To a greater or less degree, it is necessarily so in all cases where the sale is of articles in their nature not entirely uniform in quality. A sample

In Everingham v. Lord, 19 Ill. App. 565, a usage was alleged on the Chicago Board of Trade, that corn sold by sample must be inspected by the purchaser within twenty-four hours after the purchase, and rejected if it is faulty; upon a failure so to inspect and reject within said time, the purchaser is held to have accepted the corn, and cannot thereafter complain that the bulk was not equal to the sample. This was held to be a reasonable usage. "In great centres of trade," said the court, "where the volume of business is immense, usages which facilitate the completion of transactions and speed the final settlement of accounts between the parties interested, are natural and indeed necessary, and when proved to exist, the courts apply them to the parties as the law of their dealings."

And in Sanders v. Jameson, 2 C. & K. 557; 61 E. C. L. 555, a custom of the Liverpool corn market that when corn is sold by sample, if the buyer does not, on the day the corn is sold, examine the bulk and reject it, he cannot afterward reject it, or refuse to pay the whole price, was held to be a reasonable custom. "The custom as stated is, that the vendee must make his objection on the spot, and at the time; and that custom, if it exist, is, I think, a perfectly reasonable one, and one to be much approved of."

But in Webster v. Granger, 78 Ill. 230, the court took a different view of the matter. "There can be no custom giving a purchaser, by sample, twenty-four hours, or any other time, to examine the goods. He purchases by sample, and if the goods do not prove equal to the sample, he may return them, or sue for and recover the difference. It would be impossible to do business in any great mart of trade in any other way. Millions are involved in purchases by samples, and they, with tickets, pass as readily as current bank notes. It is absurd to say, such purchasers have twenty-four hours, or any other time, in which to inspect the goods."

In Lehman v. Marshall, 47 Ala. 362, a local usage among cotton dealers questions depending for their solution upon common sense and plain justice as well as more technical matters of law. Questions of public policy, freedom of trade, the natural rights of property owners to the use of their property undisturbed by others, and various other considerations of different kinds enter into the decisions of the courts.¹

making a warehouse receipt transferable by delivery without indorsement, and such mere transfer to pass the cotton, unless notice is given that a receipt has been lost, or got into the hands of some one not entitled to hold it, is not a good custom. "None but good customs have any validity. A custom that has a tendency to tempt parties to acts of wrongdoing, bad faith, or dishonesty, cannot be a good custom. A bad custom ought to be abolished. It is certainly an act of bad faith and dishonesty for a party intrusted with a warehouseman's receipt for cotton, to be handed to the owner, to transfer by delivery to a third person, without the owner's knowledge or consent."

In Beals v. Terry, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 127, a usage authorizing, on a contract for goods of a specified character, the delivery of different goods, or on the sale of the goods of one mill the delivery of the goods of another mill, was held unreasonable.

A custom that when a note is given for a gold mine, and the mine proves unproductive or does not turn out according to expectation, the note is given up, was rejected in Leonard v. Peeples, 30 Ga. 61. "If there be such a custom," said the court, "it is so unreasonable that it was probably enforced by the bowie-knife."

In Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen (Mass.) 353; 90 Am. Dec. 196, a usage that sales of certain classes of goods are subject to the approval of a public inspector, but if there is no such inspection, the buyer may rescind his purchase at his pleasure, was held unreasonable.

In Gallup v. Lederer, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 282, the unreasonable usage was for merchants to sign receipts presented by cartmen with goods, without inquiry by the receiving clerk or porter as to their ownership.

In Prescott v. Hubbell, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 94, it was a usage that when the vendor of goods receives a note of the consignee of goods, without the indorsement of the purchaser, the latter is discharged and the maker alone remains liable. And in Jacobs v. Shorey, 48 N. H. 100; 97 Am. Dec. 586, it was a usage among merchants to have their goods sent to their stores by long and circuitous routes when purchased at the stores of near neighbors.

In Casco Mfg. Co. v. Dixon, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 407, an action was brought by the buyer of cotton in bales, against the seller, for a false and fraudulent packing thereof; the defendant was allowed to prove usage in the cotton trade, that, in order to entitle the buyer to an indemnity, he should give the seller notice of the fraud, as early as possible after the discovery of the false packing, in order to afford the seller an opportunity to examine the cotton and to ascertain the identity of the bags, and the marks and numbers thereon. It was held that the plaintiff, having used up the cotton, without preserving the marks and numbers of the bags, or affording the defendant an opportunity to examine it, or giving him any notice of the false packing, until six months after the discovery of the fraud, was not entitled to recover. The seller cannot know of the supposed defects until the bags have passed out of his hands, and gone to the manufacturer's to be opened and used. It is a reasonable condition of the seller's responsibility, and of the buyer's right to indemnity, that the latter shall give the former such notice, and furnish him with such proofs and means of recourse.

In Mure v. Donnell, 12 La. Ann. 369, it was held that any custom, which would authorize the buyer of cotton, after delivery and payment of the price, to throw back the cotton upon the hands of the vendor, and rescind the sale because cotton of a finer quality than the sample had been mixed in the bale in packing, would be an unreasonable custom, and could not be enforced in a court of justice.

1. Unreasonable Usages.—The following are miscellaneous usages and customs held to be unreasonable:

A custom to charge for the insertion of an advertisement in a newspaper, long after the object of it has, on the face of it, manifestly ceased, merely because its discontinuance has not been ordered. Thomas v. Graves, 1 Mill (S. Car.) 308.

A custom for public warehouse-keepers in London to have a general lien on all goods housed in their warehouses, in the name of the merchants by whom such public warehouse-keepers are employed, for all moneys due from such merchants to such warehouse-keepers for expenses about goods consigned from abroad. The custom would make the goods of a foreign merchant, which have been consigned to a London factor for sale, and by him put into the warehouse of the warehouse-keeper for safe custody, liable to a private debt of the factor. Such a custom is at once unreasonable and unjust, and, therefore, bad in law. It is obviously prejudicial, in a direct manner and in a very high degree, to foreign trade; for no foreign merchant would be content to consign his goods to this country for sale, if they could be made liable to satisfy a debt already due from the factor to the warehouse-keeper in respect of other goods. Leuckhart v. Cooper, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 99; 32 E. C. L. 55.

A custom on the Connecticut river that, when any person clears a place for seine fishing, he holds it during the season against the world. Freary v. Cooke, 14 Mass. 488; Lufkin v. Haskell, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 356.

A custom of mine owners to dispose of water pumped therefrom by allowing it to flow into the adjacent natural water-courses, polluting the streams of adjacent proprietors; this would authorize the injury or destruction of the rights of riparian owners. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 94 Pa. St. 302; 39 Am. Rep. 785.

As to certain customs held to be void on account of immorality, see Seagar v. Sligerland, 2 Cai. (N. Y.) 219; Hollis v. Wells, 3 Clark (Pa.) 169; Holmes v. Johnson, 42 Pa. St. 159; State v. Bukner, 76 N. Car. 118; State v. Lewis, Add. (Pa.) 279; Bankers v. State, 4 Ind. 114.

In Horner v. Watson, 79 Pa. St. 242; 21 Am. Rep. 55, it appeared that H., in excavating coal, removed the "ribs," composed of coal, which supported the roof of the mine, causing the surface to sink and crack, so that water from the surface flowed into his mine, and thence into the mine of W. The court held that H. was liable to W. for any injury done by such flow of water, although resulting from the customary practice of mining in that region, and that a custom that in mining the owner may remove the "ribs" and allow the surface to sink, is not reasonable. "This point was raised in the case of Jones v. Wagner, 66 Pa. St. 429; 5 Am. Rep. 385, where it was held, that of common right the mining right was servient to the surface to the extent of sufficient supports to sustain it, and that there could be no custom to the contrary. The reason was that the business of mining in this state was of a date too recent to give such a custom the age necessary for its validity. We are willing, however, to go one step further and say, that the alleged usage lacks reasonableness. It is not reasonable that that which the law grants as of common right should, not merely be modified, but abrogated by custom or usage. . . . In the case of Hilton v. Lord Granville, 5 Q. B. 701; 48 E. C. L. 699, the defendant pleaded a prescription to take the coals under any lands in the manor, without liability for damages that might occur in consequence of the taking thereof. It was held that such a prescription or custom was void because unreasonable. . . . Reference was had to the opinion of Willes, C. J., in Broadbent v. Wilks, Willes 360, in which it is said that 'the true objection to the custom pleaded was that it was uncertain and unreasonable.'" Later English cases cited to the same effect were Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739; 64 E. C. L. 758, and Blackett v. Bradley, 1 B. & S. 940; 101 E. C. L. 940. The case was followed in Coleman v. Chadwick, 80 Pa. St. 81; 21 Am. Rep. 93.

In Taylor v. Carpenter, 2 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 1, the action was for deceit in using the plaintiff's trade-marks on the defendant's goods; and selling them as and for the plaintiff's. The court excluded evidence of a general custom in the United States, England, Germany, and France, for the last twenty years, to use and imitate the marks of foreigners with impunity, and that such custom was generally known in the commercial world and not contrary to the laws of such countries, and held that there was no principle by which a usage in this or a foreign country is competent evidence in defense of a wrong. "A custom ought to be, at least, moral and reasonable in order to be upheld. Bacon's Abr., 'Custom' C. A party can hardly set up his own bad conduct or character in defense to an action, nor justify them when prosecuted, because they may not have been materially worse than those of some other persons."

In Gano v. Palo Pinto Co., 71 Tex. 99, it was held that it was the duty of the county commissioners' court to select such agents as might be necessary to assist them in the discharge of their duties. Such duty should not be delegated. A custom to do so would be unreasonable and should not be obligatory.

In Cropper v. Cook, L. R., 3 C. P. 194, it was held that a usage in the wool trade in Liverpool, that, when a broker is employed to buy wool, he may either contract in the name of his principal, or, at the request of the seller, may, without communicating the fact to his principal, make himself personally responsible for the price, was a good and reasonable usage. "It may be material to the broker to conceal from the seller the buyer's name, though the same reason may not exist for concealing the name of the seller. The custom may therefore be a reasonable one."

In Horan v. Strachan, 86 Ga. 408; 22 Am. St. Rep. 471, it was held that a custom allowing a custody commission fee of two and one-half per cent. for taking charge of a vessel on fire in port, and preserving her cargo, an undertaking that requires great skill, is not unreasonable. But a custom allowing commission to the person in charge of the ship on disbursements not actually made by him, is void. It would be absurd to hold that a person is entitled to two and a half per cent. commission on disbursements which he never made, and did not have the money to make, and had made no arrangements to procure the money to make.

In Rankin v. American Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 619, a usage was alleged to require a survey, by the port-wardens, of goods damaged, as a preliminary proof of the loss in order to charge the insurance company. The court held this to be unreasonable. "The survey, when produced, is not to conclude either party, as to any fact stated in it. It is not to be evidence on the trial, even prima facie, for or against either party. The non-produce-tion of it is to be fatal to the plaintiff's action; but when produced, it is to prove nothing."

In M'Gregor v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co., 1 Wash. (U. S.) 39, the court rejected as unreasonable, a usage of marine insurance to pay only two-thirds of the gross freight on a total loss.

In Wilkes v. Broadbent, 1 Wils. 63, it was said that a custom is void which is unreasonable, uncertain, savours too much of arbitrary power, and tends to make a lord of a manor a judge in his own cause. Other cases are Graham v. Williams, 16 S. & R. (Pa.) 257; 16 Am. Dec. 569; Dixon v. Dunham, 14 Ill. 324; Jordan v. Meredith, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 318; 2 Am. Dec. 373; Pickering v. Dementitt, 100 Mass. 421; Foley v. Bell, 6 La. Ann. 760.

Reasonable Usages.—The following are miscellaneous usages and customs held to be reasonable.

The usage was for the consistory of the church to make nominations for elders and deacons, and for the officiating minister to announce the names of the nominees from the pulpit for two successive Sundays previous to Easter Monday, the day of the election; and none could be voted for except those who had been proclaimed from the pulpit as nominees. Miller v. Eschbach, 43 Md. 1.

A custom for the owner of a lot of land, after giving notice to the owner of an adjoining lot to build his half of a partition fence, and his refusal to do so, to build the whole, and hold the party refusing liable for his share of the expense. The party refusing should have notice to join in the work; and, if he fails to do so after a reasonable time, he ought to contribute his proportion of the expense. Knox v. Artman, 3 Rich. (S. Car.) 283.

Fishermen pursue whales in open boats, and shoot them. When killed, they sink at once to the bottom, but in the course of from one to three days they rise and float on the surface. The usage on Cape Cod, for many years, has been that the person who kills a whale, in the manner and under the circumstances described, owns it. Ghen v. Rich, 8 Fed. Rep. 159.

In Swift v. Gifford, 2 Low. (U. S.) 110, Lowell, J., decided that a custom among whalers in the Arctic seas, that the iron holds the whale, was reasonable and valid.

A usage among printers and book-sellers, that a printer, contracting to print for a bookseller a certain number of copies, shall not print from the same types while standing, an extra number for his own use, is reasonable and not in restraint of trade. Williams v. Gilman, 3 Me. 276.

An ordinance which calls for "a pavement of granite blocks, eight inches deep," may be construed in the light of a custom prevailing at the time of its adoption, and defining the dimensions of the granite blocks used, as not less than seven, nor more than eight inches deep. Such custom is not unreasonable, if it be impracticable to construct the pavement called for by the ordinance with granite blocks all exactly eight inches deep, and the provisions of the ordinance be substantially complied with by a pavement in conformity with such contract. Cole v. Skrainka, 37 Mo. App. 427.

In Adams v. Pittsburgh Ins. Co., 95 Pa. St. 348; 40 Am. Rep. 662, the court held that a custom so general and notorious may exist as to authorize the captain of a steamboat to effect an insurance on it for the benefit of the owners, without their express directions, is well settled by authority. It would not be in conflict with any statute, nor would it be unreasonable or contrary to public policy.

In Ward v. Vosburgh, 31 Fed. Rep. 12, it was held that the custom of "ringing up," in vogue among brokers and commission merchants, is founded in commercial convenience, and when not adopted to promote a gambling transaction, is not in contravention of the law.

In Knowles v. Dow, 22 N. H. 387; 55 Am. Dec. 163, it was held that a custom for the inhabitants of a town to haul seaweed from the margin of the water and deposit it upon the close of the plaintiffs, and afterward haul it away when convenient, was not unreasonable. Here it was said that a valid custom must have existed from time immemorial; but a regular usage for twenty years, unexplained and uncontradicted, is sufficient to warrant a jury in finding the existence of an immemorial custom. A customary right to do anything upon the land of another is a right adverse to that of the owner of the soil, and must have been acquiesced in by him, and its existence must not have been the subject of contention and dispute. It must be certain and definite, and must also be open and public. To prove a custom for all the inhabitants of Hampton to deposit seaweed upon the close of the plaintiffs, the defendants offered evidence that thirty of the inhabitants had done so for many years. This was held to be competent evidence to be submitted to the jury to prove the custom. A plea alleged a custom in the inhabitants of Hampton to deposit seaweed upon the plaintiffs' close. The evidence was that only those inhabitants of Hampton exercised the right who lived at a convenient distance from the sea-shore. This too was competent evidence of the custom. The custom alleged and substantially proved, was to deposit upon the beach or sand-hills of the plaintiffs the seaweed gathered between high and low water mark. In this there seems to be nothing unreasonable. It is for the benefit of the inhabitants of Hampton. Tindal, Lord Ch. J., in Tyson v. Smith, 9 Ad. & El. 406; 36 E. C. L. 163, said: "The custom is in favor of the many, and the only party against whom it is set up, and by whom it is now opposed, is the lord of the manor."

In Huston v. McArthur, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 54, the custom was, in making surveys for government lands granted to a settler, to extend the lines five per cent. beyond the length called for, and it was insisted that this custom had been so long and so uniformly persevered in, as to become, in fact, a part of the law by which titles and claims to land within the district must be regulated. The court said: "Is this pretended custom reasonable? If it be reasonable that a man to whom the government makes a donation of one thousand acres of land, and suffers him to locate it himself, should, instead of the one thousand acres, appropriate to himself twelve or fifteen hundred acres, then this pretended custom is reasonable. But if by such conduct he commits a fraud upon the government and upon other individuals in the same situation as himself, it is unreasonable, and ought not to be sanctioned."

In Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 372; Watkins v. Eastin, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 402, and Bodley v. Craig, 1 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 77, certain customs respecting settlements and pre-emption warrants were rejected as unreasonable.

In Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457, it was held that a usage or custom for the inspector of flour, who by the statute is to receive a specified money compensation, to take to his

VII. A USAGE MUST NOT BE CONTRARY TO LAW—1. In General.—This is perhaps the most difficult branch of our subject. In discussing the meaning of the word “custom,” in a note to a previous paragraph, allusion was made to the matter; it will now be referred to at length.

The expressions of the courts are perhaps unanimous to the effect that the operation of settled rules of law cannot be changed by proof of a usage having a contrary effect. If, on a given state of facts, the rights and liabilities of the parties to a contract are fixed by the general principles of the common law, they cannot be changed by any local custom.¹ The applications of this rule own use the flour drawn from the barrel in the process of inspection, called the draft flour, as an additional compensation or perquisite, would be bad, as being unreasonable, unjust, and contrary to the policy of the law. The court said: “Such a custom, when invoked for the benefit of a public functionary by transferring to him a portion of the goods of the citizen, with which he is called upon to deal in the discharge of his office, by way of additional compensation or perquisite, over and above what the law expressly provides, would be bad, as being unreasonable, unjust, and contrary to the policy of our laws. It would be unjust and unreasonable that a public officer, having a specified duty to perform in relation to the property of others for a prescribed fee, should by the discharge of that duty acquire a right, not only to the fee allowed, but also to a part of the property itself. It thus makes him the sole judge of the compensation which he shall receive.”

Other cases stating or illustrating the rule that a usage must be reasonable are Hammerton v. Honey, 24 W. R. 603; U. S. v. Buchanan, 8 How. (U. S.) 83; East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 596; 51 Am. Rep. 489; Sweet v. Leach, 6 Ill. App. 212; Mulliner v. Bronson, 14 Ill. App. 355; Bissel v. Ryan, 23 Ill. 566; Gilbert v. McGinnis, 114 Ill. 28; Kendall v. Russell, 5 Dana (Ky.) 501; 30 Am. Dec. 606; Castleman v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Bush (Ky.) 197; Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105; 18 Am. Rep. 200; Dwight v. Whitney, 15 Pick. In Latimer v. Alexander, 14 Ga. 259, the court said: “A mere local usage in a small part of the country cannot change the law and give a person a remedy against a person, when the law does not, and generally it will be found that the idea that crops out in some of the cases that a usage or custom that conflicts with the common law, cannot prevail, is after all nothing more than a well-recognized rule that the common law will prevail against a mere usage, unless the usage is of such a character and of such long standing and notoriety as to indicate that the parties must have contracted in reference to it.”

In Dickinson v. Gay, 7 Allen (Mass.) 29; 83 Am. Dec. 656, it was said: “But if no peculiar habits, modes, or courses of business were allowed to affect the legal rights of parties, it is difficult to see how there could be any valid usages. In all the cases where usages are sustained, they do in fact operate to give effect to contracts different from that which the common law would have done, and they operate in contravention of the rules of the common law.”

In Broussard v. Bernard, 7 La. 211, it was said that the custom which the defendants attempted to prove, was not, as the plaintiff objects, contrary to the general law of the land, but an exception to the ordinary rules which regulate partnerships. If the proof of customs could be rejected, because it established something different from are illustrated by the cases in the notes to the several succeeding sections.¹

2. Reasons for the Rule.—The reasons given for this rule are that if the common law of the land is to be overruled by local usages of particular trades, embarrassments of serious nature would surely result. The law would become unsettled and conflicting. Upon a given state of facts, there might be one law in one county, and a different law in another county. The establishment of the law would be withdrawn from the courts and the legislature, and placed in the hands of persons not authorized to declare it. It is against public policy that such things should be.²

the law, no custom could be proved, for if it were not different, it would make a part of the law.

1. Distinction Between this Title and Unreasonableness.—In many cases it is difficult to determine whether an objectionable usage should be classified under the head of unreasonableness, or whether it should be considered as contrary to law. The cases do not discriminate clearly between the two divisions. In one case a usage of agents which violates the rights of principals may be disallowed as unreasonable; and in another case a similar usage may be held to be void, as contrary to the established principles of law. Some usages are so bad that they may properly be rejected upon either or both, of these grounds. The reader will therefore notice that the cases tend to overlap each other; and it will be advisable for one desiring to learn whether the reasonableness of a given usage has ever been passed upon by the courts, to also examine the appropriate sections treating of usages contrary to law, and vice versa.

2. In Gordon v. Little, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 533; 11 Am. Dec. 632, Gibson, J., said: "I know not a greater or a more embarrassing evil than a law of merely local obligation. The rule of the carrying business of the Ohio ought to be that of the Juniata, the Susquehanna, the Delaware, and their tributary streams. Suppose a different usage to exist in respect to each, is there to be a different law in respect to each? In fact, that result would be inevitable; for I understand the evidence to have been offered to a custom peculiar to the Ohio, and it will hardly be expected that a usage the same in every particular should prevail with respect to all our rivers. It is impossible to get away from the conclusion that by giving the usage any further effect than that of a convenient subject of reference to explain a latent ambiguity in the expressions of the parties, where their meaning would be otherwise doubtful, we repeal an established principle of the common law—a matter which, I apprehend, is not open to us."

In Lawrence v. State, 20 Tex. App. 536, the court said: "A rule of law can never be subverted by local custom. To sanction the doctrine that it could would be to unsettle the law, would open for discussion and neighborhood proof, not the facts, but the law, and allow such neighborhood the right to claim a distinct law of its own, thereby destroying the beauty of the law which consists in the uniformity of its action throughout the land. Lockhart v. De-wees, 1 Tex. 535; McKinney v. Fort, 10 Tex. 220; White & Wilson's Ct. App. Civ. Cas., §§ 272, 353, 696."

In Winder v. Blake, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 332, the court said: "We did not import from the mother country any of the special customs, which, in particular localities, are allowed to supersede the common law. All legislative power is vested in our general assembly. We can recognize no other law-making power, and there is no intimation to be met with in any of our decisions, that special customs can grow up among us, whereby rights may be affected, or the common law be in anywise changed."

In Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 383, the court said: "Whatever tends to unsettle the law, and make it different in the different communities into which the state is divided, leads to mischievous consequences, embarrasses trade, and is against public policy. If, therefore, on a given state of facts, the rights and liabilities of the parties to a contract are fixed by the general principles of the common law, they cannot be changed by any local custom of the

3. Usages of Carriers.—Although usages may, in many cases, be received to determine the proper method of conducting the business of carriers, they cannot be admitted to overturn a settled rule of law applicable to such business. Thus, it is well settled that no freight is payable upon goods lost by peril of the sea; and this rule cannot be changed by a usage of carriers to the contrary.¹ Similarly, other usages of carriers limiting their liability contrary to the established rules of law, have been rejected.² And, conversely, local usages requiring the carrier to do something more than the law imposes have been disallowed, as contrary to law.³

4. Usages Regarding Commercial Paper.—The rules of law regarding commercial paper and the rights of bankers and depositors place where the contract was made. In this case the common law did not, on the admitted facts, imply a warranty of the good quality of the wool, and no custom in the sale of this article can be admitted to imply one."

In Rogers v. Allen, 47 N. H. 529, it was held that usages or customs are not permitted to have effect to contravene any established general rule of the law, and therefore evidence in proof of any such usage is ordinarily inadmissible. "This rule excludes both general and local usage, when the evidence offered is opposed to, or alters, the well-settled principles, either of the common or statute law."

In Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 37, the court said: "Nor is evidence of usage admissible to oppose or alter a general principle or rule of law, and upon a fixed state of facts, to make the legal rights or liabilities of the parties other than they are by the common law."

1. In Frith v. Barker, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 327, the question was whether a custom was valid that freight must be paid on goods lost by peril of the sea, the custom being contrary to the legal rule that no freight is due in such cases. Chief Justice Kent held the custom invalid, saying: "Though usage is often resorted to for explanation of commercial instruments, it never is, nor ought to be, received to contradict a settled rule of commercial law."

In Emery v. Dunbar, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 408, a previous case, the same point had been determined adversely to the custom set up. The court said: "Where a general rule, a principle of law like this, has been long and well established, it cannot be controlled by proof of any usage to the contrary."

2. In Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206; 93 Am. Dec. 184, the court refused to allow a custom to contradict the rule of law that a carrier's bill of lading, like any other receipt, may be contradicted by parol in respect to whether the goods were received or not by the carrier.

In Cranwell v. Ship Fanny Fosdick, 15 La. Ann. 436; 77 Am. Dec. 190, the court rejected a custom which, contrary to law, would relieve the carrier of all responsibility toward the shipper in certain cases.

In Kohn v. Packard, 3 La. 224; 23 Am. Dec. 453, it was held that notice to the consignee of the time and place when and where goods are to be landed, is indispensably necessary. "The usage, as proved in evidence, is this: that notice in the newspapers of the time and place of landing goods from a vessel, is such notice as places the goods at the risk of the consignee. In other words, that constructive notice binds the party as effectually as personal notice would. If this be the custom, then it is one which this court is prepared to say, it cannot sanction."

3. In Boon v. Steamboat Belfast, 40 Ala. 184; 88 Am. Dec. 761, the court said: "The rule which makes the common carrier in the nature of an insurer, and answerable for every loss not attributed to the act of God or public enemies, according to Lord Holt, 'was a politic establishment, contrived by the policy of the law, for the safety of all persons, the necessity of whose affairs obliged them to trust that sort of persons.' The same public policy which established this rule, and which has continued it in existence for ages, forbids its destruction at this day in any locality, by any pretended cannot be controlled by a contrary usage.¹ Whether or not a particular note or bond, for example, is negotiable or not, is a matter of law, and no usage can alter the legal character which the law fixes upon it.² Similarly, questions regarding the legal custom; especially when the business of common carriers has so much increased, and the necessity for the rule, instead of being diminished, is also increased. The custom then sought to be established in this case, is contrary to law, in contravention of a sound public policy, and cannot receive our sanction."

In Schieffelin v. Harvey, Anth. (N. Y.) 76, a usage was offered in evidence to the effect that as soon as a custom-house officer was put on board a vessel, the goods were at the risk of the shipper. It was said that this was the custom of merchants. The evidence was rejected, the court saying: "The established principles of law cannot be controlled by custom."

In Reed v. Richardson, 98 Mass. 216; 93 Am. Dec. 155, it was held that a usage of a port that, in order to constitute a delivery of goods by the carrier, it was necessary for a receipt to be given by the consignee or his agent, and that until then the liability of the carrier continues, is illegal and void, for it tends to contravene the fixed rule of law. By the common law, a carrier is discharged of his duty when he has made an actual or constructive delivery at the proper time and place. "Doubtless usage may regulate the manner of delivery or the time when and the place where it may be made. This would be within the legitimate range of the operation of a usage. But it cannot prescribe or determine that acts which the law declares to be a delivery shall not be sufficient to constitute it."

1. In Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 663, a usage of bankers in Washington in respect to drafts by customers for "coin" or "currency" was offered. The usage was rejected as contrary to law, and the court said that the general rule of law is that if a merchant deposits money with a bank, the title to the money passes to the bank, and the latter becomes the debtor of the merchant to that amount; and it is not perceived that the evidence offered, if it had been admitted, could have had any other effect than to control the general rule of law, as it is not pretended that the evidence showed a special deposit. Viewed in any light consistent with the other evidence in the record, the testimony was either entirely immaterial or inadmissible, as tending to control the well-settled rules of law.

2. In Vermilye v. Adams Express Co., 21 Wall. (U. S.) 139, a number of United States treasury notes, which had been stolen from the express company, were purchased by a firm of bankers after the date at which, on their face, they were payable or convertible into bonds. It appeared that the company, after the loss, had been prompt in giving warning of the theft, by advertising in the newspapers and delivering notices to the principal brokers, including the defendants. The latter introduced evidence to show that notes of the kind in question continued to be bought and sold by bankers and brokers after they had become due; that it was not customary for dealers in government securities to keep records or lists of the numbers or descriptions of the bonds alleged to have been lost, stolen, or altered, or to refer to such lists before purchasing such securities; that it would be impracticable to carry on the business of dealing in government securities if it were necessary to resort to such lists and make such examination previous to purchase; and that the purchase of the notes in question was made in the ordinary and usual mode in which such transactions are conducted. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that, as to such overdue paper, a purchaser takes subject to the rights of antecedent holders, to the same extent as in the case of other paper bought after maturity, and that the notes could be recovered from the defendants. "Bankers, brokers, and others," said the court, "cannot, as was attempted in this case, establish by proof a usage or custom, in dealing in such paper, which in their own interest contravenes the established commercial law. If they have been in the habit of disregarding that law, this does not relieve them from the consequences, nor establish a different law."

In Bowen v. Newell, 8 N. Y. 190, it was held that the usage of banks in Connecticut to regard drafts drawn nature of other written obligations are not subject to the operations of usages contrary to legal rules. Nor can the usages of bankers be valid when in conflict with the rules of law determining the mutual rights and obligations of bankers and depositors.¹

5. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—In the relation of landlord and tenant, it is held that when the law determines that certain articles are fixtures, evidence cannot be received to show a usage to regard them as personalty. The legal character of articles as fixtures cannot be evaded by proof of a usage contrary to the law.²

6. Usages Between Principal and Agent.—In the relation of principal and agent, the law imposes certain duties and obligations upon the agent from the very fact of his employment to act on behalf of his principal. These may be summarized in the general statement that the agent must always act for the benefit of his principal, and never against him. Such being the law, the validity upon them payable at a day certain as checks and not entitled to days of grace, is inadmissible as evidence to control the rules of law in relation to such paper. See also Woodruff v. Merchants' Bank, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 673; Morrison v. Bailey, 5 Ohio St. 13.

In Marine Bank v. Chandler, 27 Ill. 525; 81 Am. Dec. 249, the court said: "Nor can the special custom of banks in a particular locality change the laws of the land regulating the value of the currency and fixing the standard value of the current coins. That parties may contract to receive any commodity in lieu of money in payment of indebtedness, is undeniably true. This can only be done by special agreement, and not by usage. No custom can compel a creditor, in the absence of a special agreement, to receive anything but the constitutional currency of the country. The fact that the business men of the particular place have been in the habit of receiving depreciated paper money in payment of their demands by no means proves that all creditors in that locality have agreed to receive the same, much less a person residing hundreds of miles distant. To have such an effect, a special agreement must be proved."

In Strong v. King, 35 Ill. 9; 85 Am. Dec. 336, the court said: "It can hardly be supposed that a usage in New York City, that checks may be received as a means of payment for a bill, and the bill be held over until the next day without protest, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the check will be paid, could alter the general commercial usage of the world, however long or well established. If such a custom does obtain in New York, it cannot affect the law of other places."

1. In Gunn v. Bolckow, L. R., 10 Ch. 491, it was held that wharfingers' certificates were not documents of title, and their delivery passes no right to the goods; and no custom of trade can give them the effect of warrants or documents of title as against vendors.

In Crouch v. Credit Foncier, L. R., 8 Q. B. 374, the court said that the contract in controversy prevented the debenture from being a promissory note, even if it had been under hand only; and that it was not competent to the defendants to attach the incident of negotiability to such instruments, contrary to the general law; and that the custom to treat them as negotiable, being of recent origin and not the law merchant, made no difference, as such a custom, though general, could not attach an incident to a contract contrary to the general law.

In Hathesing v. Laing, L. R., 17 Eq. 92, the court rejected a local custom of trade, which was alleged to exist at Bombay, by virtue of which the mate's receipts for goods shipped on board a vessel are negotiable instruments, and pass the property in the goods in the same manner as bills of lading.

2. Usages as to Fixtures.—In Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray (Mass.) 536; 66 Am. Dec. 424, it was held that a steam engine set upon a granite block, and a boiler set in bricks in such a manner that they become a part of the of any usage in conflict therewith, cannot be recognized, in the absence of clear proof that the principal assented to such usage. In other words, no usage in the relation of principal and agent is valid if it conflicts with the fundamental rules of law defining the rights of such persons.

It is an elementary rule, that an agent cannot act as such when his own interest conflicts with that of his principal. Therefore an agent to buy, cannot sell his own property to his principal. If the agent was to act as vendor, the intrinsic character of his relation to his principal would necessarily be changed. Now the question arises whether an agent employed to buy, may, by the usage of a particular place or trade, be authorized to sell his own goods to his principal; in other words, whether the rule of law above stated may be abrogated by a usage to the contrary. The decisions are clear that, unless the principal is proved to have assented to such a usage, he cannot be bound by it.¹

Similarly, it is contrary to the principles of the law of agency

realty, could not be regarded in law as personality by reason of a usage and custom between manufacturers and purchasers of such property to regard it as personality. The court said that the evidence of usage was rightly rejected; it could not be received to control the operation of law, arising from the actual annexation of the engine and boiler to the freehold.

In Christian v. Dripps, 28 Pa. St. 271, it was held that certain machinery in a mill were fixtures and belonged to the realty, and that their legal character as such could not be evaded by proving that there was a custom in opposition to the rule of law.

In Thomas v. Davis, 76 Mo. 72; 43 Am. Rep. 756, a distinction was drawn between custom as to fixtures in cases of landlord and tenant, and grantor and grantee: "As between landlord and tenant, evidence of custom with respect to chattels annexed to the realty, by which they are treated as personality, is admissible; but not so with respect to articles thus annexed by a mortgagor or grantor, before the execution of his conveyance. He has absolute dominion over the property, both real and personal, and his intention in making the annexation is to be determined by a consideration of the character of the annexation, and its appropriation or adaptation to the use or purpose of that part of the realty with which it is connected. A custom which might be clearly established, as between landlord and tenant, could not possibly affect a conveyance by the owner of the fee who had annexed the chattels to the realty."

1. Robinson v. Mollett, L. R., 7 H. L. 802; L. R., 7 C. P. 84; L. R., 5 C. P. 646, is the leading modern English case upon this subject. In the court of common pleas, the four judges were equally divided in opinion; on appeal to the exchequer chamber, the six judges there were also equally divided; finally the House of Lords pronounced a unanimous judgment, which may be given somewhat fully. The decision was that a custom in a particular market that a broker who has purchased, and is purchasing, goods of a particular kind, in his own name, may take portions of those goods and supply them to principals who have employed him in his character of broker to buy such goods for them, is one of a peculiar nature, and cannot be supported as against a principal not proved to have been acquainted with it when he gave his order. And it was questioned whether it applies at all except as between brokers in that particular market. Furthermore, the mere fact of employing a broker to execute a commission as a broker, in a market where such a usage prevails, will not make the principal liable under it. And the rule that a usage which really changes the character of the broker and the nature of the dealing cannot be supported. The facts were that R., a merchant in Liverpool, gave orders to a tallow broker in London to buy certain quantities of tallow for him. The broker did not buy the specified quanti-for an agent to act for both vendor and vendee in a sale of property. In such a case the agent's interests would be antagonistic to those of his employers. A usage permitting the agent to occupy such a position, which the law has determined he should not occupy, is void, unless the principal assents to the usage.¹

Nor can the rule that profits made by an agent out of his principal's property, belong to the principal, and not to the agent, be ties from any person, though he sent bought notes in the usual form, "Bought of A. on your account;" but, both before and after the order, he bought from various persons, in his own name, larger quantities of tallow, proposing to allot to R., the quantities R. had desired to be bought. On R.'s refusal to accept, the broker sold the tallow, and brought an action for the difference. It was held that, though the evidence showed such a mode of dealing to be the usage in the London tallow market, the action was not maintainable against a principal who did not appear to have had knowledge of its existence. The following are extracts from the judgments of the judges in the House of Lords: "In the language of my brother Hannen, in the court below, L. R. 76, p. 98: 'It appears to me to amount to a custom for a broker in the tallow trade in London, to do something entirely inconsistent with the character of a broker, viz., to convert himself, from an agent to buy for his employer, into a principal to sell to him.' It is said by Willes, J., in his judgment in the court of common pleas, L. R., 5 C. P. 655, that, 'It is an axiom of the law of principal and agent that a broker employed to sell cannot himself become the buyer, nor can a broker employed to buy become himself the seller, without distinct notice to the principal, so that the latter may object if he think proper; a different rule would give the broker an interest against his duty.' I agree in this, and think that although a custom of trade may control the mode of performance of a contract, it cannot change its intrinsic character. Agents cannot act so as to bind their principals where they have an adverse interest in themselves. I submit that this fundamental and important rule cannot be defeated by a usage, or, as Mr. Justice Willes calls it, a lax practice of brokers, which is plainly of their own creation for their convenience and advantage in the settlement of speculative dealings."

In Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, the Supreme Court of the United States, following the above case, held that a custom among brokers in the settlement of differences which works a substantial and material change in the principal's rights or obligations is not binding upon the principal without his assent; and that assent can be implied only from knowledge of the custom which it is claimed authorizes it.

1. In Farnsworth v. Hemmer, 1 Allen (Mass.) 494; 79 Am. Dec. 756, the court declared that a custom that a real-estate broker could act both for the vendor and vendee in the same transaction, without the knowledge of either, was void, as contrary to the principles of the law of agency. "The law does not allow a man to assume relations so essentially inconsistent and repugnant to each other. The duty of an agent for a vendor is to sell at the highest price; of the agent of the purchaser, to buy it for the lowest. The broker commits a fraud on his principals in undertaking, without their assent or knowledge, to act as their mutual agent, because he conceals from them an essential fact, entirely within his own knowledge, which he was bound in the exercise of good faith to disclose to them. The usage on which the plaintiff relied was wanting in these essential elements. It would be unreasonable, because, if established, it would operate to prevent the faithful fulfillment of the contract of agency. It would be contrary to good morals and sound policy, because it would tend to sanction an unwarrantable concealment of facts essential to a contract, and operate as a fraud on parties who had a right to rely on the confidence reposed in their agents."

In Raisin v. Clark, 41 Md. 158; 20 Am. Rep. 66, the court decided a similar case in the same manner, saying: "It is hardly necessary to add that the usage or custom relied on cannot avail. A usage in contravention of a well-settled and salutary rule of law cannot be sustained by courts of justice."

annulled by a usage that such profits belong to him. Such a usage would override the established rule of law.¹

In numerous other cases, various usages of agents have been held void as contrary to the principles of the common law. Thus where, by the established law, an agent has no authority to do a certain act, usage will not confer such authority as against the principal, unless known and assented to by the principal; and conversely, where, by established law, an agent has authority to do a certain act, such authority cannot be withdrawn by the usage of a particular place.²

1. In Jacques v. Edgell, 40 Mo. 77, it was held that where an agent acts for an agreed salary or compensation, he will be held bound by the agreement; "and where there is no positive or express contract, a reasonable compensation will be implied; but in neither case will he be allowed to retain profits incidentally obtained in the execution of his duty, even though it may have the sanction of usage. Lees v. Nuttal, 1 R. & M. 53; 2 M. & R. 819; Reed v. Warner, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 650; Massey v. Davis, 2 Ves. Jr. 317, and the learned note by Mr. Sumner."

In Diplock v. Blackburn, 3 Camp. 43, the plaintiffs, executors of the captain of a ship, sued the defendant, who was the owner of the ship. It appeared that, when at the Cape of Good Hope, the captain drew a bill upon England on account of the ship, and on account of the exchange at the time, he received as premium the sum of £134. The plaintiffs contended that this money belonged to the testator, and offered to call witnesses to prove that it was usual for the captain of a ship, in such cases, to be allowed for his own benefit any advantage arising from the state of the exchange. But the court by Lord Ellenborough ordered a nonsuit, and said: "I am clearly of opinion that this premium belonged to the owner, and not to the captain. If a contrary usage has prevailed, it has been a usage of fraud and plunder. What pretense can there be for the agent to make a profit by a bill upon his principal? This would be to give the agent an interest against his duty. I believe that in this very way servants of the public abroad have been guilty of enormous peculation. The testator was undoubtedly bound to debit himself for the £134 as much as for any other sum of money he received on the defendant's account."

In Minnesota Cent. R. Co. v. Morgan,

52 Barb. (N. Y.) 217, the court held that a custom, according to which, among agents employed in the business of insuring for others, the former are entitled to all dividends declared by mutual companies, in lieu of all other compensation for effecting such insurance, is in contravention of the well-settled principle of law, that an agent cannot appropriate to his own use any portion of the profits arising from the business of the agency, and therefore invalid. "No custom can be established which contravenes a well-settled principle of law. It has been the settled doctrine of the courts, both of law and equity, for centuries, that an agent cannot appropriate to his own use any portion of the profits arising from the business of the agency. The custom proposed to be established overrides this rule of law, and authorizes the agent, not to appropriate to himself a part only, but the whole of the profits arising from the business of his principal. Such a custom needs only to be stated to be repudiated. If tolerated, it would lead to the grossest abuses."

2. In Allen v. St. Louis Bank, 120 U. S. 20, it was held that a pledge of cotton by a factor to a bank as security for advances made by the bank to the factor in his individual capacity, if not otherwise binding on the owner and consignor of the cotton, is not made so by a general usage of trade between the banks and cotton factors in St. Louis, where they do business not shown to be known to the consignors or other owners of cotton. "Factors having no power, by the law of Missouri, to make a pledge of the goods of their principals by a transfer, without indorsement in writing, of the bills of lading, the fact that the transactions between the factors and the plaintiff were all according to the general usage of trade between banks and cotton factors at St. Louis, cannot aid the plaintiff; because the usage attempted to be set up was not shown to have been known to the defendants or to other owners of cotton; and because it was contrary to law, in that it undertook to alter the nature of the contract between the factors and their principals, which authorizes them to sell, but not to pledge, and in that it would sustain a pledge by a factor of the goods of several principals to secure the payment of his own general balance of account to a third person."

In Bliss v. Ropes, 9 Allen (Mass.) 339, the court rejected a usage that a master of a vessel in a particular foreign port had no authority to bind his owners for necessities furnished to the vessel. "Such a usage would contradict and control a settled rule of maritime law of universal application, and would have been clearly illegal and inoperative to deprive the master of the authority vested in him by law."

In Higgins v. Moore, 34 N. Y. 417, it was held that a local usage in a particular trade is inadmissible to control the rules of law in respect thereto. Authority given to a broker to sell property does not include authority to receive payment for the same, especially when the principal is known to the vendee. The duty of a broker, in general, is ended when he has found a purchaser, and has brought the parties together. Hence, a local usage in New York, allowing brokers to receive payment for grain sold by them, when the seller resides out of the city, is not admissible in evidence for the purpose of establishing authority in the broker to receive such payment. "The duties and rights of the broker to contract for the sale of the grain were clear and well defined in this case. The law defined them. It was no part of his duty to receive payment when the principal was known, and he never had possession of the grain. No usage is admissible to control the rules of law. In Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, this court held that proof of usage of brokers in New York City to sell choses in action, pledged to them, in a mode unauthorized by law, was inadmissible. And so it has been held of stock pledged to brokers. In this case, the law defined the rights and duties of this broker and they could not be controlled by usage."

In Lucke v. Yoakum, 25 Neb. 427, the court said: "We know of no rule of law which would authorize a real-estate agent, in violation of the directions of his principals, or in the absence of any directions, to sell property on credit, even though such might be the custom."

In Ninis v. Nelson, 43 Fed. Rep. 777, the court charged the jury that a custom that an agency to act for a ship in distress is irrevocable, is invalid. If it would prevent a ship-owner from revoking the agency, it is in violation of the general principles of the law of agency. The power of an agent may be revoked at any time by the principal, without notice.

In Evans v. Waln, 71 Pa. St. 69, Waln employed M., a broker in Philadelphia, to sell stock; E., a broker in New York, sold the stock by order of Wister, another Philadelphia broker under M., with assent of Waln, without naming the owner; before the proceeds were remitted by E., Wister failed, in debt to E. It was held that E. could not retain the debt from the proceeds. Evidence that it was the custom of brokers, in their dealings with brokers of other cities, to put all transactions between them into one account and settle for the general balance, was inadmissible. Such a custom, if proved, would have constituted no defense to the plaintiff's action. Admitting its existence, the defendants had no right to credit Wister's account with the proceeds of the stock. He was not the owner of it, and he had no title or claim to its proceeds.

In Farmers', etc., Bank v. Sprague, 52 N. Y. 605, it was held that a usage adopted by a certain class of factors, as to the disposition of the funds of their principals, would not relieve such a factor from a duty or a liability which the law would otherwise impose upon him, unless he shows that his principal had knowledge of such usage, or that he assented to that method of doing his business. The usage that those engaged in the same business did not keep the sums collected upon different consignments separate, but that it was all mingled and deposited to the credit of such consignees, and that it was impracticable to transact the great amount of this business in any other way, affords no protection to the defendants.

In Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Prince, 50 Minn. 53, it was held that a local custom that insurance agents, after

7. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser—a. DELIVERY.—What constitutes a delivery of chattels as between vendor and purchaser is a question of law; and the legal rules cannot be changed by a usage. Hence it is held that when the facts of a particular case establish a delivery under the rules of law, no usage can be received to show that there was no delivery; nor, conversely, can a usage be allowed to establish a delivery where, upon the facts, the law declares that there is no delivery. It is not within the legitimate province of usages to control questions of this kind.¹

the termination of their agency, may cancel any of the policies issued through them, is unreasonable, subversive of the principles upon which the rules of law governing the relation of principal and agent are based, and is void. "The proposition that any part of the business done by an agent for his principal, and for doing which the principal pays him, belongs to the agent, rather upsets our notions of the rights growing out of the relation of principal and agent."

In Com. v. Cooper, 130 Mass. 285, it was similarly held that a usage of brokers that one, on receipt of an order to buy stocks on a margin, assumes the contract himself, instead of making it with a third person, is illegal. "When a man gives an order to a broker to buy stocks on margin, he employs the broker to act for him and in his interest; the broker has no right to put himself in a position antagonistic to the interests of his employer; he cannot make himself both buyer and seller, and any custom to this effect, unknown to the employer, is against public policy and illegal."

In Day v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 306, it was held that the order of a customer to a broker to buy stock, deliverable at any time, at the buyer's option, in sixty days, would not authorize the broker to buy the stock himself at thirty days, and deliver it to his customer at the end of sixty days at an increased price and interest, besides the usual commission, though a general usage among stock brokers to act in this manner was proved. "There are many forcible objections to its validity, but a conclusive one is that it is against sound policy and good morals. It authorizes the broker, in his discretion, to disregard his instructions, and instead of acting solely in the interest of his principal, to speculate upon the transaction for his own benefit. It creates in the agent an interest adverse to his principal, and is inconsistent with his duty and the obligations which the law imposes upon him when he enters into a contract of agency." See Pickering v. Demerritt, 100 Mass. 416, to the same effect.

In Rosenstock v. Tormey, 32 Md. 169; 3 Am. Rep. 125, the court said: "The order is given to a stock broker to purchase certain shares of a particular stock, by parties not shown to have actual knowledge of any peculiar usage or custom of his business; and whilst the law will allow custom and usage to regulate its execution in the reasonable mode we have indicated, it will not permit the defendants, by the force of any such custom or usage, to be bound by a merely fictitious purchase, such, for instance, as one not bona fide and actually made, but pretended to be effected by mere entries upon books and accounts between the plaintiff and his New York agents."

In Wolff v. Campbell, 110 Mo. 114, it was held that where a broker represents that he has certain stock in his possession, when in fact he has no such stock, and a sale is closed on the faith of this representation, in an action to recover the price paid, evidence of a custom among brokers to sell stock in their own name, and to become personally liable to perform the contract, is inadmissible.

1. See IMPLIED WARRANTY, vol. 10, p. 116.

In Haskins v. Warren, 115 Mass. 514, the court considered the rule of law that in a sale of chattels, when the specific articles are set apart, and there is no stipulation for credit, the sale, as between the parties, takes effect at once to pass the title to the purchaser. Here there was a transfer of possession to the purchasers, such as to constitute a delivery. To overcome the effect of such a delivery of possession, the plaintiffs relied mainly upon evidence of an alleged usage of trade, that in

b. WARRANTY.—In a leading case the Supreme Court of the United States rejected as invalid a usage which would add to a contract of sale, a warranty not implied by the principles of the common law from the facts of the case. The effect of the usage, by adding the warranty to the contract of the parties, would have been to abrogate the common-law doctrine of caveat emptor, and thus to change the established law in regard to the sale of chattels. The usage was declared void upon the distinct ground that cash sales, the goods were delivered or put into the possession of the buyer without prepayment, with the understanding that it was not to pass title or be a waiver of the condition to pay cash. But the court held that usage could not control the interpretation and effect which result from an established rule of law applicable to the facts; nor could it engraft on a contract of sale a stipulation or obligation different from, or inconsistent with the rules of the common law on the subject. It was therefore held that the title passed to the purchasers, in spite of a usage to the contrary.

In Southwestern Freight, etc., Co. v. Stanard, 44 Mo. 71; 100 Am. Dec. 255, the sellers of flour gave the purchasers an order upon certain flour mills, to deliver to the purchasers two hundred barrels of flour; this order was not a negotiable instrument, nor was any particular flour designated or set apart so as to vest the title by law in the purchasers; but there was a custom among the merchants that the effect of the order was to vest the title to the flour in the purchasers without delivery, and that from the time the order was handed over to them they became the absolute owners, and that the transference of the same by the purchasers to third parties, divested the seller of all interest in the flour. "But evidence of custom is never admissible to oppose or alter a general principle or rule, so as to make the rights and liabilities of parties other than they are at law. What constituted a delivery of the flour was a question of law, and the rights and liabilities of the vendor or vendee must be ascertained and fixed by the same standard." See also Ober v. Carson, 62 Mo. 209.

In Strong v. Bliss, 6 Met. (Mass.) 393, the defendant offered to prove that it was a custom among merchants, going or sending to purchase goods, to pay for the article purchased, without taking a delivery or seeing it, and that it is considered a purchase, when paid for; but the trial court rejected the testimony. On appeal it was held that the proof of usage was properly rejected. "It was not the usage of any particular place, or trade, or class of dealing, or course of dealing; it was of a general usage, to control the rules of law." And see Suydam v. Clark, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 133; Furniss v. Hone, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 247.

In Smith v. Lynes, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 203, the court rejected as contrary to law a usage that on a sale of goods for cash they are delivered to the buyer without payment or demand of payment, and after a few days a bill for the goods is sent to the buyer, and in the meantime the seller retains a lien on the goods for the price, and that such a delivery is conditional and invalid.

See also Morse v. Brackett, 98 Mass. 205, in which the court held that the sale of the eight bags of wool in controversy was one entire contract, and that the right of rescission for breach of warranty could not be exercised as to a single bag. The defendant's counsel offered to prove a custom in the wool trade by which, in such a sale, the purchaser may return a bale of wool which proves to be of a different kind from the article intended to be purchased, retaining the residue. "To support the admissibility of such evidence of usage he relied upon Clark v. Baker, 11 Met. (Mass.) 186; 45 Am. Dec. 199. But, upon the facts disclosed by the evidence, the court is of the opinion that proof of such usage would have been unavailing and was properly rejected."

In Beckwith v. Farnum, 5 R. I. 230, the court said, in reference to a usage giving a seller the right to rescind a certain kind of contract: "We cannot receive evidence of the custom and understanding of the merchants in a particular trade, to vary well-established rules of law applicable to their transactions in it."

no usage could prevail when in conflict with a rule of law.¹ Similarly in other cases, it has been held that whenever, upon a given state of facts, the common law does not establish a warranty, no usage can be admitted to raise one in opposition to the legal rule. Such a usage is characterized as the mere adoption of a doctrine as to the legal rights of parties, such doctrine being contrary to the rules of the common law.² Conversely, when, by the estab-

1. In Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 383, Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "No principle of the common law has been better established than that in sales of personal property, in the absence of express warranty, where the buyer has an opportunity to inspect the commodity, and the seller is guilty of no fraud, and is neither the manufacturer nor grower of the article he sells, the maxim of caveat emptor applies. The court below having found that, by the custom of dealers in wool in New York and Boston there is a warranty by the seller, implied from the fact of sale, that the wool is not falsely packed, and having held Barnard bound by it, the inquiry arises whether such custom can be admitted to control the general rules of law in relation to the sale of personal property." After reviewing the authorities, the opinion continues: "The parties negotiated on the basis of caveat emptor and contracted accordingly. This they had the right to do; and by the terms of the contract, the law placed on the buyer the risk of the purchase, and relieved the seller from liability for latent defects. But this usage of trade steps in and seeks to change the position of the parties, and to impose a burden on the seller which the law said, on making his contract, he should not carry. By this means a new contract is made for the parties and their rights and liabilities under the law essentially altered. This cannot be done. If the doctrine of caveat emptor can be changed by a special usage of trade in the manner proposed by the dealers of wool in Boston, it is easy to see that it can be changed in other particulars, and in this way the whole doctrine frittered away. Usage cannot be allowed to subvert the settled rules of law. Whatever tends to unsettle the law and make it different in the different communities into which the state is divided, leads to mischievous consequences, embarrasses trade, and is against public policy. If, therefore, on a given state of facts, the rights and liabilities of the parties to a contract are fixed by the general principles of the common law, they cannot be changed by any local custom. In this case the common law did not imply a warranty of the good quality of the wool, and no custom in the sale of this article can be admitted to imply one."

2. In Thompson v. Ashton, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 316, the plaintiff purchased certain crates of crockery, according to the printed catalogue of the auctioneers selling the goods. After the sale the plaintiff found that some of the ware was of inferior quality. The plaintiff brought an action for fraud, and offered to prove that it was the custom and usage in the trade that the ware was bought and sold on the invoices without opening the crates, and that the exhibition of the invoices amounted to an understanding on the part of the seller that the ware was good and merchantable. This evidence was rejected, as in conflict with the legal principles governing the sale. "The evidence offered of a usage or custom in relation to the sale of crockery ware was properly rejected. No custom in the sale of any particular description of goods, can be admitted to control the general rules of law. Such a principle would be extremely pernicious in its consequences and render vague and uncertain all the rules of law on the subject of chattels."

In Beirne v. Dord, 5 N. Y. 95; 55 Am. Dec. 321, the court said that, "No custom in the sale of any particular description of goods can be admitted to control the general rules of law." And hence it was held that evidence of a custom that in the sale of blankets in bales, the seller was held to warrant them when the law implied no warranty, should be rejected.

In Dodd v. Farlow, 11 Allen (Mass.) 426; 87 Am. Dec. 726, it was held that a usage that in a sale of a certain kind of goods there is an implied warranty that they are merchantable, when the law does not imply such a warranty, was void. The court said: "The decisive objection to its recognition is, that it embraces an element directly contrary to the ancient and well-established rule of the common law, that a vendor cannot be held responsible for the quality of goods sold, if he make no warranty or representation concerning their nature, condition, or merchantable value. In other words, it abrogates, to a certain extent, the maxim, caveat emptor, and puts on the vendor the burden of warranty, although he may be ignorant of the quality of the articles, or may have had no means of ascertaining their condition or value, and may have had no intention of selling the article with warranty. Such a usage is very like the one relied upon in the leading case of Thompson v. Ashton, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 316, which was held invalid."

Similarly in Dickinson v. Gay, 7 Allen (Mass.) 29; 83 Am. Dec. 29, in which the court said: "In the present case, the usage proved, is the adoption of a mere doctrine as to the rights and obligations of the parties under a contract of sale, which doctrine is contrary to the rule of the common law on the subject. It holds that a warranty is implied, when by law it is not implied. It is, therefore, the converse of the case of Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co., 2 Allen (Mass.) 52, where the law implied a warranty by the manufacturer, and by the usage he was held not to warrant."

In Wetherill v. Neilson, 20 Pa. St. 448; 59 Am. Dec. 741, where the offer was to prove a usage to imply a warranty in the sale of soda, the court considered its previous decisions, and said: "As to the offer to prove a special custom in Philadelphia as to the special article of soda, if it means anything at all, it means that, when people in Philadelphia are selling soda, common English words of representation become words of warranty. It must be conceded that such evidence has been admitted, Snowden v. Warder, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 101, but never without serious doubts, and we have found ourselves unable to follow the example. See Coxe v. Heisley, 19 Pa. St. 243. The courts must be allowed to understand common English without the aid of witnesses. The law is that mere representation does not constitute a warranty. If we admit evidence of this special custom, we allow the law to be changed by the testimony of witnesses, or by the soda dealers of Philadelphia. If parties mean to warrant, it is very easy for them to say so. If we imply a warranty from such special customs, it is very easy to see that, theoretically, all contracts are prima facie undefined; for we cannot know what special customs will be needed to aid in their interpretation." See also Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen (Mass.) 353; 90 Am. Dec. 196. There are, however, several cases of minor importance to the contrary.

In Jones v. Bowden, 4 Taunt. 848, the English court of common pleas held that a warranty may be implied from the custom of a particular trade. In auction sales of certain drugs it was the custom to state in the catalogue whether they were sea-damaged or not; if nothing was said as to the quality they were supposed to be sound. It was held that the freedom from sea-damage was impliedly warranted, although the purchasers, but for the custom, could not claim a warranty. Heatt, J., mentioned a trial before himself in an action on the sale of some sheep sold as stock; by the custom of the trade, stock was understood to be sound sheep, and the judge directed that there was an implied warranty to that effect. The case referred to was Weall v. King, 12 East 452. The case of Jones v. Bowden, 4 Taunt. 848, was followed in the superior court of Cincinnati in Fatman v. Thompson, 2 Disney (Ohio) 482, in which it was held that a usage among tobacco dealers in Cincinnati to warrant certain tobacco sold by them to remain sound and merchantable for four months after the sale, was valid, although no such warranty would be implied by law.

In Clark v. Baker, 11 Met. (Mass.) 186; 45 Am. Dec. 199, the Massachusetts court admitted evidence of a usage going to establish a rule directly in contravention of the rules of the common law, in relation to rescinding a contract in a case of sale of an unsound article, accompanied by a warranty, or induced by false representation; but this case has not been followed in the later cases, being distinguished in Morse v. Brackett, 98 Mass. 205; Dickinson v. Gay, 7 Allen (Mass.) 29; 83 Am. Dec. 29, and practically overruled by the cases cited above.

In Sumner v. Tyson, 20 N. H. 384, the vendor, who was the manufacturer, sold to the plaintiffs a quantity of iron castings. "To such a transaction the law annexes no implied stipulation on lished rules of law, a warranty is implied from the contract of the parties, the warranty cannot be avoided by proof of a usage not to consider a warranty as being made.¹ Usage, therefore, can neither change the rules of law by raising a warranty when the law does not imply it, nor by denying a warranty when the law does imply it.

8. Miscellaneous Cases.—In numerous other cases the courts have rejected usages the effect of which would be to establish a legal liability, or to afford a legal defense contrary to the established rules of law. The instances are given in the note. In general, it may be said that no usage in direct opposition to the rules of law can be sustained. The cases embrace questions of morals and public policy, as well as technical doctrines of law.²

the part of the vendor and manufacturer, that the articles shall be good and merchantable, but devolves upon the purchaser the burden of ascertaining their quality from inspection, or insuring it by an express contract. No express contract of warranty is shown. It was clearly proper for the plaintiff to prove a warranty, by showing that, by the custom of the country, such a contract attached to the sale of articles of this nature. Such a custom cannot be deemed contrary to law, and is the more reasonable as taking the place of the only protection which the purchaser can have against the fraud or unskillfulness of the manufacturers of commodities whose qualities are not open to any inspection." This case is contrary to the well-settled rule of law as to implied warranty by manufacturers, and to the authorities cited as to allowing a custom to impose a liability different from that imposed by the rules of law.

1. In Whitmore v. South Boston Iron Co., 2 Allen (Mass.) 52, a usage of founders not to warrant their castings against latent defects, or in case of patent defects, to be entitled to have the castings returned in a reasonable time and to have the option of replacing them with new ones, was rejected.

In Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 684; 20 Am. St. Rep. 329, the court held that it was not competent to vary the general law of the state, which raised a warranty in favor of the purchaser, by showing a local usage in Augusta operating upon the corn trade, to the effect that the acceptance of corn in bulk, and paying for it after inspection, were considered as waiving or releasing all claim upon the seller to answer for any defects of quality. "Doubtless the custom is binding upon those who have recognized it in their own transactions, and thus adopted it for their own dealings; but persons who have not done so are entitled to stand upon the general law."

2. Miscellaneous Instances.—In Jones v. Allen, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 473, the court held that the hirer of a slave, and not the owner, is liable in an action for medicine and medical services rendered the slave, while the term of hiring continues, the services and medicine not being rendered at the request of the owner, but at the request of the hirer. A particular custom in a county, that the general owner shall pay these expenses, does not vary the law. Without some stipulation on that point, the general rule of law must operate, and cannot be controlled by any understanding to the contrary in particular neighborhoods. A mere local usage, in a small part of the country, cannot change the law, and give the plaintiffs an action against one man, when they were employed by another.

In Bauer v. Samson Lodge, 102 Ind. 262, the court held that the right to sue is one given by law, and no custom can be good which is contrary to law. Hence, a custom that a party having a claim for money due upon a contract may not pursue the usual remedies provided by law, is not valid. Manson v. Grand Lodge, etc., 30 Minn. 509; Thompson v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 252; Franklin Ins. Co. v. Humphrey, 65 Ind. 549; 32 Am. Rep. 78; Spears v. Ward, 48 Ind. 541; Wallace v. Morgan, 23 Ind. 399.

In Stoeber v. Whitman, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 416, it was held that evidence of a custom in a particular place to enter for breach of a condition in a ground-rent deed, in a manner different from that authorized by the rules of the common law, or the terms of the deed, is inadmissible.

In Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356; 35 Am. Rep. 40, it was held that the custom and practice of lot owners in the city of Mobile, as to contribution or compensation between the owners of adjacent lots for the cost of a party-wall between them, cannot be received to affect their legal rights.

In Harrington v. Edwards, 17 Wis. 586; 84 Am. Dec. 768, it was held that raftsmen on navigable streams have no right to moor their rafts in such a manner as to deprive wharf owners of access to their wharfs. Hence, evidence of a custom of raftsmen to anchor their rafts regardless of the wishes or convenience of the proprietors of adjoining lands, was not admissible. Raftsmen cannot establish a custom among themselves which will override the common-law rights of riparian owners.

In Fisher v. Steward, Smith (N. H.) 60, it was held that one who finds a swarm of bees in a tree on another's land, marks the tree, and notifies the landowner, cannot maintain trover against the landowner for taking the honey. "It has been said, that, by the usage in this part of the state, the person who finds bees acquires a property in them wherever found. We recognize no such usage. We have no local customs or usages which are binding in one part of the state and not in another. If this be the law here, it must be so in every other part of the state."

In Leach v. Perkins, 17 Me. 462; 35 Am. Dec. 268, which was an action for labor upon a vessel, built by several owners, against one of them, proof of the usage of the place, "that the owners were not jointly responsible for materials and labor for the vessel, and that no one was authorized to make contracts for materials and labor for the vessel so as to bind the owners generally," is inadmissible. The rights of parties are to be determined by law.

In Bolton v. Colder, 1 Watts (Pa.) 360, the court held that a traveler may use the middle or either side of a public road at his pleasure, without being bound to turn aside for another traveling in the same direction, provided there be convenient room to pass on the one hand or on the other. "The defendants gave evidence of its being a custom, for the leading carriage to incline to the right, and the other making the transit at the same time by the left; whence it was attempted to be shown, that the injury suffered by the plaintiff, had been occasioned by his own neglect of this custom, which was said to have acquired the consistence of a law, but which was very properly exploded by the court."

In Evans v. Hesler, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 561, which was an action for wounding and killing the plaintiff's mare, the defendants offered to prove that it was the custom of the neighborhood to set dogs on horses which broke into fences or inclosures. But the court held that the evidence of the neighborhood custom was clearly improper and inadmissible, because whether the act was lawful or otherwise, did not depend upon the custom of the neighborhood, but upon the general laws of the land. The law furnishes the rule by which the propriety of every action is to be tested, and it will allow no other to be resorted to.

In Lawrence v. State, 20 Tex. App. 536, it was held that the law would not recognize a local custom authorizing anyone to kill unmarked hogs over a year old found on a range. "To fraudulently take such property when unmarked is as much theft as if it had been marked. This is the rule of law and cannot be controlled by any usage to the contrary."

In Com. v. Perry, 139 Mass. 198, on the trial of an indictment for maintaining a common nuisance, by keeping a large number of swine in the neighborhood of certain dwellings and highways, the court held that evidence was inadmissible that it was a custom in this commonwealth to tolerate the location of such establishments in populous localities; referring to Cutter v. Howe, 122 Mass. 549.

In De Saussure v. Zeigler, 6 S. Car. 12, it was held that the law gives priority of lien to the first judgment entered in the clerk's office, and a usage of the bar that all judgments lodged with the clerk for entry within a certain time after the rising of the court shall be entered as of the same date, cannot override the law of the case.

In West v. Ball, 12 Ala. 340, it was held that a usage of the attorneys at any particular place, to collect money of their clients in bank bills of the state bank, though selling at a depreciation, being contrary to law, cannot be supported.

In Corn Exchange Bank v. Nassau Bank, 91 N. Y. 74; 43 Am. Rep. 655, the court said: "The action before us is to recover money to which in conscience and good morals the defendant has no title, and it seeks to retain it upon the ground that by the custom of its kind within a certain city, its payor must at its peril ascertain whether a defect in title existed. In Rankin v. American Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 619, it was thought to be well settled that a usage could never be set up to contradict a rule of law, or to vary an express agreement. The same rule applies where usage is offered to oppose or alter a general principle or rule of law, and upon a given state of facts, make the legal rights or liabilities of the parties other than they are by the common law. In Frith v. Barker, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 327, Kent, Ch. J., says usage 'never is, nor ought to be, received to contradict a settled rule of commercial law.' In the case before us the common law did not on the admitted facts impose the duty of examination of the check on the paying bank, and we think no custom can be admitted to imply one. Whatever tends to unsettle the law and make it different in different portions of the state, would lead to mischievous consequences, and be against public policy."

In Hathesing v. Laing, L. R., 17 Eq. 92, it appeared that it was the general practice in Bombay of such of the European firms there as employ brokers to buy goods in the name of their brokers, but to ship the same in the firm's name, the brokers meanwhile retaining the mate's receipts as their security and by way of lien on the goods so shipped by them. The court rejected the custom and held that it could not override the plain, well-established law, which is that to assert a lien you must be entitled to possession.

In Paine v. Howells, 90 N. Y. 660, it was held that under a contract by which a salesman is to receive for his services a share of the net profits of the business, the interest on capital invested by the principal in the business is not an expense to be deducted in ascertaining the net profits. Hence, in an action upon such a contract, it is not competent for the defendant to prove a custom among merchants to charge interest on capital.

If a farm hand be injured in his employment, under circumstances which prevent a recovery in damages, he cannot recover his wages for the period during which he was incapacitated; nor can such liability on the part of the master be established by evidence of local custom. Shaw v. Deal, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 379; 25 W. N. C. (Pa.) 39; Brightly's Digest, vol. 4 (1889-91), col. 5888.

In Gray v. Murray, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 180, it was said that in Chandler v. Grieves, 2 H. Bl. 606, note, it was certified to the common bench to be the admiralty usage, that if a seaman be disabled in the course of the voyage, he was entitled to wages for the whole voyage, though he had not performed the whole. In Sims v. Jackson, 1 Pet. Adm. 157, it was decided, in the circuit court of the United States for Pennsylvania, that full wages for the entire voyage were due to the representative of a seaman, hired for the whole voyage, at $30 per month, and who died when it was only half performed. The decision was grounded on what was understood to be the usage of the English admiralty.

In Spotswood v. The Dora Matthews, 31 Fed. Rep. 619, the court referred to the rule of law that a person owning improved wharves, which he maintains at his own cost, may charge and collect from parties using his wharves such reasonable fees as will fairly remunerate him for the use of his property. Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U. S. 423. But it was said that there was a usage and custom among the wharf-owners in Mobile not to charge certain vessels any wharfage fee, and that said wharf was used under such usage. "It seems to me that the usage or custom invoked by the respondent in this case contravenes the well-established principles of law to which I have alluded, and, if allowed to prevail, would displace those principles, and allow respondent to make use of the libellant's wharf without incurring liability to pay for it, and would destroy the lien on the vessel given by law as security for the wharfage dues. Evidence of usage or custom in such case will not be admitted."

In Swift v. Gifford, 2 Low. (U. S.) 110, Judge Lowell said, in reference to a custom in the whaling trade which was alleged to be contrary to the general law: "The rule of law invoked in this case is one of very limited application. The whale fishery is the only branch of industry of any importance in which it is likely to be much used, and if a

VIII. USAGES MUST NOT BE CONTRARY TO STATUTORY LAW—1. In General.—A usage contrary to the terms of a statute is void. The act of the law-making power cannot be controlled by any usage. Statutes are often enacted for the express purpose of abolishing usages deemed to be unwise; and to uphold a usage contrary to the statute would be to allow the supreme law to be set aside by the custom of a limited number of individuals. But whatever the reason for its enactment, no statutory provision can be in any manner controlled by a contrary usage.¹

2. Usages of Carriers.—The usages of carriers held to be void, or in conflict with the provisions of local statutes, embrace cases in which efforts were made by the carrier to limit, or by the customer to extend, the liability imposed by statute. And when a statute limits the liability, by relieving the carrier from the operation of the ordinary rules of law, usage cannot be received to extend it.²

3. Usages of Officers.—Usages frequently grow up in the offices of public officials regarding methods of procedure and transaction of business. But neither the usage of a particular office nor the usage is found to prevail generally in that business, it will not be open to the objection that it is likely to disturb the general understanding of mankind by the interposition of an arbitrary exception."

Other cases stating or illustrating the rule that a usage must not be contrary to established law are East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 596; 51 Am. Rep. 489; Sullivan v. Jernigan, 21 Fla. 264; Gilbert v. McGinnis, 114 Ill. 28; Wilson v. Bauman, 80 Ill. 493; Van Camp Packing Co. v. Hartman, 126 Ind. 177; Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105; 18 Am. 2. In Colgate v. Pennsylvania Co., 102 N. Y. 120, the court said: "The effect of the statute prohibiting the delivery by a common carrier of property covered by a bill of lading, except upon surrender and cancellation of the bill, and authorizing the transfer of the property by indorsement of the bill, is to incorporate into every such instrument the statutory condition and make it an practice of other officers can authorize the performance of acts or justify the non-performance of duties required by statute. In matters of taxation of costs and fees in courts of law or by public officers, no usage in conflict with a statute can be allowed to prevail.¹

element of the contract. Proof of a custom to deliver property to the consignee without production of the bill of lading was immaterial; the custom could not repeal the statute, or protect from a violation thereof."

In The La Fayette Lamb, 20 Fed. Rep. 319, it appeared that there was a rule of the superintending inspectors, having the force of law, that barges should display permanent lights at night. It was proved that it was not the custom on the Mississippi river to have a permanent light upon barges. "But those whose duty it is to provide such lights for the benefit and safety of navigation cannot set up a custom in defiance of the plain requirements of the law, and if they do so they invite the law upon their own heads. It is evident the law in this case is much more reasonable than the proved custom of disregarding it."

In Walker v. Western Transp. Co., 3 Wall. (U. S.) 150, the Act of Congress of March 3d, 1851, was under consideration. That act limited the liability of owners of vessels in certain cases, but permitted parties to make contracts extending the liability. It was alleged that the statutory liability had been extended by custom; but the court held that usage could not take a case out of the statute, and said: "Can usage add to words which do not express it a liability from which the act of Congress declares the ship-owner to be free? It was the common law, or immemorial usage, which made him liable before the statute. The statute then relieved him from the force of that usage or law. It cannot be that the liability can be revived by merely attaching such usage to words in a contract which have no such meaning of themselves."

Illinois, etc., R. Co. v. People, 19 Ill. App. 141, was a case under the Illinois statute requiring every railroad corporation in the state to furnish and run cars for the transportation of such property as shall within a reasonable time previous thereto be offered for transportation. It was argued that the customary mode of transporting coal being for the carrier to furnish cars on switches at the request of the shipper, there to remain until the coal is mined and dumped into cars, and the appellant, having been notified that a certain number of cars were required daily, and having failed to furnish them, it became liable for the penalty provided in the statute. "The statute imposing a liability for treble damages is highly penal, and must be strictly construed. The language, 'as shall within a reasonable time previous thereto be offered for transportation,' cannot be extended so as to include coal in the earth, to be dug and raised from the mine after cars are furnished. The custom or usage in the shipment of certain classes of freight may fix the liability of a carrier for a refusal to transport that kind of freight in conformity to the custom, but custom and usage cannot be held to extend the terms of a penal statute."

Osborne v. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co., 33 Minn. 285, was an action under the Minnesota statute authorizing the recovery of reasonable compensation for driving the logs of another so intermingled with one's own as not to be conveniently separable. The court held that the existence of a custom to treat as voluntary and gratuitous services authorized by statute, and upon the performance of which, even without the consent of the defendant, a right of compensation is given, cannot affect the statutory right of compensation, and is no defense to an action to recover the same.

In McCune v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 52 Iowa 600, the railroad company attempted to set up a custom not to be liable for damages for the loss of blooded stock at any higher rate than for common stock. The statutes of Iowa provided that no contract or regulation should exempt any railroad from any liability, as a common carrier, which would exist had no contract or regulation been made or adopted. The custom was held void, being in conflict with the statute. See also Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. People, 56 Ill. 365; 8 Am. Rep. 690.

1. Usages of Officers.—In Shattuck v. Woods, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 170, an action of debt was brought to recover certain

4. Usages Allowing Usury.—The courts are always alert to set aside evasions of the statutes respecting the rate of interest ; and penalties incurred by the defendant as a deputy sheriff, for demanding and receiving illegal fees. He offered to prove that it had long been the usual practice in the commonwealth, for officers to charge and receive such compensation. The judge instructed the jury that the defendant had no right to demand or receive anything more as a compensation for his services and travel, than the fees mentioned in the statute. "As to the practice of other officers on like subjects, we cannot think it is legal evidence to protect the defendant against the charge in the declaration. An unlawful act cannot become lawful by usage ; and it cannot be known whether the defendant may not himself have contributed to establish the practice under which he would defend himself. Lincoln v. Shaw, 17 Mass. 410."

In Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457, an inspector of flour, who, under the Virginia statute, was allowed a certain money compensation, endeavored to prove a usage of flour inspectors to take, in addition to their legal fees, the flour drawn from the barrel in the course of inspection, called the draft flour. The court held that the statute meant that the compensation to the officer should be restricted to the fees expressly provided ; that such fees should be fixed and certain ; and that "perquisites of office" had no place in the legislation of the state. The usage set up was therefore rejected. A statute introducing a new principle, with a negative, either express or necessarily implied, must be strictly proved, and no custom can be set up against it. Dwar. on Stats. 475, 477 ; Lord Lovelace's Case, W. Jones 270 ; Jones v. Smith, 2 Bulst. 36 ; King v. Bishop of London, Show. 420.

In Cutter v. Howe, 122 Mass. 541, the court held that certain charges by an officer could not legally be included in the taxable costs of an action ; and evidence of a practice long continued, "to tax the same fees for like services," is immaterial. "In the case of Shattuck v. Woods, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 177, Chief Justice Parker said that the practice of other officers on like subjects was not legal evidence to support a charge not allowed by law ; and that an unlawful act would not become lawful by usage."

In Pierce v. U. S., 1 Ct. of Cl. 290, also called the "Floyd Acceptances Case," the facts were that Floyd, as secretary of war, accepted bills drawn on him by army contractors. As between the contractors and the government, the acceptances were fraudulent and unlawful. The claimant bought the acceptances before maturity for a valuable consideration. "He has notice that the secretary of war is prohibited 'by express law' from making direct advance payment to the contractors, and that the only authority for giving them these acceptances is 'the custom of the department.' The illegality of the transaction goes to the very foundation of the secretary's authority. He cannot be the agent of the United States to do that which the laws of the United States expressly forbid. Usage cannot aid the transaction. An illegal practice prevailing among officers of the government, no matter how long continued or extensive, can never ripen into a binding usage."

In Currie v. Page, 2 Leigh (Va.) 617, it was held that under the statute the aldermen of the city of Richmond, not being justices of the peace of Henrico, had no authority to take privy examinations and acknowledgments to conveyances of land of femes covert residing in Richmond. It was argued, that though the actual legislation may not have given this power to the corporate magistrates of Richmond, the general opinion and practice of the town has given it to them, and that this makes the law. But the court held that the statute existing at the time of the deed in question provided that it must be by two justices of the peace of the county in which the feme dwelleth. The usage could control this law, if such had been proved ; no usage of the city could make an alderman of the corporation a justice of the peace for Henrico.

In Delaplane v. Haxall, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 459, it was held that the terms of a statute requiring inspectors of flour to use an auger not exceeding half an inch in diameter, could not be controlled, either by the fact that the inspection could not be satisfactorily made with an auger of that size, or by a usage to disregard the statute.

usages to disregard the statutory limit have been unavailing as a means of obtaining usurious rates. The expressions of the courts are very vigorous to the effect that no usage can be allowed to control the provisions of the statute.¹

5. Usages as to Weights and Measures.—Usages respecting weights and measures have been offered to show that contracts were to be construed with reference to the usage rather than with

In Hicks v. Duncan, 4 Martin N. S. (La.) 497, the court said, in reference to the local statute, that where the plaintiff in an attachment is cast in the suit, the attorney for the defendant is only entitled to have a fee of $11 taxed in the costs. A custom to tax other costs relied on cannot prevail against the law, which limits the tax fee to $11.

In Scribner v. Hollis, 48 N. H. 35, it appeared that it had been the usage of highway surveyors to engage labor without express authority, contrary to the terms of the statute. The usage was held void, and the court said: "If such usage has been tolerated, it is enough for us to say that it cannot be now so construed as to repeal or violate the positive rules of statute law."

In Dwight v. Boston, 12 Allen (Mass.) 316, a usage of tax assessors to make certain deductions in taxing the stock of corporations was rejected, because the statute provided that the full value should be taxed.

In Otsego County Bank v. Warren, 18 Barb. (N. Y.) 290, it was held that a custom among notaries to make a demand of acceptance or payment of a bill of exchange in a manner different from that required by the statute, was invalid; and the same ruling was made in Commercial Bank v. Varnum, 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 90.

Other instances are found in The Forrester, Newb. Adm. 81, in which the custom of purchasers of vessels to renew their licenses at the close of navigation, instead of at the time required by the statutes of the United States, was rejected; and in Crocker v. Schureman, 7 Mo. App. 358, in which the custom was contrary to a municipal ordinance.

1. Usages Allowing Usury.—In Dunham v. Gould, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 367; 8 Am. Dec. 323, the Chancellor said: "It is perfectly idle to talk of a custom among merchants to take a commission above the legal rate of interest or the exchange of notes. Custom of merchants is not applicable to such a case. It is not a matter of trade or commerce within the law merchant, and if there were such a local usage in New York, it would be null and void, and could not be set up as a pretext or cover to trample down the law of the land. The money lenders throughout the country might as well set up a practice of their own, and then plead it in bar of the statute."

In New York Firemen's Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 678, it was held that a usage among banks to cast interest at a year for 360 days; one-half of a year, for 180 days; one-quarter 90 days; one-sixth 60 days; and the three days of grace at one-tenth of a month, would not prevent its being usurious, though such usage were universal. The legal year is 365 days; the legal half-year 182 days; and the legal quarter 91 days, the law paying no regard to the odd hours. A statute cannot be abrogated or controlled by the custom or usage of a particular trade. The custom or usage of banks or individuals cannot shorten a year to 360 days. "I cannot, therefore, resist the conclusion, that the note in this case was usurious in consequence of interest having been calculated and taken upon the principle that 90 days were the fourth of a year."

In Dunham v. Dey, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 40, it was held that where A receives B's note, on giving B his note at ten days, for the purpose of raising money on B's note, and pays B two and a half per cent. commission, this is a loan within the statute of usury, and A's note is usurious and void, and evidence that it was the usage of trade to take two and a half per cent. commission on the exchange of paper, is inadmissible; for usage is of no avail, if the transaction comes within the meaning of the statute.

In Daquin v. Coiron, 3 La. 387, the court said: "Does it follow, that any man, or set of men, can create a custom for their own benefit, or even for the mutual benefit of borrower or lender, and give to that custom a force, not merely of law, but to control reference to statutory provisions. Parties, of course, are at liberty to contract with reference to the usage if they desire; but in the absence of proof that the parties did adopt the usage as a part of the contract, to the exclusion of the statute, the law holds that the statute alone entered into their agreement. Hence, when the statute prescribes that a "ton" shall mean a certain number of pounds, the provision cannot be overcome by a usage to consider either a greater or a less number as constituting a ton. But in the absence of a statutory provision, the meaning of words denoting weights, measures, etc., may be determined by local usage known to the parties.¹

6. Miscellaneous Usages.—Various other cases in which usages have been rejected as in conflict with statutory provisions are mentioned in the note. Certain usages have been disallowed as law? Surely not. Neither combinations nor usages, of the few or of the many, can control the will of the people, constitutionally expressed through their representatives." And in Harrod v. Lafarge, 12 Martin (La.) 26, the same court said that any alleged usage of the merchants to pay and demand ten per cent. interest, could not be regarded.

And in Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St. 68, it was said that, "Evidence of a usage with other banks organized under the same law, to discount more than the legal rate of interest upon the acquisition of business paper, is not admissible. The courts of New York have settled this question. These cases are also substantially in accordance with the ruling of this court, in Hartford Protection Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. Rep. 452."

Other cases to the same effect are Greene v. Tyler, 39 Pa. St. 361; Jones v. McLean, 18 Ark. 456; Bank of Utica v. Wager, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 712; Cooper v. Sandford, 4 Yerg. (Tenn.) 452; 26 Am. Dec. 239; Gore v. Lewis, 109 N. Car. 539; Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 112.

But in Crump v. Trylitle, 5 Leigh (Va.) 251, a bank discounted a note payable on its face sixty days after date; it was understood that this accommodation would be continued indefinitely, till discontinued. The bank, in discounting the first note, deducted the interest for sixty-four days, i. e., for the time the note had to run including the days of grace, and in discounting the second note, made on the last day of grace of the first, deducted the interest for sixty-four days, counting from the day of the date of the second note and the last day of grace of the first note, to the last day of grace of the second note, both inclusive; and so on, upon each renewed note, successively, to the end of the transaction; so that the bank, in fact, received double interest for every sixty-fourth day; and this was in conformity with the known usage of the bank, and of all the banks in Virginia. It was held that this transaction was in no wise usurious. Brockenbrough, J., dissented, and said: "What is to protect the bank in this case, from the operation of the statute against usury? Its own usage, and that of the other banks of Virginia. I do not think that the usage ought to control a statute. 'It would be strange, indeed' says Chief Justice Savage, 'if any set of men, or companies of men, should become paramount to the authority of the legislature.' Bank of Utica v. Wager, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 712. To which I will add that the banks ought not to be allowed to make the law; they should obey it."

1. Usages as to Weights and Measures.—Noble v. Durell, 3 T. R. 271, is the leading English case upon this subject. The Statute 13 & 14 Car. II., ch. 26, directed that every pound of butter should contain sixteen ounces. The question, as stated by Lord Kenyon, was, whether a custom in Southampton that a pound should contain eighteen ounces, could be supported in law; "to say that it can, would be to violate all the rules of language, as long as the acts of Parliament are to regulate this subject. This has engaged the attention of the legislature for five centuries, and they have thought it of the utmost importance that there should be one standard of weights and measures throughout the kingdom. . . . If this custom can be established, it may also be extended to hops in Kent, or to any other community in any other part of the kingdom, and thus the greatest confusion will be introduced on a subject that ought to be particularly plain. . . . It might as well be contended that a custom could prevail in a particular place, that a less number of days than seven should constitute a week; or that a less space of ground than an acre should be called an acre."

In Godcharles v. Wigeman, 113 Pa. St. 431, it was held that the statute of Pennsylvania enacting that "Twenty hundreds make one ton," cannot be controlled by a custom in a particular business making twenty-two hundred and forty pounds a ton. The offer, with its variations, was to prove a custom making the ton 2,240 pounds. But the court below held that the custom, if proved, was not good, because opposed to the statute which fixes the legal ton at 2,000 pounds, and that the former could not be imposed upon the plaintiff except by proof of a special contract, or, of such knowledge by him of the rules of the establishment as would raise the presumption that he was working under them; hence the proposed evidence was rejected. On appeal, the court said: "It requires no argument to establish the correctness of this ruling, hence we attempt none."

In Evans v. Myers, 25 Pa. St. 114, where a contract was made for a given number of tons of iron, the court held that it must be taken to have been made in reference to the statute above mentioned, and it was error to admit evidence of a local custom to control the statute. "If every section of the country may have its own weights and measures, to be established by its own customs, strangers would be entrapped into liabilities which they never intended to incur, and no one could know with precision the extent of his obligations. The act of Assembly entered into the contract and formed an essential part of it. A custom may be abolished by an act of Assembly, and it was the purpose of the act to produce that result in this case. The sound policy which dictated it cannot be doubted. It is a statute which ought to be enforced, and the local customs up the Allegheny river are certainly insufficient to repeal it. It was an error to admit the evidence of custom to control the statute, and to permit the jury on such evidence to find the contract to be different from its legal import." A similar ruling was made in Weaver v. Fegely, 29 Pa. St. 27; 70 Am. Dec. 151.

In Green v. Moffett, 22 Mo. 529, the court said: "In 1841 the legislature declared, by express statute, that 'Hereafter, when sales of hemp shall be made, the delivery of one hundred pounds avoirdupois weight, shall be considered as the delivery of one hundred weight, any custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.' In 1845, the legislature again say: 'The hundredweight shall consist of one hundred pounds avoirdupois, and twenty such hundreds shall constitute a "ton."' Here is the statute law of the land since 1841, and shall it be proved away by custom? The lawmakers struck at this custom, this usage, and by law abolished it. Now, when parties make contracts about hemp, they can easily agree to pay or to take so much money for so many pounds of hemp; but if the bargain be only by the 'ton,' then the law says what the 'ton' is, and no proof will be admitted about custom or usage or understanding."

Paul v. Lewis, 4 Watts (Pa.) 402, was a somewhat analogous case, in which witnesses were called to establish a usage by which a sale by the acre, without restrictive words, passes an allowance of six per cent. of course. "What foundation is there for such a rule, either in general usage or anything else? In the progress of the cause I have heard the statute acre of Pennsylvania mentioned as something peculiar, though we have no statute on the subject but the 33 Ed. 1, Stat. 6, and it certainly says nothing about an allowance. . . . Here the attempt was to show that by the word 'acre,' the parties did not mean an acre, but something more."

In a New Hampshire case, a custom of measuring lumber by what was known as the Blodgett measure, was rejected, because it adopted a mode of measurement different from that prescribed by the statute. Rogers v. Allen, 47 N. H. 529.

In Hockin v. Cooke, 4 T. R. 314, "bushels" was construed to mean only statute bushels.

In St. Cross v. Howard De Walden, 6 T. R. 338, "quarters of corn" were held to mean the statutory quarters. But if any particular weight or measure, etc., is not covered by the statute, the custom will not of course be held void as contrary to the statute. Instances are Hughes v. Humphreys, 3 El. & Bl. 954; 77 E. C. L. 954; Giles v. Jones, 11 Exch. 393.

1. Miscellaneous Usages.—In Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 94 Pa. St. 302; 39 Am. Rep. 785, a coal company pumped from its mines water which polluted a stream of the plaintiff. The company alleged a custom to do this, and that mining would be impossible in any other manner. The court held that a custom authorizing the destruction of the rights of the riparian owners would be void. It would violate the constitutional provision that corporations taking private property for their use, shall make compensation therefor. "Not only thus would we have a custom superior to the express law of the land, but one reaching even beyond the possible sovereignty of the state, in that it would empower private persons for private purposes to injure or destroy private property, and that without compensation."

In Woodruff v. North Bloomfield Gravel, etc., Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 753, a custom or usage was attempted to be established, whereby mining débris might be sent down to the valleys, devastating the lands of private owners, without first acquiring the right to do so, by purchase or other lawful means, upon compensation paid; this was held to be in direct violation, both of the laws and constitution of the state and of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void. In Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Consolidated Min. Co., 11 Fed. Rep. 666, a similar principle was declared.

In Hawkins v. State, 17 Tex. App. 593; 50 Am. Rep. 129, in which the appellant was on trial for assault, evidence was offered of a usage of the appellant and his associates, when controversies arose between them, to curse, abuse, and denounce each other in violent language, and to flourish knives and pistols as a mere matter of jest. The evidence was rejected, the court saying: "We are aware of no principle of law which would tolerate a usage, custom, or prescription that would confer upon a citizen the right to act the rowdy to the disturbance of the peace, and carry a six-shooter in violation of the general statutes."

The legal-tender statutes cannot be controlled by the usages of banking houses. Marine Bank v. Birney, 28 Ill. 90; Marine Bank v. Rushmore, 78 Ill. 463; Marine Bank v. Ogden, 29 Ill. 249.

2. In Butler v. Charleston, 7 Gray (Mass.) 12, it was held that a city, whose charter and ordinances provide that no contract shall be binding on the city, unless made by some authorized agent, and within some appropriation, is not liable for legal services, beneficial to the city, performed by counsel retained by a majority of the members of the board of aldermen, without any official action of the city council; although the usage of the city has been to pay such bills approved by a committee. "In cities where the corporation acts only through officers whose powers are limited and defined by law, the court would be slow to sanction any usage enlarging those powers. The usage here attempted to be established is in violation of the general law, and the charter and ordinances of the city."

In McCrary v. McFarland, 93 Ind. 466, it was held that the power of trustees of a church to contract is given by statute, and the custom of a particular church cannot abridge this power. Hence, in a suit against the church as a corporation upon a contract made by the trustees, evidence that by the custom of the church the trustees could not make the contract is immaterial.

In Ocean Beach Assoc. v. Brinley, 34 N. J. Eq. 438, it was contended that, by a long established and universally recognized custom, the widow of a proprietor is not entitled to dower in lands held by him in severalty under the council of proprietors. The court said: "It is not debatable that the custom avouched by the complainants stands in direct conflict with our statute. That enacts that a widow shall be endowed of the third part of all lands whereof her husband, or any other to his use, was seised of an estate of inheritance, at any time during coverture, to which she has not released her right." The custom was therefore rejected.

In Perkins v. Franklin Bank, 21

The substance of the decisions may well be expressed in a quotation from a Louisiana case: "Where the law is express, no man or set of men can create a custom for their own benefit or convenience, and give to that custom a force paramount to that of the law."¹

7. Usages Contrary to the Policy of Statutory Law.—Furthermore, it is held that a usage contrary to the general policy of the Pick. (Mass.) 483, a usage was alleged not to allow days of grace on promissory notes, although the statute provided that grace should be allowed. The usage was rejected and the court said: "If this custom existed before the statute was passed, the statute did away with the effect of it. If it has grown up since, it was bad in the first instance and cannot be made good by time."

In Lehman v. Marshall, 47 Ala. 362, a usage to transfer warehouse receipts by delivery was rejected, because the statute required them to be indorsed.

In Gray v. Stoneham, 15 Gray (Mass.) 149, a custom to sell spirituous liquors on credit, in the face of a statute requiring them to be sold for cash only, was held void.

In Bankus v. State, 4 Ind. 114, it was held that the criminal statutes in reference to riotous conduct could not be evaded by the fact that the accused were only following the custom of the country.

In Phillips v. Innes, 4 Cl. & F. 234, a usage of barbers to work on Sunday was rejected, as in conflict with a statute prohibiting such work.

1. Ledoux v. Armor, 4 Rob. (La.) 381, in which case it appeared that there existed a commercial usage in New Orleans, which authorized the purchaser of a large quantity of rope to return the whole parcel to the seller and receive back his money, if he discovered that a part of it was defective. But the civil code established a different rule in such cases, and the usage was therefore held to be void. "In the absence of any expression of legislative will on the subject, such a usage would have been entitled to some weight. But where the law is express, no man or set of men can create a custom for their own benefit or convenience, and give to that custom a force paramount to that of the law. And see Glasgow v. Stevenson, 6 Mart. N. S. (La.) 567." Smyth v. Walton (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 24 S. W. Rep. 1084.

In Patapsco Guano Co. v. Magee,

86 N. Car. 350, it was decided that an agricultural lien could only be acquired by virtue of the statute, and in strict compliance with its requirements. The agreement must be executed before the advancements are made or supplies furnished. In such case, evidence as to the custom of the plaintiff to have agreements signed after the delivery of supplies to customers, was rejected.

In Trull v. Wheeler, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 240, it was held that a usage to allow prisoners to go beyond certain limits prescribed by statute was bad. The evidence was inadmissible to control the operation of the statute.

In Blizzard v. Walker, 32 Ind. 437; the statute provided that partition fences should be such as good husbandmen usually keep. It was attempted to prove that, although the inclosure was not such as "good husbandmen generally keep," yet it was such as was kept in that locality. "Our statute, unfortunately," says the court, "is general, and not, perhaps, adapted to this custom."

In Grisling v. Wood, Cro. Eliz. 85, the quaint record of the case is as follows: "Error, for that in an action in an inferior court, the declaration was in English, whereas by the 36 Edw. 3, ch. 15, all entries are to be in Latin; and although it was said the custom there was so used, yet this cannot be good against a statute, and the judgment was reversed."

Other cases stating or illustrating the rule that a usage must not be contrary to a statute are Blackett v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 2 C. & J. 244; The Reeside, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 567; Mosier v. Harmon, 20 Ohio St. 220; Brown v. Farran, 3 Ohio 155; Coleman v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. (Va.) 51; Hall v. Reed, 2 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 500; Many v. Beekman Ins. Co., 9 Paige (N. Y.) 188; Love v. Hinckley, Abb. Adm. 436; The Lucy Anne, 13 Law Rep. N. S. 545; Winter v. U. S., Hempst. (U. S.) 344.

8. Usages in the Construction of Statutes.—When a statutory provision is ambiguous, evidence of usage may be admissible to interpret the real meaning of the provision.² This is especially the case with ancient statutes.³ Where the statute is modern, the court will consider how far it was intended to modify a usage

1. Usages Contrary to Policy of Statutes.—In Daun v. London Brewery Co., L. R., 8 Eq. 155, it was said: "This is a custom which tends to alter the character of the interests in land belonging, respectively, to the plaintiffs and defendants, there being express legislation that every interest in land shall be created by writing. No doubt this court has in several cases found means to avoid or evade that rule of the legislature. I apprehend, however, that that is not a thing to be extended. It appears to me to be the duty of every court, whether a court of equity or a court of law, to give effect to the plain meaning of the legislature, whatever may be the views entertained of its policy or applicability in particular cases. I, therefore, should be very slow to extend anything by which interests in land can be created, affected, or altered by parol, or by any supposed convention existing by the understanding of the parties."

In Tremble v. Crowell, 17 Mich. 493, it was held that a local custom which is opposed to the general policy of the state on the subject to which it refers, is not valid in law. A custom that if fish caught within the state and sold in barrels to a dealer without express warranty, prove to be unsound, the seller shall refund the price, tends to defeat the purpose of the inspection laws of the state, and is therefore opposed to the general state policy on that subject, and cannot be supported. The effect of the usage must be to cause dealers to dispense with inspection, and pave the way for those consequences which the law was designed to avert; and, at the same time to defeat the desirable objects which the legislature intended to promote. Without attempting to contrast the usage with specific provisions, there can be no doubt but that it would introduce a practice altogether at variance with the spirit and plain policy of the inspection laws.

2. But a usage from which it may be inferred that Congress intended to use particular words in a particular sense in a tariff act, must be definite, uniform, and general; and such designation is to be determined as of the date of the act. Berbecker v. Robertson, 152 U. S. 373; Maddock v. Mayone, 152 U. S. 368.

3. Ancient Statutes.—In Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn. 81, it was held that if the language in ancient charters has become obscure from antiquity, or the construction is doubtful, the constant and immemorial usage under the instrument, may be resorted to, for the purpose of explanation; and in the case of an act of Parliament, universal usage is a proper expositor, where the language is, in any respect, ambiguous. Rex v. Varlo, Cowp. 248; Sheppard v. Gosnold, Vaugh. 169; Rex v. Scott, 3 T. R. 604.

In Dublin's Case, 38 N. H. 512, it was held that when a question arises as to the contemporaneous meaning of the terms used in an ancient instrument, early and long-continued usage has a controlling weight.

In Cole v. Skrainka, 37 Mo. App. 427, one of the judges writes: "The instances where unbroken usage has been allowed to establish the interpretation of a statute have been where the practical interpretation has stood for five hundred years, Mansell v. Reg., 8 El. & Bl. 54; 92 E. C. L. 52; two hundred years, Gorham v. Exeter, 15 Q. B. 69; 69 E. C. L. 68; one hundred years, Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 131, 143; 9 Am. Dec. 123; fifty years, Lord Fermoy's Case, 5 H. L. C. 729, 785; forty years, Reg. v. Cutbush, L. R., 2 Q. B. 379; or even thirty years, Pease v. Peck, 18 How. (U. S.) 595; U. S. v. The Recorder, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 223; Clark v. Dotter, 54 Pa. St. 215. A recent author of a work of great learning and excellence, to whom I am indebted for these citations, adds: 'It may, in general, be said, that the force of contemporaneous exposition, or the exposition involved in professional usage, is most properly confined to old statutes; whereas a re-existing at the time of its passage. But when a statute is free from ambiguity, neither contemporaneous construction nor established usage can be received in its interpretation.¹

IX. USAGES TO EXPLAIN CONTRACTS—1. The Key to the Contract—The Reason Why.—Usage is said to be “the key to the contract,” without reference to which the intent of the parties could not be ascertained. It is for the purpose of ascertaining this intent of the parties that usage is received to explain contracts. If the parties make a complete contract which is not susceptible of explanation, there is no need of usage; and hence follows the rule that usage is inadmissible to vary the terms of a contract. But whenever a contract is brought into court in which there is any ambiguity, or in which the rights of the parties are not fully expressed, usage is admissible to explain its intent. The experience of the courts proves that men of affairs are not in general careful, in making contracts, to express themselves with that completeness which a lawyer would probably desire. Merchants, whose daily transactions are of almost the same character from one year to another, get into the habit of doing certain things in certain ways; cent statute, when brought into controversy, is to be construed according to its terms, not according to the views taken of it by the parties in interest.’ Endlich on Statutes, § 359, citing Clyde Nav. Trustees v. Laird, L. R., 8 App. Cas. 673.”

In Bailey v. Rolfe, 16 N. H. 247, it was said that, “It is only where the words of the statute are doubtful, that usage may be called in to explain them, and not when the act cannot admit of different interpretation. Buller, J., in Rex v. Hogg, 1 T. R. 726. And in this case, the usage of the selectmen in their perambulations has been one way, and that of the assessors has been another. Neither can have any force against the true meaning of the act, if it contain words sufficient to satisfy the court as to what that meaning is.”

1. In Robertson v. Downing, 127 U. S. 607, it was said that the regulation of a department of the government is not, of course, to control the construction of an act of Congress when its meaning is plain. But when there has been a long acquiescence in a regulation, and by it rights of parties for many years have been determined and adjusted, it is not to be disregarded without the most cogent and persuasive reasons. U. S. v. Hill, 120 U. S. 182; U. S. v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 59; Brown v. U. S., 113 U. S. 571.

In Swift, etc., Co. v. U. S., 105 U. S. 691, it appears that the Act of July 14th, 1870, ch. 255, allowed the proprietor of friction matches, who furnished his own dies, a commission of ten per cent. upon the amount of stamps purchased. The provisions of the statute being clear to that effect, he was entitled to recover pursuant thereto, although a different contemporaneous construction of them was given by the bureau, it not appearing that he acquiesced therein. The rule which gives determining weight to contemporaneous construction put upon a statute, by those charged with its execution, applies only in cases of ambiguity and doubt. Edwards v. Darby, 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 206; Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall. (U. S.) 374; U. S. v. Moore, 95 U. S. 760; U. S. v. Pugh, 99 U. S. 265.

In Frazier v. Warfield, 13 Md. 279, it appeared that an immemorial usage had existed in Baltimore, by which the weight of a lot of wheat, as between buyer and seller, had always been ascertained by weighing one bushel in sixty. The legislature passed an act to regulate the sale of grain and provided that inspectors should weigh all wheat offered for sale. The question was whether the statute abrogated the usage. The court said: “If the meaning of the words of the act be uncertain, the law authorizes us to resort to the usage for their interpretation. Doubtful words, in a general statute, may be expounded with reference to a general usage, and when a statute is and as everyone in the particular business is familiar with the method, or usages, which thus become established, contracts are made in silent reliance upon them. To those engaged in the trade, it seems unnecessary to state at length what every one acts upon as a matter of course. Their contracts are thus made as brief as possible, and naturally do not mention the usages which every one takes as understood. But when such contracts are brought into court for construction they are examined more carefully. The effort of one of the parties will be to construe the contract with reference to the usage; the other litigant will deny that the usage is admissible. The duty of the court is to interpret the contract so as to enforce it, in accordance with the intention of the parties at the time it was made. The question then arises whether the usage offered to explain the contract does, in fact, explain it, or whether its effect would be to vary the plain meaning of the terms employed.¹ applicable to a particular place only, such words may be construed by usage at that place. Love v. Hinckley, Abb. Adm. 436. This rule is founded in reason and common sense, and is peculiarly applicable to the case before us. The legislature must be presumed to have acted with a knowledge of the usage existing in Baltimore, and if it had been their purpose to inaugurate a new mode of weighing, they would have declared their intention in plain and unequivocal terms."

In Devlin v. Creditors, 2 La. 361, the court said: "Something was said of the custom of merchants. That custom is entitled to attention, when it is not opposed to positive law. But the opinions of that portion of the community can neither inform the court, nor in any respect influence its judgment, in construing a recent statute."

1. German Savings Bank v. Renshaw (Md. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 281.

In Stewart v. Scudder, 2 Am. L. Reg. 80, usage is said to be the key to the contract, without reference to which the intent of the parties could not be ascertained.

In Williams v. Woods, 16 Md. 220, it is said that in a mercantile transaction, where the terms of a written instrument are technical or equivocal on its face, or are made so by reference to extraneous circumstances, parol evidence of the usage and practice in the trade, is admissible to explain their meaning.

In Van Camp Packing Co. v. Hartman, 126 Ind. 177, it was held that usage may always be referred to for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties in all those particulars concerning which they have not expressed themselves with clearness and certainty in the contract; or where words have been used which have acquired a broader or different signification than that commonly attributed to them, the fact may be proved. Lyon v. Lenon, 106 Ind. 567; Morningstar v. Cunningham, 110 Ind. 328; 59 Am. Rep. 211; Reissner v. Oxley, 80 Ind. 580.

In Nordaa v. Hubbard, 48 Fed. Rep. 921, it was said that while evidence of usage is inadmissible to contradict, it is admissible to explain, a contract, where otherwise the intention of the parties cannot be ascertained.

In Starkie on Ev. (10th ed.) 710, it is said: "The principle upon which such evidence is admissible, seems to be a reasonable presumption that the parties did not express the whole of their intention, but meant to be guided by custom as to such particulars as are generally known to be annexed by custom and usage to similar dealings. It is evident that in commercial affairs, and all the other usual and common transactions of life, it would be attended with great inconvenience that the well-known ordinary practice and usage on the subject should not be tacitly annexed, by virtue of such a presumption, to the terms of a contract, and that the parties should either be deprived of the certainty and advantage to be derived from the known course of dealing, or be placed under the necessity of laboriously specifying

2. Classifications of the Cases.—Usages to explain contracts may be said to be of two kinds:

a. USAGES TO EXPLAIN AMBIGUITIES OR TECHNICALITIES IN CONTRACTS.—In the first class are usages which explain ambiguous or technical words or phrases in contracts. Thus, if a stock-broker's contract states that certain stock is to be sold "short," in their contracts by what particular usages they meant to be bound."

"Experience and observation," says Storrs, J., in Kilgore v. Bulkley, 14 Conn. 390, "prove that the engagements of individuals are in fact entered into with reference to the customs and usages which prevail in the community where they are made; they, therefore, tacitly agree to conform to them, and so far from doing injustice, by regarding such customs and usages, it is the only mode by which justice can be attained. The presumption is, indeed, that those who enter into contracts intend to be governed by the general principles of law. It is, however, competent for them to renounce these principles when public policy does not forbid, and to adopt another rule of action; and the prevalence of a particular local usage on the subject, variant from those general rules, in the absence of evidence to resist it, affords a rational ground of inference that they intended to do so."

In Humfrey v. Dale, 7 El. & Bl. 266; 90 E. C. L. 265, Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "The minds of lawyers are under a different influence from that which, in spite of them, will always influence the practice of traders; which practice creates the usages of trade. The former desire certainty, and would have a written contract express all its terms, and desire that no parol evidence beyond it should be receivable; but merchants and traders, with a multiplicity of transactions pressing on them, and moving in a narrow circle, and meeting each other daily, desire to write little, and leave unwritten what they take for granted in every contract. In spite of the lamentations of judges, they will continue to do so; and in a vast majority of cases, of which courts of law hear nothing, they do so without loss or inconvenience, and, upon the whole, they find this mode of dealing advantageous, even at the risk of occasional litigation. It is the business of courts reasonably so to shape their rules of evidence as to make them suitable to the habits of mankind, and such as are not likely to exclude the actual facts of the dealings between parties when they are to determine on the controversies which grow out of them."

Mr. Schouler, in his work on Bailments, § 448, says: "Custom antedates judicial sanction in most instances; and not to recognize its just force as shaping the social and business intercourse of mankind would be to set the courts, whose machinery was contrived for bending individuals to the public will, into hopeless encounter with the public will itself and the irresistible forces of human society."

Other cases expressing similar views are Chapman v. Devereux, 32 Vt. 616; Ellis v. Ohio L. Ins., etc., Co., 4 Ohio St. 662; Macy v. Whaling Ins. Co., 9 Met. (Mass.) 354; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264.

In Brown v. Byrne, 3 El. & Bl. 703; 77 E. C. L. 702, Coleridge, J., said: "In all contracts, as to the subject-matter of which known usages prevail, parties are found to proceed with the tacit assumption of these usages; they commonly reduce into writing the special particulars of their agreement, but omit to specify these known usages, which are included, however, as of course, by mutual understanding; evidence, therefore, of such incidents is receivable. The contract in truth is partly expressed and in writing, partly implied or understood and unwritten. But, in these cases, a restriction is established on the soundest principle, that the evidence received must not be of a particular which is repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the written contract. Merely that it varies the apparent contract is not enough to exclude the evidence; for it is impossible to add any material incident to the written terms of a contract without altering its effect, more or less; neither in the construction of a contract among merchants, tradesmen, or others, will the evidence be excluded because the words are, in their ordinary meaning, unambiguous, for the

it would be necessary upon a trial to explain the meaning of the technical term "short;" or if a contract uses an ambiguous word, it would be necessary to explain the ambiguity. In these cases evidence of usage is admitted under the general rules of evidence respecting ambiguities.¹

6. USAGES TO EXPLAIN OMISSIONS IN CONTRACTS.—The second class comprises cases in which usages are admitted to determine the rights and obligations of parties in respect to matters about which the contract is silent. Thus, if a contract omits to specify whether certain goods contracted for are to be delivered in bulk or in sacks, evidence of usage is received to determine the proper method.²

The consideration of the first class of cases in which the meaning of words or phrases are explained, consists largely of a list of instances in which explanations have been made. The second class is more interesting and important.³

3. Usages to Explain Ambiguities or Technicalities.—a. THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES.—The cases in the notes define the principles upon which proof of usage is admitted to explain the meaning of technical or ambiguous words and phrases. In general it may be said that usage is admitted in such cases as a matter of necessity, in order to inform the court of the meaning of the parties. So, also, when words or expressions are used by parties in a special or limited sense, usage is admitted to explain their exact meaning. Words and phrases frequently acquire a peculiar or secondary signification in particular trades; and parties engaged in such trades are presumed to use them in their acquired sense.⁴

principle of admission is, that words perfectly unambiguous in their ordinary meaning are used by the contractors in a different sense from that. What words more plain than 'a thousand,' 'a week,' 'a day'? Yet the cases are familiar in which 'a thousand' has been held to mean twelve hundred; 'a week' only a week during the theatrical season; 'a day' a working day. In such cases the evidence neither adds to, nor qualifies, nor contradicts the written contract; it only ascertains it by expounding the language."

3. See infra, this title, Usages Annexing Incidents to Contracts.

4. In Long v. Armsby Co., 43 Mo. App. 253, the court said: "Numberless terms are used in the various branches of commerce and trade, which have a distinct and well-defined and known meaning, but which to the uninitiated and general public are not more intelligible than if Sanskrit. The admissibility of evidence of this kind is necessary to enable the court to understand the contract made, and that the elements of a general and uniform usage need not be proved in such a case, and that the evidence is competent, whether the definition be sanctioned by usage, local or general, limited or universal. If it is shown that a special sense is attached by known usage of trade to words of a contract, it is presumed that the words bear their special meaning. The meaning of terms at the place where the parties use them, or to which they look as the seat of the contract may also control their interpretation. In the hurry of trade and the multitude of contracts, brevity and condensations are absolutely essential. The decisions of the courts in the various jurisdictions seem to be quite uniform and to result in this: that when words have acquired an exact and technical meaning in any

b. PARTICULAR INSTANCES.—The decided cases in which usage has been admitted to explain the meaning of words are very trade or business, and are used in a contract relating to such trade or business, prima facie, they are to be construed in the meaning or sense which they have acquired in that business." In this case the words used were "strictly choice" evaporated apples. Evidence was admitted to show the meaning of those words as acquired by trade usage.

In Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33; 25 Am. Rep. 349, the court said: "Inasmuch as the great mass of commercial business is transacted by men pressed by their affairs, and who are not in the habit, even if time would permit, of reducing their agreements to writing beyond a mere memorandum, the courts are compelled to look to the usages of trade or business to learn the real intention of the parties. If proof of such usages was not allowed, it is believed that in a large number, if not the greater portion of commercial transactions, the intention of the parties would be defeated instead of being enforced, when differences should occur between them. The number, magnitude and complexity of the transactions carried on by dealers on the Board of Trade, have necessitated the adoption of various customs, rules and usages for the regulation and government of the business of the board. Indeed, few of these transactions can be adequately understood from the words, either oral or written, actually employed by the contracting parties, without reference to the usages and rules of the trade. The language of the parties, standing alone, is often meaningless and incapable of interpretation, but when viewed in the light of these customs, rules and usages, it becomes plain, sensible, and easily understood. In point of fact, the main body of these contracts is made up from the rules and usages of the board. Evidence, then, of these rules and usages must ordinarily, at least, form an indispensable element in the interpretation of these transactions."

In Myers v. Sarl, 30 L. J. Q. B. 9; 7 Jur. N. S. 97, Blackburn, J., said: "The words of a written contract are to be understood in that sense which the phrase has acquired in the trade with regard to which it is used. It is the prima facie presumption that it was the intention of the parties to use it in that sense; and, having expressed themselves in a written contract making use of the phrase, it is prima facie, as a matter of construction of the contract, to be taken that they used the phrase in the particular limited sense which it has acquired in the trade. That peculiar and limited sense, if such a one had been acquired, must be shown by parol evidence; and this having been shown, then the presumption is that that was the sense in which the parties making the contract used it. In order to introduce this extrinsic evidence, it is not necessary that the phrase should be at all, on the face of it, ambiguous."

In Eaton v. Smith, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 150, it was said that when a new word is used in a contract, or when a word is used in a technical or peculiar sense, as applicable to any branch of business, or to any particular class of people, evidence of usage is admissible to explain and illustrate it, and that evidence is to be considered by the jury; and the province of the court then is, to instruct the jury what will be the legal effect of the contract, as they shall find the meaning of the word modified or explained by the usage.

In Smith v. Clews, 114 N. Y. 190; 11 Am. St. Rep. 627, it was held that, "Evidence of usage is always admissible to explain the meaning of terms used in any particular trade, when their meaning is material to construe the contract; this rule extends to forms of expression as well as to single words. Evidence of usage is also admissible to apply a written contract to the subject-matter of the action; to explain expressions used in a particular sense by particular persons as to particular subjects, and to give effect to language in a contract as it was understood by those who made it."

In Dwyer v. Brenham, 70 Tex. 30, it was said: "When there is nothing in a contract to negative the inference that the parties contracted with reference to the usage or custom which prevails in the particular trade or business to which the contract relates, then the usage may be shown in evidence for the purpose of ascertaining with greater certainty what was intended by the words or terms used in the contract; numerous and are incapable of satisfactory classification. In the note a few interesting examples are given at some length, and in and this, though a meaning may be thereby given to words contradicting that which would attach to them generally. This rule, even when there is no ambiguity in the contract, is especially applicable in a case where the literal and usual construction of the words used would render the contract so unconscionable that no sane man would have entered into it."

In 2 Parsons on Contracts (7th ed.), p. 541, it is said: "The degree in which these characteristics must belong to the custom, will depend in each case upon its peculiar circumstances. Suppose a contract to be entered into for the making of an article which has not been made until within a dozen years, and only by a dozen persons. Words are used in this contract, and their meaning is uncertain; but it is proved that these words have been used and understood, in reference to this article, always, by all who have ever made it, in one way, and that both parties to the contract knew this; then this custom will be permitted to explain and interpret the words of the parties. But if the article had been made a hundred years, in many countries, and by multitudes of persons, the same evidence of this use of words, by a dozen persons, for a dozen years, might not be sufficient to give to this practice all the force of custom."

In Lowe v. Lehman, 15 Ohio St. 179, it was said: "It is as true now as it was in the time of Horace, that custom is at once the arbiter and standard of languages; usus, quem pene et jus et norma loquendi. It belongs to the imperfection of language, that while much the larger part of its words become, by usage, fixed and universal in their meaning, yet some of them must always be left subject to the changes and variations necessarily occasioned by local usages, and the custom of trades."

In Carver on Carriage of Goods by Sea, § 169, it is said: "A word or phrase used may have a peculiar, or a specially limited sense in the trade, although it may be an ordinary, well-known expression, and free from any apparent ambiguity. If so, evidence of its meaning may be given. The object is to get at the real effect to the parties of the terms used; and if they have acquired secondary meanings in connection with particular kinds of transactions, it is as important to have them translated, as if the contract were in a foreign language." And in § 170 it is said: "Where a word is understood in a special sense in the trade in which the parties are engaged, the presumption is that they have used it in that way. 'Where it is shown that the term or phrase has acquired a peculiar meaning in the trade, it is prima facie to be taken as used with that meaning, unless upon construing the whole contract you can see that, either in express terms or by necessary implication, the parties intended to use it in a different sense.' Per Blackburn, J., Myers v. Sarl, 30 L. J. Q. B. 16; Holt v. Collyer, 16 Ch. Div. 718."

In Long v. Davidson, 101 N. Car. 170, the court said: "If the terms are only used in a particular trade or science or calling, the meaning must be gathered from the testimony of persons acquainted with the trade or science or calling in which the terms are employed, and it is for the jury to ascertain the meaning of the terms used; but when the terms of the contract are ascertained, the construction of the contract is a matter for the court." Silverthorn v. Fowle, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 362.

In Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. White, 66 Md. 444; 59 Am. Rep. 186, it was said that proof of usage for the purpose of explaining the meaning of terms used in the formation of a contract, should be admitted with extreme caution, and never until the party offering it has distinctly stated to the court what he intends to prove. "If a word has acquired a peculiar meaning in a certain trade or business, either local or general, that meaning will be applied to it in the construction of written instruments affecting the transactions growing out of that trade or business; but the fact that the word has acquired such meaning must be distinctly proved by the adduction of satisfactory evidence. Allegre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 136; 20 Am. Dec. 424; Taylor v. Briggs, 2 C. & P. 525; 12 E. C. L. 245; Murray v. Hatch, 6 Mass. 477; Coit v. Commercial Ins. Co., 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 385; 5 Am. Dec. 282."

1. In Smith v. Wilson, 3 B. & Ad. 728, a leading case, the facts were that in a lease of a rabbit-warren, the lessee covenanted that at the expiration of the term he would leave on the warren ten thousand rabbits, the lessor paying for them £60 per thousand. In an action by the lessee against the lessor for refusing to pay for the rabbits left at the end of the term, it was held, that parol evidence was admissible to show that by the custom of the country where the lease was made, the word "thousand," as applied to rabbits, denoted twelve hundred. It was agreed that to say that a thousand means twelve hundred was not to explain, but to contradict, the lease. The judgments in the king's bench were as follows:

Lord Tenterden, C. J.: I am of opinion that the evidence was properly received. Where there is used in any written instrument a word denoting quantity, to which an act of Parliament has given a definite meaning, I agree it must be considered to have been used in that sense. But there is no act of Parliament which says one thousand rabbits shall denote ten hundred, each hundred consisting of five score; and that being so, we must suppose the term "thousand" to have been used by the parties in the sense in which it is usually understood in the place where the contract was made, when applied to the subject of rabbits, and parol evidence was admissible to show what that sense was.

Littledale, J.: I am of the same opinion. Words denoting quantity are undoubtedly to be understood in their ordinary sense, where no specific meaning is given to them by statute or custom. But here the ordinary meaning of the word "thousand," as applied to rabbits in the place where the contract was made, was one hundred dozen. The word "hundred" does not necessarily denote that number of units, for one hundred and twelve pounds is called a "hundred weight," so, where that term is used with reference to ling or cod, it denotes six score; and there being, therefore, no precise meaning affixed by the legislature to the word "thousand," as applied to rabbits, I think that parol evidence was admissible to show that in the country where the contract was made the word "thousand" meant one hundred dozen.

Parke, J.: The only question is whether the evidence has been properly received. Assuming that it has, the jury have found that, according to the custom of the country, there was an understanding between the parties to this contract that the defendant should pay for the rabbits, computing them at the rate of one hundred dozen to the thousand. Although the principle has been more frequently applied to mercantile instruments than to others, it is not confined to them; and if the word "thousand," as applied to the particular subject-matter of rabbits, had, in the place where this contract was made, a peculiar sense, I think that parol evidence was admissible to show it. In an action upon a contract for the sale of one thousand deals, it would, I think, be competent to show that the word "thousand" meant more than it would in its ordinary sense. I agree that where a word is defined by act of Parliament to mean a precise quantity, the parties using that word in a contract must be presumed to use it in the sense given to it by the legislature, unless it appear from other parts of the contract that they use it differently. But that is not the present case. No specific meaning has been given by the legislature to the word "thousand," as applied to rabbits, and therefore it must be understood according to the custom of the country, and evidence is admissible to show what that was.

In Soutier v. Kellerman, 18 Mo. 509, the plaintiff, alleging that he bought of the defendant 4,000 shingles, and that he received eight bundles, which contained only 2,500, and that he had paid for 4,000, brought suit to recover the value of the 1,500 not delivered. The defense was that by the custom of the lumber trade two packs of a certain size are regarded as 1,000 shingles, and are always bought and sold as such without any count of the number, and that the eight bundles delivered to the plaintiff were, according to the custom, properly reckoned as 4,000 shingles. The court declared that, "If the contract was at so much per thousand, and not so much per bundle, and no express agreement was entered into that two bundles should represent a thousand, then the defendant must deliver the four thousand, or else account to the plaintiff for their value." On appeal to the supreme court, this ruling was declared to be erroneous and the judgment reversed. "In the present case, there was evidence that a general custom prevailed in the lumber trade of estimating two packs of shingles of certain dimensions as a thousand shingles, without reference to the number of pieces in the pack. If such was the usage of the trade, so general and well established that those buying and selling might be presumed to deal in reference to it, there does not appear to have been any such contract shown in this case as would prevent the usage from applying. The law commissioner seems to have thought that the defendant could not escape from liability, if the contract was at so much per thousand, unless there was an express agreement that two bundles should represent a thousand. This was an incorrect statement of the law in a case where evidence was given of a general usage that a thousand shingles meant two packs of certain dimensions."

In Merrick v. McNally, 26 Mich. 374, where a contract called for "sixty thousand cubic feet square white oak lumber," a custom in the market to reject fractions of a foot in its measurement was allowed.

In Bragg v. Bletz, 7 D. C. 105, the defendant ordered from the plaintiff, Bragg, of Maine, the shingles in controversy. It appeared that the quantity of shingles constituting a thousand was regulated by a uniform and well-settled custom of trade in Maine, and that that custom established a package twenty inches in width and twenty-three and twenty-four courses in thickness as the equivalent of a quarter of a thousand. The court said that, "The dealings between the parties settled the question whether the custom of reckoning a thousand shingles by measurement, instead of by actual count, was binding upon the defendant. It appeared that cedar and spruce shingles were thus reckoned by mercantile usage everywhere, and that the defendant contracted with a distinct knowledge of its existence."

In Heald v. Cooper, 8 Me. 32, where mill logs were sold for a price per thousand, according to the quantity of lumber they should afterward be estimated to make, and there was a table or scale of estimation then in such general use that the parties were found by the jury to have referred to it as the rule for computing the quantity, it was held that they were bound by this scale, though proved to be in some respects erroneous. "This usage explains the intent of the parties, and not being in opposition to established principles of law, or in contradiction to the express terms of the written instrument, is deemed to form a part of the contract, as much as though actually incorporated into it, or expressly referred to."

In Smith v. Clayton, 29 N. J. L. 357, it was said that it is the duty of the court to interpret written instruments, the meaning of words and their grammatical construction, according to the general rules and usages of the language, as matters of law; but if a local or provincial usage, or a usage as applied to a particular branch of business, is meant to be established, as in regard to the meaning of the word "grain," evidence of common usage is competent.

In Featherston v. Rounsaville, 73 Ga. 617, it was said that where, in the particular trade of selling and buying bacon and pork sides, the words "fully cured" were used as descriptive of the classification of articles sold, in a contest in regard thereto, such words are to have the meaning attached to them by experts—that is, persons in the trade.

In Parks v. O'Connor, 70 Tex. 377, it was said that in a contract for the delivery of cattle, when the word "yearlings" is used, it is competent to prove the local custom among stock men as to the age of cattle coming within the meaning of the word.

In Whitney v. Boardman, 118 Mass. 242, it was held that if goods are sold with "all faults," parol evidence is admissible to show that these words have a well established meaning in the trade in such goods, and what that meaning is. "The expression was one of such a character, that, if in common use and having a well-established meaning in the trade in such articles, such meaning might properly be shown. It is not necessary that terms should be technical, scientific, or ambiguous in themselves, in order to entitle a party to show by parol evidence the meaning attached to them by the parties to the contract. Whitmarsh v. Conway F. Ins. Co., 16 Gray (Mass.) 359; 77 Am. Dec. 414; Miller v. Stevens, 100 Mass. 518; 97 Am. Dec. 123; 1 Am. Rep. 139; Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365."

In Williams v. Stevens Point Lum-

c. EXPLANATION OF PARTICULAR WORDS AND PHRASES.—The reports contain many instances of the application of usage to particular words and phrases used in contracts, mercantile or other.¹

ber Co., 72 Wis. 487, it was queried whether the purchaser of specific piles of lumber, who had received the identical property purchased, could show by parol that, by local usage, the word "lumber" in the bill of sale meant pine lumber only.

In Cook Mfg. Co. v. Randall, 62 Iowa 244, the contract and order for the buggies specified "top buggies with poles." A witness engaged in the trade was permitted to testify against the plaintiff's objection that these words in the order would be understood to mean a common grade of buggies. The evidence was held competent. The language had a meaning understood by the trade, and that meaning must be adopted in enforcing the contract.

In Bullock v. Finley, 28 Fed. Rep. 514, which was an action for "three car-loads of brewers' rice," it did not appear that the contracting parties agreed as to the quantity to make a car-load. It was held that the custom of the trade would fix the quantity. "Where it does not appear that the parties to a contract agreed upon the meaning of a particular word in it, the custom of the trade will determine it."

In Lane v. Union Nat. Bank, 3 Ind. App. 299, it was held in an action on a note executed by the defendants, and payable at the "First Nat., La Fayette, Ind.," and assigned to the plaintiff before maturity, it was admissible to show by extrinsic evidence that the words "First Nat., La Fayette, Ind.," had a definite and settled meaning in the neighborhood where the notes were payable, and meant the First National Bank of La Fayette, Ind., and the proof of such usage or custom, whereby the words were so used, need not to be co-extensive with the state.

In Scott v. Hartley, 126 Ind. 239, it was held that where words or phrases peculiar to a trade or business are found in a written contract, they are open to explanation by parol evidence, and the same may be said of abbreviations.

In Bonham v. Charlotte, etc., R. Co., 13 S. Car. 267, it was said that it was clear that the terms "heavy articles" and "articles of measurement" could not be defined, in their application to goods of different kinds, by mere legal authority; but assuming them to be intelligible to those concerned in the business of transportation by rail or by more general means, their sense must be made apparent by testimony of such a custom or habit of business as tends to define their import.

In Dodge v. Hedden, 42 Fed. Rep. 446, it was held that the trade usage which is to determine the meaning of a word or words in the tariff must be a well-known and general one.

In McCulskey v. Klosterman, 20 Oregon 108, it appeared that in a contract to ascertain the net profits of a firm, it was provided, among other things, that "from the outstanding accounts 5 per cent. be deducted to cover losses and bad accounts;" usage was admitted to show in such case that "outstanding accounts" meant those from which the bad accounts had been segregated and charged to profit and loss.

In Bissel v. Baird, 28 L. T. N. S. 740, the judge received evidence that in the iron trade a usage or custom prevails whereby the entire months of July and August would be included in the terms "during the next two months." It was held that the evidence was properly admissible.

In Myers v. Walker, 24 Ill. 133, the meaning of the word season was explained by reference to a local usage, regarding the time in which grain could be shipped. "The court could see that the term as employed was, without proof of a local usage, without meaning, and that it must have been employed with a local signification."

4. Usages of Banks.—In the note are several instances of usages admitted to explain transactions of banks with their customers.¹

5. Usages of Carriers.—In contracts between carriers and their customers, usages have frequently been received to interpret the terms of bills of lading, and to explain the intent of the parties as to matters not specifically embraced in them. Thus, questions as to the manner of transportation, the right of steamboat carriers to alter the course without causing a deviation, methods of delivery, and various other matters, have been determined by means of usage as explanatory of the contract between the parties.²

1. Instances of Usage in Bank Transactions.—In Keavy v. Thuett, 47 Minn. 266, the defendants, dealers in live stock, wired the plaintiffs, who were in the banking business: "Will honor W. Jones' $500 draft carload steers, bill lading attached." Three days later Jones presented to the plaintiffs a draft, with bill of lading attached, and received the amount of money specified. In an action on the said draft, it was held that as against the plaintiffs, who were not dealers in, or shippers, or carriers of live stock, the defendants could not show what would be understood among such persons by the use of the term "carload," as found in the telegram, and that the animals shipped to the defendants did not in weight constitute a "carload," according to such custom.

In First Nat. Bank v. Fiske, 133 Pa. St. 241; 19 Am. St. Rep. 635, the defendants, commission merchants dealing in wool, wrote the plaintiff bank as follows: "We expect to have some business with Reid, when the wool season opens, in which case we will honor his drafts with bill of lading attached." The plaintiff bank, discounting drafts upon the defendants by Reid, with knowledge of a usage of trade in the sale of wool on commission limiting the amount of drafts to a certain rate upon the value of the shipment, was affected by that knowledge in such transactions. And, such usage not being unreasonable or in conflict with positive law, the plaintiff bank, discounting drafts in excess of the amount authorized thereby, had no right of action against the defendants upon their refusal to honor them. "The usage does not contradict the terms of the instrument on which the plaintiff relies, but it explains them, and gives effect to the intention of the parties.

The letter of the defendants must be read in the light of the usage known to the parties, and applicable to the transaction between them. When so read, it is fatal to the plaintiff's claim for the overdraft."

In Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 483, it appeared that A sent to the Chesapeake Bank $3,000, in gold coin of the United States, which, in accordance with a previous agreement, was received as a special deposit, and entered on the bank book of A, as follows: "1861, Dec. 30th, Cash (coin) $3,000." In an action by the depositor, A, against the bank, the court held that the plaintiff could properly introduce evidence to show that, according to the general and well-known usage of the banks in the city of Baltimore, existing before and at the time of the deposit, and ever since, the entry in his bank book imported an agreement on the part of the defendant to return the deposit in kind—such evidence being offered for the purpose of explaining a latent or patent ambiguity in the entry itself; and that, according to this usage, the striking of balances subsequent to such entry, did not work any change in the character of the particular deposit, the balance to the credit of the plaintiff having always exceeded the amount of the deposit. "It is because of the absence of expressed stipulations in the contract under consideration, that proof of existing usage, in reference to which the contract is supposed to have been made, is admissible, in order to ascertain the real meaning of the parties." Compare Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 663.

2. Usages of Carriers.—In East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 75 Ala. 596; 51 Am. Rep. 489, it was held that when a special contract is entered into between a railroad com-

6. Usages Between Employer and Employee.—In contracts between employer and employee, usages have been received to explain the meaning of the agreement in various particulars.¹ The instances pany and the owner of cattle, for the transportation of the cattle, and it is silent as to the kind of car to be furnished, and as to any special preparation of the car, evidence of a usage, by which the owner is to bed the car, known to him, and upon which he had acted in making previous shipments, is admissible for the purpose of interpreting and explaining the intention of the parties in making the special contract.

In Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Nash, 43 Ind. 423, it was held that where it had been the custom of the railroad company to deliver cars loaded with lumber for the plaintiff, at or near the plaintiff's place of business, it is to be presumed that the contract of shipment was made with reference to such custom or usage, and that the railroad company was bound to deliver the cars at the usual place.

In Fisher v. Geddes, 15 La. Ann. 14, it was held that where it is the custom of common carriers to allow the baggage of passengers to be taken in charge by servants in their employ, to be delivered by them at a certain place and in a certain manner, they will be liable for the loss of the baggage arising from the neglect of their employees to make the delivery according to custom.

In Andrews v. Roach, 3 Ala. 590; 37 Am. Dec. 718, it was held that although a bill of lading of cotton, to be carried by river, states the price at which it is to be transported, the carrier is not precluded from showing the existence of a custom on the river to charge lighterage in addition to the freight, whenever the tide is so low throughout the season as to prevent cotton boats from passing shoals.

In Hooper v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 27 Wis. 81; 9 Am. Rep. 437, it was held that where a bill of lading recited that certain cotton was shipped on a specified steamboat, it was ruled admissible to show that, by the custom of the river, when the river was low, barges were carried in tow, and freight stored, at the option of the carrier, on either the boat or the barge.

In McClure v. Cox, 32 Ala. 617, it was held that where a railroad company received goods addressed to a point beyond its terminus, and gave a bill of lading for the transportation of the goods to its terminus, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to prove that there was a custom in such cases to deliver to a connecting carrier, such evidence not tending to vary or contradict the bill of lading.

In several cases usage has been received to explain the meaning of the word "days" in bills of lading, as referring to working days. Cochran v. Retberg, 3 Esp. 121; Higgins v. U. S. Mail Steamship Co., 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 282; Balfour v. Wilkins, 9 Cent. L. J. 56; Commercial Steamship Co. v. Boulton, L. R., 10 Q. B. 346. For other cases, see Peek v. North Staffordshire, etc., R. Co., 10 H. L. Cas. 473; Bissel v. Campbell, 54 N. Y. 353; Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206; 93 Am. Dec. 184.

In Walsh v. Homer, 10 Mo. 6; 45 Am. Dec. 342, it was held that evidence that it was the usage of the carrying trade for one boat on a voyage to stop and aid another boat in distress, is competent to show that such is not a deviation so as to make the owners liable for a loss.

In Lowry v. Russell, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 360, it was held that by a bill of lading expressing that goods are to be carried from one port to another, a direct voyage is prima facie intended; but this presumption may be controlled by a usage to stop at intermediate ports. "The bill of lading, like other contracts, is to be construed according to the intention of the parties. Usage of trade is always presumed to be within the knowledge of the parties, and these contracts are supposed to be made with reference to it. There is nothing in the evidence in the present case, contradicting the express terms of the bill of lading, which are that the goods shall be carried from New York to Georgetown. A direct voyage is prima facie intended, but this may be controlled by usage."

1. Usages Between Employer and Employee.—In Grant v. Maddox, 15 M. & W. 737, by a written contract, the plaintiff, an actress, agreed to perform at the defendant's theater, and the defendant agreed to engage her for three years, and pay her a salary per week. The court allowed the uniform usage of the theatrical profession to be shown, by include usages to show that in a contract at a yearly salary, the employer may dismiss the employee at a month's notice;¹ that in an agreement for a year, the employee is not expected to work continuously, but is entitled to certain intervals for rest and holiwhich the plaintiff was to be paid only during the theatrical season, i. e. during the time while the theater was open for performance, in each of those years. "You have no right to qualify or alter the effect of a written contract, but it is perfectly competent to qualify or alter the meaning of the words which apparently form the written contract, and to insert the true words which the parties intended to use. That is not to alter the contract, but to show what the contract is. Whenever the words used have, by usage or local custom, a peculiar meaning, that meaning may be shown by parol evidence. The evidence was admitted only for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the words used in the contract. It is clear that this may be done with respect to foreign words or scientific expressions; and I think the same is true of a case where the words of the contract have reference to a particular profession."

In Gleason v. Walsh, 43 Me. 397, it was held that when men are hired, and no special agreement made as to the time they are to work, evidence of what usage in that particular employment is, as to time, is proper for the consideration of the jury.

In Vaughn v. Gardner, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 326, it was held that proof of the customary duty of those employed in the performance of any particular service at any particular place, which is reasonable, is legitimate evidence in questions involving the rightful discharge of such duty.

1. In Parker v. Ibbetson, 4 C. B. N. S. 346; 93 E. C. L. 345, the plaintiff agreed to serve the defendants as agent, under a written agreement as follows: "P. engages to serve the said I. & Co. as agent or representative, at the salary of £150 per annum in consideration thereof. Also provided, that at the end of the year, if I. & Co. find the said P. has done sufficient business to justify them in recompensing him by making up his salary to £180, to do so, being a donation of £30 to his present stipulated amount of £150." Under this agreement, the plaintiff continued in the service of the defendants, receiving his salary monthly, when the defendants, before the end of the year, gave him a month's notice to quit. For this dismissal, he brought an action. On the trial, the defendants called several witnesses to prove a custom in the trade to dismiss at a month's notice, though the engagement was at a yearly salary. Crowder, J., said: "It seems to have been established that there was a general custom in the trade that a yearly hiring might be put an end to by either party upon a month's notice. It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff that, assuming such a custom to exist, the special terms of this agreement exclude the application of it to this case. It seems to me that there is no foundation for that argument. The first part of the contract amounts simply to an engagement on the part of the plaintiff to serve the defendants as agent, at the salary of £150 per annum; then follows a proviso that if 'at the end of the year the said I. & Co. (the defendants) find the said P. (the plaintiff) has done sufficient business to justify them in recompensing by making up his salary to £180, to do so, being a donation of £30 to his present stipulated amount of £150.' Reading this agreement and its construction is for the court, and not for the jury. It seems to me to be simply an agreement for a yearly hiring at a yearly salary, and that there is nothing in the proviso to alter the nature and character of the agreement. The simple question is whether, looking at the custom proved, which is general, there is anything in the written agreement to exclude it. I see nothing in it that can have that effect. The proviso cannot exclude it; that has no reference to dismissal. Then, if there is nothing in the contract that is inconsistent with the application of the general custom, it is the same as if the custom had formed part of the written agreement. This case must follow the ordinary rule, that wherever a contract is made in a particular trade, all customs which regulate that trade are tacitly incorporated into the contract, unless by express terms excluded." Willes, J., said: "The fact of the plaintiff having been engaged at a yearly salary, under an agreement which has been reduced into writing, is clearly not enough to exclude the custom, which was proved to be general, to determine a yearly hiring by giving a month's notice, just as in the case of domestic servants, where, though a general hiring is presumed to be a hiring for a year, the service may nevertheless be put an end to at any time by a month's notice. The question is, whether the application of that general custom to the particular case, is excluded by the concluding words of the agreement, which provide that, at the end of the year, if the employer is satisfied with the amount of business done, he will make an addition of £30 to the stipulated salary. Would that proviso be inconsistent with the agreement going on to say that the master should be still at liberty, if so minded, to dismiss the servant at any time during the year, upon giving him a month's notice? Clearly not. The custom, being proved, becomes part and parcel of the contract." Byles, J., said: "In cases of this nature two questions generally arise—the one, a question of law: Whether the terms of the agreement may admit, or must necessarily exclude the custom; the other, one of fact: Whether, if the agreement may admit the custom, the custom extends to the particular agreement."

1. In Reg. v. Inhabitants of Stoke-upon-Trent, 5 Q. B. 303; 48 E. C. L. 301, the court held that when, by written contract, a workman engages to work at a particular trade for a year, parol evidence may be given that, by the custom of the trade, the workman is entitled to certain holidays in the course of the year; "as the contract is in general terms and does not specify the particular times of service, such evidence explains and does not contradict the written contract. If the contract had been to serve day by day, the evidence of custom with respect to holidays would have contradicted the contract. But it was in general terms, specifying merely the commencement and the determination of the term of service. The evidence was therefore not inconsistent with the contract."

2. In Hinton v. Locke, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 437, an action to recover for work and labor done for the defendant, it appeared that he had promised to pay the plaintiff, a carpenter, twelve shillings per day for every man employed by him about the work. The plaintiff insisted that ten hours' labor constituted a day's work, and that he was entitled to charge one day and a quarter for each natural day during which the men worked twelve hours and a half; and he offered evidence of a custom among carpenters to that effect which the court admitted. "The usage or custom did not go to vary the contract. It went to explain and ascertain the intention of the parties in relation to a matter upon which the contract was silent. Evidence often serves to explain or give the true meaning of some word or phrase of doubtful import, or which may be understood in more than one sense, according to the subject-matter to which it is applied. Now here, the plaintiff was to be paid for his workmen at the rate of twelve shillings per day; but the parties have not told us by their contract what they meant by a day's work. It has not been pretended that it necessarily means the labor of twenty-four hours. How much then does it mean? Evidence of the usage or custom was let in to answer that question. And when we find a universal usage in this business to call ten hours' labor a day's work, we have arrived at the true meaning of the word day, as used in this contract."

3. In Jonsson v. Thompson, 97 N. Y. 642, which was an action against a hotel keeper to recover an alleged agreed compensation for services as hostler, the defendant claimed to set off moneys received by the plaintiff as gratuities or "scale moneys," and offered to show that it was the universal custom at hotels to consider scale money as part of the compensation of the hostlers. The testimony offered tended to prove a general usage to that effect, and if such a usage existed, the parties may be presumed to have contracted with reference to it. The court said: "Even if the referee was justified in finding from the evidence that the amount of the plaintiff's wages was fixed by agreement at $20 per month, this would not be inconsistent with a usage, if such a general usage existed, that the scale money received by him was to be considered a part of his wages."

Usages are frequently admitted to explain what are the proper duties of the employee's position, and to show whether or not he is bound to do various items of work. By this means the duties of salesmen, mechanics, and others have been judicially ascertained.¹

7. Usages in Contracts for Services or Labor.—Contracts for services and labor have been prolific of controversies requiring proof of usage for their determination. Especially has this been the case in building contracts, into which mechanics and others have sought to incorporate the usages of their trades. Thus, contracts providing for the building of house walls may be at so much per square yard, and when a dispute arises between the parties, the question is, how are the square yards to be computed in respect to windows, doors, cornices, rounded surfaces, and the like. In such cases the courts generally have held that the usages of the trade are admissible to determine the proper method of measurement. Other cases relate to the manner of ascertaining the amount of materials used in erecting a house, such as the number of bricks in a wall; the ownership of refuse or old material; the compensation to be paid, etc.²

1. In Brown v. Baldwin (C. Pl.), 13 N. Y. Supp. 893, it was held that evidence to show that an agreement in writing "to serve as traveling salesman" imposes upon the salesman, according to the usages and customs of trade, the duty of making up samples necessary for his business, is admissible in an action for breach of such contract. The court said that by the contract the respondent was to serve as traveling salesman, "but what were his duties as such was not defined, nor does the law determine them. Parol evidence of trade usage ascertaining those duties was, therefore, in no sense contradictory of or inconsistent with the terms of the written instrument, but tended only to show the full meaning and effect of the words 'traveling salesman.'" Other cases of similar character are Hagan v. Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. 9 Hun (N. Y.) 73; Hosley v. Black, 28 N. Y. 438; Sweet v. Lea, 3 M. & G. 452; Price v. Mouat, 11 C. B. N. S. 509; 103 E. C. L. 508; Mumford v. Gething, 7 C. B. N. S. 305; 97 E. C. L. 303; Collyer v. Collins, 17 Abb. Pr. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 467; Baron v. Placide, 7 La. Ann. 229.

2. In Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464; 10 Am. Rep. 407, the plaintiffs contracted, in writing, to furnish the materials to do certain plastering for the defendant, at so much per square foot. They charged him for the full surface of the wall, without deducting for cornices, baseboards, or doors and windows. Proof that this was the customary method among plasterers in measuring work was allowed. "The contract between the parties was in writing. By it the plaintiffs were to furnish the material for the plastering work of the defendant's house, and to do the work of laying it on. The defendant was to pay them for the work and material a price per square yard. Of course, the total of the compensation was to be got at by measurement. But when the parties came to determine how many square yards there were, they differed. The query was, the square yards of what? Of the plaster actually laid on, or of the whole side of the house, calling it solid, with no allowance for the openings by windows or doors? . . . How shall the number of the square yards of the work done be ascertained, is not so determinately reached by the language of the contract as that the law can say there was but one method in the minds of the parties, and this is it. . . . The usage is not designed to obtain payment for material never furnished. It is a method devised for more conveniently and readily ascertaining the quantum of compensation for what work has been done in fact, and what material has been in fact furnished. It is agreeable with common sense that it is more difficult, asking more skill and care, requiring more time, to plaster about the frames of doors and windows and along the edges of baseboards and cornices than over the plain, uninterrupted surface of wall and ceiling. The more, then, of such openings or obstacles, the more, in proportion to the space of plaster actually laid on, should be the compensation. And it matters not, in law or in reason, how the amount of that greater compensation is arrived at; whether by a minute and precise calculation of part plain and of part broken space, at a greater price for the square yard of space actually covered, or by an assumption that the whole surface worked upon is plain, and then payment be made for it at a less price per square yard thereof. The aim which the usage takes is at a compensation which shall be just to employer and employed. The mode of reaching it proposed by the usage does not infringe upon any principle of law, for it is but a mode."

In Ford v. Tirrell, 9 Gray (Mass.) 401; 69 Am. Dec. 297, which was an action on an agreement to build an octagonal cellar wall at a certain price by the foot, evidence of the usage of measuring the angles of such walls, and of the proper mode of measuring the angles of rectangular walls, was held admissible. "The meaning of the language used by the parties in their agreement being, in reference to the compensation to be paid for the work which was to be done, equivocal and obscure, it was certainly competent for the plaintiff to introduce proof of usage, in order to interpret the meaning of the language and ascertain the extent of the contract. 'The true office of usages of trade,' says Mr. Greenleaf, 'is to interpret the otherwise indeterminate intention of the parties; and to fix and explain the meaning of words and expressions of doubtful or various senses.' The evidence in relation to a general usage to make an allowance to the extent claimed by the plaintiff in the admeasurement of octagonal walls beyond the mere inner surface of them, on account of necessary additional work at the angles, was, we think, very properly admitted."

In Long v. Davidson, 101 N. Car. 170, however, the court held that the terms used were terms of art, and meant amongst contractors, builders and others, that the count was to be made by ascertaining the number of cubic feet in the wall, and then multiplying that number by eighteen, as the number of bricks of average size needed to make a cubic foot, "The contract was that the building was to be erected of brick at $2.40 per thousand, 'wall count, solid measure,' and it must be that something was meant by the term used. The defendant says that no such contract as is alleged by the plaintiff was made, and that he knew nothing of any such rule for counting bricks as was alleged; but if the terms of the contract were as alleged by the plaintiff, it was the misfortune of the defendant to have agreed to pay $2.40 per thousand, 'wall count, solid measure,' in ignorance of the meaning, and the only meaning, as appears from the testimony, conveyed by the terms used in making the contract, and without informing himself of the fact that they had at least, one meaning."

In Graham v. Trimmer, 6 Kan. 231, where the subject of controversy in a suit was, among other things, the amount, in yards, of a certain job of plastering, it was held that it was not error for the court to permit evidence to be given as tending to show the proper and customary method of measuring and ascertaining the amount of such work.

In Fitzsimmons v. Academy of Christian Brothers, 81 Mo. 37, contractors undertook to do the masonry of a building according to plans and specifications for the same, for the sum of $2, in addition to the price of rock, per perch, the evidence showed a custom prevailing, in ascertaining how much masonry had been completed so as to pay the demand of a mason for laying rock in a wall, to count corners twice, each corner constituting a part of two intersecting walls, also all openings for doors and windows as if they were solid matter. It was held that the contractors were entitled, under their contract, to a measurement in accordance with the said custom.

In Johnson v. DePeyster, 50 N. Y. 666, which was an action upon a building contract, evidence of usage, as to measurements in the locality where the building was built, was held competent, and the usage became part of the contract.

In Smythe v. Parsons, 37 Kan. 79, it was held that parties to a contract are presumed to contract with reference to a uniform and well-settled custom or usage pertaining to the matters concerning which they make the contract, where such custom or usage is not in opposition to well-settled principles of law nor unreasonable; and therefore it was held, in an action upon a building contract, that the trial court did not err in permitting testimony to be introduced tending to prove a general custom at Wichita, with reference to the method of ascertaining the number of bricks in a wall, the contract having been made at Wichita, and not prescribing how the number of the brick in the wall should be ascertained.

In Hugg v. Shank (Supreme Ct.), 4 N. Y. Supp. 929, it was held, in an action for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien, that where the point in controversy is as to whether the ceilings were as high as required by the specifications, the question asked a witness, "In measuring for a nine-foot ceiling from what points do you measure?" does not call for a matter of opinion, but for a custom or rule of the trade.

In Bradbury v. Butler, 1 Colo. App. 430, it was held that where, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien on an irrigating ditch, the contract for the construction of the ditch was silent as to the basis of estimates of work and labor, testimony of custom was admissible.

In Lowe v. Lehman, 15 Ohio St. 179, the contract was to furnish and lay bricks at a certain price per thousand. "The question was as to the proper mode of counting the bricks, and evidence of a usage among builders to estimate by measurement of the walls on a uniform rule based on the average size of brick, making slight additions for extra work and wastage, deducting openings in walls, but not for openings in chimneys, nor jambs, was held admissible. The workman was to furnish the brick and materials, and lay them up by the thousand. The contract contains no specifications of the dimensions, shape, angles, openings or arches of the wall, or of the size of the brick. It does not require a mason to know that the value of the work and materials depends much upon these, and such like conditions, if they are to be paid for by the numerical thousand. Again, the brick are to be furnished as well as laid up. Where and how will you count them numerically? Will you count them at the kiln, on the ground, or in the wall? And who will lose the breakage in transportation and in handling, and the waste of filling them into the wall? Some fair measurement of the wall would seem to be a more reasonable method. And we cannot say that this method was not a fair one. It slightly increased the estimated number of bricks in the wall, it is true, by making small additions for extra work, and extra waste of bricks at the angles and openings; and the rule of measurement adopted fixes upon an arbitrary and uniform dimension for the average size of the brick, which may vary slightly, but cannot vary very much, from their true average size. All this seems to be reasonable."

In Hewett v. John Week Lumber Co., 77 Wis. 548, it was held that a usage by saw-mill owners to retain the slabs of logs which they have contracted to saw, in addition to the compensation fixed in the contract, may be proved in an action by the mill-owners for the breach of such a contract. "The custom was, we think, a proper and lawful custom, and one which would be likely to be adopted by parties dealing in the furnishing of logs by one party, and the manufacture of them by another party, for the reason that the slabs would be of considerable value to the mill-owner, and of little or no value to the man furnishing the logs, if required to remove them from the mill. The object of proving the usage is not to contradict or change the contract made between the parties, but to interpret it to the court and jury as it was understood by the parties at the time it was made."

In Wausau Boom Co. v. Dunbar, 75 Wis. 133, which was an action to recover boomage charges, the defendant counter-claimed for the failure to deliver some of his logs at his mill. The plaintiff alleged that the logs in question became misplaced and were passed below the defendant's mill without fault of the plaintiff, and that, in accordance with the established custom in such cases, the logs were delivered to other mills, which gave credit to the defendant therefor. It was held that evidence of such custom was admissible. "Such evidence, in such a case, manifestly tends to explain and make evident the understanding and intent of the parties upon matters as to which their contract is silent. Of course, such usage, customs, and course of dealing should, in the absence of actual knowledge, be so long continued, and so well known and established, and so

8. Usages in Contracts of Insurance.—Usages to explain contracts of insurance are chiefly directed toward defining the meaning of words used in policies, either by way of limiting or extending their scope. So, also, usages have been received to explain the established method of conducting business in insured buildings, or on board ship, and in other cases.¹

9. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—In contracts between landlord and tenant all the usages prevailing in the particular locality are supposed to be in the minds of the parties. It is said that every demise is open to explanation by the usage of the uniformly acted upon, as to raise a presumption that it was known to both contracting parties, and that their contract was made with reference to it."

In Cooper v. Kane, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 386; 32 Am. Dec. 512, a contract for the excavation of lots in a city, so as to make them conform to a certain plan, was silent as to whom should belong the sand or other material taken therefrom. A usage existed, long established and notorious, that it went to the excavator, and not to the owner of the lots. It was held that evidence of the usage was admissible to explain the contract of the parties. The court, by Nelson, J., said: "I am inclined to the opinion that the evidence of the custom in respect to contracts like the one out of which this action has arisen, by way of explaining it, and which was offered by the defendant for that purpose, was admissible. It did not go to vary any express or necessarily implied stipulations between the parties therein contained, but rather to establish what amounted to a complete performance agreeably to the presumed understanding of the parties. . . . Now, in this case, there is simply an agreement to excavate the earth in a certain street, and to make the necessary embankment, according to a map of the corporation, for a given compensation. Nothing is said about the surplus earth; where it is to be laid, or what is to be done with it. Would it be a workmanlike execution of the contract to pile it upon the adjacent bank or may the contractor dispose of it as he sees fit, and as most convenient and profitable to himself? It appears to me the solution of these questions may very well be referred to common usage in such cases, if any exist."

Other cases upon this subject are Jordan v. Meredith, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 318; 2 Am. Dec. 373; Pittsburg v. O'Neill, 1 Pa. St. 343; Martin v. Thrasher, 40

Vt. 460; Myers v. Sarl, 30 L. J. Q. B. 9; 7 Jur. N. S. 97; Reynolds v. Jourdan, 6 Cal. 108; Symonds v. Lloyd, 6 C. B. N. S. 691; 95 E. C. L. 689.

1. Usages in Insurance Contracts.—In Allegre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 408; 29 Am. Dec. 536, it was held that policies of insurance, charter-parties, or instruments of like nature, may be explained by parol evidence of the usages of the trade to which they relate, whether such usages regard the course of the voyage or not. Parol evidence of usage is admissible to prove the meaning of the words in a policy that in case of loss, the same was to be paid in ninety days after proof and adjustment thereof.

In Crocker v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. (Mass.) 79, it was held that a policy of insurance on a "machine shop, a watchman kept on the premises," does not require a watchman to be kept there constantly, but only at such times as men of ordinary care and skill, in like business, keep a watchman on their premises; and in an action on such a policy, evidence of the usage, in this respect, of similar establishments, is admissible to explain the meaning of the terms.

In Mooney v. Howard Ins. Co., 138 Mass. 375; 52 Am. Rep. 277, which was an action upon a policy of insurance against loss by fire on a junk-dealer's stock of "rags" and "old metals," it was held that evidence was admissible to show that, by a usage of the trade, the terms quoted had acquired a broader signification than belonged to those words as commonly used. The plaintiff was permitted to prove a custom in the junk trade to include under the term "rags" all articles used in the manufacture of paper, and under the term "old metals" various articles, such as old rubber and old glass. The court said:

place where the land lies, and that it would be very inconvenient if it were otherwise. The cases relate to the removal of fixtures, the cultivation of the soil, the apportionment of expenses, the hours for quitting the premises, and other matters.¹

10. Usages in Maritime Contracts.—In maritime contracts usages have explained questions in relation to the departure which will

"Knowledge by an insurer of a usage in a certain trade, extending the meaning of terms used in a policy of insurance upon articles designated by those terms, may be inferred from the universality and long existence of the usage."

In Allegre v. Maryland Ins. Co., 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 136; 20 Am. Dec. 424, it was said that the word "cargo," in an order for insurance, does not, ordinarily, cover live stock; but if live stock constitutes the only article of exportation from the port from which the vessel carrying the insured property is to sail, to the port to which she is destined; or if, according to the mercantile usage of the place of effecting the insurance, the word "cargo" is understood to cover live stock, then an insurance under that general denomination, will cover live stock.

In Boice v. Thames, etc., Marine Ins. Co., 38 Hun (N. Y.) 246, evidence was received, against the objection and exception of the defendant, tending to show that the plaintiff was accustomed to load on deck; that this was the customary mode of loading, and that the defendant's agents knew this to be so. It was held that, as the evidence was not intended to explain or modify any terms actually written in a policy, but only to show what must have been the understanding of the plaintiff and the agents when the verbal agreement was made, it was admissible.

In Lapham v. Atlas Ins. Co., 24 Pick. (Mass.) 1, it was held that a general usage for the same species of vessels, in various kinds of navigation and in different seasons of the year, to carry deck loads, was competent evidence, in connection with the opinions of nautical witnesses, to show that in fact the risk was not increased by carrying the cotton on deck. "The usage was not admitted in evidence for the purpose of giving a construction to the contract. In that view it would have been competent, if the contract had been in reference to it. But it was introduced merely as to the question, whether, in point of fact, the risk was or was not increased by taking the cotton on deck. It does not seem to have been very material, but we cannot perceive that it was altogether irrelevant."

Other cases in which usages have been admitted to explain policies of insurance are Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Brock, 57 Pa. St. 74; New York Belting, etc., Co. v. Washington Fire Ins. Co., 10 Bosw. (N. Y.) 428; White v. Mutual F. Ins. Co., 8 Gray (Mass.) 566; Houghton v. Manufacturers' F. Ins. Co., 8 Met. (Mass.) 114; Percival v. Maine Mut., etc., Ins. Co., 33 Me. 242; *Webb v. This subject is considered at some length in MARINE INSURANCE, vol. 14, pp. 329 et seq., rendering unnecessary anything further in this article.

1. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—In Van Ness v. Pacard, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 137, the question was as to the validity of a custom in the city of Washington, authorizing a tenant to remove any building, which he might erect upon rented premises, provided he did it before the expiration of the term. The court, by Story, J., said: "Every demise between landlord and tenant in respect to matters in which the parties are silent, may be fairly open to explanation by the general usage and custom of the country or of the district where the land lies. Every person under such circumstances is supposed to be consuant of the custom, and to contract with a tacit reference to it."

In Hutton v. Warren, 1 M. & W. 474, Parke, B., said: "The relations between landlord and tenant have so long been regulated upon the supposition that all customary obligations not altered by the contract are to remain in force, that it is too late to pursue a contrary course; and it would be productive of much inconvenience if this practice were now to be disturbed. The common law, indeed, does so little to prescribe the relative duties of landlord and tenant, since it leaves the latter at liberty to pursue any course of management he pleases, provided he is not guilty of waste, that it is by no means surprising that the court should have been favorably inclined to the introduction of those regulations in the mode of cultivation, which custom and usage have established in each district to be the most beneficial to all parties." And see LANDLORD AND TENANT, vol. 12, p. 713.

In Amory v. Melvin, 112 Mass. 83, the lessees in certain leases of property in Boston covenanted that they would pay "all taxes and assessments whatsoever, which may be payable or assessed in respect of the premises, or any part thereof, during said term." The leased premises were parts of a large building which was leased to several tenants. At the trial the judge admitted evidence of a usage in Boston, in such cases, to apportion the whole tax assessed upon the building among the different tenants, according to their respective rents. "The covenant of each tenant to pay taxes cannot be construed to mean the taxes upon the whole estate. From the nature of the case some mode of apportioning the whole tax must be contemplated by the parties. The usage to apportion it in proportion to the rents paid by the tenants is a convenient and reasonable usage, and, in the absence of any express stipulation upon the subject, the parties must be deemed to have contracted in reference to it."

In Wilcox v. Wood, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 346, the court said that it seems that a lease of premises from the first day of May in one year to the first day of May in the succeeding year, excludes the first day. But proof of a local custom that a lease in those terms expires at noon of the last day is admissible; and the court suggested that such custom would be highly convenient. "I do not mean to be understood that, in general, customs can be valid which give a construction to written instruments; that is the business of the courts; but if under leases in the usual form, from the first of May, to the first of May, it has been the immemorial usage to interchange possession at twelve o'clock at noon, it seems to me unobjectionable—not as a construction of the instrument, but as a practical exercise of rights under it. The time in the lease either includes or excludes the first of May; but as the courts would not settle the point, the people have taken the medium and that which is the most convenient, and, therefore, that which was no doubt the true intention of the parties. A strict compliance with the letter of the lease, whether it includes or excludes the day, would compel those who change tenements to move in the night, or remain one night in the street. Such an absurdity was never intended."

In Mangum v. Farrington, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 236, it was held that a written contract may be interpreted by the local customs in reference to which it was made, and it is error to exclude evidence of such customs. As between the lessor of a bulkhead and the lessor of the adjoining pier, evidence of the custom of the port is admissible to show how far wharfage is collectible for the use of the bulkhead, and to what extent for the use of the pier.

In Hutton v. Warren, 1 M. & W. 466, a custom by which the tenant, cultivating according to the course of good husbandry, was entitled, on quitting, to receive a reasonable allowance in respect to seed and labor bestowed on the arable land in the last year of his tenancy, and was bound to leave the manure for the landlord, if he would purchase it, was held not to be excluded by a stipulation in the lease that he would consume three-fourths of the hay and straw on the farm, and spread the manure arising therefrom, and leave such of it as should not be so spread on the land, on receiving a reasonable price for it.

In Muncey v. Dennis, 1 H. & N. 216, a custom of the country binding the incoming tenant to pay the outgoing tenant for straw left on the farm, was held not to be excluded by a provision in the lease to the outgoing tenant that all constitute a deviation, the payment of freight and towage, the measurement of goods shipped, etc.¹

straw should, during the term, be consumed, and the manure used on the premises.

In Holding v. Pigott, 7 Bing. 465; 20 E. C. L. 201, a lease contained stipulations limiting the quantity of grain that should be grown on the farm, and directing that the land should be summer-fallowed, and that the tenant should spend all the fodder, hay, straw, turnips, etc., on the premises; and held that the custom of the country, which would give the tenant a right to the away going crop of wheat after a crop of turnips, was not excluded, though such crop had been grown in violation of the covenant to leave the land summer-fallowed. The court said these were stipulations as to the terms of holding, not as to the terms of quitting. In reference to this case it is said, in Clarke's Brown on Usages and Customs, section 51; "The agreement under which the tenant held was silent altogether as to any terms on which the tenant should quit, and the clause of the agreement which was inconsistent with the custom of the country was a stipulation confined expressly to the period of holding by the tenant. It adverted to nothing that was to take place at the end of the tenancy, and spoke only of terms of holding during its continuance. There was, therefore, nothing in such an agreement at variance with the application of a custom between the landlord and tenant which did not come into force until the expiration of the term. In that case, the rights of the landlord and tenant were governed by the terms of the agreement during the tenancy, and by the terms of the custom immediately afterwards. It is clear that, as the agreement only referred to the continuance of the tenancy, both the landlord and tenant must have anticipated, not only an end to the holding, but must have looked forward to a time when their mutual relations must be regulated by some other rule than that contained in the agreement. As there is nothing said as to the end, there is the ambiguity of silence which the custom of the country can be called upon to explain."

In Muncey v. Dennis, 1 H. & N. 216, where, by the terms of a farm lease for seven years, expiring at Michaelmas, the tenant agreed to cultivate the land according to the custom of the country, and "during the term to consume with stock on the farm all the hay, straw, and clover grown thereon, which manure shall be used on the farm," and the landlord agreed to let the tenant occupy part of the homestead until midsummer after the expiration of the term, if necessary, "to end the cropping of the tenant grown on the premises," it was held that the lease did not exclude the custom of the country, by which the tenant having paid for straw on his incoming, was entitled to be paid for straw on his quitting.

1. Usages in Maritime Contracts.—In Brown v. Byrne, 3 El. & Bl. 703; 77 E. C. L. 702; 18 Jur. 700, the action was for freight claimed by a shipowner against the indorsee of a bill of lading who had accepted goods, the bill of lading stating "he (the indorsee), paying freight for them five-eighths of a penny sterling per pound, with five-pound per cent. primage and average accustomed." The court held that evidence was admissible that by the custom of Liverpool the shipowner was entitled to a deduction of three months' discount from the freight, though such custom applied only to goods coming from ports in the southern states of America. "Here," said Coleridge, J., "the contract is to pay freight on delivery, at a certain rate per pound. Is it inconsistent with this to allege that, by the custom, the shipowner, on payment, is bound to allow three months' discount? We think not. The written contract expressly settles the rate of payment. The custom does not set this aside; indeed, it adopts it as that upon which it is to act, by establishing a claim for allowance of discount upon freight to be paid after that rate. The consignee undertakes to pay freight on delivery after that rate; the shipowner undertakes to allow three months' discount on freight paid after that rate. The latter contract is dependent on the former, but is not repugnant to it. If the bill of lading had expressed—or if from the language of it, the intention of the parties could have been collected—that the freight, at the specified rates, should be paid free from all deductions, customary or otherwise, then it would have been repugnant to it to set up the custom, and the case would have been brought within the restriction mentioned above. . . . But the contract

11. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser.—The cases arising in the relation of vendor and purchaser are numerous and interesting. In these cases it is competent to offer evidence of usage, not contradictory to the contract, to show what the parties must have intended by their contracts of sale.¹ The cases disclose a settles the rate of freight; whether or not discount is to be allowed on the payment, it leaves open, and to that the custom applies."

In Hostetter v. Park, 137 U. S. 30, a deviation was defined to be "a voluntary departure, without necessity or reasonable cause, from the regular and usual course" of a voyage, in reference to the terms of a policy of marine insurance; "but it is no deviation, in respect to such a voyage, to touch and stay at a port out of its course, if such departure is within the usage of the trade. The same doctrine is applicable in the case of a bill of lading, even though the usage be not known to the particular shipper, if it be established as a general usage. It is well settled that parties who contract on a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail, incorporate such usages by implication into their agreements, if nothing is said to the contrary. Robinson v. U. S., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 366. The contract in the bill of lading, that the goods are to be delivered at New Orleans 'without delay,' is qualified by the exception of 'the dangers of navigation' and 'unavoidable accidents;' and if the navigation was in its course according to the usage of the trade, as is found to be the fact, the loss in question occurred through a danger of navigation. Western Transp. Co. v. Downer, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 129; The Favorite, 2 Biss. (U. S.) 502; Williams v. Grant, 1 Conn. 487; 7 Am. Dec. 235." And see Walsh v. Homer, 10 Mo. 6; 45 Am. Dec. 342.

In Buckle v. Knoop, L. R., 2 Exch. 125, and Bottomley v. Forbes, 6 Scott 816; 5 Bing. N. Cas. 121; 35 E. C. L. 50, the actions were for freight; usages were admitted to explain that the measurement of the goods, which determined the amount of the freight, was to be calculated at the port of shipment rather than the port of delivery.

In The Queen of the East, 12 Fed. Rep. 165, it was held that payment for towage from and to sea, under a contract in which the time for payment for the same is not specified, is due in the port of New Orleans, under the custom thereof, prior to the ship's being towed back to sea. And further, it is well settled that, in all maritime contracts, usage or custom is always applicable and binding on the parties to explain doubtful and supplement incomplete agreements and stipulations.

In Brown v. Hicks, 8 Fed. Rep. 155, it was held that in the light of the usages of the port of New Bedford, the common contract to perform a whaling voyage can be terminated by either party for good cause; and information justifying a party to such a contract in concluding that the voyage had failed, and could no longer be prosecuted with success, constitutes a good cause. "The contract should be construed in the light of the usages of the port of New Bedford, and, being so construed, it provided for a whaling voyage to continue for the term of three years, or until an earlier accomplishment of its purpose; and in the meantime neither party had the right, at his own pleasure and against the will of the other, to put an end to the voyage, except for good cause."

For other cases upon this subject see Roberston v. Jackson, 2 C. B. 412; 52 E. C. L. 411; Leidemann v. Schultz, 14 C. B. 38; 78 E. C. L. 38; Cuthbert v. Cumming, 10 Exch. 809; 11 Exch. 405; Russian Steam Nav., etc., Co. v. Silva, 13 C. B. N. S. 610; 106 E. C. L. 609; Birch v. Depeyster, 1 Stark. 210; Barker v. Briard, 1 H. & N. 21; Robertson v. Wait, 8 Exch. 299; Peisch v. Dickson, 1 Mason (U. S.) 11; Gibbon v. Young, 2 J. B. Moo. 224; Hudson v. Clementson, 18 C. B. 213; 86 E. C. L. 213.

1. Usages Between Buyer and Seller.—In Haas v. Hudmon, 83 Ala. 174, the contract required the sellers to deliver the meat at O. The court held that it necessarily followed, if there was nothing to vary the rule, that the damage for non-delivery was governed by the price at O. It was contended, however, that there was a general custom of trade varying the rule; and that the custom was so general, and had prevailed so long, that the parties must be presumed to have contracted in reference to it. Under this custom it was claimed that, in cases like the present, the price at the point of shipment was the measure of damages for non-delivery. "To avail, it must, among other things, have been established and acted on generally, and sufficiently long to raise a presumption of its knowledge. There is no rule of mere law which forbids the making of the defense, offered as it was in this case."

In Belrne v. Dord, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 89, it was held that a general and uniform usage in a particular trade, in goods so packed or situated that examination of the bulk is inconvenient and difficult, or calculated to expose the goods to injury, to the effect that the goods in that trade are sold by the production and examination of samples, is competent, in connection with other evidence, to prove in respect of a sale of such goods, that a personal examination of the bulk was not contemplated by either party, and that both intended to contract upon the sample only.

In Page v. Cole, 120 Mass. 37, the defendant by a written instrument conveyed to the plaintiff for a certain sum, "a certain milk route, situated in the southerly part of Boston, with all the rights, privileges thereto belonging;" "also the right and good will of supplying twenty-six full eight-quart cans of custom situated as above." In an action upon the agreement, the plaintiff offered in evidence the testimony of experts that milk trade is bought and sold by the can; that the right and good will of supplying customers has a known and recognized value in the market; that there was a uniform usage in the trade for the person selling the right and good will of supplying custom to furnish to the purchaser customers whose average daily purchases amount to the number of cans sold; that in the milk trade the terms "right and good will of supplying custom" mean, when applied to sales of the trade, the right of supplying milk to the customers furnished and pointed out by the vendor from those accustomed to buy milk of him. The court held that this evidence of usage of the milk trade was admissible, and the defendant's contract was hardly intelligible without it, and said "the usage which the plaintiff offered to prove was not offered for the purpose of contradicting the terms of the written contract, or applying to it any system of interpretation different from the standing rules applicable to written contracts generally. It was merely as to the mode of doing business in that particular trade, and to show that certain terms, hardly intelligible in themselves, have a recognized and well-known meaning in that special trade."

In Atkinson v. Truesdell, 127 N. Y. 230, it was held that a written contract for the sale and purchase of glassware "to be made after September 1st, and to be taken by January 1st, 1883, terms, sixty days, net on dock," is not varied, but only explained, by parol evidence showing that in the glass business the words "to be taken" between fixed dates give the buyer a right of ordering the goods to be shipped as he wishes, between the dates; that the seller must ship as ordered, and may not deliver the goods without such order.

In Field v. Lelean, 6 H. & N. 627; 30 L. J. Exch. 68, evidence of a usage amongst brokers that on the sales of mining shares the seller is not bound to deliver without contemporaneous payment, was held admissible to show that the defendant was not entitled to have the shares which he had bought from the plaintiff delivered to him before payment, although by the bought and sold notes payment of the price was to be made, half in two, half in four months, and nothing was there said as to the time of delivery.

In Loneragan v. Stewart, 55 Ill. 44, it was held that where the owner of grain deposited the same in a warehouse, taking an ordinary warehouse receipt therefor, which did not explicitly state the character of the transaction—whether as a sale or a mere bailment—it is competent, in an action by the depositor against a purchaser from the warehouseman, for the latter to show that, according to the usage in such cases, warehousemen do not keep the identical grain deposited, but ship and sell it without regard to the identity of the grain deposited by any particular person, and that depositors at a warehouse do not expect to take their grain away, but to get their money at the market price on the day they demand it—and this, as tending to give character to the transaction as a sale rather than a bailment.

So in Lyon v. Lenon, 106 Ind. 567, it was held that where a receipt for personal property delivered does not disclose whether the transaction is a sale or a bailment, extrinsic evidence may be resorted to. "Where a contract concerning a particular business is ambiguous, it will be presumed that it was made with reference to the ordinary course of such business, and evidence showing such course is admissible."

In Gunther v. Atwell, 19 Md. 157, it was held that where samples of tobacco are prepared by a state tobacco inspector, his agency in performing that duty is as much in behalf of the buyer as the seller, and neither the buyer nor seller has cause of complaint, or right of redress, either against the other, for any mistake as to condition or quality of the goods sold, if with mutual knowledge and good faith they buy and sell upon the credit of the samples so obtained. Hence, in an action for damages alleged to have resulted from the non-correspondence of two hogsheads of tobacco sold by sample, with the samples by which it was sold, the defendant offered to prove "that according to the usage and understanding of merchants in the tobacco trade in the city of Baltimore, the purchaser does not look to the seller to insure a correspondence between the quality of the tobacco in the sample and that in the hogsheads, but relies exclusively upon the sample, and the fidelity of the inspector in its preparation." The court, in holding that such evidence was admissible, said: "The testimony would only have proved a usage among tobacco dealers, in strict conformity with what we understand to be the law in buying and selling tobacco by samples prepared by the state inspectors."

So in Mida v. Geissmann, 17 Ill. App. 207, it was held competent to show a custom or usage of the whisky trade in Chicago, well known to all dealing in whisky warehouse receipts, that in purchasing whisky warehouse receipts, the seller of such receipts was never looked to as the responsible party; that the sole reliance was upon the warehouse which issued the receipts. It was entirely competent to prove such usage where, as in this case, it contravened no provision of an express contract.

In Florence Mach. Co. v. Daggett, 135 Mass. 582, B agreed to make for A a certain number of castings of a new stove, in a specified time, the patterns for which were to be furnished by A. In an action by A against B, for breach of this contract, one ground of defense was, that delays were occasioned by the failure of A to furnish patterns in time, because of alterations made by him in the patterns. It was held that A was entitled to put in evidence that there was a well-known, universal usage in the business to make changes in new patterns, arising from the fact that the first set of patterns, however good, would never produce castings that could be put together without alteration. The court said: "In mercantile, manufacturing and other business transactions, evidence of established usage is admissible, not merely to explain the words or terms employed in a contract, but to annex to it those ordinary and customary incidents which must have been intended to form a part of it. If it be impossible to add any material incident to the written contract without altering its effect more or less, an incident so established is deemed to have been contemplated by and embraced in it. The usage which the plaintiff attempted to show was not in violation of any rule of law, was not unreasonable and was neither expressly nor impliedly excluded by the tenor of the written instrument."

In Johnson v. Raylton, 7 Q. B. Div. 438, the defendants tendered evidence to show that in the iron trade there is a custom that, under a contract between a manufacturer of iron plates and a customer for the supply of them, the seller must, in the absence of stipulation to the contrary, supply plates of his own make, and that the purchaser is entitled to reject other plates, if tendered, though of the quality contracted for. The learned judge at the trial rejected this evidence, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. On appeal it was held that such evidence was improperly rejected. "The contract contains no express stipulation on the question in dispute, and as this is the fact, the principle of the cases is that if there is a custom or practice of the trade, the parties must be taken, as regards matters on which the contract is silent, to have dealt with reference to the practice or custom of the trade, and to have expressed in their written contract those matters for which the custom of the trade did not variety of instances of this character. Thus, where goods are to be delivered under a contract, and the measure of quantity is of doubtful meaning, usage is received to show what meaning should be given to the measure mentioned;¹ and where there is nothing to show how certain goods are to be delivered, whether in sacks or in bulk, usage may decide the uncertainty.² So various questions of weight, measurement, quality, etc., in the sale of goods are determined by the usage of the trade in respect to said sales, as the best means of ascertaining the intention of the parties where it is not declared by the contract.³ Similarly, in the provide, or in which in the particular case they decided to depart from or vary the custom."

Other cases upon this point are Spicer v. Cooper, 1 Q. B. 424; 41 E. C. L. 608; Salmon Falls Mfg. Co. v. Goddard, 14 How. (U. S.) 446; Shepherd v. Kain, 5 B. & Ald. 240; *Schneider v. 1. In Miller v. Stevens, 100 Mass. 518; 97 Am. Dec. 123; 1 Am. Rep. 139, the court, in holding oral evidence admissible to show that in a written contract for the purchase of a certain number of "barrels" of petroleum oil at so much a gallon, the word "barrel" means a vessel of a certain capacity, and not the statute measure of quantity, said: "The written contract between the parties does not show whether the word 'barrels' is used as describing a quantity merely, or a vessel of a certain kind and capacity; for 'barrels' might mean either a quantity or a vessel; and if the vessels intended were of a uniform size, the fixing of the price by the gallon would be equally adapted to either. Parol evidence was therefore admissible to show in which sense the parties intended to use the word; and the presiding judge rightly admitted testimony that refined petroleum was often sold in barrels, and that the usual size of such barrels was forty-two gallons."

2. In Robinson v. U. S., 13 Wall. (U. S.) 363, a party agreed to deliver so many bushels of "first quality clear barley," the contract not stating whether the barley was to be delivered in sacks or in bulk, i. e., loose. It was held that evidence was properly received to show a usage of trade to deliver in sacks; such evidence tending, not to contradict the agreement, but only to give it precision on an important point where by its terms it had been left undefined. If a person of a particular occupation in a certain place makes an agreement by virtue of which something is to be done in that place, and this is uniformly done in a certain way by persons of the same occupation in the same place, it is but reasonable to assume that the parties contracting about it, and specifying no manner of doing it different from the ordinary one, meant that the ordinary one and no other should be followed. Parties who contract on a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail, by implication incorporate them into their agreements, if nothing is said to the contrary.

3. In Barton v. McKelway, 22 N. J. L. 165, the contract was for the delivery of a number of trees, "not to be less than one foot high." A usage was shown that such trees should be measured only to the top of the ripe wood, rejecting the green, immature top. "It is no answer to say that 'tree' is a word of precise and definite signification, or that a 'tree' is a 'tree,' and can be nothing else, and that everybody knows what a tree is. It is the qualification contained in the contract that we are to consider in this case. The trees were to be at least a foot high. This involves the question of measurement, and how were they to be measured—while standing and growing in the ground, or after they had been dug from it? Were they to be measured from the extreme root to the extreme branch (both of which are parts of the tree), or in what other mode were they to be measured, in order to determine their height? The jury were called upon to decide whether the plaintiff's or the defendant's rule of measurement was the true rule, and they could do that satisfactorily only by being informed of the usage that appertained to the subject matter of the contract."

In Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, the plaintiffs contracted with the defendants for certain goods described as "all the horn chains they manufacture." The defendants contended that these words implied a warranty that the chains should be made wholly of horn, and that there was a failure to comply therewith if part of the links were made of hoof; but the plaintiffs were allowed to show that chains of the latter kind were known as horn chains in the market. "There are many articles which are named from one of several different materials of which they are made. A contract, for example, to furnish gold watches or mahogany furniture would not be construed to require the whole watch to be of gold, or the whole piece of furniture to be mahogany. In the admission of the evidence offered by the plaintiffs on this point, the true rule was applied by the court."

In Jones v. Hoey, 128 Mass. 585, it was held that if goods in cases are sold by weight, without more specific agreement, evidence of a general usage is admissible to show that the weight is to be computed as previously ascertained at the time of packing and marked on the cases, and not by the actual weight at the time of the sale.

In Ragland v. Butler, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 323, it was held that a contract to sell the merchantable pine timber upon a certain tract of land, to be sawed into lumber by the vendor according to the directions of the purchaser, and to be delivered at Richmond, was a contract that the lumber should be merchantable; and the usage at Richmond as to what constitutes a compliance with the directions of the purchaser, is to be the rule in determining that question. "If it should appear that there was an established usage, showing what should be deemed a substantial and sufficient compliance with such orders, it might be proved to ascertain the sense in which the orders were understood by the parties."

In Humphreysville Copper Co. v. Vermont Copper Min. Co., 33 Vt. 92, A agreed, in writing, to deliver to B five hundred tons of copper ore, to be paid for at certain specified prices per ton, according to the quality of the ore, to be ascertained by an assay thereof, "the moisture to be deducted, as usual, from the weight of the ore." B claimed that under the contract A was bound to deliver a quantity of ore weighing five hundred tons after deducting for the moisture, while A insisted that he was only bound to deliver five hundred tons of ore, gross weight, without any deduction for the moisture, and that the proviso in regard to such deduction related only to the mode of ascertaining the weight of ore to be paid for. It was held that either party might show a custom in the sale of copper ore corresponding with their respective claims as to the construction of the contract.

In Baker v. Squier, 1 Hun (N. Y.) 448; 3 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 465, the action was upon a bought-and-sold note describing the goods as 225 tons "Kurtz, 48 to 50 per cent. carbonated soda-ash." The court admitted evidence of a custom as to determining the quality of the goods. On appeal it was said: "We think the custom was properly admitted in evidence. A person engaged in a particular trade is presumed to be acquainted with the usages of that trade, and to contract with reference to them, and the usage of the trade in which the contract is made, may be shown to explain the meaning of a particular contract, but not to contradict its plain terms. The figures 48 to 50 per cent. convey no meaning to a person ignorant of the subject-matter of the contract, and of the usages of the trade in which it was made, and the evidence of the custom was to explain the meaning of those terms or figures when used in such a contract, and did not tend to vary the import of the contract so far as its terms were expressed."

absence of an express provision, usage may determine whether the vendor or purchaser should pay the duties upon goods imported, or the freight upon goods sent by a carrier, or storage.¹

12. Miscellaneous Contracts.—In the note are collected other cases in which proof of usage has been admitted as explanatory of contracts. Among them are usages in wagering contracts, usages in the mining regions of California and elsewhere, and other instances.²

1. In Brown v. Browne, 9 U. C. Q. B. 312 the plaintiffs bought from the defendant certain coal shipped to the defendant at Toronto from a foreign port, and then lying on board the vessel in the Welland canal. A sale note was given, stating only the quantity and price, and the time by which it was to be taken out of the vessel. It was held that the defendant was not obliged to pay the import duties and that evidence was rightly admitted to show the usage of the trade on sales made under such circumstances. "There was no writing produced that expressed anything on the subject of duties, and the defendant was therefore not seeking to contradict the terms of any writing by parol testimony when he gave evidence as to what was the usual course of trade when purchases of coal are made under such circumstances. That was strictly admissible evidence; because, when we know what the general usage of trade is in regard to any branch of business, we are to look on the parties as intending to contract with reference to it, unless we have proof that they meant to deviate from it."

In Howe v. Hardy, 106 Mass. 329, which was an action between a manufacturer of window frames and a dealer in them, on an issue whether the former should pay freight on frames sold and delivered by him to the latter, evidence of a usage between manufacturers and dealers, in the place where the goods were made and sold, that the manufacturers should pay the freight, was held admissible. The usage was competent, for it related to what the vendor was to do in respect to the delivery of the goods in the absence of an express stipulation. Putnam v. Tillotson, 13 Met. (Mass.) 517.

In Fawkes v. Lamb, 31 L. J. Exch. 168; 8 Jur. N. S. 385, a written contract for the sale of goods was silent as to the time for which warehouse-room rent was allowed by the seller to the purchaser, and it was held competent to show this fact by evidence of custom.

2. Usages in Miscellaneous Contracts.—In Walker v. Armstrong, 54 Tex. 609, the court interpreted a written contract for a horse race. It appeared that the word for starting was given in so loud a tone that one of the horses became frightened, and not entering the polls was not turned loose, while the other horse started and ran the distance required by the contract. "The contract being silent as to the consequences of a failure to start when the word is given for the start in a horse race, parol evidence of custom is admissible to explain its consequences. It will be presumed where the contract was silent, the parties had in view the rules of the turf. Evidence of these rules does not vary the contract, but explains the meaning of the parties to it."

In Evans v. Pratt, 3 M. & G. 759; 4 Scott N. R. 378, an agreement was made for a wager upon a horse race "across a country." Usage was admitted to show that by this expression the rider was not allowed to ride through an open gate.

In Morgan v. Richards, 1 Browne (Pa.) 173, usage was received to show that when either party to a wager relinquishes the deposit, the wager is at an end.

In Brown Chemical Co. v. Atkinson, 91 N. C. 389, it was held that parol evidence is admissible to show the custom or usage of a place where a contract is entered into; and this, upon the principle, that it is presumed the parties did not mean to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they intended to be bound, but a contract with reference to such usage. In this case the court allowed evidence of usage in a controversy as to whether fertilizer dealers in other states, or their local agents in North Carolina, should pay the license tax imposed in North Carolina.

In Lamb v. Klaus, 30 Wis. 94, it was held that where there is a written contract to manufacture and deliver

X. USAGES ANNEXING INCIDENTS TO CONTRACTS—1. Nature of this Branch of the Subject.—We have thus far considered the functions of usages in explaining contracts, by removing ambiguities, or by determining matters about which the contract was silent. But beside these functions an important branch of the law of usage relates to what is termed “annexing incidents” to contracts. An example will illustrate clearly what is meant by usage “annexing an incident” to a contract. A tenant holds under a lease running from April 1st to April 1st in each year. The lease contains nothing as to the tenant’s right to the crop sown before April 1st, but maturing after April 1st. There is nothing in the lease requiring explanation or construction. Here the usage steps in and adds a new clause to the contract of lease, to wit: that the away-going crop shall be the property of the tenant. This clause, thus added by the usage, is said to be an incident annexed to the contract. This branch of the law of usage is an outgrowth or extension of the principles governing the admissibility of usage to explain contracts. It was found that parties in goods, and money is advanced thereon, a usage to pay interest on such advance at ten per cent. is not contrary to the terms of the written contract, although nothing is said of the interest therein. “A usage to pay ten per cent. interest on advances is like any other unwritten promise to pay that rate, and is good to enforce payment of interest at seven per cent.; the rate allowed by law where there is an obligation to pay interest and no written agreement for a higher rate.

In the following cases usages in the mining business were received: Clayton v. Gregson, 5 Ad. & El. 302; 31 E. C. L. 342; Hicks v. Bell, 3 Cal. 219; Packer v. Heaton, 9 Cal. 568; Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 366; 76 Am. Rep. 574; Roach v. Gray, 16 Cal. 383; English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107; Gore v. McBrayer, 18 Cal. 582; Prosser v. Parks, 18 Cal. 47; *St. John v. There are also other California mining cases of merely local interest. See also MINES AND MINING CLAIMS, vol. 15, p. 559.

In Newhall v. Appleton, 114 N. Y. 140, it appeared that the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff $15 for each order that he obtained for the defendants’ encyclopedia. It was held that the defendants may show that the words “$15 an order for each and every order obtained for the encyclopedia” meant, and were well understood in the subscription-book business to mean, $15 for each order obtained for the encyclopedia, under which five volumes have been taken and paid for. “By the usage or custom of the subscription-book business, the words used in the contract had a well-defined meaning which was understood by both parties to the contract, and what such meaning was. The evidence of custom was admissible, not to change or vary the contract made, but to ascertain with greater certainty what was the intention of the parties at the time of its making.

In Miller v. Insurance Co. of N. A., 1 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y. Supreme Ct.) 470, it was held, in an action on a promise to pay commissions to an insurance agent, that evidence of a usage or custom of the trade to pay commissions only on premiums actually collected was admissible. “The agreement designated no time for the payment of the commissions. Parol evidence for the purpose of supplying this omission was therefore admissible. The defendants proved a custom among brokers, that the commission is not due until the premium is paid, and by the plaintiff that the custom was to collect commissions after the premiums were paid. Evidence of a custom of that kind is admissible. It is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the contract, nor does it add any new terms thereto, but is merely explanatory thereof.”

making contracts often omitted to state important parts of their agreements. It was, therefore, recognized by the courts that it was as necessary to add to the contract as it was to explain it, if the intent of the parties was to be followed.¹

2. Distinction Between Annexing Incident and Varying Contract.—The chief difficulty in determining whether or not a given incident may be annexed to a particular contract, arises when it is considered in reference to the question whether it varies the terms of the contract.² An incident annexed, simply means a term added; and it is, therefore, clear that in every case in which an incident is annexed, the contract is to that extent changed and made different from what it previously was. If the change varies the contract by contradicting it, or adds inconsistent terms, it is

1. In Hutton v. Warren, 1 M. & W. 474. Parke, B., delivering judgment, said: "It has long been settled that in commercial transactions extrinsic evidence of custom and usage is admissible to annex incidents to written contracts in matters with respect to which they are silent. The same rule has also been applied to contracts in other transactions of life, in which known usages have been established and prevailed; and this has been done upon the principle of presumption that in such transactions, the parties did not mean to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they intended to be bound, but to contract with reference to those known usages. Whether such a relaxation of the common law was wisely applied where formal instruments have been entered into, and particularly leases under seal, may well be doubted; but the contrary has been established by authority."

In 1 Greenl. on Ev. (15th ed.), § 294, it is said that, "Parol evidence of usage or custom is admissible 'to annex incidents,' as it is termed; that is, to show what things are customarily treated as incidental and accessory to the principal thing, which is the subject of the contract, or to which the instrument relates. This evidence is admitted on the principle, that the parties did not intend to express in writing the whole of the contract by which they were to be bound, but only to make their contract with reference to the known and established usages and customs relating to the subject-matter. But in all cases of this sort, the rule for admitting the evidence of usage or custom must be taken with this qualification, that the evidence be not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the contract; for otherwise it would not go to interpret and explain, but to contradict, that which is written."

In Everingham v. Lord, 19 Ill. App. 565, it was said that while usage or custom cannot contradict the stipulations in the contract, it may add new terms not expressed in or covered by the contract, and which are incidental and not repugnant to it. "Customs which do not contradict the agreement, but add to it a consequential right or duty, are binding on the parties without reference to the question whether the agreement is by deed or parol, or the undertakings are implied from certain acts of the parties."

But a usage to affect a contract must be so general and well established that knowledge and adoption of it may be presumed; and it must be certain and uniform. Baltimore Base Ball, etc., Co. v. Pickett (Md. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 279.

2. In Humfrey v. Dale, 7 El. & Bl. 266; 90 E. C. L. 265, Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "In a certain sense, every material incident which is added to a written contract varies it, makes it different from what it appeared to be, and so far is inconsistent with it. If, by the side of the written contract without, you write the same contract with the added incident, the two would seem to import different obligations and be difinadmissible; but if it has not such effect, it may be received. The line of distinction is difficult to draw closely, much depending upon the facts of particular cases, and the views of individual judges. The paragraph of this article relating to the rule that usages are inadmissible to vary the terms of a contract should be read in this connection.¹

3. Cases Between Landlord and Tenant.—The cases in which usages have been received to annex incidents to contracts are principally those arising out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and vendor and purchaser's agent. As between landlord and tenant, the cases are chiefly upon the away-going crop. In a leading English case the question was decided in favor of admitting the usage. It was said that, "The custom does not alter or contradict the agreement in the lease; it only superadds a right."²

ferent contracts. To take a familiar instance by way of illustration: On the face of a bill of exchange at three months after date, the acceptor would be taken to bind himself to the payment, precisely at the end of the three months; but by the custom he is only bound to do so at the end of the days of grace, which vary, according to the country in which the bill is made payable, from three up to fifteen. The truth is, that the principle on which the evidence is admissible is that the parties have not set down on paper the whole of their contract in all its terms, but those only which were necessary to be determined in the particular case by specific agreement, and which, of course, might vary infinitely, leaving to implication and tacit understanding all those general and unvarying incidents which a uniform usage would annex, and according to which they must in reason be understood to contract, unless they expressly exclude them. To fall within the exception, therefore, of repugnancy, the incident must be such as, if expressed in the written contract, would make it insensible or inconsistent. Thus, to warrant bacon to be 'prime singed,' adding, 'that is to say, slightly tainted,' or to insure all the boats of a ship, and add, 'that is to say, all not slung in the quarter,' and other cases of the same sort scattered through the books, would be instances of contracts in which both the two parts could not have full effect given to them if written down; and, therefore, when one part only is expressed, it would be unreasonable to suppose that the parties intended to include the other also. Without repeating ourselves, it will be found that the same reasoning applies where the evidence is used to explain a latent ambiguity of language."

2. Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Doug. 201; 1 Smith Lead. Cases *594, was an action of trespass for mowing, carrying away, and converting to the defendant's own use, the corn of the plaintiff, a tenant. The defendant Dallison, the landlord, pleaded liberum tenementum, and the other defendant justified as his servant. The plaintiff replied, that it was true that the locus in quo was the close, soil, and freehold of Dallison; but pleaded a custom in the following words, viz: "That within the parish there now is, and, from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary, there hath been a certain ancient and laudable custom, there used and approved of, that is to say, that every tenant and farmer of any lands within the same parish, for any term of years which hath expired on the first day of May in any year, hath been used and accustomed, and of right ought, to have, take, and enjoy, to his own use, and to reap, cut, and carry away, when ripe and fit to be reaped and taken away, his way-going crop; that is to say, all the corn growing upon the said lands which hath before the expiration of such term, been sown by such tenant upon any part of such lands, not exceeding a reasonable quantity thereof in proportion to the residue of such lands, according to the course and usage of husbandry in the same parish, and which hath been left standing and growing upon such lands at the expiration of such term of years." He then stated that he sowed with corn part of the said close, being a reasonable part in proportion to the residue thereof, according to the course and usage of husbandry in the said parish, and that the corn produced and raised by such sowing of the corn so sown as aforesaid, being the corn in the declaration mentioned, at the end of the term, and at the time of trespass committed, was standing and growing in the said close, the said time not exceeding a reasonable time for the same to stand, in order to ripen and become fit to be reaped, and that he was during all that time lawfully possessed of the said corn, as his absolute property, by virtue of the custom. The jury found the custom in the words of the replication. It was moved, in arrest of judgment, that such a custom was repugnant to the terms of the deed, and therefore, though it might be good in respect to parol leases, could not have a legal existence in the case of leases by deed. Lord Mansfield said: "We have thought of this case, and we are all of opinion that the custom is good. It is just, for he who sows ought to reap, and it is for the benefit and encouragement of agriculture. It is, indeed, against the general rule of law concerning emblements, which are not allowed to tenants who know when their term is to cease, because it is held to be their fault or folly to have sown, when they knew their interest would expire before they could reap. But the custom of a particular place may rectify what otherwise would be imprudence or folly. The lease being by deed does not vary the case. The custom does not alter or contradict the agreement in the lease; it only superadds a right which is consequential to the taking, as a heriot may be due by custom, although not mentioned in the grant or lease." Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff, upon which a writ of error was brought in the exchequer chamber, and the defendant assigned for errors, "that the custom contained and set forth, etc., is a custom void in law, and is contrary to and inconsistent with the said indenture of lease in the said replication mentioned." Lord Loughborough delivered the unanimous opinion of the court of exchequer chamber, that the custom was good, and the judgment was affirmed.

This case and a contemporaneous decision in *Pennsylvania*¹ have been generally followed in the United States, and therefore a

1. Before the judgment in Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Doug. 201, was known in this country, a similar decision had been reached in Pennsylvania. The decision was based both upon the reasonableness of the thing, and the fact that it did not conflict with the terms of the lease. In Stultz v. Dickey, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 285; 6 Am. Dec. 411, Tilghman, C. J., said: "When the custom of a country or of a particular place is established, it may enter into the body of a contract without being inserted. Both parties are supposed to know it, and to be bound by it, unless provision to the contrary is made in the contract. It appears to me, therefore, that it was proper to admit evidence of the custom concerning the way-going crop. I understand that this custom had been recognized by a decision at nisi prius prior to this action, and that the law had been held as it is laid down in the case of Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Doug. 201. There the custom was limited to a particular part of England. With us it is supposed to extend throughout the state. In the nature of the thing, it is reasonable that where a lease commences in the spring of one year and ends in the spring of another, the tenant should have the crop of winter grain sown by him the autumn before the lease expired, otherwise he pays for the land one whole year without having the benefit of a winter crop. If the parties intend otherwise, it is easy to control the custom by an express provision in the lease." Yeates, J., said the question had been settled by the case of Diffendorffer v. Jones, decided in 1782, and in which he was counsel. "Though I was dissatisfied with the opinion then delivered," he added, "I have never heard the doctrine questioned since. I have adverted to this case in Carson v. Blazer, 2 Binn. (Pa.) 487; 4 Am. Dec. 463. Such custom is said in our books not to alter or contradict the agreement in the lease, but only to superadd a right which is consequential to the taking, although not mentioned therein. There can be no doubt, if the tenant was restricted by the terms of his lease from removing his grain after his time was expired, that he would be bound by his contract; and I apprehend the privilege of the tenant, in general, is confined to a rea-lease not providing for the disposition of the away-going crop, is, by the addition of terms not inconsistent with the lease, made to contain a clause which was in the minds of the parties, but which was omitted from their contract.¹

sonable quantity of the lands in proportion to the residue thereof, according to the course and usage of husbandry in the same parts of the country. The privilege is founded on the highest equity, and conduces to the extension of agriculture.

1. In Foster v. Robinson, 6 Ohio St. 90, it was held that in case of a lease of farming lands, whether by deed or in parol, from the first of April in one year, to the first of April in the next year, the contract of lease being silent in respect to an away-going crop, and containing nothing, either expressly or by fair implication, to negative a customary right of the tenant to such crop, a general custom, established in the place where the parties reside and the demised premises are situate, giving to the tenant the right to the away-going crop, annexes such right, by way of incident, to the contract of lease.

In Howell v. Schenck, 24 N. J. L. 89, the court defined it as "the custom which allows a tenant to enter after the expiration of his term and reap his way-going crop. It is a custom established for the benefit and encouragement of agriculture, and based upon the principle, that he who sows in peace shall reap in peace. The custom is recognized in VanDoren v. Everitt, 5 N. J. L. 460; 8 Am. Dec. 615, as the law of New Jersey. Its object is to give the tenant the full benefit of the crops of the year, of which he would otherwise be deprived, as they do not all ripen until after the expiration of his term." See also Society, etc. v. Haight, 1 N. J. Eq. 393.

In Dorsey v. Eagle, 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 321, it was said: "It is conceded that if the lease were silent upon the subject of the manor regulations, that then parol evidence would be admissible to prove that the tenants have a right, by the custom of the manor, to remove their away-going crops at any time within a reasonable period after the determination of their leases; because the law itself would admit evidence extrinsic of the written agreement of the custom of the manor for the purpose of annexing it incidentally to the terms of the written instrument concerning which it was silent." And in Dircks

v. Brant, 56 Md. 500, it was held that where the renting is for a term certain, the tenant is not entitled to the crops which at the time of sowing he knew could not mature during the continuance of his term, unless by express stipulation with his landlord, or by the custom of the country.

In Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh (Va.) 632; 50 Am. Dec. 510, it was held that where land is leased for a fixed and determinate period, the off-going tenant is not entitled to the way-going crop; and that parol evidence of a usage for the off-going tenant to have the way-going crop, is not admissible to explain a written contract of lease for a fixed and certain period. "Here there is no ambiguity, no uncertainty, no doubt, whatever. It is nothing more nor less than a lease for a fixed period and certain, when the interest of the tenant is to cease and determine. To extend it beyond that period by parol testimony, is contrary to received principles, and utterly inadmissible."

In Woodfall's Landlord & Tenant (13th ed.), p. 752, it is said: "At common law a tenant who knows when his tenancy will end (whether he be a tenant for years, or a tenant from year to year, having received due notice to quit), has no rights on or out of the land at the end of his tenancy. But this rule (which may, of course, be modified by agreement) the common law allows to be modified by custom by what is called, in relation to agricultural holdings, the 'custom of the country.' The customs of the country vary in respect of place, and change in respect of time in a very remarkable degree. Nor are they always for the benefit of agriculture. In forward districts, they will be found to move with the times, or to be superseded by special agreements, but in backward districts this is often not the case. However this may be, the object of all customs of the country applicable to the end of the tenancy is to extend the doctrine of emblements, and to allow him who sows to reap. With this object, the outgoing tenant is allowed to occupy his farm for periods and under limitations infinitely varying in extent, after the expiration of his tenancy; to re-

4. Cases Between Vendor and Purchaser's Agent.—In the relation of vendor and purchaser's agent the illustrations of the principle are, perhaps, still more pointed. In some trades there is a usage that if a broker purchasing goods does not give the name of his principal in the contract of purchase, the broker is to be held personally liable for the purchase-money, although he contracted merely as a broker for a principal. By the terms of the contract, the broker is liable as an agent; by the usage, another liability is imposed upon him. The contract is thus changed by the addition of a distinct term to the written agreement of the parties.¹

enter and carry away crops; and to receive compensation for unexhausted improvements. Every custom of the country must be proved as a fact by the party setting it up. It need not have existed from time immemorial; a common usage of the neighborhood is sufficient. The landlord and tenant are presumed to have contracted with reference to the custom, and the custom is incorporated into the contract, whether oral, in writing, or by deed, unless the custom and the terms of the contract are expressly or impliedly inconsistent with it."

In Senior v. Armitage, Holt's N. P. 197, which was an action by a tenant against his landlord for a compensation for seed and labor, under the denomination of tenant-right, Bayley, J., on its appearing that there was a written agreement between the parties, nonsuited the plaintiff. The court afterward set aside that nonsuit, and held that though there was a written contract between landlord and tenant, the custom of the country would still be binding, if not inconsistent with the terms of such written contract; and that, not only all common obligations, but those imposed by custom, were in full force where the contract did not vary them. Mr. Holt appears to have stated the case too strongly when he said that the court held the custom to be operative, "unless the agreement in express terms excluded it." It would appear that the court held that the custom operated, unless it could be collected from the instrument, either expressly or impliedly, that the parties did not mean to be governed by it. On the second trial, the Lord Chief Baron Thompson held that the custom prevailed; although the written instrument contained an express stipulation that all manure made on the farm should be spent on it, or left at the end of the tenancy, without any compensation being paid. Such a stipulation certainly does not exclude by implication the tenant's right to receive compensation for seed and labor.

1. In the leading English case of Humfrey v. Dale, 7 El. & Bl. 266; 9 E. C. L. 265, it appeared that the defendants, brokers, employed by S. to purchase oil, signed a memorandum as follows: "Sold for Messrs. T. (the plaintiff's brokers) to our principals, ten tons of linseed oil," and delivered the memorandum to Messrs. T., without disclosing the name of their principals, who afterward became insolvent, and did not accept the oil. The plaintiffs then sued the defendants, alleging a custom in the trade that when a broker purchased without naming his principal, the broker was held liable as a purchaser. In reference to this custom, the court of queen's bench said: "The plaintiff does not seek by the evidence of usage to contradict what the tenor of the note primarily imports, namely: that this was a contract which the defendants made as brokers. The evidence, indeed, is based on this; the usage can have no operation except on the assumption of their having so acted, and of there having been a contract made with their principal. But the plaintiff, by the evidence, seeks to show that, according to the usage of the trade, and as those concerned in the trade understand the words used, they imported something more, namely: that if the buying broker did not disclose the name of his principal, it might become a contract with him, if the seller pleased. Supposing this incident had been expressed on the face of the note, there would have been no objection to it as affecting the validity of the contract, for the effect of it would only have been that the sale might be treated by the vendor as a sale to the broker, unless he disclosed the name of his principal; if he did that, it remained a sale to the principal. Whether this evidence be treated as explaining the language used, or adding a tacitly implied incident to the contract beyond those which are expressed, is not material. In either point of view it will be admissible, unless it labors under the objection of introducing something repugnant to or inconsistent with the tenor of the written instrument. And upon consideration of the sense in which that objection must be understood with reference to this question, we think it does not. If all that the plaintiff contends for had been expressed, the defendants would have contracted thus: 'We buy for our principal; but if we do not disclose his name within a reasonable time, we agree that you may treat us as the purchasers.' And it cannot be said that the latter branch is inconsistent with the former." This judgment was affirmed on appeal to the exchequer chamber. El. Bl. & El. 1004; 96 E. C. L. 1004.

In Fleet v. Murton, L. R., 7 Q. B. 126, the same question arose. It was a custom of the London fruit market that if brokers did not give the names of their principals in the contract, the brokers were held personally liable, although they contracted as brokers for a principal. Cockburn, C. J., said: "Although where a party contracts as agent there would not, independently of some further bargain, be any liability on him as principal, yet if a man, though professing on the face of the contract to contract as agent for another, and to bind his principal only, and not himself, chooses to qualify that contract by saying that he will make himself liable, though he is contracting for another, and giving to another rights under the contract, he himself will incur the same liability as his principal. Now, although where a party professes to contract as broker, it might prima facie be taken that he contracts without the intention of incurring liability on his own part, yet, if by the custom of that particular trade there is that qualification of the contract (which, if written into the contract in extenso, would undoubtedly bind him), that qualification may, I think, be imported into the contract by evidence of the custom. The defendants here undoubtedly call themselves 'brokers,' acting for their principal.

But if the custom attaches, the non-liability which would, under ordinary circumstances prima facie exist in a contract made by a person purporting to contract as broker, ceases, and the contract assumes a different form and character, and carries with it different legal consequences, by reason of the custom of the trade, evidence of which, according to all principles, is admissible to qualify the terms of a contract where not inconsistent with it."

In Hutchinson v. Tatham, L. R., 8 C. P. 482, the defendants chartered a ship, signing themselves "agents to merchants." Evidence of usage was admitted in an action by the ship-owners against the defendants upon the charter-party establishing a personal liability upon the defendants, the name of the principal not being disclosed.

In Pike v. Ongley, 18 Q. B. Div. 708, the court said: "In this case the defendants are clearly not liable upon the contract itself; they were selling as agents for an owner, and, in the absence of trade usage, no liability would attach to them. The evidence came to this, that if the name of the owner was not given in, or at the time of the making of the contract, the buyer had the right to treat the broker as principal; and on such a custom I should say that even if the owner's name were disclosed after the making of the contract, the buyer might sue either the principal or the broker. The meaning of this custom is that where the principal's name is not disclosed in or at the time the contract is made, the buyers reserve to themselves the right of suing the broker or factor. By the terms of the document itself the owner is liable; the custom says the broker shall be liable also; there is nothing in that which is inconsistent with the contract, though it would be inconsistent if the custom were to exclude the liability of the owner."

In Imperial Bank v. London, etc., Docks Co., 5 Ch. Div. 195, a usage of the London dry-goods market was recognized, by which a broker who buys for an undisclosed principal is personally liable to the seller for the price of the goods.

In Barrow v. Dyster, 13 Q. B. Div. 635, a written contract made by brokers on behalf of undisclosed principals for the sale of hides, provided that, "If any difference or dispute shall arise under this contract it is hereby mutually

XI. USAGE NOT ADMISSIBLE TO VARY CONTRACTS—1. The Rule Stated.—Usage is not admissible in evidence to vary the express terms of a verbal or written contract.¹ This rule, as also the rule admitting proof of usage to explain the terms of a contract, is merely an application of the general principle of the law of evidence, that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract.

Parties by their contracts may disregard any usage or custom ordinarily prevailing in their transactions, and if they make the terms of their contracts contrary to the usage, they must have intended their contract to exclude the usage; in such a case, therefore, evidence of usage would give the contract a meaning different from the clear purport of its terms, and the intention of the parties.²

2. Difficulty of the Subject.—The difficulty in considering the subject is not with the general principle as above stated, but with the application of the principle to the facts of particular cases. In considering whether in a given case evidence of a usage would, or would not, vary the terms of a contract, a court may be influenced to some extent by its views as to what the policy of the law should be in regard to the admissibility of usages in general. If the court thinks that the admission of usages should be encouraged, it will be more likely to admit a usage to influence a contract in a doubtful case than if it were not favorable to the admission of usages as a variety of evidence. The views of different courts vary in respect to such matters, and the views of the same court often undergo a change. In admitting usages, the earlier authorities in England and America were more liberal than the later ones have been. The extracts in the notes contain the substance of useful cases in this connection.³

agreed between the sellers and buyers that the same shall be settled by the selling brokers, whose decision in writing shall be final and binding on both sellers and buyers." Under this contract the court held that evidence of a custom of the trade that a broker who does not disclose his principal is personally responsible for the performance of the contract and liable for the breach, was rightly rejected, as such custom was inconsistent with the arbitration clause, which would, if the custom were incorporated, make the brokers judges in their own cause.

In Boorman v. Jenkins, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 566; 27 Am. Dec. 158, it was held that evidence of usage in a particular trade is admissible for the purpose of annexing incidents to a written instrument, concerning which the instrument is silent; thus, evidence may be given to show that, according to the known usage of the trade, cotton is sold by sample; and then it may be shown by parol that a particular sale of cotton was a sale by sample, although the entry in the broker's book, the bought-and-sold note, and the bill of parcels are silent in that respect.

1. Pickering v. Weld, 159 Mass 522.

2. 1 Greenl. Ev. (14th ed.), § 292.

3. In Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 383, the court said: "It is to be regretted that the decisions of the courts defining what local usage may or may not do have not been uniform. In some judicial tribunals there has been a disposition to narrow the limits of this species of evidence, in others to extend them; and on this account, mainly, the conflict in decision arises. But if it is hard to reconcile all the cases, it may be safely said they do not differ so much in principle as in the application of the rules of law. The proper office of a custom or usage in trade is to ascertain and explain the meaning and intention of the parties to a contract, whether written or in parol, which could not be done without the aid of this intrinsic evidence. It does not go beyond this; and is used as a mode of interpretation, on the theory that the parties knew of its existence and contracted with reference to it. It is often employed to explain words or phrases in a contract of doubtful signification, or which may be understood in different senses, according to the subject-matter to which they are applied. But if it be inconsistent with the contract, or expressly or by necessary implication contradicts it, it cannot be received in evidence to affect it. 'Usage,' says Lord Lyndhurst, 'may be admissible to explain what is doubtful; it is never admissible to contradict what is plain.' 'If any of the cases are in apparent conflict, it is not on account of any difference in opinion as to the rules of law which are applicable. These rules,' says Chief Justice Wilde in Spartali v. Benecke, 10 C. B. 222; 70 E. C. L. 221, 'are well settled, and the difficulty that has arisen respecting them has been in their application to the varied circumstances of the numerous cases in which the discussion of them has been involved.'

In Kirkland v. Nisbet, Scotch App. Rep. 876, the controversy was in regard to the construction of certain correspondence between the parties. A witness was asked what an employer "would be entitled to expect" from a certain letter in the correspondence. The court refused to allow the question. On appeal to the House of Lords, the following discussion occurred. The counsel of the appellants argued that the question was competent. "We wanted to prove that six hundred tons of the sugar had been actually sold to us by the respondents, and that this was the meaning of the word 'contracted,' in the letter of the 11th of December, 1850. We produced a witness to prove the mercantile usage, and asked him that question." Lord Chancellor Campbell: "If you had asked the witness about the mercantile usage, that might have been well; but how could you ask him such a question as this: 'What would the employer be entitled to expect from that letter?' That was asking the witness to explain or construe a written document." Counsel: "What we wanted was merely to explain the technical meaning of the word 'contracted.'" Lord Chancellor Campbell: "But you must defend the question as put. The question was, in substance, 'What is the meaning or just construction of the whole letter?'" Lord Chelmsford: "What a witness in such cases is called on to do, is merely to explain some technical terms to assist the court, and the court then construes the document. You might have asked the witness what was the technical meaning of the word 'contracted,' if it had any peculiar meaning. But you ask him the meaning of the whole written contract. You are not to use the witness as an interpreter, but only as a guide." Lord Chancellor Campbell: "You are not to substitute the witness for the judge." Counsel: "We can carry the argument no further." Lord Chancellor Campbell: "My lords, I think that this question was very properly overruled by the learned judge, because, in effect, it sought to obtain the opinion of the witness on the construction of a written document. There is no doubt that evidence may be competently given of mercantile usage to explain the meaning of peculiar terms used in trade. But what is the meaning of a written document is not a question proper to put to a witness. The question here put was substantially this: What was the contract—what is the construction of the document? That was an improper question, and I have no difficulty in recommending your lordships to affirm the unanimous judgment of the learned judges in Scotland, which overruled it."

In Lamb v. Henderson, 63 Mich. 302, the court said: "The decisions in this state are uniform that custom cannot change a definite contract, and that no custom is binding which is not certain, definite, uniform, and notorious. Harvey v. Cady, 3 Mich. 431; Erwin v. Clark, 13 Mich. 10; Hutchings v. Ladd, 16 Mich. 493; Advertiser, etc., Co. v. Detroit, 43 Mich. 116; Ledyard v. Hibbard, 48 Mich. 421; 42 Am. Rep. 474; Greenstine v. Borchard, 50 Mich. 434; 45 Am. Rep. 51."

In Lamb v. Klaus, 30 Wis. 94, it was said that it is not in cases alone where the incidents to be annexed to the contract by usage are in conflict with the express language of the instrument, that the usage is excluded, but that it is also excluded where the provisions of the contract are such as reasonably Bearing in mind the cardinal principles that the proper office of a usage is to ascertain the meaning and intention of the parties to a contract, and that usage may be admissible to explain what is doubtful, but never to contradict what is plain, we proceed to consider the cases decided in different contractual relations.

and fairly to imply some different agreement or intention as between the contracting parties.

In Dixon v. Dunham, 14 Ill. 324, the court said: "No usage or custom can be admitted to vary or control the express terms of a contract, but they may be admitted to determine that which by the contract is left undetermined. The parties by the contract may abrogate any custom, no matter how ancient or uniform, but such custom cannot abrogate the terms of a contract. Whenever there is a conflict, the contract must control. The reason why a custom is allowed to be proved for the purpose in interpreting a contract, is because both parties are supposed to have been acquainted with it, and to have contracted in reference to it. The custom does not become a part of the law of the place, but rather a part of the contracts which are to be performed at the place; and hence, if the usage is excluded by the contract, it cannot constitute a part of it."

In Foye v. Leighton, 22 N. H. 71; 53 Am. Dec. 231, it was said that a usage explains and ascertains the intent of the parties. "It cannot be in opposition to any principle of general policy, nor inconsistent with the terms of the agreement between the parties; for it incorporates itself into the terms of the agreement, and becomes a part of it."

In Bigelow v. Legg, 102 N. Y. 653, it was said that, "Custom or usage cannot control the legal rules applicable to the construction of a contract, and evidence that by a custom a contract means something different from what its terms clearly import, is inadmissible."

In Willmering v. McGaughey, 30 Iowa 205, it was said that while extrinsic testimony may be received to aid the court in construing a contract where it refers to principles of science or arts, or where it uses the technical phraseology of some profession or occupation, or common words used in a technical sense, or uses new and unusual words, such testimony is not admissible where it is not apparent that the language is used in any such new, peculiar, or technical sense; and the contract will be construed according to the established usage of language as applied to the subject-matter.

In Snelling v. Hall, 107 Mass. 134, it was held that the evidence offered by the defendants as to the local usage of the coal trade was properly rejected. "It was an attempt, not to show a peculiar mode of doing business, but a local rule of law in the interpretation of written contracts, giving to them a meaning different from the obvious purport of the terms in which they are expressed. This, the law does not allow."

In Partridge v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 15 Wall. (U. S.) 573, the court said: "When usage is confined to establishing an implied contract, and the knowledge of the usage is brought home to the other party, the evil is not so great. But when it is sought to extend the doctrine beyond this, and incorporate the custom into an express contract whose terms are reduced to writing, and are expressed in language neither technical nor ambiguous, and, therefore, needing no such aid in its construction, it amounts to establishing the principle that a custom may add to, or vary, or contradict the well-expressed intention of the parties made in writing. No such extension of the doctrine is consistent either with authority or with the principles which govern the law of contracts."

In Randolph v. Halden, 44 Iowa 327, it was held that a contract cannot be controlled by a custom which the parties have expressly excluded, or which they have excluded by necessary implication, as by providing that a thing which custom effects shall be done in a different way. Where the terms of a contract are plain, custom, even under that very contract, cannot be permitted to affect materially the construction to be placed upon it. The custom of miners to remove the pillars and supports in a mine cannot be permitted to control a contract, when the effect of allowing a custom to leave the mine in good working order, would be

3. Usages of Banks and Regarding Commercial Paper, etc.—The various usages of banking institutions have, in almost all cases, been sustained by the courts, as entering into the contracts of parties doing business with them. But banks are equally subject to the law with others, and their usages can have no legal validity when in contradiction to the terms of a contract. Usages have been rejected as open to this objection, allowing the bank to disregard the express terms of powers of attorney, or the forms of indorsement, or to extend or limit the scope of words whose meaning is settled by legal decisions.¹

4. Usages of Carriers.—In contracts between carriers and their customers usages have frequently been set up to modify or limit the terms of the agreements; but have almost uniformly been rejected. And whether the contract may have been an express one and evidenced by a bill of lading, or one implied from the mere receipt of goods for transportation without an express contract, the result is the same. Whenever the effect of the usage is to vary or contradict the terms of the express or implied contract of

to render nugatory express stipulations of the contract.

In Smyth v. Ward, 46 Iowa 339, it was said that customs are subordinate to contracts, and will not control or affect the rights of parties whose contracts contain conditions not in harmony therewith. In Duncan v. Green, 43 Iowa 679, it was held that a contract will not be set aside upon proof of a custom in conflict with its provisions. In Phillips v. Starr, 26 Iowa 349, it was said that a custom cannot control the express stipulations of the parties.

1. English Bank v. Barr, 31 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 7. In First Nat. Bank v. Taliaferro, 72 Md. 164, certain blank powers of attorney executed by T and by her delivered to V, merely authorized V to sell certain registered Virginia consols belonging to T, and by her intrusted to V for sale. In an action by T against a bank in Baltimore, to which V had hypothecated the said consols as security for his own debt thereto, it was held that evidence was inadmissible to prove that, according to a custom or usage among banks, bankers and brokers in Baltimore, registered Virginia consols were treated as negotiable, when accompanied by powers of attorney like those executed by T. "No custom or usage prevailing amongst banks, bankers and brokers could possibly change the legal character of the powers of attorney, and convert them into totally different instruments, capable of effecting results never contemplated by the person who executed them."

In Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 393; 1 Am. Rep. 115; 97 Am. Dec. 107, it was held that the insertion of the word "trustee," after the name of a stockholder, indicates and gives notice of a trust. No one is at liberty to disregard such notice and to abstain from inquiry, for the reason that a trust is frequently simulated or pretended when it really does not exist. The circumstance that stock certificates issued in the name of one as trustee, and by him transferred in blank, are constantly bought and sold in the market without inquiry, is likewise unavailing. "A usage to disregard one's legal duty, to be ignorant of a rule of law, and to act as if it did not exist, can have no standing in the courts."

In Security Bank v. National Bank, 67 N. Y. 458; 23 Am. Rep. 129, which was an action by a bank to recover the amount paid upon a raised check which had been certified by it, the court rejected evidence that, by the custom and common understanding of banks and merchants, the word "certified," at the time of the certification, when used in the certification of checks, is construed to import an obligation on the part of the certifying bank to pay the amount stated in the check, notwithstanding the body of it was forged. "The nature and meaning of the contract, evidenced by the certification of a check, was clearly defined by law, when the plain-carriage, it cannot be received. The cases embrace usages to exempt the carrier from liability for injury to goods in its charge, or for goods lost, or for misdelivery or non-delivery, and other instances.¹

tiff certified the check in question. The offer to prove that the contract of certification, by the understanding of the bankers and merchants, had a larger scope and meaning than it had by settled legal construction, was inadmissible."

In People's Bank v. Bogart, 16 Hun (N. Y.) 270, it was held that the acceptances in the case, being valid obligations, and no express warranty having been made in regard to them, no implied warranty could be established by proof of any local usage or custom, as to what acceptances were understood to be, in the commercial community of New York. See also Allen v. State Bank, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. (S. Car.) 3.

1. Usages of Carriers—In Coxe v. Heisley, 19 Pa. St. 243, it was held that a common carrier, who received into his canal-boat certain furniture to be carried from Lycoming county to Philadelphia, a portion of which became wet whilst in his charge, no express contract existing limiting his responsibility, cannot show that a usage exists, in relation to carriers on the Pennsylvania canal, that the dangers of navigation, fire, and unavoidable accidents, are excepted from the risks of common carriers. "The contract between the parties, if construed by the common law of the land, bound the defendant to deliver the goods in Philadelphia in as good order as he received them, unless he was prevented from doing so by the act of God, or by a public enemy. He undertook to show that this contract was not to be performed according to its legal import, but according to a custom which prevailed among that class of carriers who are engaged in business on the Pennsylvania canal. The custom, in this case, is set up to defeat the contract. The receipt of the goods implied a promise to deliver them safely in Philadelphia; implied it as clearly as such a promise could be expressed in words or writing. Now, a custom cannot be received to defeat the essential terms of a contract; 3 Kent. Com. 360. The cases which rule this principle are mostly upon express contract; but it cannot be doubted that where a well-understood and clearly-defined rule of law implies a contract from the act of the party, from the consideration paid to him, and from the known duties of his calling, such a contract is, and ought to be, no less secure against a local usage inconsistent with it, than the same contract would be if made in express words. Our own decisions on this subject have not been very consistent. This court, in the early cases, stood over the law and guarded it against invasion faithfully enough. A rule among merchants to charge interest for goods sold after six months; Henry v. Risk, 1 Dall. (U. S.) 265; a usage of plasterers to charge for their work at a certain rate; Jordan v. Meredith, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 318; a custom to re-enter for a forfeiture, incurred by non-payment of rent; Stoever v. Whitman, 6 Binn. (Pa.) 417. All these were held to be inadmissible. But in 1822 a custom on the Ohio river was permitted to vary the responsibility of a carrier there, Gordon v. Little, 8 S. & R. (Pa.) 533; and nine years later a usage in Philadelphia was allowed to add a warranty to a contract of sale, which in fact and in law did not embrace one. Snowden v. Warder, 3 Rawle (Pa.) 101. In both these cases Chief Justice Gibson dissented from a bare majority, and his warning, though unheeded at the time, was remembered when the question came up again. Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts (Pa.) 179. Our latest decisions are consistent with the oldest. The law of Pennsylvania may therefore be considered as settled in accordance with reason, and with the judicial authorities of other commercial states. A local usage, if it be ancient, uniform, notorious and not unreasonable, may enter into and become part of a contract which is to be executed at the place where the usage prevails; but here, as elsewhere, it is checked by this wholesome limitation, that it must not conflict with the settled rules of law, nor go to defeat the essential terms of the contract."

In Randall v. Smith, 63 Me. 105; 18 Am. Rep. 200, it was held that where a shipper and a carrier of goods have entered into a valid contract, the one to load the other's vessel with a cargo of coal, at a specified port, and to pay freight at a certain rate per ton, and the other to carry such cargo to the place of contract for that price, a practice among persons engaged in that kind of business at such place of contract, to treat such contract as binding upon the parties only as might suit the convenience of either of them, cannot be upheld as a commercial usage to affect such written contract, because of its repugnancy thereto, and to the principles of law. "It nullifies the contract and subverts the very objects for which it was entered into. A contract which is absolute in terms, it makes conditional; an obligation expressly enjoined upon both parties, it makes optional with either. . . . Instead of subserving the purposes of the parties, as disclosed in their contract, it dominates over and controls them. . . . It is difficult to understand how such a practice could ever have assumed the proportions necessary to give it the cognomen of a commercial usage in a commercial community; it is less difficult, however, to understand that it could never have the sanction of law." In The Reeside, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 567, Judge Story held that evidence was not admissible to vary the common bill of lading, by which the goods were to be delivered in good order and condition, the danger of the seas only excepted, by establishing a custom, that the owners of packet vessels between New York and Boston, should be liable only for damage to goods occasioned by their own neglect.

In Cox v. Peterson, 30 Ala. 608; 58 Am. Dec. 145, which was an action against the owners of a steamboat, as common carriers, for failing to deliver goods at the place specified in their bill of lading, it was held that evidence of a custom among the steamboat men to ascend the river as high as the stage of water in it permitted, and then to land their cargo and deposit the goods in warehouses, is not admissible for the defendants. Its plain effect would have been to vary or contradict the written contract.

In Boon v. Steamboat Belfast, 40 Ala. 184; 88 Am. Dec. 761, it was held that the owners of a steamboat were liable, as common carriers, for a loss by robbery; and where the only exception specified in the bill of lading was "dangers of the river," parol evidence could not be received to show a custom among the persons who were engaged in navigating the river, which exempted the owners of the boat from liability for a loss caused by the forcible and illegal seizure of the boat by a body of armed men, without fault or neglect on the part of the officers or crew. "The decision in Steele v. McTyer, 31 Ala. 677; 70 Am. Dec. 516, lays down a contrary principle; and so much of that decision as holds that parol evidence is admissible, to show that by a custom existing on a particular river, flatboatmen were not responsible for a loss caused by dangers of the river, although the bill of lading contained no such exception, being in opposition to the principle announced in this opinion on that question, is overruled. Sampson v. Gazzam, 6 Port. (Ala.) 123; 30 Am. Dec. 578, has been so often recognized and followed by this court, in cases involving the identical question, that the principle established by it must now be regarded as the settled law of the state, in its application only to cases of the particular class to which it specially relates; we are unwilling to extend its application beyond this limit." Other Alabama cases upon this point are Hibler v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501; Ezell v. Miller, 6 Port. (Ala.) 311; Ezell v. English, 6 Port. (Ala.) 307; McClure v. Cox, 32 Ala. 617; Jones v. Pitcher, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 135; 24 Am. Dec. 716; Cox v. Peterson, 30 Ala. 608; 68 Am. Dec. 145.

In Stinson v. Jackson, 58 N. H. 138, the defendants offered to prove an established custom of express carriers to deliver packages to the proprietor of the store, or shop, etc., named in the direction, whenever the person to whom the package is addressed is not there found, and that such delivery satisfies the terms of their undertaking. The court said that the liability of common carriers continues until delivery of the goods at their destination. "The agreement in this case was expressed and in writing, and evidence of usage would not be competent to vary its terms; but if such usage was known to the plaintiff, or was so established and notorious as to be presumed to be known to him, and that he contracted in reference to it, evidence of it, and that the defendants delivered the package according to such usage, might be introduced to show his understanding of the mode of delivery by the defendants, and that they had performed the contract according to its terms."

In Collender v. Dinsmore, 55 N. Y.

5. Usages Between Employer and Employee—a. IN CONTRACTS FOR WORK AND LABOR.—The cases involving usages to vary contracts for work and labor chiefly embrace questions growing out of agreements made between builders and their customers. Workmen in particular crafts are apt to use words and expressions relating to their craft in a different sense from that which they would usually bear. But agreements upon matters of workmanship, measurement, number, quality, etc., when expressed in clear terms, cannot be varied by proof of a usage inconsistent with the terms used.¹

b*. IN CONTRACTS OF HIRING.—Local usages in reference to contracts of hiring have been passed upon by the courts, and uniformly rejected when in conflict with the terms of the agreements 200; 14 Am. Rep. 224, the court held that the meaning of the letters "C. O. D.," as used in an express receipt, was so well known and established that usage could not be introduced to give them a different meaning.

In Simmons v. Law, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 219, which was an action to recover the value of a quantity of gold-dust shipped by Simmons from San Francisco to New York on Law's line of steamers, which was not delivered, an attempt was made to limit the liability of the common carrier beyond the terms of the contract in the bill of lading, by proof of the usage of the trade, which was well known to the shipper, but the evidence was rejected. The court, in commenting on the question, said: "A clear, certain, and distinct contract is not subject to modification by proof of usage. Such a contract disposes of all customs by its own terms, and by its terms alone is the conduct of the parties to be regulated and their liability to be determined." See also Aymar v. Astor, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 266; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Erie R. Co., 72 N. Y. 188; Bank of Commerce v. Bissell, 72 N. Y. 615; Garrison v. Memphis Ins. Co., 19 How. (U. S.) 312; Bazin v. Steamship Co., 3 Wall Jr. (C. C.) 229; McGovern v. Helsenbuttel, 8 Ben. (U. S.) 46; Sager v. Portsmouth R. Co., 31 Me. 228; 1 Am. Rep. 659; Martin v. Union Pac. R. Co., 1 Wyoming 143; Phillips v. Briard, 1 H. & N. 21; Wardell v. Mourillyan, 1 Esp. 693; Hayton v. Irwin, 28 W. R. 138.

1. In Corcoran v. Chess, 131 Pa. St. 356, it was held that where a mason contracts in writing to do work at a certain price per cubic yard, the contract is not to be affected by evidence of a usage for "masons' measurement," a mere usage of trade, recent in its date, and not general in its application. "A cubic yard means twenty-seven cubic feet; and when the parties have used this term in their contract, it must be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that they understood it in its ordinary and popular meaning."

In Sweeney v. Thomason, 9 Lea (Tenn.) 359; 42 Am. Rep. 676, it was held that in suit upon a contract to pay "eight dollars per thousand for brick in the wall," proof of the usage or custom that the number of brick in the wall was to be ascertained by measurement, and not by actual count, is incompetent. "The terms of the contract are not ambiguous. The words and terms of the contract are not terms of art having any special signification or meaning different from their ordinary or popular meaning. The number of brick should be counted, but if not practical to ascertain the number by actual count, there can be no objection to adopting estimates based upon measurement, as the best means of approximating the number."

In Cook v. Hawkins, 54 Ark. 423, it was said that the fact that plasterers were in the habit of slighting their work, and violating their contracts, by doing "drawn work" when three-coat work was contracted for, could not excuse the violation of such a contract.

In Chambers v. U. S., 24 Ct. of Cl. 387, it was held that where a contract provides that the price named per square yard of plastering work "will include all surfaces, whether curved or flat, all edges, angles, and corners, whether salient or reentrant," the language is too plain to admit of a custom being implied, whereby a curved surface is computed as being equal to double the plane surface of the area. See also Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464; 10 Am. Rep. 407.

In Pavey v. Burch, 3 Mo. 314; 26 Am. Dec. 682, P. agreed to pay B. "seven dollars per thousand for making and laying brick, counting the neat brick in the building." B. introduced witnesses who testified that, "The rule known and established among masons for measuring their work and ascertaining the number of neat brick in a building, was to ascertain the number of cubic feet, by multiplying the aggregate length of the walls from out to out, by the height of the story, and that product by the thickness of the wall (which would give the cubic feet in the wall), counting the corners twice, and then, by multiplying the number of cubic feet thus ascertained, by twenty-two and a half, the product would be the number of neat brick." The case was reversed. "The covenant is to be constructed according to the plain and obvious meaning of the terms used by the community at large, and not according to their meaning as used among brick-masons."

In Holmes v. Stummel, 15 Ill. 412, a contract required a person to clear, grub, and pile the brush on all of a certain piece of land; evidence that it was not usual in the neighborhood to "grub" such lands, or that a farm would be better without having them grubbed, was held inadmissible. "The court below erred in admitting evidence showing that it was not usual to grub ravines such as this, and that it was thought to be better for the farm not to have them grubbed. H. had a right to contract to have the whole land grubbed as he did. Whether it was a matter of utility in his judgment or of mere taste, it was his privilege to differ with others on that subject. . . . The fact that he had made a contract to have that portion of his land grubbed, showed that he chose to differ with those who thought it better not to have it done."

In Harper v. Pound, 10 Ind. 32, the contract was to clear land.

In Harvey v. Cady, 3 Mich. 431, the agreement was to dig a ditch.

In Charlton v. Gibson, 1 C. & K.

541; 47 E. C. L. 540, the controversy was as to unmining stones.

In Detroit Advertiser, etc., Co. v. Detroit, 43 Mich. 116, the contract was held to exclude certain "figure work" used by printers and in newspaper work.

Other similar cases are Fellows v. New York, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 249; Wheeler v. Nurse, 20 N. H. 220; George v. Bartlett, 22 N. H. 496.

1. Contracts of Hiring.—In Sweet v. Jenkins, 1 R. I. 147; 36 Am. Dec. 242, which was an action upon a contract under which a person agreed to work for another for a certain specified time, evidence of a local custom that either party may terminate such a contract at will, without giving a reason for so doing, was rejected. "This court has permitted evidence of a usage to discharge, on giving a fortnight's notice, to be proved in the trial of an action for the breach of a contract similar to that described in the declaration; for in such a case a contract, absolute on the face of it, is complete at its inception, and may well stand consistently with the usage, just as a deed, absolute on the face of it, may stand with a condition existing in parol, which makes it a mortgage. But in the case at bar, the contract and the usage cannot stand together. Either the contract must prevail and make void the usage, or the usage must prevail and make void the contract. And can there be a doubt which of these alternatives should be sustained at law? At law, the contract is valid—is a legally binding contract from its inception, and shall that law permit a usage to be proved, which makes it void at and from its inception? The contract described in the declaration, is not a contract made with reference to the usage, but against it. The contract described, is to labor for a year, but the usage terminates it at will."

In Barlow v. Lambert, 28 Ala. 704; 65 Am. Dec. 374, the court rejected evidence of a usage to construe a provision in a contract of hiring, that the hirer should "lose the negro's lost time," as meaning that the hirer should lose the time under certain contingencies, not under others.

In Cooper v. Purvis, 1 Jones (N. Car.) 141, which was an action upon a contract of hiring, there was proof of a long and well-established custom in the county, embracing the place of the transaction, and the residences of the parties, to allow a certain sum to the hirer of a woman who was not able to work for the full period of her hiring. "The decisive objection to the allowance of such neighborhood customs is the uncertainty in relation to the proof of them, and the great inconvenience of having local laws, in any part of the state, to regulate matters which ought to be the subjects of express contracts. The parties here entered into an express and specific contract, which was neither general nor doubtful, and therefore left nothing to be presumed or inferred."

In Bedford v. Flowers, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 242, a slave was hired to be employed in cutting cordwood and for no other purpose. The hirer put him to assist in the removal of cordwood in a boat and on rafts, whereby he was drowned. Evidence that it was the custom, and considered part of the business of hands employed in cutting cordwood, to take it to the highlands when necessary, was rejected as varying the contract. The express stipulation in the contract, restricting the service of the slave to cutting cordwood alone, and excluding all other kinds of service, manifested the intention of the parties to exclude the operation of usage, and such evidence would be repugnant to and inconsistent with the written contract.

In Petty v. Gayle, 25 Ala. 472, it was held that when a slave, who is hired for one month, does not work the full term agreed upon, no recovery can be had upon the contract, as it is entire; and evidence of a particular usage to pay pro rata on such a contract cannot be received, since the usage, if proved, would vary the terms of the contract. "We have said nothing as to the evidence of a usage in Mobile to pay pro rata in contracts of hire, where the slave fails to work the full time agreed on, for the reason that, if proved, it could not be recognized. A particular usage may be given in evidence to influence the construction of a contract, or to explain the sense in which words or terms are used; but when the contract is established, and is not governed by the commercial law, it is not allowable to change its character, and attach to it conditions in opposition to the established rules of law. West v. Ball, 12 Ala. 340."

In Metcalf v. Weld, 14 Gray (Mass.) 210, the plaintiffs, seamen, entered into shipping articles with the defendants, owners of a vessel, by which they were entitled to receive a stipulated sum as advance wages. The custom relied upon in the defense was a custom for the owners to pay this advance to their shipping agent, who was employed by them to procure a crew, and for him in his turn to pay it to the boarding-house keeper who brings the seamen to him. "It is not a question of the meaning of terms in a contract which have a meaning peculiar to the port of Boston, and known to the contracting parties. The contract is intelligible and complete in itself. It obliges the defendants to pay, and entitles the plaintiff to receive, a certain sum of money at a certain time. Under such a contract, we do not think the mode of payment is the proper subject of a custom, and no authority has been cited in support of such a proposition. It would amount to a custom of seamen to employ a certain class of agents—a custom for the owners to transfer the direct personal responsibility resting upon them to another, and perhaps an irresponsible party. There are many usages of trade which have nothing to do with the contracts of parties, and which cannot be set up to modify or control them. It is very customary for merchants to pay their debts by checks upon a bank; and this may be very well known to persons who deal with them, and yet no one is bound to receive a check in discharge of a promise to pay money. It may be a custom in some kinds of business to pay workmen in orders for goods, or in goods kept for sale by their employer, or not to pay wages punctually at the time they are due, and the fears or necessities of the laborer may induce him to yield to the custom and accept payment in a manner or at a time convenient to the employer; but it would hardly be contended that such a custom could be regarded in determining the legal effect of a written agreement. We fear it would not be difficult to prove a custom in many ports to defraud and impose upon seamen in various ways—a custom to subject their persons and property to a kind and degree of control which has its origin only in their ignorance and vices—but these are not the customs

6. Usages in Contracts of Insurance—a. USAGES ASSERTED BY THE INSURER.—In the first class, the usages rejected as varying the terms of the policy, include various usages attempted to be set up by insurance companies for the purpose of limiting their liability as determined by the policies of insurance; usages to pay less than the amount due in certain cases, and to add conditions not expressed in the policy.¹

b. USAGES ASSERTED BY THE INSURED.—So, also, usages have been offered by the insured to relieve themselves from the consequences of the non-performance of some act required of them by which give an interpretation to their contracts.”

1. Usages Asserted by the Insurer.—In Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co., 2 C. & J. 244, it was held, in an action on a policy of insurance on a ship, her tackle, apparel, boat, and other furniture, that evidence of a usage that boats slung on the outside of the ship, on the quarter, are not protected, is inadmissible, as contradicting the express terms of the contract. The objection to the parol evidence is, that it was not to explain any ambiguous words in the policy—any words which might admit of doubt—not to introduce matter upon which the policy was silent, but was at direct variance with the words of the policy, and in plain opposition to the language it used. Usage may be admissible to explain what is doubtful; it is never admissible to contradict what is plain.

In Insurance Co. v. Wright, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 456, it was held that where a written contract is susceptible on its face of a reasonable construction, resort cannot be had to evidence of custom or usage to explain its language. And this general rule of evidence applies to an instrument so loose as an open or running policy of assurance, and even to one on which the phrases relating to the matter in contest are scattered about the document in a very disorderly way. Rating of vessels in insurance policies means the determination of their relative state or condition in regard to their insurable qualities. The usage that the rating referred to in the policy was that on the register of the company, if it is admissible at all, can only apply to the case of a vessel which has an actual rating on the books of the company so recent as to be recognized as a valid rating.

In Lewis v. Thatcher, 15 Mass. 431, which was an action upon a policy on property on board “the Swedish brig Sophia,” it was held that these words amounted to an absolute warranty that the vessel was Swedish; and that no parol evidence was admissible, to show that anything different was thereby intended by the parties to the insurance. “The cases mentioned, in which the usage of trade has been held to control the description of a voyage in the policy, are by no means analogous. The underwriter and the assured are both presumed, by the law, to make their contracts with reference to such usages; and they, in fact, make a part of the contract. But there cannot be a usage, by which a warranty that a vessel was neutral, should be held to mean that she was not neutral, but only pretended to be so.”

In Insurance Co. v. Wright, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 456, in which a usage as to the rate of premium was offered, the Supreme Court of the United States said: “The usage attempted to be set up cannot be sustained. It contradicts directly the written contract. It proposes to set aside all that was said about the rate of premium, and substitute the discretion of one of the parties to the instrument. It goes upon the assumption that all that is written in the contract which fixes, or ascertains, or limits the amount that may be claimed for premium of insurance by the company is nugatory, and that the whole field is left open, and the power placed in the hands of one of the parties exclusively. No such usage can be admitted thus to contradict, vary, and control this contract.”

In St. Nicholas Ins. Co. v. Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 238, the court held that proof of a usage and custom, however uniform and universal among insurance companies in the city of New York, not to require a reinsuring company to pay the full premium which, by the policy of reinsurance, it is stipulated shall be paid, cannot legally operate to impair the effect of an agreement to pay a fixed rate settled by the policy. A written agreement, which is in no wise of ambiguous or uncertain import, is to have effect according to its terms, and the parties are bound thereby; and the express stipulations of parties cannot be overruled or set aside by any custom not to require their performance according to their tenor. This is not a question regarding the mere incidents to the defendants' undertaking, but it is a question whether a written agreement is itself binding.

In M'Gregor v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co., 1 Wash. (U. S.) 39, the court held that the alleged custom in Philadelphia to strike off one-third of the gross freight for charges and to pay two-thirds only to the assured, in a policy on freight, where a total loss has occurred, is in direct opposition to the terms of the policy, and is invalid. "The usage of a particular trade, is supposed to be known by those who engage in that trade; it is or ought to be equally well known by the person who insures against the risks incident to that trade, as to the person engaging in it. But that which is called a usage, in this case, is nothing more than a rule established by a particular class of men, to control a contract entered into by them with others, not privy nor consenting to the rule; and who are and can be under no legal obligation to know of its existence. It is a law governing this species of contract, different from the general law upon the subject, and varying the general rules of evidence."

In Swamscot Machine Co. v. Partidge, 25 N. H. 369, a policy provided that the company should "settle and pay to the assured all losses within three months after notice shall have been given as aforesaid, and that the payment of the loss ascertained should be made within the time prescribed by the charter, without deduction from the sum decreed by the adjustment," a usage on the part of the company, in case of a total loss, to retain of the amount of the ascertained loss two per cent. per month on the balance of the premium-note, from the date of the last assessment upon it until the expiration of the term of the policy, was rejected. "The object and effect of the proof offered of the usage were plainly to vary and limit the plain and unequivocal terms of the policy, and to control and limit their construction and legal effect. To give the evidence of the usage the effect claimed for it, would be to allow the exact converse of the true and well-settled rule of law upon this subject to prevail. It would be to hold that while the contract, in express and unmistakable terms, provides that the whole loss shall be ascertained and paid to the assured, the usage shall control the express terms and give them the effect of a contract for the payment of a sum less than the whole loss sustained. It would be to allow the usage to control an express written contract and to limit its terms and effect, while it is well-settled—in accordance with sound reason, too—that a usage shall be regarded as waived by the express terms of a contract when they are in conflict with each other."

In Stebbins v. Globe Ins. Co., 2 Hall (N. Y.) 632, a policy contained no condition requiring the assured to give notice of changes in adjoining premises. On the trial, evidence was rejected by the trial court, which went to show that by a usage in New York, where the contract was made, upon the occurring of any circumstance whereby the risk was increased by the act of the assured, after the effecting of the insurance, notice thereof was to be given to the insurers, so that they might have the option of continuing the policy or annulling it. On appeal the ruling was affirmed, on the ground that "it could not be given in evidence to alter the legal operation and effect of the policy."

In Rankin v. American Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 619, a marine insurance company bound themselves to pay all damage to the property insured arising from "the perils of the sea." It was held incompetent for the company to prove that, "by the established usage of trade in the port of New York and other ports, the master of the vessel is in all cases responsible for any damage sustained by the goods delivered by him to the owner or consignee, unless there has been an actual survey made on board the vessel by the wardens of the port or other officers, and on such survey the surveyors shall have found that the goods were properly stowed, and were damaged on the voyage by the perils of the sea; and that, by a similar usage as between the assurers their contract with the insurer; or to excuse the misrepresentation or suppression of some material fact; or to extend the liability of the insurer beyond the terms of the policy. In all such cases, the usages offered have been rejected.¹

and the assured, the survey so made by the wardens is a document indispensable to be produced in order to charge the underwriters, and that the preliminary proof is deemed insufficient unless such document be established as part of it."

In Macomber v. Howard Fire Ins. Co., 7 Gray (Mass.) 257, it was held that under a policy of insurance against fire on a stock in trade, which provides that a use of the premises for the purpose of keeping or storing any of the articles denominated hazardous in the condition annexed to the policy, shall avoid the policy, unless otherwise specially provided for, and in which conditions "rags" are enumerated as hazardous, is avoided by the keeping of rags as part of the stock; although it is usual for shopkeepers, having a general stock of goods like that insured, to keep rags in the same manner. "The effect of the evidence to prove a usage to keep rags in a country store was to control the written agreement of the parties. The evidence was therefore incompetent."

1. Usages Asserted by the Insured.—

In Smith v. Mobile Nav., etc., Co., 30 Ala. 167, it was held that parol evidence of a custom could not be received to show that a marine policy of insurance on goods shipped from New Orleans to Mobile, the language of which is plain and unambiguous, covers the overland transportation of the goods by railroad. "If the policy had contained the distinct statement that the insurers only agreed to indemnify the owners of the goods while they were waterbound, no one, we apprehend, would contend that these terms could be shown by usage, or local custom, to embrace land risks. To allow such evidence, would be to change the entire character of the written contract."

In Cande v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 4 Fed. Rep. 143, the question was whether evidence was admissible of an alleged custom of insurance companies, alleged to have been known to the agent of the plaintiff, that upon the happening of a future event the policy should become void, which condition was not inserted among the numerous detailed and clearly-expressed conditions subsequent to the policy. The court held that it was not admissible to add to the carefully-drawn and accurately-defined provisions of an express contract, like an insurance policy, a new stipulation contained in an unexpressed custom.

In Van Alstyne v. Aetna Ins. Co., 14 Hun (N. Y.) 360, the owner of a canal boat procured a policy of insurance of the defendant on his boat, the policy providing that it should become void if any other insurance should be made upon the boat. Subsequently, he procured another policy to be issued upon the boat by another company. In a suit against the first company, it was held that evidence was not admissible to show a custom to take out what is called a "trip policy," whereby a party takes out a policy for a particular trip he desires to make, and that according to the custom the time policy is suspended during the life of the trip policy, and that such a policy is not considered as "other insurance" in the sense these words were used in the first policy. Such a usage would be in direct opposition to the terms of the policy.

In Odionre v. North England Mut. M. Ins. Co., 101 Mass. 551, it was held that neither the oral statement of the president of an insurance company, at the time of issuing a policy on a vessel, that the violation of a warranty not to enter certain waters or ports would not avoid the policy; nor a usage, among the underwriters of the port where the insurance is made, to consider such a violation as not avoiding a policy, is admissible, in an action on the policy to control or vary its construction. The usage which was offered to be proved is inadmissible. Seccomb v. Provincial Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 305. It is merely a usage among underwriters in Boston to construe a clause of the policy in a particular way. There is nothing in this language so technical or peculiar, or having such application to a particular branch of business, or a particular method of managing business, as to require the evidence of usage to explain it, within the principles stated in Eaton v. Smith, 20 Pick.

7. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—The usages rejected, as varying contracts between landlord and tenant, relate to about the same matters as those collected in a previous section, and held to be admissible as explaining the terms of such contracts.¹ Thus, an agreement providing for the away-going crop may exclude proof of a usage which would otherwise give it to the tenant. Other cases pertain to contracts. And so, also, various other customary rights of the tenant may be found to be inadmissible to vary the terms of the lease; and when the agreement provides for the fixtures, evidence of usage in regard to them is necessarily excluded.²

8. Usages in Maritime Contracts.—In the construction of charter-parties, evidence of usage must be excluded, when its effect would (Mass.) 150; Macy v. Whaling Ins. Co., 9 Met. (Mass.) 354; or Crocker v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co., 8 Cush. (Mass.) 79. But the proposition is, in effect, to resort to the underwriters in Boston as authority for the legal construction of a contract containing ordinary language.

In Farmville Ins. and Bank Co. v. Butler, 55 Md. 233, it was held that the attempt to establish a usage in contradiction of the provision of the policy, is contrary to the best considered authorities. It is elementary law, that a custom may be established by proper evidence to show the true construction of a contract, but not to control, alter and vary it. Foley v. Mason, 6 Md. 49; Murray v. Spencer, 24 Md. 520; Chesapeake Bank v. Swain, 29 Md. 483.

In Busby v. North American L. Ins. Co., 40 Md. 572; 17 Am. Rep. 634, the policy provided as follows: "And it is also understood and agreed by the assured, that in case the said premium shall not be paid on or before the date hereinbefore mentioned for the payment thereof, then, and in every such case, the said company shall not be liable for the payment of the sum assured, or any part thereof, and this policy shall cease and determine." The court said that the plaintiff could not show that there existed a usage among the general agents of foreign insurance companies doing business in the city of Baltimore, and in the state generally, and among domestic insurance companies, to accept premiums after the time when they became due and payable by the terms of the policies.

For other instances see Gabay v. Lloyd, 3 B. & C. 793; 10 E. C. L. 229; Bend v. Georgia Ins. Co., cited in Ang. on Ins., § 25; Crofts v. Marshall, Humphrey*, 65 Ind. 549; 32 Am. Rep. 78; Bargett v. Orient Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 385; Turner v. Burrows, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 541; 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 144; Lat-tourns v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 3 Houst (Del.) 404.

1. See supra, this title, Usages to Explain Contracts.

2. Usages Between Landlord and Tenant.—In Stultz v. Dickey, 5 Binn. (Pa.) 285; 6 Am. Dec. 411, an agreement by a tenant that the landlord should have the away-going crop was held to exclude the custom of the country that such crop should be the property of the tenant.

In Werner v. Footman, 54 Ga. 128, it was held that the legal right of a landlord under an express contract for a time certain cannot be evaded by a custom.

In Webb v. Plummer, 2 B. & Ad. 746, in reference to a lease the court said: "Where there is a written agreement between the parties, it is naturally to be expected, that it will contain all the terms of their bargain; but if it is entirely silent as to the terms of quitting, it may let in the custom of the country as to that particular. If, however, it specifies any of those terms, we must then go by the lease alone. The custom of the country applies to those cases only where the specific terms are unknown."

In Stoddard v. Emery, 128 Pa. St. 436, it was held that if the parties to a demise of land for oil and gas purposes have provided therein, by express terms, how many wells shall be put down, no implication can be raised that be to vary or contradict the terms of the contract. The cases embrace customs of the port with reference to approaching a wharf, and unloading, and various other instances.¹

any greater number are to be drilled in accordance with a custom for the most effective operations.

In Roberts v. Baker, 1 C. & M. 808, the question was whether a covenant in a lease whereby the tenant bound himself not, on quitting the land, to sell or take away the manure, but to leave it to be expended by the succeeding tenant, excluded the custom of the country, by which the outgoing tenant was bound to leave the manure and was entitled to be paid for it. The court held that it did. In that case Lord Lyndhurst said: "It was contended that the stipulation to leave the manure was not inconsistent with the tenant's being paid for what was so left, and that the custom to pay for the manure might be engrafted on the engagement to leave it. But if the parties meant to be governed by the custom in this respect there was no necessity for any stipulation, as, by custom, the tenant would be bound to leave the manure, and would be entitled to be paid for it. It was altogether idle, therefore, to provide for one part of that which was sufficiently provided for by the custom, unless it was intended to exclude the other part."

In Roxburgh v. Robertson, 2 Bligh 156, a lease contained an express provision as to the disposal of the away-going crop, and specified and regulated the particular allowances that were to be made by an incoming tenant to an outgoing one; under these provisions the custom of the country in respect to the matters referred to is excluded.

Other similar cases in which the terms of the contract between the landlord and tenant are held to exclude any custom are Clarke v. Royston, 13 M. & W. 752; Sutton v. Temple, 12 M. & W. 63; Stafford v. Gardner, L. R., 7 C. P. 242; Wiltshire v. Cottrell, 1 El. & Bl. 674; 72 E. C. L. 674; Thorpe v. Eyre, 1 Ad. & El. 926; 28 E. C. L. 243; Dalby v. Hirst, 1 B. & B. 224.

In Webb v. Plummer, 2 B. & Ad. 746, there was a lease of down lands, with a covenant to spend all the produce on the premises, and to fold a flock of sheep upon the usual part of the farm; and also, 'in the last year of the term, to carry out the manure on parts of the fallowed farm pointed out by the lessor, the lessor paying for fallowing the land and carrying out the dung, but nothing for the dung itself, and paying for grass on the ground and threshing the corn. The claim was for a customary allowance for foldage (a mode of manuring the ground); but the court held, as there was an express provision for some payment, on quitting, for the things covenanted to be done, and an omission of foldage, the customary obligation to pay for the latter was excluded. No doubt could exist on that; the language in the lease was equivalent to a stipulation that the lessor should pay for the things mentioned, and no more.

In Boyd v. Shorrock, L. R., 5 Eq. 72, a deed was made conveying certain fixed machinery, looms and other machinery, fixed or movable. In a contest as to the looms, the court said: "It is said that there is a custom in this trade that all these looms are regarded as not being fixtures, and I am asked to give credit to the evidence upon the subject. No such custom, however, I apprehend, can be produced in evidence to alter the meaning of the words of the deed, those words being that the mill shall be assigned, with all its machinery, fixed and movable. It appears to me that the parties must be bound by what has been done, and if I come to the conclusion that they have fixed those things for the term, and have treated them as so fixed, and not as things to be transported from one place to another, the case is at an end."

In Martyr v. Bradley, 9 Bing. 24; 23 E. C. L. 249, the lease provided for the fixtures, fastenings, etc., set up during the demise; this necessarily excluded evidence of any custom in regard to the articles.

1. Usages in Maritime Contracts.—

In Holloway v. McNear, 81 Cal. 154, it was held, in an action against a charterer for breach of a charter-party, which recites that "a commission of five per cent. on this charter shall be paid by the vessel, after completing the loading," to the charterer, that evidence of a custom of trade, by which the charterer was not entitled to the entire amount of the commissions specified in the charter-party, will not be admitted.

9. Usages Between Principal and Agent.—The usages rejected as varying contracts in the relation of principal and agent, are chiefly in cases where the agent has claimed commission in excess of that agreed upon, relying upon a usage in the trade to do so.¹

In Turnbull v. Citizens' Bank, 16 Fed. Rep. 145, the contract declared that the consignees were to take the cargo "from alongside;" "that means that it is to be taken from where the ordinary appliances of the ship would leave it in discharging, at the end of the ship's tackle, on a wharf, if the ship was discharging at a wharf; on a lighter, if the ship could not reach a wharf and was discharging in the stream." But the consignees urged a custom of the port, that the term "taken from alongside," in its general acceptance with merchants at the port of delivery, did not mean that the merchant was to take it from within a foot or two of the ship, but that the ship was to deliver on the earthwork, as was customary at this port. And that the term "alongside" had ordinarily been construed there to mean delivery at the port; and as the custom-house authorities required that the cargo should be delivered on terra firma, and as the wharf-master always insisted that the wharf property could not be jeopardized by the delivery of any heavy weights on the woodwork, the delivery on the earthwork has almost always been customary. In reply to this the court said that the custom of the port could not vary the terms of an unambiguous contract, and that to allow such a custom to come in where the parties have specified that the cargo is to be taken from alongside, would be to render nugatory such a provision.

In Hearne v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 20 Wall. (U. S.) 488, it was expressed in the policy that the vessel should proceed to a certain port in Cuba, and thence to Europe. "It was implied that she should visit no other port in Cuba. Expressum facit tacitum cessare. Under such circumstances, usage can have no application, and proof of its existence is inadmissible. In no case can usage be received where it is inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the contract. Otherwise it would not explain, but contradict and change the contract which the parties have made; substituting for it another and different one, which they did not make. To establish such inconsistency it is not necessary that it should be excluded in express terms. It is sufficient if it appear that the parties intended to be governed by what is written and not by anything else."

In The Alhambra, L. R., 6 P. D. 68, a vessel was chartered to proceed with a cargo from Baltimore to Falmouth for orders, "thence to a safe port in the United Kingdom as ordered, or as near thereunto as she could safely get, and always lay and discharge afloat." The vessel was ordered to Lowestoft. Her draught of water when loaded was such that she could not lie afloat in Lowestoft Harbor without discharging a portion of her cargo, but the discharge of cargo might have been carried on with reasonable safety in Lowestoft Roads. The court rejected evidence that it was the custom of the port of Lowestoft for vessels to be lightened in the roads before proceeding into the harbor, and said that the custom, if it is proved, is in no way admissible to control what is the true construction of the charter-party. The custom alleged is that Lowestoft does not mean Lowestoft, but means something else, i. e., Lowestoft Roads.

In Cobb v. Lime Rock F. etc., Ins. Co., 58 Me. 326, it was held that in a policy of insurance on a vessel, the words "prohibited from the River and Gulf of St. Lawrence between September 1st and May 1st," constitute a warranty that the vessel shall not enter those waters within the time mentioned. The words are to be construed in their ordinary and popular sense, unless by some known usage of trade they have a different meaning.

In The Gazelle, 128 U. S. 474, it was held that evidence of a custom to consider as safe a particular port, which in fact is not reasonably safe, would directly contradict the charter-party, and would therefore be incompetent as matter of law.

1. In Lonergan v. Courtney, 75 Ill. 580, which was a suit where the plaintiff sought to recover, for building certain houses, a commission of ten per cent. on the cost, and where the evidence tended to prove a contract to pay such per cent. as commissions, "evidence on the part of the defendant, as

10. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser.—The usages rejected as varying contracts made between vendor and purchaser, embrace usages offered in evidence to directly contradict the terms of a to what was the general or customary commissions paid on such buildings, is properly rejected, as the same is wholly immaterial."

In Stagg v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 10 Wall. (U. S.) 589, it was held that where there was an express contract for the compensation of an insurance agent, no proof of a general custom as to such compensation was admissible which was in conflict with the contract. "By the language of the second circular, it is quite clear there was no room for usage, for it is there expressly stated that the commission on the renewal premiums, like those on the original premiums, was to be paid only so long as the plaintiff continued to be the agent of the company."

In Castleman v. Southern Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Bush (Ky.) 197, the agent's contract provided that he should be allowed certain commissions, "as compensation in full for any and all services under the agreement." A usage in the insurance business giving the agent commissions on the renewal premiums on policies obtained by him was rejected.

In Osborne v. Rider, 62 Wis. 235, a sub-agent agreed, by written contract, that notes taken by him on sales made for the principal, should be notes of persons of well-known responsibility, and that if the principal should find, at any time within six months after any settlement, that any notes taken and passed upon at such settlement, were doubtful or worthless at the time of sale, he (the sub-agent) would replace them with cash or good notes. "No general custom among agents upon taking notes to receive and act upon a property statement by the maker without further inquiry as to his financial condition, would abrogate the positive provisions of the contract."

In Ware v. Hayward Rubber Co., 3 Allen (Mass.) 84, there was a written contract, by which commission merchants agreed that they would receive goods consigned to them, and insure and sell the same in accordance with provisions therein contained, and charge on all such sales a certain specified commission. "This being a written and express contract, the evidence offered in respect to the usage of commission merchants to charge half commissions when goods consigned to them in the ordinary way for sale are taken back, is not applicable to this case; for an express contract cannot be controlled or varied by usage."

In Partridge v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., 15 Wall. (U. S.) 573, the Missouri agent of a Connecticut life-insurance company, having inquired of the company concerning the terms on which he was employed, received the following answer from them: "Concerning your status in Missouri, it is simply this: You are there working up a business for yourself, and are paid the highest commissions which we pay." In consequence of subsequent disputes, the agent was soon after discharged by the company, there being at the time the sum of $1,772 in his hands, which they claimed. The agent brought suit for his commission, and on the trial offered to prove, by men familiar with the business of life insurance, that the words of the letter had a peculiar and well-understood meaning among insurance men; that its meaning, as understood in that business, was that the agent should have the right to solicit and cause policies to be issued according to the published rules and rates of the company, and should have the right, during the life and force of such policies, to collect all renewed premiums thereon, and have commissions on such renewals; and that, if he was discharged by the company without sufficient cause, he was entitled to be paid immediately the present value of his commissions, to be computed by the actuarial rule used by such companies to value policies. The trial judge excluded the evidence, and in the Supreme Court of the United States, where the case was taken, his ruling was affirmed. "It appears to us, as it did to the circuit court," said Mr. Justice Miller, "that the testimony offered would have established a new and distinct term to the contract. It would have established a contract very different from the written one introduced by plaintiff. The language of the letter was neither ambiguous nor technical. It required and needed no expert, no usage, to discover its meaning. To have admitted the usage contract; usages which, while not expressly contradicting the terms of the contracts, would control them by superadding obligations not contemplated by them; usages allowing the performance of a contract in a manner different from that agreed on, although perhaps not involving any detriment to the contractee; and other usages involving variations in, or inconsistent additions to, the contract as made.¹

offered in evidence in this case, would have been to make a contract for the parties, differing materially from the written one under which they had both acted for some time."

In Kimball v. Brawner, 47 Mo. 398, the defendant (the principal) contracted to pay the plaintiff (the agent), "twenty per cent. upon all original or first-year premiums collected and paid in by him upon policies issued upon applications taken" by him. The plaintiff offered evidence to show that it was the established "usage, custom and method of doing business by the insurance company, in regard to such policies as were referred to in the contract, to treat all premiums as 'collected,' though, for the convenience of the assured, payable in installments." The court said: "There is nothing here for a construction. The plaintiff is simply suing to recover commissions on money which he did not collect and pay over, and seeks, by the aid of a construction founded on usage, to so enlarge the scope of the stipulation as to include commissions on all original premiums, whether collected and paid over or not. The parties might have so contracted, but did not. The usage must yield to the express stipulations contained in the written agreement."

In Park v. Piedmont, etc., L. Ins. Co., 48 Ga. 601, the defendant's counsel asked the witness if he knew of any usage in the life-insurance business as to the commutation of value of renewals on the discharge of agents, and what such usage was, if there was any? which being objected to, the court sustained the objection, and said: "The contract of the parties in this case was, that the defendants should receive for their services twenty per centum on all sums collected by them for first year's premium insurance, and seven and one-half per centum on all sums received by them for continued renewals of policies. This contract is plain and explicit; there is no doubt or ambiguity as to the meaning of it, or as to the intention of the parties."

1. In Atkins v. Howe, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 16, goods consigned by the defendants to an auctioneer, were sold by him to the plaintiff, on the condition of sale, that no allowance should be made for damage unless applied for within three days from the sale. It was held that the condition of sale limited the liability of the defendants for such damage, as well as of the auctioneers, to three days from the sale, notwithstanding the damage was not discovered till after the lapse of such time. Hence, in an action to recover back the price of such goods, evidence to prove that, according to the custom of merchants, goods were returned by purchasers at auction to the owners, and received by them or allowances made, after the expiration of three days, was held to be inadmissible. "It seems to the court, that the evidence of custom, as offered, was plainly inadmissible. Custom is often of importance, to show how parties are to be understood, in the language which they have used; but this is not such a case. Here was a claim for damage. The terms of sale were, that all claims for damage must be made within three days, and before the bills were settled. The stipulation was one which the parties might lawfully make, and if it varied from the common custom, it shows that these parties intended to make terms differing from those usually made; conventio legem vincit. They had a right to make a law for themselves, and are bound by it."

In Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136; 18 Am. Rep. 463, the plaintiff, a tailor, agreed to make the defendant a satisfactory suit of clothes; the defendant received the suit, but returned it as unsatisfactory. There was evidence to show that a custom existed among tailors of having garments tried on after they were finished, and then making any alterations which might be necessary to make them fit. The plaintiff contended that, as there was such a custom to remedy such defects when they occur, the plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to remedy the defects. But the court held that, "When an express contract like that shown in the present case was proved to have been made between parties, it was not competent to control it by evidence of a usage. It may be that the very object of the express contract was to avoid the effect of such usage, and no evidence of usage can be admitted to contradict the terms of a contract, or control its legal interpretation and effect. If the plaintiff saw fit to do work upon articles for the defendant and to furnish materials therefor, contracting that the articles when manufactured should be satisfactory to the defendant, he can recover only upon the contract as it was made."

In Oelrichs v. Ford, 23 How. (U. S.) 49, the court held that where there was a contract to deliver flour at a certain time, place, and price, there could be no room for evidence of a usage to require margins from the vendor as security for the delivery according to contract. "There is no ambiguity or uncertainty in its terms or stipulations, and the condition sought to be annexed was not by way of explanation or interpretation, but in addition to the contract. The plaintiff agrees to deliver a given number of barrels of flour on certain days, at the price of $9.25 per barrel, in the consideration of which the defendants agree to receive the flour and pay the price. This is the substance of the written contract. But the defendants insist that, besides the obligations arising out of the written instrument, the plaintiff is under an additional obligation to give security, whenever called upon, for the faithful performance, and this by the deposit in bank of the sum of $5,000. The written instrument bound only the personal responsibility of the plaintiff; the parol evidence seeks to superadd, not a responsible name as security, but in effect the same thing—a given sum of money. The parol proof not only adds to a written instrument, but is repugnant to the legal effect of it."

In Oelrichs v. Ford, 21 Md. 489, the same question arose between the same parties, and was decided by the court of appeals of Maryland in the same manner, the usage being rejected as tending to control the written contract.

In Gibney v. Curtis, 61 Md. 192, G. offered to prove that when a sale of grain in quantities of a thousand bushels and more, is made to a merchant in Baltimore, to be delivered within a limited time, and after such sale, and before the delivery of the whole, grain advances in price, there is a uniform, well-established custom in that city, which permits the vendee to exact a reasonable sum of money, as margin, from the vendor, if none of the grain has been delivered; and if part has been delivered, such custom enables the vendee to retain in his hands a reasonable sum of money, the proceeds of sales made, as margin or security for future deliveries. The contract, in respect to the mode and time of payment for the barley that might be consigned to the appellant, G., was, that he should pay for it as delivered, by the acceptance of five-day drafts, to be paid when due. The court held that no evidence of custom or usage was admissible to alter or modify this express provision of the contract. "The purpose of the evidence of custom was to incorporate an additional provision or term in the contract, and that, too, in respect to a matter for which the contract had expressly provided."

In Scott v. Hartley, 126 Ind. 239, which was an action for the breach of a contract to purchase from the plaintiff corn in Indiana at a certain price, "net, track, Philadelphia, Union Line," brought on the defendants refusing to receive the corn, the defendants alleged a custom of persons engaged in the grain trade that, upon a sale of grain, to be delivered in Philadelphia or other cities in the eastern states, at a stated price on the "track," or "net," or "net track," such grain was to be delivered on the track at such city without payment of freight by the seller, and that the purchaser should pay the freight, and deduct it from the purchase price of the grain, and thus fix the net price; the rates of freight thus paid being fixed by contracts between the purchasers and the transportation companies. It was held that there was no ambiguity in the terms of the contract, and evidence of such custom, tending to contradict the contract as to the "net price," was inadmissible.

In Wilkinson v. Williamson, 76 Ala. 163, it was held that under an express contract for the sale of timber, all the terms being agreed on at the time, and a controversy afterward arising as to the price agreed on, evidence of custom or usage cannot be received to determine it. "Evidence of usage and custom is not permitted, in other words, to prevail over and nullify the express provisions and stipulations of the contract."

In Mulliner v. Bronson, 14 Ill. App. 355, it was said that the claim that the appellee was entitled to a return of the rejected lumber or to be paid for it, upon the ground that such had been the accustomed mode of dealing between the parties in many prior transactions, could not be sustained in the case, for such a private and special custom could not control the express words of the contract.

In Van Camp Packing Co. v. Hartman, 126 Ind. 177, it appeared that by a written contract, the plaintiff, who was cultivating tomatoes, agreed to deliver them to the defendant as they should ripen, from day to day, and the defendant agreed to receive, unload, and weigh them "on unusual business hours, from 6 o'clock on Monday morning till 10 o'clock on Saturday morning of each week during the season." A stipulated amount was to be paid as liquidated damages for any default. It was held in an action for such damages for the defendant's failure to attend at its place of business and receive the tomatoes, according to contract, that evidence of a usage by which, under like contracts during previous years, the defendant's warehouse was not open until seven o'clock in the morning, was not admissible.

In Woods v. Miller, 55 Iowa 168; 39 Am. Rep. 170, the contract called for Early Rose potatoes. There was evidence tending to show that the potatoes were mixed. One witness said that about three-fourths of them were Early Rose. As to the kind of potatoes, a witness was allowed to testify that the potatoes were what, according to the understanding of dealers, would be called Early Rose potatoes. "In one view this testimony was not objectionable. It was proper for plaintiffs to show, by a person acquainted with the different kinds of potatoes, that these were Early Rose. But it is manifest, from the examination of the evidence generally, that the plaintiffs sought to show by Leow that the lot, notwithstanding the potatoes were mixed, had enough Early Rose potatoes in it to enable it to pass in the potato trade as a lot of Early Rose potatoes. Now, it may be that where a lot of potatoes has a large predominance of a particular kind, the lot would be designated by potato dealers by the name of the predominant kind. Where a specific lot of potatoes is bought, upon inspection, it is evident that it is of no consequence what they are called. But in the case at bar, the potatoes were contracted for simply by name. Under the contract, it appears to us that the defendants were entitled to have the contract performed by a delivery only of the kind named. Of course, if there was any precise degree of mixture within which a mixed lot of potatoes would, in the custom of the trade, not only be called by the name of the predominant kind, but would be deemed sufficient to fill contracts made without inspection, and when the potatoes were designated only by name, and such custom was general, or, if local, was within the knowledge of the party sought to be bound, so that he must be presumed to have contracted with reference to it, then the custom might be shown and the contract read in the light of it. Rindscoff v. Barrett, 14 Iowa 101."

In Gilbert v. McGinnis, 114 Ill. 28, it appeared that in February a person agreed to sell to another a quantity of corn at a stipulated price per bushel, to be delivered in the months of August and September following, and the purchaser, as a part of the same agreement, promised to make advances on the contract to the seller of what money he might, from time to time, require. It was held, in a suit upon the contract brought by the purchaser for non-delivery of the corn, that evidence that a custom or usage prevailed requiring the vendor to give to the vendee his note, upon receiving any such advances, was not admissible in behalf of the plaintiff, as it was inconsistent with the express contract. "Instead of collecting something on his corn, as provided by the agreement, the seller is offered a loan of money on his individual note, which would be a complete change of the legal relations of the parties. Whereas the seller was before a mere creditor of the purchaser, he at once, upon giving such a note, becomes the debtor of the purchaser, and no part of the debt due him on account of the sale is thereby discharged."

In Beals v. Terry, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 127, a usage of trade, to the effect that on a contract to deliver flour of a particular mark or brand, a delivery of flour of equal or better quality, of a different mark or brand, will satisfy the contract, was held to be inadmissible.

"There is nothing equivocal in this contract; nothing to require the aid of any usage, or mercantile understanding, to ascertain the meaning of any of its terms or phrases. . . . We cannot recognize a usage which will authorize a party to deliver one article in fulfillment of a contract positively to deliver another."

In Greenstine v. Borchard, 50 Mich. 436; 45 Am. Rep. 51, evidence was offered to the effect that it is usual and customary for manufacturers, where customers bargain for walnut counters, to make the panels or other parts, where it would be especially desirable and important to have the wood firm, hard, and rich, of mere whitewood. The judge excluded the evidence. The ruling was held correct on appeal. "The effect of such evidence, if any, must have been to derogate from the intent of the plaintiff and to defeat a right secured to him by the contract."

In Atkinson v. Allen, 29 Ind. 375, a contract was made between A and B for the purchase, killing, and packing of hogs. It was agreed, among other things, that the hogs were to be killed and packed by B "on joint account, each party to have one-half interest." It was held that evidence of a custom of the trade that when, under such a contract, the packers themselves slaughtered the hogs, they were entitled, to the exclusion of the other contracting party, to the profits on the sale of the bristles, gut, fat, and grease from the hogs packed, was inadmissible, as being in direct conflict with the express terms of the contract.

In O'Donohue v. Leggett (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 426, it was held that where a contract is to purchase "1,700 piculs of Free Preanger coffee, to arrive," it cannot be shown that on sales of coffee to arrive the exact quantity was not always realized; that it overran in some cases, and fell short in others; and that when 1,640 piculs would arrive it would be regarded a good delivery on a contract for 1,700. The contract being definite and certain in respect to quantity, evidence of a custom to change or vary it cannot be received.

In Marshall v. Perry, 67 Me. 78, the court said that a party who sells butter with a warranty of its quality, cannot limit or control the legal effect of such warranty by proof of a local usage among merchants in the trade, where the sale is made, to the effect that in the ordinary transactions in the trade, the seller is not liable to take back the butter or make any deduction from the price agreed, unless the purchaser examines the butter as soon as may be after delivery, and, in case of defect in quality, returns it to the seller, or gives him notice of the defect at once. "Under the contract of warranty claimed by defendants, the rights and liabilities of the parties were fixed and well defined by the general principles of the common law. The usage claimed steps in and supersedes the well-defined legal effect of the contract as made by the parties, and substitutes therefor the qualified and limited liability under the local usage. This could not have been the intention of the parties. If they knew the usage, and their rights and liabilities under it, and made an express contract of warranty, it must be presumed that they were not satisfied with their rights and liabilities under the usage, and therefore made the express contract, taking the case out of the usage."

In Yates v. Pym, 6 Taunt. 445, it was held that a usage of trade cannot be set up in contravention of an express contract; therefore, on a warranty of prime singed bacon, evidence is not admissible of a practice in the bacon trade to receive bacon to a certain degree tainted as prime singed bacon; nor of a practice to preclude the purchaser from all remedy, if he does not discover and point out the defect by an early day.

In Willmering v. McGaughey, 30 Iowa 205; 6 Am. Rep. 673, it was contended, in an action for breach of contract, that a clause providing for delivery "at any time in December" meant upon the last days of the month. But the court rejected the evidence as in conflict with the contract.

In Cash v. Hinkle, 36 Iowa 623, the contract provided for the delivery of "sixty-five head of fat hogs, to weigh 225 pounds and over." Upon a question as to whether evidence could be given that this meant an average of 225 pounds for the animals, and not that each animal should weigh 225 pounds, the court said that there was no ambiguity. "There is simply an omission of a word to express whether the weight specified is the weight of each hog or the aggregate weight of all the hogs. It is very clear that the former was intended, and that the word

11. Miscellaneous Cases.—In the note are collected a number of cases upon various usages which have been rejected by the courts as varying the terms of the contracts to which it was sought to connect them.¹

'each' is to be implied." Of this decision Mr. Lawson remarks (Lawson, Usages and Customs, § 214): "But if it was the custom of the trade, when buying and selling a lot of hogs over a certain weight, to receive or deliver hogs aggregating that weight throughout, though some fell under and some went over, it is clear that the contract would purposely omit to specify what the court here thought was accidentally omitted. The understanding of the trade as to what the contract really meant was more likely to be correct than the unaided opinion of a bench of lawyers. Of this belief was the chief justice, who dissented from the ruling of the majority, and who did not fail to give reasons for his dissent. The chief justice of the court dissented from the opinion, and said in part: 'In the contract before us, the parties agree that the hogs sold are "to weigh 225 pounds." Now, the custom in question does not change the import of the words. It simply implies to them a meaning. The language of the contract is not explicit, and is left by the parties to interpretation. Its meaning, whether each hog, or the average of all the hogs, must be 225 pounds in weight, may well be ascertained by proof of a custom governing the trade, in view of which the law presumes the parties contracted.'"

In Hedden v. Roberts, 134 Mass. 38; 45 Am. Rep. 276, the plaintiff sued the defendant for the price of a monument. The defendant set up that the contract was for a monument and two tablets to be made and erected in the defendant's cemetery lot; and that the plaintiff had not performed or offered to perform this contract. At the trial the plaintiff offered evidence of a general custom that when a special contract is made for a monument and accompanying tablets to be set up in a cemetery lot, and when the contract includes tablets and a monument and the setting of the same, not to furnish the tablets until the purchaser has selected them and furnished the lettering for them. It was held that evidence of the custom offered was inadmissible. "The general understanding of manufacturers of monuments and tablets, as to their rights and obligations under similar contracts, could not be received to vary the rights of these parties under this contract. The custom put in evidence, if it had any pertinency to the case, contradicted the rules of law applicable to the contract, and was inadmissible."

In O'Donohue v. Leggett (Supreme Ct.), 8 N. Y. Supp. 426, it was held that the sale of the coffee in controversy having been in writing, and no mention made of samples, the seller could not show a custom making it the duty of buyers of coffee to accept or reject it immediately after the receipt of overland samples, and that, consequently, the buyer had accepted the coffee by retaining such samples for two days, and returning them with instructions that the coffee be sold as the sort bought. 1. In Sigsworth v. McIntyre, 18 Ill. 126, the defendant having entered into a written contract to build the plaintiff a dwelling house, etc., and a barn, each with a cellar, and all of specified dimensions, sought to limit and interpret the meaning by reference to a neighborhood usage among mechanics. "The very attempt in this case to make the parties speak in their writing, through the mouths of witnesses, shows the soundness of the rule which excludes such testimony. One carpenter would not include, under such an agreement, either the foundation of that portion not required to have a cellar, nor shutters or blinds, nor to paint the outside, nor plaster the inside of the dwelling. Another carpenter would lay a foundation and plaster, but would not paint or put on blinds. This would introduce great uncertainty into contracts, where it is supposed that the parties intended to have meant and understood each other definitely. No one would be willing to accept of a contract, the meaning of which was to be treated as a matter of fact, to be settled by the interpretation of witnesses. . . . If the defendant has entered into a contract in terms which will compel him to do more than he intended, it is his misfortune; but he may not relieve himself by a resort to the usages of that neighborhood, if, indeed, any exist. None, however, are shown, but the witnesses are permitted to give each his private opinion of the extent of such an undertaking."

In Grinnell v. Western Union Tel. Co., 113 Mass. 299; 18 Am. Rep. 485, which was an action against a telegraph company for a mistake in sending a message, it was held that evidence of a usage in a local office of the company is inadmissible to vary the terms of the contract under which the message is sent.

In Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, it was held that where a written agreement provided that certain work should be "measured by the city engineer," a usage that the city engineer's assistants could attend to such work was inadmissible. In Cortelyou v. Van Brundt, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 357; 3 Am. Dec. 439, it was said that evidence of usage was inadmissible to explain the language of a deed not ambiguous or equivocal.

In Tucker v. Smith, 68 Tex. 473, it was held that proof of a custom whereby one is denied a right to land embraced within the boundaries set forth in his title papers, or which changes the legal effect of the deeds under which he claims, is inadmissible in evidence.

In Suse v. Pompe, 8 C. B. N. S. 538;

98 E. C. L. 537, it was held, in an action against a drawer of a bill of exchange drawn and indorsed in England and payable abroad, and dishonored, evidence is not admissible to prove a usage among merchants in England to entitle the holder, at his option, to demand from the drawer the amount of re-exchange, or the sum which he gave for the purchase of the bill, this being a usage which in terms contradicts the written instrument.

12. Usage Cannot Vary Legal Import.—Evidence of usage is not admissible when its effect would be to contradict the legal import as distinguished from the express terms of a contract, as determined by the court independently of the usage. Where, by judicial construction, a contract is held to have a certain meaning, that meaning cannot be varied by evidence of usage. Where the court decides that, under the terms of a contract, the parties have certain rights and obligations, such rights and obligations cannot be varied by proof of a usage that the contract means otherwise. In other words, the legal import of a contract cannot be varied by usage. This legal import may arise, either from a judicial construction of the meaning of the terms of the contract, or, when the meaning of the terms is clear, from a judicial determination of the rights of the parties under the contract. Usage is not allowed, either to contradict the judicial construction in the former case, or the judicial determination in the latter. This must be clearly distinguished in the first case, however, from cases in which it is proper to explain the meaning of a word or expression of doubtful import, or one used in a certain business, in a different sense from the usual one; but where words or expressions have received a judicial interpretation in a certain character of contract, they cannot be shown to mean something different when drawn in question in such a contract.¹

In the latter case, when the court holds that, upon the proper construction of a contract, the parties are entitled to certain rights and are under certain obligations, such judicial construction cannot be controlled by proof of a usage to the contrary. Very pointed instances illustrating this rule have grown out of contracts made with stock-brokers and others, upon pledges of securities for loans of money. The law determines the rights of pledgor and pledgee under such contracts, and decides in what manner it is proper for the pledgee to sell the securities in default of payment of the loan. The legal import of the contract between the parties being thus fixed by the construction of the court in the particular case, the court will not allow its construction to be controlled by a usage contrary thereto. Any such us-

1. In Seccomb v. Provincial Ins. Co., 10 Allen (Mass.) 305, Bigelow, C. J., said: "There can be no doubt that, in the interpretation of written contracts, especially those of a mercantile character, evidence of usage is competent and frequently admitted, to explain the sense in which particular words or phrases are used, and to show that, as applied to the subject-matter, the language of the instruments was understood by the parties to have a special and peculiar meaning, differing from that which might ordinarily be attributed to it; especially is this true in respect to policies of insurance. These contracts, like others of a mercantile nature, when first introduced as subjects of exposition in the courts of common law, contained many loose, undefined, and indeterminate words and phrases, which, if interpreted literally, and without reference to the course of trade and the customs of merchants, would have increased the risk assumed by the insurers or abridged the indemnity secured to the assured, contrary to the real intentions of the parties. But it is obvious that the necessity which gave rise to the liberal rules which have heretofore been adopted by courts of justice in admitting usages as explanatory of this class of customs has in great measure ceased to exist. By a long course of judicial decisions, that which was originally indefinite and uncertain and difficult of application in the language of the instrument has become clear, determinate, and well settled. The consequence is, that of late years, the tendency of courts of law has been to apply the rules regulating the competency of usages to explain and interpret the language of written instruments with great strictness, and to guard with increased vigilance against the danger of allowing extrinsic evidence to vary or control the words in which the parties have deliberately expressed their meaning. Many of the early authorities in England and in this country go much farther in the admission of testimony to prove usages for the purpose of aiding in the interpretation of written contracts than would be deemed to be reasonable or safe at the present day. We are inclined to doubt whether in any case it would now be deemed to be competent to offer evidence to show that a description of a voyage, in a policy which is susceptible of a clear and definite exposition, in conformity to the interpretation of the words, as established by adjudicated cases, has another and different meaning by mercantile usage, from that which has been so recognized and settled."

In Bargett v. Orient Mutual Ins. Co., 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 385, the court said: "It is not competent to show that words written in a policy, and which have received a judicial interpretation, have acquired by the usage of trade a peculiar commercial meaning, variant from or in conflict with that which the courts have adjudged to be their true meaning."

In Hone v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co., 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 137, in an action upon a policy of reinsurance, the court rejected evidence to limit the meaning of the word reinsure, and said: "The word 'reinsure,' has a definite meaning, settled in the law for two centuries past, and having the same meaning in its ordinary and popular sense. It is equally effective with the word 'insure,' and it has been decided that the word 'insure' may be used in a policy of reinsurance with the same force and validity. The proof offered attempts to wrest the term 'reinsure' from the established sense, and make it correlative, as between the first insurer and the reinsurer, whenever the former insures more than the latter, with the distinct and different contract of double insurance. In our view, it seeks to vary an express agreement between these parties, couched in plain language, having an established legal as well as conventional meaning, and we are entirely clear that the testimony of usage ought not to be received."

In Lombardo v. Case, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 95, the plaintiff was not permitted on the trial to prove the alleged custom, for the reason that effect could not be given to the custom without making a new contract between the parties. "Six months from date" cannot, by proof of any custom, be extended or explained to mean or include "a day or two before date."

In Galena Ins. Co. v. Kupfer, 28 Ill. 332; 81 Am. Dec. 284, the court refused to allow evidence as to the meaning of the words "current funds," as the terms have a settled meaning. When a word has a general well defined signification, it is not competent to change that meaning by evidence. On the contrary, if a word is employed which has no definite and specific general meaning, its local meaning may be proved. See also Moore v. Morris, 20 Ill. 255; Marc v. Kupfer, 34 Ill. 286; Osgood v. McConnell, 32 Ill. 74.

In Gross v. Criss, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 250, it appeared that a merchant in Philadelphia wrote to his debtor in Clarksburg, reminding him that his debt had been due for some time, and said: "We must request you to remit the amount." This did not authorize the admission of evidence of a local usage or understanding, to give a meaning to the terms of the letter different from that which they obviously bore. "The meaning of the terms used is plain and unequivocal, importing a demand of payment of a debt, which had been due for some time, and nothing more."

In Lawrence v. Gallagher, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 309, it was held that where the contract, by unambiguous terms, was in a certain event to clothe one of the parties thereto with the rights of an owner of certain property, the subject of the contract, a usage which would annul such right, was inadmissible.

age would change the rights of the parties to the contract as construed, and would contradict its legal effect.¹

1. In Allen v. Dykers, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 593; 7 Hill (N. Y.) 497, A. borrowed money of D., a stock-broker, on a promissory note payable in sixty days; the note stating that the former had deposited with the latter two hundred and fifty shares of the stock of a certain bank as collateral security, with authority to sell the same in case the note was not paid at maturity. D. proposed to prove that, where stock was deposited with a broker as collateral security, it was the general usage for the latter to hypothecate or dispose of it at pleasure; and, on payment or tender of the principal debt, to return an equal number of shares of the same kind of stock. But the court held that the evidence was inadmissible as tending to contradict the legal import of the note.

In Wheeler v. Newbould, 16 N. Y. 392, it was held that the pledge of commercial paper as security for a loan of money does not, in the absence of a special power for that purpose, authorize the pledgee, upon the non-payment of the debt and upon notice to the pledgor, to sell the securities pledged either at public or private sale. "In order to authorize a sale of the subject of a pledge, by the act of the party without judicial proceedings, personal notice to redeem, and of the time, place, and manner of the intended sale, which must be public, must be given to the pledgor. Evidence is inadmissible of a local custom in the city of New York to sell commercial paper, pledged as security for a loan, at private sale and for the best price that can be obtained, after demand of payment and notice that such sale will be made in case of default. Such a custom, if it existed, would be illegal and void." See also Taylor v. Ketcham, 5 Robt. (N. Y.) 507; Stentor v. Jerome, 54 N. Y. 480.

In Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, the defendants, stock-brokers, purchased certain stocks for the plaintiff in their own names and with their own funds, he depositing with them a margin of ten per cent., which he agreed to keep good. The plaintiff having failed to keep the margin good, the defendants sold out the stock without notice to him. It was held that the relation between the parties was that of pledgor and pledgee; that a sale under such circumstances without notice was a conversion; and that, in an action by the plaintiff for such conversion, evidence of a usage that stock held, as in this case, might be sold by the broker, whenever, by the fall of the stock in the market, the margin was exhausted and not renewed, was inadmissible, because in direct variance with the rules of law applicable to the relation of the parties. "This was an offer, not to explain the meaning of particular terms, or to prove attending circumstances to enable the court to construe the agreement, but to change the rights of the parties to a contract. By the law, as I have interpreted it, the customer did not lose the title to his stock by any process less than a sale upon reasonable notice, or by judicial proceedings. The brokers had no right to sell without such a notice. A practice or custom to do otherwise would have no force."

In Baker v. Drake, 66 N. Y. 518; 23 Am. Rep. 80, the court followed Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, and held that the relation of broker and customer, under the ordinary contract for a speculative purchase of stocks, was that of pledgee and pledgor; that a sale of the stock by the broker, under such a contract, without notice to the customer of the time and place of sale, was a conversion; and that proof of the usage of brokers in such cases was not admissible, to add to or make part of the contract.

In Hopper v. Sage, 112 N. Y. 530; 8 Am. St. Rep. 771, it was held that a dividend upon corporate stock belonged to the owner of the stock at the time it was declared, although the dividend was made payable at a future time. In the absence, therefore, of any provision to the contrary in a contract of sale and purchase of stock, made outside of and not subject to the rules of the stock exchange, dividends previously declared, but made payable thereafter, belonged to the seller, and are not transferred by the contract, notwithstanding a usage to that effect. "Usage and custom may not be proved to contravene a rule of law, or to alter or contradict the express or implied terms of a contract free from ambiguity, or to make the legal rights or liabilities

And similarly in various other cases it is held that the legal construction of a contract cannot be controlled by usage. The court decides upon the rights of parties under their contracts, and in rendering its decision, it cannot be affected by what may be the understanding or usage of persons in respect to the determination of legal propositions.¹

of the parties other than they are by the terms thereof. When the terms of a contract are clear, unambiguous and valid, they must prevail, and no evidence of custom or usage can be permitted to change them. The evidence offered in this case would have been inconsistent with the rules of law and would have contradicted the plain terms and legal effect of the contract."

In Spear v. Hart, 3 Robt. (N. Y.) 420, the court similarly said: "Upon a sale of stock deliverable at a future day, at the option of the seller, a dividend declared before the sale, but not payable until after the day fixed for delivery of the stock, belongs to the seller, and does not pass to the buyer, under the contract. Under a contract to sell 100 shares of stock, a custom that something more passes to the purchaser, cannot be allowed. It varies the agreement by adding to it, and it would not be merely an explanation or interpretation of it."

1. In Groat v. Gile, 51 N. Y. 431, the defendant contracted to sell the plaintiffs two flocks of sheep, which had been examined by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs paid twenty-five dollars upon the purchase, and were to take the sheep and pay the balance at a subsequent, specified time. Within the specified time the plaintiffs paid the balance of the purchase-money and took the sheep; but before this, the defendant had sheared the sheep and appropriated the wool. In an action for the conversion, it was held that the title to the sheep became vested in the plaintiffs immediately upon the completion of the contract and payment of the twenty-five dollars, which title necessarily included the wool; and that the legal effect of the agreement could not be controlled or varied by showing a custom in the county where the transaction took place that the wool of sheep, sold under such circumstances, does not go to the purchaser, and that evidence of such custom was incompetent. "Where the terms of a contract are undisputed, the question as to the nature, extent and effect thereof, and of the interest of the parties thereto, is to be determined by the contract, and is a question of law for the court."

In Davis v. Galloupe, 111 Mass. 121, the plaintiffs, stonecutters, agreed in writing with the defendant to furnish stone for his building according to the plans of an architect. Wooden patterns were necessary for cutting the stone according to the plans, and the plaintiffs procured and paid for them, without asking the defendant or the architect to furnish them. It was held in an action to recover the amount paid for these patterns, that evidence of a usage for stonecutters, in cutting stone for a building, to procure such patterns and recover the cost from the owner of the building, was inadmissible. "By the legal construction of such a contract, the plaintiffs were to furnish the patterns. A usage that the defendant should pay for them would be contrary to the terms or construction of the contract, and therefore would not be valid."

In Potter v. Smith, 103 Mass. 68, it was held that a provision, in shipping articles for a whaling voyage, that if any officer or seaman should be judged by the master incompetent, the master might "displace him and substitute another in his stead," and that a corresponding reduction of the lay of such officer or seaman, should thenceforth take effect, did not authorize the master to discharge from the vessel one who had shipped under these articles as second mate; and the effect of such a provision could not be varied by evidence of a usage in the whaling trade never to disrate an officer to a seaman, but, when the necessity for displacing him occurred, to discharge him from the vessel. "The usage alleged to exist cannot avail the defendants. Its effect, if proved, is to control and vary the written contract, unambiguous in its terms, into which the parties have deliberately entered."

In Wilson v. Knott, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 473, it was held that where a contract was made between the owner of the soil and a carpenter for building a house, and the house was burnt

XII. USAGES IN VARIOUS RELATIONS—1. In General.—Having examined the principles governing the admissibility of usages to affect contracts in various relations, we now come to consider the cases which cannot conveniently be classified under the preceding divisions of our subject. In various branches of business, usages have grown up which determine the rights of parties who conduct their affairs with reference to them. By these usages, the propriety of the conduct of parties is measured. They constitute a kind of local law for those who subject themselves to their operation.

2. Usages of Banks¹—a. DAYS OF GRACE.—Days of grace are said to be the mere creature of usage, varying in different countries, and of no compulsory force. The usage of almost all banks in America has been to allow three days of grace; but as usage established the number, so it may also change the number. In a leading and interesting case in the Supreme Court of the United States, it was held that usage in Washington and the District of Columbia could establish four days of grace as the rule in those down after much work was done, but before completion, that "proof of the usage as to the party on whom the loss would fall was inadmissible." This was regulated by the contract and the circumstances of the transaction, and not the usage of builders.

In Randall v. Rotch, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 107, it was held that it was not competent for a master cooper to send his apprentice abroad on a whaling voyage and receive his earnings on such voyage, and a custom to that effect was bad, being repugnant to the objects and terms of the contract of apprenticeship. "A high trust and confidence are reposed in the person of the master. All the considerations which go to support the rule that an apprentice cannot be assigned over, are arguments against the right of the master to place the apprentice out of his own control and instruction, for from two to four years, a large portion of the usual period of apprenticeship. It is directly repugnant to the leading stipulation on the part of the master, to instruct the apprentice in his trade. The evidence of custom was therefore rightly rejected. The custom was relied upon to establish rights and duties directly repugnant to the objects and terms of the contract."

In Ripley v. Crooker, 47 Me. 370; 74 Am. Dec. 491, it was held that proof of a custom in the vicinity for persons building a vessel together, that each should be responsible for his own share only, was inadmissible to modify a written contract, which under a proper construction bound all the parties building the vessel. "To allow such a custom to modify the written contract of the parties would be to set it up against their express agreement and manifest intentions, which the law will not permit."

In Rice v. Codman, 1 Allen (Mass.) 377, it was held that a bill of sale of gunny cloth, specifying the invoice weight, was not a warranty that the actual weight was substantially the same with the invoice weight; and evidence that such was the understanding among dealers in that article in Boston was inadmissible. "There is no doubt that it is competent to prove by parol that words used in a contract have, by commercial usage, a settled meaning different from their common and ordinary acceptation. But we do not understand the plaintiff's offer of proof to come within this rule. They asked to be allowed to prove, that the defendants, by warranting that the cloth was described as of a certain weight in the invoice, warranted that the statement in the invoice was substantially true. This does not seem to us to be explaining the meaning of the terms used in the contract, but an attempt to give to the contract a force and effect which its terms do not warrant."

places; and that this would be binding upon those who contracted with knowledge of the usage. This decision has been followed in other states, and it is generally recognized that, in the absence of statutory law, the usage of a place controls in the matter.¹

1. In Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 581, a usage on the part of all the banks of Washington and Georgetown to demand payment and give notice to indorsers of commercial paper on the fourth day of grace, was held binding upon an indorser who knew of the usage. The court said: "This court must assume as established facts that the custom of the Bank of Columbia, and all the other banks in Washington and Georgetown, from their first institution, had been to demand payment of notes due them, on the fourth day after the time limited therein, and that this custom was known and well understood by the defendant when he indorsed the note in question; and, it may be added, with full knowledge and expectation that this note was to be dealt with in the same way. Under such circumstances, it would seem that nothing short of some positive and unbending principle of law could shield the defendant from responsibility. But, so far from trenching upon any such principle, we think his liability completely established by well-settled rules of law. It seems to be assumed as the settled law of promissory notes, that in order to charge an indorser, demand of the maker must be made on the third day after that limited in the note, and that this is so stubborn a rule that parties are not permitted to violate it even by their mutual agreement. We admit in the most unqualified manner that the usage of making the demand on the third day of grace has become so general that courts of justice will notice it ex officio, and in the absence of any proof to the contrary, will presume that such was the understanding of all parties to a note when they put their names upon it. But that this rule has any attributes so inviolable as not to be touched by the parties to negotiable paper, cannot be admitted. It has its origin in custom, and that custom, too, comparatively of recent date, and is not one of those to the contrary of which the memory of man runneth not, and which contributed to make up the common-law code, which is so justly venerated. So far from this,

that the allowance of any days of grace is in derogation of the common-law rule applicable to other contracts. They are emphatically the mere creatures of usage, varying in different countries to suit the views and convenience of men in business, originally gratuitous, and not binding on the holder. When the allowance of only three days of grace is said to be the law of the contract by bills of exchange and promissory notes, nothing more can be intended than that custom has so long sanctioned this rule that all dealers in paper of this description are understood to govern themselves by it. The custom under which this bank has transacted business for five and twenty years, of demanding payment of the drawers of notes on the fourth instead of the third day after the time limited for payment, is not unreasonable or repugnant to any principles of general policy. It does not stand alone, but is in accordance with the usage of every other bank in Washington and Georgetown. The defendant indorsed the note in question with full knowledge of the custom. A demand on the fourth day is in perfect harmony with the principles of the common law, if applied to the contract, the maker having the whole of the third day to pay his note, and not being in default until the fourth. The inconveniences suggested on the argument, growing out of a usage here differing from that which is in practice in other places on this subject, are not of great public concern. If they exist, they affect the banks and their customers only. And if felt to the prejudice of either the one or the other, we may rest assured it would be altered."

In Sharp v. Ward, 7 Ohio 223, it was said: "Are days of grace allowed, in this state, upon notes like this? In the absence of litigation, and of decided cases, this depends upon custom, that is, upon the usual mode of transacting the business upon which the controversy arises. Upon such notes, and upon commercial bills of exchange, it is a well-established usage, to allow days of grace. In relation to mere ordinary notes of hand, made in the

b. DEMAND AND NOTICE.—The usages of banks are of special interest in connection with matters of demand for payment of commercial paper, and notice to parties liable as indorser or otherwise. It may be said, in general, that all usages of banks pertaining to demand and notice are presumed to enter into the contract of the parties, and that all acts done in accordance with common transactions of life, no such usage is understood to prevail."

In Godden v. Shipley, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 579, it was said that when the local law of a state does not fix the days of grace which shall be allowed upon negotiable notes, the law merchant fixes it, which is by custom, varying in different places, and the custom should be proved.

In Reese v. Mitchell, 41 Ill. 365, it was said that whatever may have been the usage of bankers and a portion of the business community, the custom of allowing days of grace did not obtain among the great majority of the people in Illinois. The precise question, however, was presented to the court in the case of Elston v. Dewes, 28 Ill. 436. It was there held, that days of grace did not exist as a right, prior to the passage of the Act of 1861, so far as it related to promissory notes.

In Cookendorfer v. Preston, 4 How. (U. S.) 317, the court said, that at one time it was the usage in the city of Washington to allow four days of grace upon notes discounted by banks, and also upon notes merely deposited for collection. "But since then the usage has been changed as to notes deposited for collection, and been made to conform to the general law merchant, which allows only three days of grace. Although evidence is not admissible to show that usage was in fact different from that which it was established to be by judicial decision, yet it may be shown that it was subsequently changed."

In Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 25, it was said: "It is the usage of the Bank of Washington, and of other banks in the District of Columbia, to demand payment of a bill on the day after the last day of grace; and this usage has been sanctioned by the decisions of this court. The usage is equally binding on parties who were not acquainted with its existence, but who have resorted to the bank governed by such usage, to make the bill negotiable. The usage of a place on which a bill is drawn, or where payment is demanded, uniformly regulates the number of days of grace which must be allowed."

In Fowler v. Brantly, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 318, it was said, that the known custom of the bank, and its ordinary modes of transacting business, including the prescribed forms of notes offered for discount, entered into the contract of those giving notes for the purpose of having them discounted at the bank; and the parties to the note must be understood as having agreed to govern themselves by such customs and modes of doing business; and this, whether they had actual knowledge of them or not; and it was the especial duty of all those dealing with the note to ascertain them, if unknown. This is the established doctrine of the supreme court, as laid down in Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 581; in Mills v. U. S. Bank, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 431, and in Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 32.

In Planters' Bank v. Markham, 5 How. (Miss.) 397, it was held that where a note is made payable at a banking house, the usage and custom of the bank constitute a part of the contract. Where, by the usage of the bank, all persons having notes payable there are allowed until the expiration of banking hours for payment, a demand of payment at the bank before that time is insufficient, unless the note is permitted to remain in bank until the close of banking hours.

In City Bank v. Cutter, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 414, it appeared that the day of commencement at Harvard College was not a holiday; but the court said that a usage of any bank, in respect to notes falling due on that day, to make a demand on the maker and give notice to the indorser on the day preceding, will be binding on an indorser of a note discounted for him at the bank, who is consunt of such usage; and whether the note is made payable at such bank or not, is immaterial. See also Weld v. Gorham, 10 Mass. 367, note (a).

the usage will be recognized as valid. Such usages are received because the parties must have intended that their commercial paper should be treated according to the established usage.¹

c. DUTIES AS COLLECTING AGENT.—The proper performance of the duties of a bank as a collecting agent may be determined by usage. Under this heading may be included, the duty of presenting a check within a certain period after receiving it for

1. See DEMAND, vol. 5, pp. 528z, 533.

In Lincoln, etc., Bank v. Page, 9 Mass. 155; 6 Am. Dec. 52, it was held that where a banking company have established usages and by-laws respecting demands on makers of promissory notes, and notices to indorsers thereof, the dealings and contracts of those doing business with such company are to be understood and enforced according to such usages and by-laws.

In Central Bank v. Davis, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 373, the court said: "An established usage of a bank, known to its customers, would be evidence against them. All who transact business at a bank must be presumed to agree to conform to their modes of doing business, so far as they are known to them. They incorporate its known usages into and make them a part of their contracts. They are therefore bound, not by the force of the usage, but by virtue of their own contracts."

In Warren Bank v. Parker, 8 Gray (Mass.) 221, a bank in Boston, with whom a promissory note was placed for collection, gave notice to the maker before the note fell due, according to the usage in Boston, of the day when the note would be payable, and requested him to come and pay it; and the note remained in the bank through the banking hours of that day. It was held that if the maker was a trader and accustomed to transact business at the bank, his consent to the general usage which made such notice sufficient might be shown, and, if shown, rendered any other demand immaterial.

In Carolina Nat. Bank v. Wallace, 13 S. Car. 347; 36 Am. Rep. 694, it was held that while the general rule requires that, where the parties reside in the same city or town, notice of dishonor must be given personally to the indorser, or, in his absence, must be left at his residence or place of business, yet where the note is made payable at a bank whose usage it is to give such notice through the post office, that mode of giving notice will be sufficient.

In Sahlien v. Bank, 90 Tenn. 221, it was held that a person sending paper to a bank for collection, without special instructions, is bound by a custom of the bank to hold paper sent to it for collection for some days after presenting it and receiving a promise of payment, if such usage is not in violation of the general law. The great weight of authority is that such a custom of banks, though not known to the party sending paper for collection, is binding upon the sender as a part of the contract of agency, to which the sender impliedly assents by selecting the bank as agent, without inquiry or without special instructions. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 25; 1 Morse on Banks, § 221.

In Bell v. Hagerstown Bank, 7 Gill (Md.) 227, it was said, in reference to bank usages, that they "have grown up as a part of the settled law of the land. In obedience to this usage, it is that the law dispenses with personal notice, and charges the indorser by the bare deposit of the notice in the post office, if in due time, even if the notice never comes to hand. The importance of fixed and uniform rules in reference to mercantile dealings, has converted usage into law. It is adapted to expedite commercial and banking operations."

In Statesville Bank v. Pinkers, 83 N. Car. 377, it was held that the usage of a particular bank, known and acted upon by its customers, may be proved to modify the general law merchant, as applicable to such bank.

In Grinman v. Walker, 9 Iowa 426, it was said that the rule of the commercial law is, that if the parties live in the same town, notice should not be sent by mail. It must be sent either to the place of business or the residence of the party to be notified. The note was made payable at a banking house in the city of Keokuk. Plaintiff proposed to prove that it was the custom of these banking houses to give notice to indorsers through the post office, as was done in this instance, and that defendants knew of this custom. "It is objected that this usage, or custom, if proved, would be inconsistent with the rule of law, above referred to, and would therefore be void. Usage, when established, affords the same evidence of intention as the most direct language, and may have the same effect upon the application of legal rules. If, therefore, it would be competent to prove that the parties contracted that notice should be given through the post office, the same may be shown by proving a usage to that effect."

In Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. (U. S.) 515, it was held that evidence of the general custom of banks to give previous notice to the payer, of the time when notes will fall due, was properly rejected, unless the witness could testify as to the practice of the particular bank at which the note was made payable.

In Williams v. National Bank, 70 Md. 343, it was held that evidence offered by W., the defendant, to prove the existence of a custom among the Baltimore banks to send notice of notes held by them to all persons whose names were on such notes, and that this was the custom when the notes were held as collateral security, and that no such notice had been sent to the defendant, was properly rejected, as no rule of law required such notice to be sent, and the plaintiff had not adopted such custom.

In Farmers' Bank v. Duvall, 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 78, a written notice was served upon the maker of the note, stating when it would mature, etc. This was in pursuance of the usage of the bank, and was relied on as a sufficient demand in accordance with the usage. The court said: "It is supposed that this language of the witness constitutes evidence of a usage on the part of the bank to make demand of payment at a time and under circumstances different from the general rules of law, and that efficacy should be given to such usage, if found by the jury, so as to validate as a demand that which without such a usage would be a nullity. In the view which we take of the evidence, it is immaterial to examine the question as to the legal effect of such usage, if established, because we consider that the witness proves no usage bearing on the question of demand. The only conclusion which can be drawn from the evidence is, that it is the practice of this bank, as it is of all banks, to give notice of the falling due of notes, that the parties may be apprised, not only of the holders of the notes, but reminded and admonished of the near approach of the time for the payment of their liabilities. The witness does not state the existence of any usage to treat this common notification as a substitute for a legal demand on the holder. The rule established is, on the contrary, perfectly consistent with the necessity of presentment for payment when due, and in the accustomed legal mode. . . . The plaintiff should have gone further, and proved that, by the usage of the bank, demands against the drawers of notes, in order to charge the indorsers, were always made by the alleged notification on the day notes first fell due, instead of being made according to the rules of law, and that such notice was made by usage a substitute for the lawful demand. In such a state of facts, the question would have been brought before the court how far, in point of law, such a notice could operate as a demand."

In Marrett v. Brackett, 60 Me. 524, it was held that the acceptance of a check implies an undertaking on the part of the holder to use due diligence in presenting it for payment. "The holder is in the exercise of due diligence when he presents it for payment in accordance with the usage of the banks where payable, and of the persons having accounts with such banks, provided the usage is well established, reasonable, and lawful, and recognized by the mercantile community and the parties to the check."

In Blanchard v. Hilliard, 11 Mass. 85, it was said that the usage of a bank, at which the parties to a promissory note are accustomed to transact business, respecting the time of demand and notice on such notes, may be shown, not as forming rules for the decision of the court, but as evidence of the assent of the parties to such usage, and of their waiving their legal claims.

In Chicopee Bank v. Eager, 9 Met. (Mass.) 584, it was held that where a bank is the holder of a note made payable at its banking house, the indorser is bound by a notice of non-payment by the maker, given conformably to the established usage of the bank, though not conformably to the general law. The defendant, being charged as an indorser of a promissory note payable, by its terms, at the Chicopee Bank, is bound by a notice conformable to the established usage of that bank. Mills v. U. S. Bank, 11 Wheat. (U. S.) 431.

collection;¹ the question whether the duty of making demand upon the maker of a note may be delegated to a notary,² and whether a bank need notify all the indorsers on notes sent to it for collection.³ The bank being an agent for collection, it is presumed that the agency will be executed according to usage.

d. POWERS OF OFFICERS.—As between a bank and its customers, usage may determine the powers of the bank's officers; and customers are entitled to rely upon the usage in making contracts with the bank.⁴ The cases embrace instances in which usage has been looked to for the purpose of determining whether various acts of presidents, cashiers, tellers, clerks, and others were within the scope of their respective powers.⁵

The case stated shows that there was such a mode of giving notice established by usage, and that the notice in the present case was given conformably to it.

Other cases upon usages affecting demand and notice are Heywood v. Pickering, L. R., 9 Q. B. 428; Bank of Alexandria v. Deneale, 2 Cranch (C. C.) 488; *Patriotic Bank v. 2. MISCELLANEOUS.—Certain other cases in which the usages of bankers have been considered are stated in the note.¹

3. Usages of Carriers—a. DELIVERY BY CARRIERS.—Carriers' usages which have come before the courts for consideration are to a great extent those relating to the delivery by the carriers of goods received by them for transportation. The cases show that great latitude has been allowed the carriers in this connection.

was held that a usage for a teller to certify checks as "good" in the absence of authority was void. This has not been followed, and the contrary has been held in numerous cases. See Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 604; Clarke Nat. Bank v. Bank of Albion, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 592; Meads v. Merchants Bank, 25 N. Y. 143; 82 Am. Dec. 331; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Bank, 52 N. Y. 96; 50 Barb. (N. Y.) 339; U. S. Bank v. Fleckner, 8 Mart. (La.) 309; 13 Am. Dec. 387.

1. In Bank of Utica v. Smith, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 230, a note payable at the Mechanics' Bank in New York was presented and payment demanded fifteen minutes after bank hours; and this was held sufficient, it appearing that although it was a quarter of an hour after the usual time of closing the bank as to other business, it was within bank hours, it appearing that, according to the general course of doing business at this bank, these fifteen minutes were the usual and accustomed time for these presentments, and of this course of business the defendant ought to have informed himself.

In Dodge v. National Exchange Bank, 30 Ohio St. 1, it was held that the rightful possession of a check, made payable to the order of a particular person, confers no authority on the drawee to pay the same to the person having such possession, without the genuine indorsement of the payee. "The duty of the drawee upon acceptance of such check, to pay the same only upon the genuine indorsement of the payee named therein, is not affected by a custom among bankers as to the mode of ascertaining the identity of the person indorsing the name of the payee and receiving payment."

In Sims v. U. S. Trust Co., 103 N.

Y. 472, it was said that the custom of the trust company to require the signature of a customer to accompany a deposit was one adopted for the safety and protection of the bank, which it was at liberty to enforce or omit as it deemed best under the circumstances.

In Planters' Bank v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 8 Gill & J. (Md.) 449, it was held that a usage established by proof, that current deposits made in a bank, and the proceeds of notes and drafts placed for collection, are to be paid to the depositor, upon demand, at the counter of the bank, would prevent the running of the Act of Limitations against such depositor.

In McCurdy v. Society of Savings, 8 Wkly. Law Bull. (Ohio) 69, it was held that the right of the drawer of a check to have it paid according to his order, without indorsement by him, or the right of a holder of it to be paid according to its terms without any new contract arising from indorsement by him, cannot be affected or destroyed by such usage. "What good reason is there why a holder of such a note, bill, or check shall be required to indorse a paper as a condition to getting his money when he is lawfully entitled to it without such indorsement? It does not make the person's indorsement genuine, if it was in fact forged; it does not increase his liability to the bank in such a case; it may cause the holder, who is frequently a person who has no actual interest in the paper, to wit: an agent's attorney, trustee, etc., to run the risk of a liability by a fraudulent or improper reissue of the note and bill with his indorsement on it; neither can it be fairly justified on the ground that the signature is in effect a receipt of the holder, that he has received money; first, for the reason that the possession of the bill or check is evidence of its payment; second, because a party having the obligation of paying money cannot insist on a receipt as a condition precedent to payment." See generally CHECKS, vol. 3, p. 211.

The ground upon which such usages have been received, is, of course, as in other relations, that the usage entered into the contract of the parties.¹

The proper method of delivering varies in different places. In a sparsely settled country, it would be unreasonable to expect the same method of delivery as in a large city. The usages, there-

1. See CARRIERS OF GOODS, vol. 2, p. 891. In Dixon v. Dunham, 14 Ill. 324, the court said, in reference to the effect of usage upon delivery by carriers: "While the convenience of commerce may require different rules for the delivery of goods when transported by sail or steam vessels on the great lakes, on the rivers, on the canal, or by railroad, by plank or the common roads, it would be very inconvenient for each commercial point on these thoroughfares to establish an independent usage by which the same contract would receive different constructions, depending upon the place at which it was to be performed. Where the necessities of any particular line of commerce may render a particular usage so indispensably necessary as to commend itself to, and force itself upon all those engaged in that line of commerce, there may be great propriety in allowing such usage, when it has become universal and well understood, and acquiesced in by all, to be proved in order to explain the intention of parties upon points as to which the contract itself is not explicit, although without such usage the law might give it a different construction. This is allowed upon the same principle which allows other extraneous facts to be proved, in view of which parties have entered into engagements, and by the aid of which their intentions are ascertained where otherwise they might be doubtful. In construing contracts of affreightment, the courts themselves take notice of the course of trade, and the means of transportation in use in carrying on that commerce; and, in aid of the means of information which the courts are supposed to possess in reference to commercial transactions, usages which the necessities of a particular trade have established have been allowed to be proved to the courts, to aid them in giving a construction to contracts made in reference to such trade."

A custom of railroads for the delivering carrier to take up bills of lading before delivering freight to the consignee, for the purpose of holding such bills as evidence of having delivered the freight to the right party, is unenforceable. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. McCown, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 435.

In Blin v. Mayo, 10 Vt. 56; 33 Am. Dec. 175, it was said that the usages of business in a vicinity, are of importance to show when a wharfinger acquires, and when he ceases to have the custody of goods in that capacity, as in the case of common carriers. The cases are numerous where evidence, as to the usages of business, is received to show when goods are considered as delivered to, and received by, common carriers, and when their liability commences. Hence the evidence of the customs and usages of merchants, in the vicinity of the defendant's wharf, was properly received to show that goods landed on the wharf, as was the flour in this case, were not considered as in their custody, and that they did not receive and take care of them, as wharfingers.

In Kansas City Transfer Co. v. Neiswanger, 18 Mo. App. 103, it was held that if a transfer company has been for a considerable time in the habit of hauling freight belonging to the consignees from the depot to their place of business, and paying charges thereon and collecting them from the consignees, and this is recognized by the consignees and is in accordance with the custom between them, the transfer company has a right to continue in the said habit or custom until notified by the consignees to desist therefrom.

In Cahn v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 71 Ill. 96, it was held that the prima facie obligation of a carrier with respect to delivery may be affected by a well-established and generally well-known custom and usage; but to have that effect, it must be so universally acquiesced in, by length of time, that the jury will feel themselves constrained to say that it entered into the minds of the parties, and made a part of the contract.

fore, vary in such cases.¹ So, also, usage may prescribe that goods should be stored upon arrival at their destination in the carriers' warehouse or elsewhere.² The character of notice of the arrival of goods may also be regulated by usage; in some cases, indeed, actual notice has not been required.³ Similarly, the method of unloading, the place prescribed, and the time allowed for it, may

1. In The Mill Boy, 13 Fed. Rep. 181, it was said that the rules regulating the liability of a carrier of goods by water to landings where there are wharves and warehouses, and where the consignee resides or may be found, are not applicable to neighborhood or way landings on the river banks of the southwest, where there is no wharf and no warehouse, and where the consignee does not reside, and is not to be found. Furthermore, the usage and custom has been uniform that when the boat put goods off at such a landing in good order and condition, and the person living at or near the landing was notified of the fact, and requested to look after them and notify the consignees, the liability of the boat was at an end, and, being reasonable, contracts of affreightment will be presumed to have been made with reference to such usage and custom. Hence, where the consignees had notice in fact of the precise character of the landing, and ordered a mill consigned to such landing, and lived at a distance from it, with no direct or speedy means of communication between the landing and themselves, it was their duty to have been in attendance to receive the mill, or to have had an agent at or near the landing for that purpose, if they did not desire to be bound by delivery in accordance with the usage and custom of the landing.

In Forbes v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 133 Mass. 154, it appeared that it was the custom of the railroads terminating in Boston to deliver to the consignee goods "billed straight," as it is termed, that is, billed to a particular person, not to order, when they were satisfied of the identity of the consignee, without requiring the production of the bills of lading, and to rely upon the way-bills to determine the consignee and the form of the consignment. Under this usage, the court said that there was no laches in not calling for the bill of lading; and, in thus delivering, there was no violation of any of the terms of its contract, express or implied. Such delivery, therefore, was not a misdelivery which would amount to a conversion and render the defendant liable to the plaintiffs.

2. In Alabama, etc., Rivers R. Co. v. Kidd, 29 Ala. 221, a railroad company gave a receipt for freight "to be delivered to R. R. agent;" the agent deposited it in a warehouse of a third party under a usage to do so; the railroad proposed to prove the custom, and under it justify the deposit of the cotton in the warehouse as a means of preserving the cotton after its delivery to the agent. This, then, could not relieve the railroad from observing its written contract to deliver to the agent; but, if the custom existed, and was proved according to the rules governing in questions of custom or usage of trade, it might relieve the road from the liability which would otherwise rest on it, for the loss of the cotton in the hands of its agent.

In McCarty v. New York, etc., R. Co., 30 Pa. St. 247, it was held that the owner of goods, delivered to a common carrier, is bound to take notice of a usage to store them, on arrival at their place of destination, in the carrier's warehouse, and the carrier is thereafter liable only as a warehouseman. "If the owner neglects to make the necessary inquiries as to the usage or custom of business, or to give direction as to the disposal of goods, it is his own fault; and the loss, if any, after the carrier has performed his duty according to the course of his trade and business, should fall upon such owner, and not upon the common carrier."

3. In Russell Mfg. Co. v. New Haven Steamboat Co., 50 N. Y. 121, it was held that where a manufacturing company has been in the habit of shipping its goods daily by a common carrier to its agent for sale, and it has been the long established course of dealing for the consignee to call daily and receive the goods upon their arrival without notice, no notice to the consignee of the arrival of any consignment is necessary, but the carrier is discharged when the goods are unloaded at the accustomed place and the consignee has had time to remove them. Where, be the subject of usage;¹ in the case of carriers by water, these usages are particularly effective, the usages of the port of delivery being impliedly incorporated into every contract of affreightment.² It is, however, in the power of every shipper and carrier to make special contracts with reference to the matters that would otherwise be regulated by usage; and if the shipper gives particular directions, and the carrier accepts the goods, he will be bound however, the usage has been for the consignee not to receive or remove goods arriving upon a holiday, as to goods arriving upon such day the ordinary rule applies, and the carrier, to relieve himself from liability as such, must give notice and a reasonable time to remove, otherwise the liability attaches until after a reasonable time for removal upon the next day.

In Huston v. Peters, 1 Metc. (Ky.) 558, it was said that in the case of a carrier by water there must be a landing of the goods at the wharf, or usual landing-place, with reasonable notice thereof to the consignee. "But this rule may be affected by a well-established, reasonable, and generally known local custom and usage, of such age, uniformity of observance, certainty, fixedness of character, and notoriety, that a jury would feel clear in saying that it was known to the party sought to be affected by it." In this case the usage was that steamboats deliver freight at N. by putting it on the wharf and exhibiting a manifest of the cargo in some public place, the consignees taking notice of the arrival of boats and of freight for them.

1. In Consolidation Coal Co. v. Shannon, 34 Md. 144, where, the contract being silent as to the time of unloading, the court held that a reasonable time was implied, and a claim for demurrage would lie for detention beyond such time; that evidence of the existence of a custom of the trade at the place of unloading to unload boats within twenty-four hours, was admissible, "for the purpose of showing what was regarded, in the regular course of the trade, as the reasonable time within which boats should be unloaded. The regulations incorporated into the contract, fixed no definite time within which boats would be unloaded and discharged; but if by usage, established in the trade at appellant's wharf, twenty-four hours were taken as reasonable time, the fact of such usage was certainly admissible as tending to show what the appellant, or its agent, regarded as reasonable time, and its own practice upon the subject."

In McCullough v. Helewegg, 66 Md. 269, a bill of lading for a cargo of wood provided that the cargo was to be delivered at the wharf of the owner of the cargo, in the city of Baltimore. It was held that the parties were presumed to have contracted with reference to a custom proved to exist in the port of Baltimore, requiring a cargo of wood to be unloaded on the wharf of the owner of the cargo, and piled in suitable form for measurement and inspection, before freight can be demanded.

In Steel Works v. Dewey, 37 Ohio St. 242, D. agreed in writing to deliver to S. a certain quantity of iron ore, at a specified price per ton, "on the landing at C.," and gave him an order therefor, and S. brought an action on the agreement, alleging that D. refused to deliver the ore. It was held competent to show that, by the settled, uniform usage at C., well known to the parties when they contracted, one holding such order is entitled to have the ore taken from the pile on the landing and placed in his boats; that ore is not permitted to be removed, nor is it practicable to remove it, in any other manner; and that the ore is weighed when it is carried in the boats to its destination, and then payment therefor is made. This extraneous evidence shows the rights and obligations of the parties to this instrument to be very different from those implied in the absence of such evidence. But the usage is not inconsistent with the terms of the contract.

2. In "Norden" Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 1 C. P. Div. 654, timber was consigned, under a charter-party made at Riga, to the Canada dock in the port of Liverpool, a given number of days being allowed for unloading there. It was held that although, by the general law, the lay days commenced from the time the ship arrived in the dock, it was competent for the consignee to show, notwithstanding the plaintiff was a foreigner, that there was a custom in the port of Liverpool, that, in the case of timber ships, the lay days commenced only from the mooring of the vessel at the quay where, by the regulations of the dock, she alone was allowed to discharge.

In The Mary Riley v. 3000 Railroad Ties, 38 Fed. Rep. 254, it was held that where a custom is established requiring vessels to wait their turn in unloading at a particular port, the master is held to contract with reference to it; and, if no stipulation for demurrage is made in the contract, he assumes the risk of delay. The custom of the port respecting the delivery of such cargoes is a part of the contract of shipment, and binding upon the vessel as fully as if reduced to writing therein. The M. S. Bacon v. Erie, etc., Transp. Co., 3 Fed. Rep. 344; Henley v. Brooklyn Ice Co., 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 522; The Glover, 1 Brown Adm. 166; One Hundred and Seventy-Five Tons of Coal, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 400; Wordin v. Bemis, 32 Conn. 268; 85 Am. Dec. 255.

In Shepherd v. Lanfear, 5 La. 342; 25 Am. Dec. 181, it was said that parties are presumed to know the usages and laws of the port where the contract is to be performed, and to contract in reference to them. The mode of delivery depends much on the usage of the place where that delivery is to be made, and if the general laws of the country change the place of delivery in case of quarantine, the freighter is bound to receive it.

In Irzo v. Perkins, 10 Fed. Rep. 779, it was held that it is the duty of the vessel to make delivery of cargo, and where the bill of lading is silent as to the particular place and mode of delivery, it must be made according to the usage and regulations of the port, or the arrangements made with the consignee.

In Hostetter v. Gray, 11 Fed. Rep. 179, it was held that, if nothing is expressed to the contrary in the bill of lading, established usages relating to a voyage are impliedly made part of the contract. After the express provisions of the contract, the usage of the trade is the predominating test as to deviation, and of what belongs to the voyage, and the proper course in prosecuting it.

The time, place, and manner of delivery of a cargo may be regulated by a usage of trade, when there is no express contract upon the subject; under such circumstances, the usage enters into and forms part of the contract. Pickering v. Weld (Mass. 1894), 34 N. E. Rep. 1081.

In Devato v. 823 Barrels of Plumbago, 20 Fed. Rep. 510, it was held that where a cargo is, by the bill of lading, to be delivered at a designated port of wide extent, without naming the particular place within the port, delivery must be made according to the established custom and usage of the port, and in that part of it customarily used in the discharge of similar goods. To ascertain this, proof of usage, either general or in particular lines of trade, is competent. Where the consignees are numerous, a usage for the majority to name the place of discharge is valid, if the place named be suitable, and within the limits where such cargo is ordinarily landed. The Boston, 1 Low. (U. S.) 466; The E. H. Fittler, 1 Low. (U. S.) 114; 1 Pars. Shipp. and Adm.

In the case of Blossom v. Smith, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 316, Nelson, J., held valid an established usage of trade less obviously reasonable than this; namely, that the largest single consignee of a cargo of naval stores, such as resin, turpentine, etc., might select a yard in Brooklyn at which the whole cargo should be delivered, and that the other consignees must accept delivery there. Consignees of goods at a designated port have a right to expect a delivery of their goods, according to the established custom and usage of the port, and in that part of the port customarily used for the discharge of such goods; and the vessel is bound, and has a right, to make delivery accordingly. Abb. Shipp. 378; Vose v. Allen, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 289; The Grafton, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 176; Gatliffe v. Bourne, 2 N. & R. 100; Cargo ex Argos, L. R., 5 P. C. 134, 160; Irzo v. Perkins, 10 Fed. Rep. 779.

In Bradstreet v. Heron, Abb. Adm. (U. S.) 209, it was held by Betts, J., under a usage proved in that case, and upon a defense precisely similar to the defense in this case, that a delivery of goods at quarantine, during the quarantine season, was a compliance with a contract of the bill of lading to deliver at "the port of New York." The same, also, in substance, was held in the case of Gracie v. Marine Ins. Co., 8 Cranch (U. S.) 75.

In Sleade v. Payne, 14 La. Ann. 457, it was said that the manner of deliver-to obey the directions, any usages to the contrary notwithstanding.¹

b. DELIVERY TO CARRIERS.—What constitutes a delivery to a carrier may be determined in many cases by the usage which the carrier has allowed to grow up, and under which it receives goods. Thus, whether the articles have been delivered at the proper place, or to the proper employee of the carrier, is in great measure a matter of usage. The previous course of dealing in such cases is always a matter of importance. But when an act is done which the law recognizes as a delivery, the carrier cannot avoid it by proof of its usage to require something more, or different.²

ing the goods, and consequently the period at which the responsibility of the master and owners will cease, depends upon the custom of particular places, and the usage of particular trades.

1. Of course, if a customer gives special directions as to the delivery of the goods, the usage is excluded, and the carrier will disobey the directions at his peril. Wardell v. Mourillyan, 1 Esp. 693; Sager v. Portsmouth R. Co., 31 Me. 228; 1 Am. Rep. 659; Bazin v. Steamship Co., 3 Wall. Jr. (U. S.) 229; Express Co. v. Kountze, 8 Wall. (U. Horlock*, 1 Bing. 34; 8 E. C. L. 389.

In McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264, a usage was sustained that, at a way station, where the business of the railroad was not of sufficient importance to justify the erection of a warehouse, or to have a freight agent, goods should be delivered at the station without storing them and without notice.

In Gibson v. Culver, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 305; 31 Am. Dec. 297, it was the usage of the defendant line of stages to leave freight carried by it directed to T. at the stage house at that place, and not to deliver it to the residence or business address of the consignee, the usage prevailing at all the stopping-places of the line.

Other cases respecting delivery of goods by carriers are Banister v. Hodgson, 2 Camp. 488; Rogers v. For- rester, 2 Camp. 485; Petrocochino v. Bott, L. R., 9 C. P. 355; The Felix, 2 Ad. & El. 273; Hyde v. Trent, etc., Nav. Co., 5 T. R. 389; Garside v. Trent, etc., Nav. Co., 4 T. 2. In Green v. Milwaukee R. Co., 38 Iowa 100; 41 Iowa 410, it was held that a usage of draymen to leave trunks at the waiting room of a railroad station without notice to the carrier's employees, was valid. The court said: "That a delivery may be made at the proper place of receiving baggage under the express assent or authority of the carrier, without notice to its employees, will not, we presume, be disputed. . . . There was evidence tending to show a course of business on the part of defendant, a custom to receive baggage left at the station house, as in this case, without notice to plaintiff's servants. Upon evidence of this character, it was proper that the facts should have been left to the determination of the jury, whether there had been a delivery of the property within the rules above announced, whether a course of business—a custom had been established to the effect that a delivery of baggage at the station-house without notice was regarded by defendant as a delivery to its servants, and whether plaintiff's trunk was received under this custom."

In Wright v. Caldwell, 3 Mich. 51, are the following observations: "It is well settled that, if a uniform custom is established and recognized by the carrier, and is known to the public, that property intended for carriage may be deposited in a particular place, without express notice to him that a deposit of property for that purpose in accordance with the custom, is constructive notice, and would render any other form of delivery unnecessary. The rule is founded in reason, as the usage, if habitual, is a declaration by the carrier to the public that a delivery of property in accordance with the usage will be deemed an acceptance of it by him for the purpose of transportation. To allow a carrier, when property is thus delivered, to set up by way of defense the general rule, which requires express notice, would operate as a fraud upon the public and lead to manifest injustice."

In Montgomery, etc., R. Co. v. Kolb, 73 Ala. 396; 49 Am. Rep. 54, it was held that a deposit of cotton in a street along the side of the platform of a railroad depot, or in the railroad cotton yard, for shipment, in pursuance of a custom or usage adopted or sanctioned by the depot agent, may amount to a delivery to the railroad company, although no receipt is given by the agent to the shipper, and such usage or custom is contrary to the established regulations of the company, known to the shipper, and no notice thereof is traced to the superintendent or managing agent of the company. "The trading public, as a rule, have no access to the superintendent, and can only know the station agents, with whom they have dealings. Whatever regulation, custom, or usage such station agent adopts, or permits to be adopted, the public must either conform to, or will feel itself justified in conforming to. The rules observed by shippers in their general transactions, if continuous or frequent, although not universal, grow into a usage, which would authorize others to treat it as the proper rule, and as an element of the contract of affreightment. This constitutes the very spirit, the intent of a usage of trade. It supplies, by implication, an unexpressed fact, or link in the chain of facts, which go to make up and prove the contract. And we think it no answer to this, that no testimony was offered of this violation of instructions on the part of the agent, tending to trace notice of it to the superintendent. It was the duty of the corporation to keep itself informed of the manner in which its station agents conducted their agency, their habit, or usage in the matter of receiving and delivering freight; and we think it would be highly detrimental to the public service, if we were to permit a railroad corporation to escape responsibility for the consequences of a usage, which its own trusted agents had permitted to grow up, and be acted upon."

When a delivery has in fact been made to a carrier, the latter's liability cannot be avoided by proof of a usage not to regard itself as liable until some further act is done. If a delivery is made of merchandise, the legal effect of the delivery is not affected by a usage to be liable only as provided in a bill of lading to be afterward made out. Illinois, etc., R. Co. v. Smyer, 38 Ill. 354; 87 Am. Dec. 301. Nor, after a passenger trunk is delivered to the carrier, can it avoid liability by proof of a usage to be liable only after a check is given the passenger. Hickox v. Naugatuck R. Co., 31 Conn. 281; 83 Am. Dec. 143.

In Cobban v. Downe, 5 Esp. 41, it was held that a delivery to the mate of a ship, in accordance with the usage of the wharf, was valid. Lord Ellenborough said: "What the duty of a wharfinger is, is to be measured by the usage and practice of others in similar situations, or his known and professed liability. Every man contracts with the public according to the known and ascertained usage of the trade or business in which he is engaged. The defendant has proved that, by established usage, the goods are delivered by the wharfinger to the mate and crew of the vessel which is to carry them, from which time it has been considered that their responsibility is then at an end." This case was followed in Leigh v. Smith, 1 C. & P. 638; 11 E. C. L. 506.

In Hutchinson on Carriers, section 93, it is said in reference to usages in respect to constructive delivery to carriers: Cases may arise in which the usage and course of dealing between the parties should undoubtedly have that effect. But certainly, to do so, they should be shown to have existed, and to have been uniformly acted upon by the parties, by the most satisfactory proof, and for a sufficient length of time to have become an established usage, tantamount to an agreement to that effect, or to a declaration to the public that a delivery in accordance with the usage will be deemed an acceptance by him for the purpose of the transportation; and perhaps it should be shown that a reliance upon the previous course of dealing, or the usage, or the notice, had controlled the action of the shipper in the particular instance.

1. In Van Santvoord v. St. John, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 157, reversing same case in 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 660, it was held that a shipper is bound by the usage of a carrier to deliver at the end of his own line to a connecting carrier, whereupon his liability ceases.

In Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Murray, 72 Ill. 128, it was held where it is the general and long-established custom of a railroad company, in delivering freight to connecting lines, to deliver as consignors, a shipper who has been in the habit of shipping over such road, will be presumed to be familiar with that custom, and to contract with reference to it.

In Simkins v. Norwich, etc., Steamboat Co., 11 Cush. (Mass.) 102, it was held that if it be the general custom of a carrier to forward by sailing vessels all goods destined beyond the end of his line, he is not liable for not forwarding a particular article by a steam-vessel, unless the directions to do so be clear and unambiguous.

In Hooper v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 27 Wis. 81; 9 Am. Rep. 439, it was held that where a bill of lading is given by a carrier, to the terminus of his line, of goods addressed to a point beyond, he may show a usage to deliver in such cases to a connecting carrier. And see also The Convoy's Wheat, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 225; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Curtis, 80 Ill. 324; Knapp v. U. S., etc., Exp. Co., 55 N. H. 348.

2. In The Titania, 19 Fed. Rep. 101, it was held that the seaworthiness of a vessel was to be determined with reference to the customs and usages of the port or country from which the vessel sails, the existing state of knowledge and experience, and the judgment of prudent and competent persons versed in such matters. Stowage, according to custom and usage, and the best judgment of experienced persons, was sufficient to protect the ship from the charge of negligence, as against insurers.

In Jones v. Pitcher, 3 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 135; 24 Am. Dec. 716, it was held that a custom among the navigators of steamboats on a river, to preserve particular situations, in ascending and descending, would seem salutary and reasonable, and analogous to the rule governing ships passing each other at sea. Such custom, if proved, would bind navigators of steamboats to its observance, and a failure to do so would be at the peril of the owners.

In Myers v. Perry, 1 La. Ann. 378, it was held that in the absence of any law, an established usage among those engaged in navigating the Mississippi with steamers, must be considered in determining questions of fault or negligence in the management of the boats on that river.

In Schouler on Bailments, § 448, it is well said that usage among ordinarily prudent carriers of the same class under similar circumstances will largely determine what care, skill, and diligence should be employed toward averting or lessening the injurious consequences of a disaster otherwise excusable. Baxter v. Leland, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 526; The Reeside, 2 Sumn. (U. S.) 567; Rich v. Lambert, 12 How. (U. S.) 347. Usage may thus enlarge rather than diminish the scope of a carrier's duties. Thus, if it be the custom of an express company to seal valuable packages, the omission to do so may be considered culpable negligence. Overland Mail, etc., Co. v. Carrol, 7 Colo. 43. But usage cannot be set up to absolve a carrier from the ordinary duties which public policy, his general undertaking, or an express promise may have bound him to; instead of diverting, it shapes the natural course of the current; and its controlling influence is spent, after all, within narrow and well-recognized confines. See Newall v. Royal Shipping Co., 33 W. R. 342; Merx v. National Steamship Co., 22 Fed. Rep. 680; Coxe v. Hesley, 19 Pa. St. 243; Cox v. Peterson, 30 Ala. 608; 68 Am. Dec. 145; Steamboat Sultana v. Chapman, 5 Wis. 454; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 69 Pa. St. 374; 8 Am. Rep. 264.

1. In Lamb v. Parkman, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 343, the court said, in reference to the general question of usage in stowage: "Now, it having been shown that this cargo was stowed in accordance with an established usage, why is not that decisive in favor of the libellants? . . . It is a usage as to the mode of stowing a cargo of merchandise for a sea-voyage, a usage of trade as to the details in the mode of carrying it on. It violates no rule of law or principle of public policy, but is a matter of business between private individuals, to be regulated by them. There is no controversy that the parties may make a contract for any mode of stowage which they may see fit. What contract have they made in this respect? In the absence of express stipulations, the usage of the trade answers this question; to that usage the contract tacitly refers, not to contradict or vary its terms, but for expounding its meaning, and supplying details in the mode of its execution. Let us look into this charter-party. It contemplates the conveyance by sea of a full cargo of great value by a long voyage, and yet not a word is said as to the manner in which that cargo shall be protected at the bottom, at the sides, or on the top. . . . The contract being silent in this respect, how are the rights and duties of the parties to be ascertained? The answer is, by the usage of the trade." In this case the court, in determining the rights of the parties, admitted a usage in the trade from Calcutta to Boston, to load vessels at Calcutta with full cargoes, including gunny cloth and gunny bags, close up to the upper deck, without dunnage or air space at the top, although gunny cloth thus stowed is liable to damage from the condensation of vapor on the under side of the upper deck.

In Baxter v. Leland, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 526, a general ship took on board at New Orleans, a quantity of flour, under the common bill of lading, for a voyage to New York. The flour was stowed upon hogsheads of sugar and under sacks of corn, and was damaged by such stowage. But it being shown that it was the usage to stow flour in that manner, in voyages from New Orleans to New York and other northern ports, it was decided that the shipper was bound by the usage, and that the carrier was not responsible for the damage.

In Meaher v. Lufkin, 21 Tex. 383, it was held, in the absence of any general usage or course of trade, that goods carried on deck and jettisoned, give no claim for contribution. But where they are so carried, according to common usage and the course of trade on the voyage for which they are shipped, their jettison does give a claim for contribution.

In Chevallier v. Patton, 10 Tex. 344, a common carrier, being sued upon a bill of lading for failure to deliver in

f. MISCELLANEOUS.—Various other cases in which usages have been received are given in the note.¹

4. Usages of Corporations.—The usages of corporations may be of service in determining various questions relating to their contracts; especially in regard to the validity of the acts of their officers or agents; and although the charter of a corporation may prescribe a rule for its affairs, yet a usage may make valid many acts which would otherwise be rejected as beyond its powers.²

like good order, etc., pleaded a custom to carry goods in open vehicles, of which the plaintiff had notice, and that the only damage sustained by the freight (cotton) was caused by rains which fell upon it during the transportation. It was held that this plea was good.

1. Miscellaneous Usages of Carriers.—Although the principal business of a carrier is to convey goods, yet it may by usage extend its functions and become liable for the transportation of other things. Thus, a steamboat may become liable as a carrier of cash letters, as in Hosea v. McCrory, 12 Ala. 349; Knox v. Rives, 14 Ala. 249; 48 Am. Dec. 97; Garey v. Meagher, 33 Ala. 630; or of money, as in Lee v. Salter, Lator 163; Harrington v. McShane, 2 Watts (Pa.) 443; 27 Am. Dec. 321; Taylor v. Wells, 3 Watts (Pa.) 65; Emery v. Hersey, 4 Me. 407; 16 Am. Dec. 268; Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 109.

The lien of the carrier upon consigned goods in its charge may be extended by a usage known to the consignor, and entering into the contract, as in Rushforth v. Hadfield, 6 East 522; Holderness v. Collinson, 7 B. & C. 202; 14 E. C. L. 30. And see also Crawshay v. Homfray, 4 B. & Ald. 50; The Eddy, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 481; Raitt v. Mitchell, 4 Camp. 145; Rex v. Humphrey, 1 McCl. & Y. 191.

The charges for transportation may be determined by usage. Weber v. Kingsland, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 415; Holford v. Adams, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 471; Kirtland v. Montgomery, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 452; Bancroft v. Peters, 4 Mich. 619; Bastard v. Bastard, Show. 81; Sutton v. Great Western R. Co., 11 Jur. N. S. 879; Lewis v. Marshall, 7 M. & G. 729; Hayward v. Middleton, 3 McCord (S. Car.) 121; Middleton v. Heyward, 2 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 9.

Under what circumstances the carrier is authorized to sell goods in its charge may also be determined by usage. Kemp v. Coughtry, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 109; Taylor v. Wells, 3 Watts (Pa.) 65; Rapp v. Palmer, 3 Watts (Pa.) 178; Bryant v. Commercial Ins. Co., 6 Pick. (Mass.) 131; Pickering v. Busk, 15 East 44.

Limitation of Liability.—In Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Barrett, 36 Ohio St. 448, it was held that neither usage nor custom, though known to the shipper, which he has not clearly assented to as a condition of the contract of shipment, can be set up to absolve a carrier from his common-law liability.

See MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS, vol. 15, p. 1048.

2. Usages of Corporations.—In Bulkeley v. Derby Fishing Co., 2 Conn. 252; 7 Am. Dec. 271, the act of incorporation of the defendant provided that policies of insurance issued by it should be countersigned by the secretary of the company; in the case at bar the policy was not countersigned; the plaintiff offered evidence that it had not been the usage of the defendant for its secretary to countersign; the court held that in all cases where banks and similar corporations conform to their charter, their acts are binding on them. "So in cases where they do not conform literally to their charter, they may be liable. Suppose a banking corporation should by vote agree to issue bills in a different form or with different signatures from those prescribed, they would by their own act be rendered liable to pay them. If such a corporation, without a vote, should introduce a usage and practice in the transaction of their business different from that prescribed by law, they would by the same reason be rendered liable; for, though such conduct might be improper in itself, yet the bank cannot take advantage of their own wrong to avoid their contracts. . . . Banks, like individuals, must be liable in the character which they hold out to the world; and whatever may be the forms of their obligations, if they are according to their charter, their corporate votes, or their known usage and practice, they ought to be binding. A corporate act is not required in all cases. It is sufficient if there be a usage and practice under such circumstances as may be presumed to be within the general knowledge and by the consent of the company. Nor can the stockholders or members of the company be subjected to any inconvenience or damage. If any officer vested with certain powers should in any instance violate them, and attempt illegally to subject the corporation to any obligation, such corporation may, instantly on the discovery, disavow the act and prevent a repetition; and then, as there will be neither law nor usage to sanction the transaction, it will not be binding. But where the corporation will suffer such practice to continue, it is to be presumed that it is done with their consent, and be made obligatory on them. In the present case, it appears to me that the evidence offered conduced to prove that it was the usage and practice of this company to underwrite policies of insurance, and draw bills of exchange in the form now under consideration, and, of course, that it ought to have been admitted."

5. Usages in Insurance Contracts.—Although in some instances usages have been admitted to affect policies of insurance more freely than is allowed in other contracts, it is now established that the same legal principles must be applied in all cases.¹

In Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen (Mass.) 106, it was held that an unlawful expenditure of the money of a town cannot be rendered valid by usage, however long continued. Hence, a custom in Lynn to celebrate the Fourth of July was not legally sufficient to sustain a vote of money for the purpose, not authorized by the charter. "Abuses of power and violations of right derive no sanction from time or custom. A casual or occasional exercise of a power by one or a few towns will not constitute a usage. It must not only be general, reasonable and of long continuance, but, what is more important, it must also be a custom necessary to the exercise of some corporate power, or the enjoyment of some corporate right, or which contributes essentially to the necessities and convenience of the inhabitants. The usage relied on in the present case, if established, would not satisfy either of these last-named requisites, which are necessary to give it validity. It was said by this court, in a recent case, that there are many things in the management of town affairs, which are done without objection and pass by general consent, which cannot, when objection is made and they are brought to the test of judicial investigation, be supported as strictly legal. Sikes v. Hatfield, 13 Gray (Mass.) 347. The present case is an illustration of the truth of this remark."

In Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 71, Shaw, C. J., said: "There are some subjects which have long been regarded as within the authority of towns, not made so by statute, but derived from usage. Indeed, a recurrence to the history of the formation of towns, will show that most of the powers originated in usage, founded on the convenience and necessities of the inhabitants, and were afterward recognized and confirmed by statute."

1. Usages in Insurance Contracts.—Long v. Allen, Park. 390. And see Merchants, etc., Transp. Co. v. Associated, etc., Ins. Co., 53 Md. 448; Arnould on Insurance, ch. 3; Walsh v. Horner, 10 Mo. 6; 45 Am. Dec. 342.

In Hone v. Mutual Safety Ins. Co., 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 137, the court said: "In fine, we believe that the rule of construction applicable to policies of insurance does not differ from that applied to other mercantile instruments. Its sense and meaning are to be ascertained from the terms of the policy, taken in their plain and ordinary signification, unless such terms have, by the known usage of trade in respect to the subject-matter, acquired a meaning distinct from the popular sense of the same terms, or unless the instrument itself, taken together, shows that they were understood in some peculiar manner, and that, while we may not enlarge or restrict the clear and explicit language of the contract by proof of a custom or usage, yet in the application of a contract to its subject-matter, in bringing it to bear upon any particular object, the customs and usages of trade are admissible to ascertain what subjects were within and what were excluded from its opera-

The general rules relating to usages in insurance policies are summarized as follows by Mr. Arnould in his work on Insurance: First, Every usage of a particular trade which is so well settled or so generally known that all persons engaged in that trade may be fairly considered as contracting with reference to it, is considered to form part of every policy designed to protect risks in such trade, unless the express terms of the policy decisively repel the inference.¹ Second, The usage, in order to be binding, must be tion. Such evidence is proper, on the same principle that proof of the meaning of technical words, and words of science and the arts, is permitted in arriving at the intention of the parties in the construction of contracts."

In Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Pottker, 33 Ohio St. 459; 31 Am. Rep. 555, it was held that where, by the terms of a policy of life insurance, the non-payment of the required annual premium, at the designated time, is declared to be a ground of forfeiture, but the uniform custom of the insurance company has been to give notice of the time when the premiums fall due, and to collect the same at the residence of the policyholder, through a local agent residing in his neighborhood, good faith requires that this mode of collection should not be discontinued, and payment required at the company's office, without notice to the insured.

In Grant v. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co., 76 Ga. 575, it was held that the custom and usage of an insurance company in giving personal notice to the holder of a life policy as to premiums falling due became, if not part of the contract, yet such an incident to it or so incorporated in the spirit of the dealings as to require the company to keep it up.

In Thompson v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co., 104 U. S. 252, it was said: "The replication sets up a usage, on the part of the insurance company, of giving notice of the day of payment, and the reliance of the assured upon having such notice. This is no excuse for non-payment. The assured knew, or was bound to know, when his premiums became due. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Eggleston, 96 U. S. 572, is cited in support of this replication. But, in that case, the customary notice relied on was a notice designating the agent to whom payment was to be made, without which the assured could not make it, though he had the money ready."

In Burger v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 71 Pa. St. 422, it was held that the rules of an insurance company, requiring that notice of the transfer of a policy should be given to the company, in an action by a transferee, who had not given notice, to recover for loss by fire, evidence that the company had "always permitted and do now permit such transfers to be made," was inadmissible. The case of Helme v. Philadelphia L. Ins. Co., 61 Pa. St., 107; 100 Am. Dec. 62, does not support the contention of the plaintiff in error. There, the offer was not to show that the insurance company sued had, in other instances, allowed thirty days' grace for the payment of premiums due, when a clause for forfeiture for non-payment on the day existed; but that such was the custom of all life insurance companies. In other words, the offer was to prove a usage of trade.

In Home Ins. Co. v. Favorite, 46 Ill. 263, it was held that where a contract of insurance refers to a policy, which both parties knew had no existence, to define the conditions of the contract, and where it is apparent that both understood that the agreement was to be governed by the same terms and conditions as such an instrument would contain, if in existence, the contract will be governed by the uniform and settled custom of the company with reference to the conditions contained in like policies.

In Baxter v. Massasoit Ins. Co., 13 Allen (Mass.) 320, which was an action against an insurance company, upon a policy of insurance and also upon an agreement to insure, it was held that evidence was competent to prove a usage that where there had been a verbal agreement for insurance, and the terms agreed upon and entered in the books of the company, the contract for insurance was considered as valid for the insured, although the premium was not paid.

1. In reference to his first rule, it either a general usage of the whole mercantile world, or a particular usage of universal notoriety in the trade upon which, and of the place at which, the insurance is effected. The usage of a particular place or a particular class of persons cannot be binding on non-residents or on other persons, unless they are shown to have been cognizant of it. Third, Where the sense of the words and expressions used in a policy is either ambiguous or obscure on the face of the instrument, or is made so by proof of extrinsic circumstances, parol evidence is admissible to explain by usage their meaning in a given case. Fourth, A resort to parol evidence, however, is only permitted where the language of the policy is either obscure or equivocal. Such evidence will never be admitted to set aside or control its plain and unambiguous terms.¹

6. Usages in Cases of Partnership.—Usages may be invoked in cases of partnership to determine the proper conduct of the business, the mutual powers of the partners, the rights of the partners as between themselves and in respect to third persons, the proper construction of the articles of partnership, and various other matters.²

is said in Arnould on Insurance, § 43 : "The principle upon which evidence of usage is received at all to explain a policy, is that the parties to it are supposed to have contracted with reference to such usage. With regard to usages, which are either common to all trades, or perfectly well known and settled in the particular course of trade to which the insurance relates, it is obviously a fair presumption that the parties to the policy, as mercantile men, are conversant with such usages and have contracted with reference to them. Such usages, in fact, form part of the law merchant, and to incorporate them with the policy is merely to admit the addition of known terms not inconsistent with the tenor of the instrument, and well understood by the contracting parties; but with regard to usages which only prevail in a given place, or amongst a particular description of persons, the presumption is the other way, and in such cases, accordingly, it must be satisfactorily shown that the party sought to be affected by the usage either had or might have had cognizance of it." The cases upon this point are as follows: Pittsburgh Ins. Co. v. Dravo, 2 W. N. C. (Pa.) 194; Fabbri v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 55 N. Y. 129; Buck v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 1 Pet. (U. S.) 151; Hazard v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 8 Pet. (U. S.) 557; Block v. Columbian Ins. Co., 42 N. Y. 393; Stan- ton v. Natchez Ins. Co., 5 How. (U. S.) 744; Murray v. Hatch, 6 Mass. 477; Gray v. Swan, 1 Har. & J. (Md.) 142; Hartshorne v. Union Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Bosw. (N. Y.) 536; 36 N. Y. 172; Union Bank v. Union Ins. Co., Dudley (S. Car.) 171; Hancox v. Fishing Ins. Co., 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 132.

1. Arnould on Insurance, § 43.

2. In Waring v. Grady, 49 Ala. 465, 20 Am. Rep. 286, it appeared that it had been the usage for many years on the Alabama river, for the proprietors of steamboats, when the ordinary freight was scarce, and therefore deemed advantageous to increase the freights of the boat, to purchase salt at Mobile to be carried up the river and sold, or exchanged for wood or expenses; and that this usage of the trade was deemed good economy, and was recognized and known to all the steamboatmen, merchants, and others, and to owners engaged in the said trade, and was considered within the scope of the business. In an action against one of the proprietors of a boat for salt furnished, the defense was that the defendant had no knowledge, and did not assent to the purchase of the salt. The question was whether the usage could influence the powers of a partner. The court said: "A partnership is created by an agreement of the parties who constitute it, and it may be entered into with reference to a custom or usage of the place where its business is to be

7. Usages Between Principal and Agent—a. USAGES IN CONTRACT OF AGENCY.—The usages of a particular place or of a particular business are impliedly incorporated into every contract of agency, unless the contrary is specially mentioned. The principal and agent are presumed to adopt such usages and to agree to govern themselves in accordance with them.¹ It is the duty of the principal to inform himself of such usages, and he transacted. If this custom is a legal one, and such as the law will enforce, it may modify the legal effect of the partnership agreement; and such a custom may be shown, in connection with the contract, to establish the intention of the parties in entering into it, for such a custom becomes a part of the contract itself, and explains its stipulations."

In Scudder v. Ames, 89 Mo. 496, it was held that a usage between partners that either one may draw out of the funds of the partnership more in any one year than the other, if long continued, may become engrafted in the written contract of partnership.

In Morris v. Allen, 14 N. J. Eq. 44, it was said that the right of a partner to receive interest on advances made by him for the benefit of the firm, in the absence of an express agreement for that purpose, rests upon the usage of trade, the usage raising an implied contract to pay interest on the principal advanced. Collyer on Partnership, § 338; *Rensselaer Glass Factory v. In Long v. Armsby Co., 43 Mo. App. 253, the court said: "A person who deals in a general market is bound to inquire into what its usages are; and those who deal with him have a right to hold him bound by them to the same extent as they would have been entitled to hold a person bound who belonged to the place. He is precluded from setting up, as against the persons he dealt with, his ignorance of that which he ought to have known. Cothran v. Ellis, 107 Ill. 413; Talcott v. Smith, 142 Mass. 542; Whitmore v. Coats, 14 Mo. 9; Walsh v. Homer, 10 Mo. 6; 45 Am. Dec. 342; Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 473; 10 Am. Rep. 407; Wallace v. Bradshaw, 6 Dana (Ky.) 382. And usage may be general, though confined to a particular city, town, village, or district. Gleason v. Walsh, 43 Me. 397; Van Ness v. Packard, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 137. In Graves v. Legg, 2 H. & N. 210, the contract required that notice of the shipment in controversy should be given by the seller to the buyer. Here the notice was given by the seller to the broker who acted for both parties. There was evidence that, according to the usage of Liverpool, if notice was given to the buyer's broker, that was equivalent to a notice to the buyer himself; and the case was the same whether there be two brokers, one for the seller and the other for the buyer, or one broker who acted for both; the custom of the Liverpool market being that in such case notice to the broker as the agent of the buyer was notice to the buyer. "The only question is whether, when a merchant residing in London, contracts with a Liverpool merchant in Liverpool, he is bound by the usage of trade at Liverpool. We think that, as he employed an agent at Liverpool to make a contract there, it must be taken to have been made with all the incidents of a contract entered into at Liverpool, and one is that notice to the buyer's agent is notice to the principal."

1. In Kraft v. Fancher, 44 Md. 204, the court said: "He who directs another to make a contract at a particular place must be taken as intending that the contract may be made according to the usage of that place; and, in this last case, it is quite immaterial that the principal himself is unacquainted with the usage or custom with reference to which his agent or factor may deal. Sutton v. Tatham, 10 Ad. & El. 27; 37 E. C. L. 25; Bayliffe v. Butterworth, 1 Exch. 425; Pollock v. Stables, 12 Q. B. 765; 64 E. C. L. 765; Graves v. Legg, 2 H. & N. 210; 1 Tayl. Ev. (8th ed.) 183, § 148. Here, the appellant, by authorizing the appellees to make the contract of shipment at Baltimore, must be taken to have contemplated the operation of all such well-established and uniform usages and customs as belonged to and governed the trade there." See also Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33; 29 Am. Rep. 349; U. S. Life Ins. Co. v. Advance Co., 80 Ill. 549; Summer v. Stewart, 69 Pa. St. 321; Hodgson v. Davies, 2 Camp. 530; Colket v. Ellis, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 375; Rapp v. Grayson, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 130.

In Dwight v. Whitney, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 179, the court said that a factor is bound to conform to the instructions of his consignor as to the price of the article to be sold, the terms, and mode of payment. But in the absence of any instructions, the consignor is presumed by law to be acquainted with and to assent to the course of dealing which is usually practised at the same market by others in the same line of business.

In Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73, the court said that a person dealing at a particular market will be taken to have dealt according to the known general custom and usage of that market, and if he employs another to act for him in buying or selling at such market, he will be held as intending that the business should be conducted according to such general usage and custom of such market; and this has been held to be the rule, whether he in fact knows of the custom or not. See also Oldershaw v. Knoles, 4 Ill. App. 63; Bailey v. Bensley, 87 Ill. 556; Doane v. Dunham, 79 Ill. 131; Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33; 29 Am. Rep. 349; Loneragan v. Stewart, 55 Ill. 44; Home Ins. Co. v. Favorite, 46 Ill. 263.

In Guesnard v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 76 Ala. 453, it is said that where a mercantile agency is to be executed at a particular place, the principal who employs the agent, is presumed to consent that he may execute it, in the absence of particular instructions, according to the general custom and usage relating to that kind of trade or business, whatever it may be. The law implies that he gives his assent for his agent to act as all other similar agents, who are honest and diligent, are accustomed to do. And it is immaterial, as a general rule, whether the principal is informed as to such customs and usages or not. To the same effect as to the principal's knowledge, is Dreshler v. Beers, 32 Ill. 368; 83 Am. Dec. 274.

2. In U. S. L. Ins. Co. v. Advance Co., 80 Ill. 549, it was held that where

b. CONDUCT OF AGENT.—The agent must in all things conduct himself in accordance with the usages of the business in which he is engaged. He is taken to be informed as to those usages, and must obey them unless otherwise ordered. Whatever is required by usage to be done by the agent, must be done by him, or he will be liable to his principal for the consequences. And when he acts in accordance with the requirements of usage, he cannot be charged by his principal with any responsibility.¹

a party contracts with a general agent of an insurance company, with knowledge of a custom prohibiting the agent from making such a contract, he cannot hold the company bound under the contract. Where an agency is exercised in respect to matters governed by known usage, it will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that the agency is to be conducted in the manner and according to the practice which is allowed and justified by such usage.

In Fraser v. Tenants, 5 Rich. (S. Car.) 375, it was said that where the instructions of the principal are silent, much of necessity must often be left to the discretion of the agent; and if, in the absence of instructions, there be a known usage of trade, or a mode of transacting business applicable to a particular agency, the agent is not only permitted, but it is his duty to conform to it.

In Leach v. Beardslee, 22 Conn. 404, it was held that a general usage affecting any branch of business, furnishes good evidence of what is regarded as right and reasonable in that respect, and when it is conformed to, negligence or misconduct cannot be imputed. Barber v. Brace, 3 Conn. 9; 8 Am. Dec. 149; Casco Mfg. Co. v. Dixon, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 407; Chitty on Cont. 20; 1 Sw. Dig. 10.

In National Furnace Co. v. Keystone Mfg. Co., 110 Ill. 427, it was said that in the case of a general agent the law permitted usage to enter in and enlarge the liability of the principal.

In Phillips v. Moir, 69 Ill. 156, it was held that the usage of a particular trade or business was properly admitted, for the purpose of interpreting powers given to an agent or factor. See also Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Ill. 33; 29 Am. Rep. 349, where the same principle is announced.

1. An agent must insure the goods of his principal in his hands, whenever the usages of trade require him to do so. Walsh v. Frank, 19 Ark. 270; Collings v. Hope, 3 Wash. (U. S.) 150; Tonge v. Kennett, 10 La. Ann. 800; Lee v. Adsit, 37 N. Y. 87; Columbus Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. (U. McDoual*, 13 Ves. 138; DeForest v. Fulton Fire Ins. Co., 1 Hall (N. Y.) 84; Kingston v. Wilson, 4 Wash. (U. S.) 310.

In Bailey v. Bensley, 87 Ill. 556, it was held that under the custom of trade in Chicago, a commission merchant, to whom grain is consigned, may dispose of the warehouse receipt given him for the same, although directed by the consignor not to sell, but to hold the grain for further orders, if he keeps on hand, ready for delivery when called on, other receipts for a like quantity and grade of grain.

In Corbett v. Underwood, 83 Ill. 324; 25 Am. Rep. 392, it was held that where a party conversant with the rules and usages of the Chicago board of trade employed a commission merchant to make purchases of grain for future delivery for him, and afterward sued the merchant for a loss incurred by the sale, which was made for want of necessary advances to meet a decline in prices, proof of the usage of the board of trade was properly admitted to justify the act of the commission merchant.

In Morningstar v. Cunningham, 110 Ind. 328; 59 Am. Rep. 211, it was held that where the only practical method of conducting a business, such as receiving and storing articles of commerce, is to render to each bailor the amount of goods stored in kind and quality, it is no conversion if the bailee, in the absence of a special contract, treats them according to the known and general usage in that regard; and evidence of such usage in the business of pork packing, and also of a usage

c. AUTHORITY OF AGENT.—In the absence of specific instructions, the authority of an agent in any particular trade is largely dependent upon the usages of such trade. Third parties are entitled to deal with the agent in the belief that he possesses all the authority that is usual for such agents to enjoy; nor can his authority, in respect to such third persons, be limited by secret directions contrary to the usages of trade and unknown to those dealing with him.¹

known to the bailor in pursuance of which certain offal was retained for compensation, is admissible in such a case.

R., 1 Exch. 320; Whitehead v. Tuckett, 15 East 408; Howard v. Sheward, L. R., 2 C. P. 148; Wiltshire v. Sims, 1 Camp. 258; Early v. Reed, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 12; Upton v. Suffolk County Mills, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 587; 59 Am. Dec. 163; Potter v. Morland, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 384; Mott v. Hall, 41 Ga. 117; Lebanon v. Heath, 47 N. H. 353; Jones v. Warner, 11 Conn. 40; Savage v. Pelton, 1 Colo. App. 148.

In Wiltshire v. Sims, 1 Camp. 258, it was held that an agent employed generally to do any act, is authorized to do it only in the usual way of business. Therefore, as stock is sold usually for ready money only, a broker employed to sell stock cannot sell it upon credit, without a special authority, although acting bona fide, and with a view to the benefit of his principal.

In Partridge v. Bailey, 20 Ill. App. 351, it was held that the usages of a particular trade may extend the scope of an agent's authority, when dealing with a person who has no knowledge of special or particular instructions. "It was therefore error to exclude the evidence offered in this case, as to the universal usage and course of business for dealers in the line of goods in question, to pay traveling men for samples sold and delivered by them, instead of paying the principal. In all cases where such usages exist and an agency is to be exercised touching such matters, the natural presumption, in the absence of all controverting proof, is, that the agency is to be conducted in the manner and according to the practices which are allowed and justified by such usages."

In White v. Fuller, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 267, it was held that when there is a custom of the trade that an agent for the sale of coal has no right, unless specially authorized, to make a time contract extending over a long period, persons dealing with an agent are bound by such custom; and a principal will not be liable upon such a time contract, made by an agent without special authority. "This custom prevailing, the plaintiffs must be presumed to have dealt with reference to it. At least, existing in the trade, they are chargeable with notice of it. As is said by Wright, J., in Easton v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 232: 'The purchaser is bound to take notice whether the agent is departing from the usage of trade. He is presumed to understand the restrictions and limitations imposed by the usage of trade upon a general agency, Story on Agency (9th ed.), §§ 224, 225; and when, in making a sale, the agent has departed therefrom, the principal may repudiate the act.' It was the duty of the plaintiffs, or incumbent upon them, to have ascertained whether or not the agents had the special power to make the sale on time, which they did make."

d. SALE ON CREDIT.—Whether an agent is authorized to sell the goods of his principal on credit or for cash only, may, in the absence of specific directions, be determined by usage. In some branches of business it is the usage to sell for cash only, and in others on credit. The propriety of the action of the agent may in either case be determined by reference to the usage prevailing in the trade.¹

In Baines v. Ewing, L. R., 1 Exch. 329; 35 L. J. Ex. 194, it was held that the presumption which would have arisen of an insurance broker's authority to underwrite generally for the defendant at Liverpool, was rebutted by the custom proved to exist at Liverpool, by which an insurance broker's authority to underwrite is always, or nearly always, limited to a certain sum. And, therefore, where the defendant's broker had taken a risk in excess of his authority, the defendant was held not liable as principal on the contract, although the plaintiff, the assured, had not been aware that the broker had exceeded his limit.

1. Sale on Credit.—In Upton v. Suffolk County Mills, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 589; 59 Am. Rep. 163, it was held that a general agent is not, by virtue of his commission, permitted to depart from the usual manner of effecting what he is employed to effect. "When one authorizes another to sell goods, he is presumed to authorize him to sell in the usual manner, and only in the usual manner, in which goods or things of that sort are sold. (Story on Agency, § 60. See also Shaw v. Stone, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 228.) The usage of the business in which a general agent is employed furnishes the rule by which his authority is measured. Hence, a general selling agent has authority to sell on credit, and to warrant the soundness of the article sold, when such is the usage. Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Camp. 555; Nelson v. Cowing, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 336."

In Goodenow v. Tyler, 7 Mass. 36; 5 Am. Dec. 22, T., a factor, having goods consigned to him by G., sold them on three months' credit, taking in payment the purchaser's promissory note to himself; but the purchaser, before the maturity of the note, became bankrupt. In an action by G. against T. for the value of the goods sold, it was held that evidence that he had acted according to the custom of the place was admissible, and would discharge him from liability. The court will take notice, as a part of the law merchant, that a factor may sell goods at a reasonable credit, at the risk of his principal, when he is not restrained by his instructions nor by the usage of the trade. A general usage in any place by which sales on commission are regulated may be given in evidence; for it is a reasonable and legal presumption that every man knows the usage of the place in which he traffics, whether by himself or his factor, and if the usage be not illegal he is bound by it. If, then, it be the well-known and uniform usage in Boston for the factor to take negotiable notes in his own name as a security for the payment for the goods of his principal, sold on credit, but in trust for his principal, such usage must bind the principal, unless he give his factor instructions repugnant to it; and such usage may be proved by a jury. See also Story on Agency (9th ed.), § 209.

In Leach v. Beardslee, 22 Conn. 404, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, a drover, certain oxen, to be driven to the city of New York, and there sold for a commission, in the usual and customary manner. The defendant, having sold the oxen, received one note, for the price both of them and of his own oxen, sold at the same time, which note he retained in his own possession. Before the maturity of the note, the makers became insolvent. It was held that, in the absence of specific instructions as to the manner of selling such oxen, the implied undertaking of the defendant was, to sell them in the customary manner; and that the custom of drovers in reference to such sale might be shown, to show the extent of the duty and obligation of the defendant; and that, if he conformed to such custom, he incurred no liability thereby.

In Deshler v. Beers, 32 Ill. 368; 83

e. POWER TO WARRANT.—Whether a selling agent has authority to warrant the goods sold by him depends, in the absence of specific directions from the principal, upon the usage of the particular trade.¹

f. EMPLOYMENT OF SUB-AGENT.—The rule that a delegated power cannot itself be delegated, does not apply to cases when, in the appointment of an agent, the recognized usage of trade permits the agent to employ sub-agents or brokers. The rule relates chiefly to powers involving discretion in the agent. Whenever the usages of business justify, an agent is authorized to employ other persons under him in order to properly perform the duties of his agency.²

Am. Dec. 274, it was held that if there be a custom or usage, of long standing, general and uniform, at the place to which property is consigned for sale, controlling the time within which payment may be made upon a cash sale, the consignor will be bound to take notice of it; and his ignorance in fact on the subject, will not effect the operation of the custom. If the sale by the consignee, although made for cash on delivery, did not exclude the operation of a usage of the character mentioned, under which a purchaser for cash had from one to three days in which to make payment, the purchaser being in good credit, the consignee would not be liable to the consignor, in the event of loss resulting from a failure to require payment from the purchaser immediately on delivery. Other cases to the same effect are Dwight v. Whitney, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 179.

1. Power to Warrant.—In McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Snell, 23 Ill. App. 79, it was held that an agent to sell has authority to do all that is necessary and usual in the course of the business of selling, and if it is usual in the trade for the seller to warrant, the agent has authority to warrant. See AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 358.

In Pickert v. Marston, 68 Wis. 465; 60 Am. Rep. 877, the court said that an agent employed to sell has no implied power to warrant, unless the sale is one which is usually attended with warranty. But if, in the sale of the goods confided to him, it is usual in the market to give a warranty, the agent may give that warranty in order to effect a sale.

In Howard v. Sheward, L. R., 2 C. P. 148, it was held that the agent or servant of a horse-dealer has an implied authority to bind his principal or master by a warranty, even though, unknown to the buyer, he has express orders not to warrant. And that evidence of a general practice (not amounting to a technical usage) amongst horse-dealers not to warrant where the horse has been examined by a veterinary surgeon and certified by him to be sound, is not admissible to rebut the inference of authority to warrant.

2. Employment of Sub-Agent.—In Darling v. Stanwood, 14 Allen (Mass.) 504, it was held that if a commission merchant is employed in Massachusetts to buy goods in a distant market, and the custom of that market is for commission merchants to employ brokers to make such purchases, and this custom is understood by the principal, the commission merchant may properly employ a broker of experience and good reputation to make the purchases; and if he does so he will not be liable for such broker's errors or misconduct. When the defendant employed the plaintiff to buy cotton on his account in the New Orleans market, and to ship it to Boston, he was presumed to have contemplated that the purchases would be made in the ordinary course of such business at that port. The employment of a broker to effect the purchases was therefore a justifiable delegation of authority to a sub-agent, because this manner of transacting business was the usual and known custom of the New Orleans market.

In Carter v. Philadelphia Coal Co., 77 Pa. St. 286, a coal company, indebted to the defendants, engaged them to sell their coal; the defendants employed brokers to sell for them; in settlement with the company, they charged commissions paid the brokers; in a suit by

g. OBEEDIENCE TO PRINCIPAL'S DIRECTIONS.—No usage can authorize an agent to disobey the instructions of his principal. The directions of the principal form the rule of action for the agent, and the consequences of a disobedience must fall upon the latter, although his acts may have been in line with usage. When the principal's instructions and the usage of the trade conflict, the agent must obey the former and disregard the latter.¹

the company to recover back the commissions, the court held that evidence was proper that it was usual and customary in the Philadelphia coal trade, where the business was transacted, to sell through the agency of brokers'. "It is not necessary to prove all the elements of a custom to make a law; the object here is to interpret a contract. The usages of a particular trade or business are presumed to be known to those engaged therein. They furnish a most valuable aid in arriving at the mutual assent of the parties."

In Guesnard v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 76 Ala. 453, it was shown to have been the custom of importers in New Orleans, to employ brokers to attend to the receipts of imported goods, and look after the payment of custom duties on them. The court therefore held that an agent was justified, in view of this custom, in employing such a broker, and in paying him the usual and reasonable fee for his services in this particular.

In Titus v. Cairo, etc., R. Co., 46 N. J. L. 393, it was held that, except where a known usage of trade justifies, or necessity requires, the employment of sub-agents, an agent whose powers and duties involve personal trust and confidence and the exercise of judgment and discretion, cannot, without authority from his principal, delegate to another the confidence and discretion reposed in him.

Other cases recognizing the power of usage in such matters are Johnson v. Cunningham, 1 Ala. 249; Darling v. Stanwood, 14 Allen (Mass.) 504; Gray v. Murray, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 167; Moon v. Guardians of the Poor, 3 Bing. N. Cas. 814; 32 E. C. L. 336.

1. Obedience to Directions of Principal.—In Hatcher v. Comer, 73 Ga. 418, it was said that a factor may exercise his discretion according to the general usages of the trade, but the primary obligation of an agent or factor, whose authority is limited by instructions, is to adhere faithfully to those instructions. "The defendants in error contend that, by the custom of merchants which obtains in Savannah, as they had advanced plaintiffs in error on the cotton, they were not bound to obey the instructions of the plaintiffs in error, but might hold this cotton and sell in their discretion." But the court rejected this view.

In Clark v. Cumming, 77 Ga. 64, it was held that the agent's power is limited by and ceases with his instructions; and this is true, even though it had been usual, in the course of dealings between the broker and his principal, for the broker to continue to sell at the prices last quoted by the principal.

In Wootiers v. Kaufman, 73 Tex. 395, the plaintiff shipped cotton to factors, directing them to sell only in the home market. It appeared that some factors in time of financial depression sometimes exported cotton, when satisfactory prices could not be had at home. The court held that this practice could not excuse the violation of instructions by the agent. "That some factors shipped to a foreign port under these circumstances could not make a transaction valid which otherwise was contrary to law. It was in direct violation of the contract shown by the evidence, of the express directions given by the plaintiff to his factors to sell the cotton in Galveston, and not ship the same abroad."

In Hall v. Storrs, 7 Wis. 253, it was held that where a factor receives wheat with instructions to be sold for cash, and he sells it on credit, he is liable for all losses that may accrue to his principal. "A sale of property for cash, means that the money shall be paid down when the title to the property passes, and a sale and delivery for a bank check payable the next day after the sale, is not a sale for cash. A custom of trade or business that can vary or modify the language of express instructions of an agent or factor from his principal, must be established by the most certain, clear, and satisfactory proof. Such a custom must be ancient, uniform, notorious, and reasonable. We are aware that cases can be found which go to establish the doctrine that when a factor has received goods with direction to sell for cash, but which he does not sell for cash, but on short time, according to the usage and custom of the market, it has been held that such a sale was in compliance with the orders of the principal. We doubt exceedingly the soundness and correctness of the rule."

In Parsons v. Martin, 11 Gray (Mass.) 112, it was held that a broker, having written instructions from his principal to sell under certain circumstances, cannot transfer the shares for a different purpose, although there may be a custom for brokers to do so. "As an agent acting under a written authority contained in the letter addressed to him on the subject, the defendant was bound to regard the instructions given him in every particular. No usage or custom, such as that which he attempted to show was recognized by and prevalent among the brokers in Boston, could affect the legal rights of the parties; nor, if fully proved, would the law sustain or tolerate it. Proof of usage is admissible to interpret the meaning of the language of the contract, or, where its meaning is equivocal and obscure, to ascertain its nature and extent, but not to vary its terms, or introduce new conditions, or authorize the doing of acts which are in direct contravention of its provision."

In Steward v. Scudder, 24 N. J. L. 96, it was held that when a grain factor is directed to sell for cash, evidence may be given of a custom, on sales for cash, to allow the purchaser to receive the grain, and to call for the money in three or four days after delivery; "but unless the evidence is that such custom is uniform, well-established, and at the risk of the principal, it will not establish the usage so as to protect the factor. In the case of Clark v. Van Northwick, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 343, the same usage which was set up in this case was established and sanctioned by the court. In the case of Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252; 30 Am. Dec. 467, the supreme court of Vermont held the same usage to be unreasonable and illegal. The usage spoken of is rather a matter of courtesy than a rule of law, and there is nothing in it to prohibit a demand of the money on the delivery of the goods, or the commencement of a suit for the purchase-money immediately on the refusal to pay."

In Wanless v. McCandless, 38 Iowa 20, it was held that where an agent for the sale of land was instructed to sell for "one-third cash," a contract made by him to sell without a strict compliance with that condition could not be enforced against his principal. Proof that the custom of a county did not require purchasers of land to pay cash, though the terms of sale were for cash payment, will not sustain a contract of sale made by an agent who had violated an instrument to sell for "one-third cash."

In Ireland v. Livingston, L. R., 5 H. L. 395, it was said that in the Mauritius market it is often impossible to obtain so large a quantity of sugar as five hundred tons from one house, or to find one vessel to take it. Quære, whether an order to commission merchants there, to purchase such a cargo must be construed with reference to the customs of that market?

In Porter v. Patterson, 15 Pa. St. 230, an action was brought to recover damages for breach of orders, on the sale of an invoice of molasses consigned by the plaintiff to the defendant. It appeared that the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, inclosing the invoice and bill of lading of the goods, and said: "On the arrival of this cargo, unless a fair profit can be realized on landing, please put it into a good store, with the hope of sending a further cargo." The defendants sold the goods at a loss, and on the trial the court rejected evidence of a custom of the port, which the defendants offered, justifying their action under the circumstances. "If a usage be certain, uniform, ancient, and reasonable, it incorporates itself into the contract. But as this is a suit for a breach of an order, plain, positive, and free from ambiguity, I cannot understand what the usage of those cities has to do with the matter in controversy. If the plaintiff failed to prove a breach of orders, there was an end of his case. If he succeeded in proving instructions binding on the defendants, and the breach of them, it admits not of control by reason of any custom whatever. The agreement of the parties constitutes the law of the contract."

In Barksdale v. Brown, 1 Nott & M. (S. Car.) 519; 9 Am. Dec. 720, which was an action against the defendants

h. REMITTANCES TO PRINCIPAL.—The established usages of business in relation to the collection of negotiable paper, or the remittance of funds, will be the guide for the conduct of the agent in such matters; and no negligence can be imputed to him if he follows such usage.¹

to recover the proceeds of certain rice consigned to them, as factors, for sale, it appeared that the plaintiff's instructions to the defendants were to sell for cash; but that they sold and delivered the rice to another party without his paying for it, and that he afterward absconded. The defendants set up a usage which had existed among factors in the place of the sale for forty years, where they sold for cash, to give indulgence of a week or a fortnight before calling for the money. The judges were of the opinion that it could not on any account excuse the departure from the instructions given. "That usage does, in many instances, constitute the law, and that contracts must be construed with reference to the usages of the trade or business to which they relate, are principles too well established to be questioned now. Numerous examples are to be found among the cases arising on policies of insurance; and perhaps no stronger case can be found than that of three days' grace allowed in cases of bills of exchange. But, to entitle a usage to that high respect, it must be a reasonable one. It must be for the benefit of trade generally, and not for the convenience and benefit of a particular class of individuals. And I can conceive of no usage that will authorize a departure from positive instructions. The instructions of a principal to his agent make the law by which he is to be governed, and to authorize him to depart from them would be depriving the parties of the privilege of making their own terms."

For other cases upon this subject see Strong v. Bliss, 6 Met. (Mass.) 393; Bliss v. Arnold, 8 Vt. 252; 30 Am. Dec. 467; Catlin v. Smith, 24 Vt. 85; Leland v. Douglass, 1 Wend. (N. Y.) 490; Clark v. Van Northwick, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 343; Hutchings v. Ladd, 16 Mich. 493; Day v. Holmes, 103 Mass. 306.

1. Remittances to Principal.—In Jackson v. Union Bank, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 146, it was held that an agent was not answerable for negligence or inattention, where a bill of exchange was placed in his hands for collection, and he undertook to collect it, according to the usages and customs of merchants and banks, by sending it to a bank for collection, and owing to the bill having been demanded and protested for non-payment on the fourth day after it fell due, the indorser was discharged, and the amount of the bill thereby lost.

In Potter v. Morland, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 384, it was held that goods being consigned to an agent for sale, with general instructions to remit the proceeds, it is a sufficient compliance with such instructions, if the agent remit by a bill of exchange, without indorsing or guaranteeing it; provided such is the usage at the agent's place of business and the agent use proper diligence and discretion in the purchase of the bill. In an action against the agent, to recover the proceeds of such sale, proof of the usage and of a remittance accordingly is a sufficient prima facie defense; and if it is established by the agent, the burden of proof is then on the principal to show that bills remitted in pursuance of the usage ought to be indorsed or guaranteed by the agent.

In Chandler v. Hogle, 58 Ill. 46, it was held that where parties in Illinois shipped a carload of hogs to a commission merchant at Buffalo, New York, with instructions to sell and remit proceeds to them, the bailee having sold the hogs, and with the proceeds thereof purchased a draft from a banker of Buffalo on a house in New York City, in favor of the shippers, and remitted it to them on the day of sale, but when presented it was protested; it was held, that as it was the custom of commission merchants at Buffalo to remit to their correspondents in that manner, and as the banker of whom the draft was purchased was in good credit when it was obtained, the commission merchant acted with due diligence and was not liable for the loss.

In Haven v. Wentworth, 2 N. H. 93, it was said that the invariable usage of an agent in respect to the funds with

i. THE AGENT'S COMPENSATION.—In the absence of an express contract, the proper compensation of an agent may be determined by general usage in the particular trade; and when a course of dealing has grown up between a principal and agent in respect to the latter's compensation, it will be binding in controversies between them.¹

8. Usages of the Stock Exchange.—The usages of stock exchanges are numerous and technical. The general rule to be extracted from the cases is, that as between members of a stock exchange every usage of the exchange is adopted as a part of their contracts; and this whether the usage is reasonable or the reverse, according to law or contrary to law. The members have the right to make their contracts as they please and to insert in their contracts any unreasonable or peculiar provisions they desire; and it would be to abridge that freedom of contract which all men enjoy, to hold that any usage which members of the exchange incorporate into their contracts can be forcibly excluded by the courts.²

which he is intrusted binds his employers, if that usage is known and recognized by them. And see generally AGENCY, vol. 1, p. 397; BROKERS, vol. 2, p. 578.

1. Compensation of Agent.—In Baring v. Stanton, 3 Ch. Div. 502, a shipowner had for several years had an account with merchants who effected for him insurances on his ships. In their accounts they charged him with the full premiums, but they had been allowed by the underwriters, and retained out of the premiums, five per cent. brokerage and a further ten per cent. discount for ready money, as usual on insurances. On taking the accounts in a suit respecting a mortgage on some ships, the shipowner objected to allowing the merchants to retain the ten per cent. It was held that as these allowances were usual, and as the shipowner had never inquired on what terms the merchants effected the insurances, and appeared to have accepted their terms, he could not now raise the objection.

The similar case of Great Western Ins. R. Co. v. Cunliffe, L. R., 9 Ch. 525, appeared to the court to govern the above case. In that case Lord Justice Mellish observed: "It is quite obvious that they must have known, and they do not deny that they did know, that the agents were to be remunerated by receiving a certain allowance or discount from the underwriters with whom they made the bargains. It was easy to ascertain by inquiry what was the usual and ordinary charge which agents who effect reinsurances are entitled to make. If a person employs another, whom he knows carries on a large business, to do certain work for him as his agent with other persons, and does not choose to ask him what his charge will be, and in fact knows that he is to be remunerated, not by him, but by the other persons—which is very common in mercantile business—and does not choose to take the trouble of inquiring what the amount is, he must allow the ordinary amount which agents are in the habit of charging."

But in respect to the effect of the usages of the stock exchange upon outside parties, the rule is different. Third persons who are ignorant of such usages, and who make contracts through members of a stock exchange, are only bound by the reasonable and legal usages of the exchange. Any unreasonable or illegal usage is of no validity, as against them, unless they had knowledge and assented to it.¹

stock exchange was, that in transactions between members of it there is an implied understanding that, on the purchase of stock or shares, the buying jobber shall be at liberty by a given day, called the "name day," to substitute another person as buyer, and so relieve himself from further liability on the contract, provided such substituted person be one to whom the original seller cannot reasonably expect, and that such person accept a transfer of the stock or shares, and pay to the original seller the price. It was held, reversing the judgment of the court of common pleas, that this was a reasonable usage; as a usage founded on the general convenience of all persons engaged in a particular department of business, cannot, as regards such persons, be said to be unreasonable.

In Colket v. Ellis, 10 Phila. (Pa.) 375, it was held that a custom among brokers to sell stocks deposited as collateral security for a call loan, at the board, on failure of the borrower to pay on the day on which demand is made, is not illegal as to parties familiar with, and dealing on the basis of, such custom. "It was strenuously argued by plaintiff's counsel that this was not a valid usage, as it was in contravention of the rule of law which requires a sale of collaterals to be public, and to be made after due notice. Without intimating what would be the effect if such a usage as the present were set up against an outside party, I am of opinion that, as between plaintiffs and defendants, both members of the board of brokers, familiar with, and dealing on the basis of it, it is a valid and lawful custom and controls the rights of these parties."

1. In Hamilton v. Young, L. R., 7 Ir. 289, an alleged usage of the stock exchange, relied upon as authorizing stock brokers who are entitled to sell stock or shares of a customer, for the realization and payment of money due to them by such customer, to take over to themselves, at the price of the day, stock or shares of the customer, for which there is an inadequate demand, where a forced sale would lower the selling price, was held unreasonable, and incapable of being supported against a customer who was not proved to be acquainted with the existence of such alleged usage. "I have shown that this court has refused to recognize the validity of sales by persons, in a fiduciary position, to themselves, and that it makes no difference that in particular instances no injury has been sustained, or wrong done. The conflict between duty and interest is sufficient to invalidate such transactions."

In Maxted v. Paine, L. R., 4 Exch. 210, Cleasby, B., said: "I do not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion that the plaintiff would be bound by any usage which a court of law would consider unreasonable. I think, on the contrary, that he would not, unless he had actual notice when he authorized the contract to be made of the particular usage. A man may, of course, if he thinks proper, make a contract with any stipulations in it which are not unlawful, as, for instance, that he will not enforce it without the authority of some particular officer or committee; but such a usage on the stock exchange would not, I think, bind a person having no connection with the stock exchange, and no actual knowledge of its usages, simply because he employed a stock-broker to contract for him, even though it was within the authority of the broker to make the contract on the stock exchange."

In Davis v. Howard, 24 Q. B. Div. 691, the court said: "At first sight, no doubt it appears unreasonable that it should be within the province of a stock-broker to close all the transactions of his principal, because two days after the broker has made contracts on the principal's behalf on the stock exchange, the principal fails to supply the broker with, it may be, a very small balance

9. Usages Between Vendor and Purchaser.—In the relation of vendor and purchaser, the usages of importance include those to determine the mode of measurement of the quantity of goods, as by measuring one barrel in ten;¹ or similarly to ascertain the due on the previous account; but, on closer examination, and having regard to the peculiar nature of the business which a stock-broker does for his principal, I can see nothing unreasonable in this usage. It is admittedly reasonable where the principal is insolvent, or, if not actually insolvent, is in circumstances which give good reason for thinking that it may be difficult for him to meet his engagements. Its root and foundation is the peculiar position of the broker, who has to pay all his principal's differences out of his own pocket before three o'clock on pay-day, and who, if he does not do this by eleven o'clock on the following morning, is liable to be declared a defaulter on the stock exchange. In such circumstances it is, in my opinion, very reasonable that the broker should have this right to protect himself."

In Neilson v. James, 9 Q. B. Div. 546, the court said: "It is said that the contract was void because it did not set forth the name of the person in whose name the shares were registered, as required by 30 and 31 Vict., ch. 29, and that it is the custom of the Bristol stock exchange to disregard the provision of that act. If that be the practice on that exchange, the sooner it is altered the better; but, in my opinion, the plaintiff is not bound by such a custom, as it is neither reasonable nor legal."

In Perry v. Barnett, 15 Q. B. Div. 388, the court said: "The proposition that a person who directs another to deal upon a particular market is to be treated as if he knew the rules of that market, has been adopted in the law to some extent, but certainly not to this extent, that however unreasonable or illegal they may be, he is still to be treated as if he knew them. There is a line of demarcation between rules by which such person is bound and rules by which he is not bound, and the rules of the stock exchange applicable upon this occasion would seem to come within the latter of these. If the custom is unreasonable, the courts have said they will not recognize it as binding on people who do not know it and who have not consented to act upon it.

It seems to me that the rule of the London stock exchange by which every contract made there, whatever its terms, must be fulfilled by its members, unless there has been fraud, is, as a custom, unreasonable and one which cannot be supported. Such a usage, when applied, not to brokers, but to strangers who are ignorant of it, is inconsistent with the contract of employment. To bind outsiders by it would be unreasonable; and it is as regards such outsiders and such outsiders only, that such a usage can be called unreasonable, for it would not be unreasonable as regards those who know of it and desire to be bound by it. On this point I think we are bound by the decision in Neilson v. James, 9 Q. B. Div. 546. So, also, the language of the present master of the rolls and of Lord Chelmsford in Robinson v. Mollett, L. R., 7 H. L. 836, is identical as to this, viz.: if a person employs a broker to buy or sell on a market of the usage of which such person is ignorant, he authorizes him to make contracts upon the footing of such usages as are reasonable and as do not alter the character of such contracts. To go further would be inconsistent with the hypothesis that the agent is employed to make a valid contract." See generally STOCK EXCHANGE, vol. 23, p. 748.

1. Usages Between Buyer and Seller.—In Dalton v. Daniels, 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 472, a usage was alleged in the liquor trade, in the sale of liquor, to measure but one barrel in ten. The action was to recover for a deficiency in quantity upon a sale; and the deficiency was shown by a measurement, made in this manner. The court sustained a judgment for the plaintiff, holding the usage to be a reasonable one, and said that the usage "related simply to the mode of ascertaining a fact upon which a rule of law might be declared. The contract between the parties, enlarged or fully expressed by reference to the custom mentioned, would be: 'I sell you a number of barrels of liquor, which I say contain a certain number of gallons, stated on this bill; but the exact quantity may be weight of articles by a known method of estimating it.¹ Upon a sale of goods, usage may be introduced to show when the delivery is unconditional,² and, if the goods are in store and are sold ascertained by measuring ten out of every one hundred of the barrels, or in like proportion for any number, and making a general estimate founded upon such measurement.' This mode of ascertaining the quantity is reasonable and convenient. It is equally open to both parties, and must result often in a saving of labor, time and expense. It does not contravene any policy or principle of the law, and is, in fact, an agreement that as to quantity both seller and buyer may, by a system of average, determine the number of gallons contained in a number of barrels, without gaging or measuring each one. As a commercial usage it seems to be one of great utility, as, so far as the evidence given in this case illustrates its operation, it subserves the ends of justice, inasmuch as no testimony was offered by the defendant to controvert the result of the examination by the plaintiff's witnesses."

1. In Conner v. Robinson, 2 Hill (S. Car.) 354. A purchased of B a number of bales of cotton, at a certain price per pound. Several months prior to the sale the cotton had been weighed by the wharfinger, and marked on the bags and in the books at 63,043 pounds. When the cotton was delivered it was re-weighed by A, and found to amount to only 61,205 pounds. A thereupon paid B for the cotton as of the latter weight, but refused to pay for more than he had actually received. In a suit by B against A for the difference, it was provided that, according to the custom of the trade, cotton was weighed by the wharfinger before it was put in store, and the weight marked on the bags and entered in books kept for that purpose, and that where a sale was made without any stipulation to the contrary, it was understood as being made upon the basis of the weights thus ascertained. It was held that A was bound by the custom, and that B was entitled to recover. "We must suppose that the defendant knew at the time he made the contract that cotton, when put in store, would generally lose in weight, depending for the quantum of the loss upon the part of the house in which it was stored, the season of the year in which it was picked and packed, and the time that it was in store; and that the general usage was to sell by the weight ascertained when it was stored, and from these data, which he might ascertain, he would be able to form a pretty correct estimate of the amount of the loss in weight. This would necessarily enter into the estimate of his offer to purchase. . . . This mode of ascertaining the quantity of an article of commerce is not peculiar to cotton. Flour, for instance, is habitually sold by the barrel, without stipulating that it shall contain a given number of pounds, and yet everyone understands that it must contain one hundred and ninety-six pounds, because it is the usage to put that quantity in each barrel. The quantity of cloth, or other goods sold by the piece or package, is generally, nay—almost universally—ascertained by the quantity stamped upon them, and it rarely occurs that the precise quantity is marked; and it never yet occurred to any one that if there should happen to be a fraction over, that the buyer should pay for it, or if a fraction under, the seller should make it good. And so of very many other articles which might be enumerated."

2. In Haggerty v. Palmer, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 437, goods were sold at auction in the city of New York, to be paid for in approved indorsed notes at four and six months; it was the usage in that city, where goods were so sold, to deliver them to the buyer when called for, and for the vendors afterward to send for the notes. The vendee, after he had received the goods, before he was called on for the notes, according to the terms of the sale, stopped payment, and assigned over the goods, with other property, in trust, to pay certain favored creditors. In considering the question whether the usage could determine the question of passing of title vel non, Kent, Ch., said: "In a case like the present, when the purchaser knew of the usage, and that the delivery of the goods before the delivery of the notes was a deposit in trust, and well understood to be upon condition of a delivery of the notes, it would be very productive of fraud, to give the same force and by transfer tickets, or warehouse receipts, usage is received to determine when the title passes to the purchaser.¹ And so the proper manner of remitting money to a vendor,² or goods to a purchaser, may be shown by a usage of the trade.³

effect to a voluntary assignment, made for partial purposes, and to the exclusion of the real owner." The usage was allowed.

In Furniss v. Hone, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 247, it was questioned whether a delivery of goods under a usage or custom in the city of New York, where goods are sold at auction, to be paid for in approved indorsed notes, to deliver the goods to the buyer when called for, and afterward to send for the notes, is an absolute delivery so as to pass the title, or only a conditional delivery.

1. In Merchants' Banking Co. v. Phoenix Bessimer Steel Co., 5 Ch. Div. 205; 46 L. J. Ch. 418, a custom was upheld whereby in the iron trade, where warrants were given, stating on the face of them that they were deliverable to the purchasers or their assigns, by indorsement thereon, it was understood that they were to be free from any vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money; that they passed from hand to hand by indorsement, and conveyed to the holder a title to the goods represented by them.

In Newhall v. Langdon, 39 Ohio St. 87; 48 Am. Rep. 426, it appeared that it was the usage of the business with reference to which the parties contracted, that flour so received by rail and stored, was not removed by the consignee to his possession, but remained in the custody of the railroad company until sold, and that the owner sold in lots to such purchasers, and gave to each purchaser an order on the company for the amount purchased, and upon presentation of such an order the agent would point out the lot from which the order was to be filled, and the purchaser would remove and receipt for the amount taken. Nothing remained to be done by the seller in contemplation of the parties to complete the sale. Upon these facts it was held that, by such usage, the flour called for by the order, after its acceptance by the railroad company, was the property of the purchaser, and he was liable to the seller for the price, though part of it was destroyed before being removed to his actual possession.

In Stanton v. Small, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 230, it was held that where, in an action upon a contract for the sale and purchase of flour, brought by the vendor against the purchaser, it is proved that it is the usage for flour, in a storehouse or vessel, to be sold by accepted delivery orders, and to pass by the transfer of the orders from hand to hand, without actual delivery of the flour, such usage will be held to have entered into the contemplation of the parties, and to have constituted a part of the contract.

In Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. (Va.) 473; 18 Am. Dec. 726, the custom found was, that flour in store is sold by order, and passes by the transfer of the order, from hand to hand, without actual delivery of the flour to any, and the custom was sustained by the court.

2. In Warwicke v. Noakes, Peake's Ad. Cas. N. P. 67, it was held that if a debtor is directed by his creditor to remit money by the post, and it is lost, the creditor must bear the loss. Lord Kenyon said: "Had no directions been given about the mode of remittance, still this being done in the usual way of transacting business of this nature, I should have held the defendant clearly discharged from the money he had received as agent."

In Morton v. Morris, 31 Ga. 378, it was held that for a debtor to protect himself against loss, by remitting money to his creditor by mail, he must show either the express authority of the creditor to send in that mode, or a usage to that effect in business, from which the creditor's authority may be inferred.

3. In Putnam v. Tillotson, 13 Met. (Mass.) 517, which was an action for shoes sold and delivered, brought by a manufacturer in Massachusetts against a distant purchaser, evidence was held admissible to show that where shoes are ordered, it is the usage and course of the shoe business, when no special mode of conveyance is mentioned by the purchaser, for the manufacturer to take the shoes to Boston, at his own risk and cost, there to deliver them to some regular line of packets running to the

XIII. MISCELLANEOUS POINTS—1. Usage as Determining Negligence.—As a general rule it may be said, that whenever the law condemns an act as negligent, evidence of a usage to do such act is not admissible to show that the act was not negligent.¹ Thus, when an employee of a railroad commits an act of contributory negligence, it is no excuse to say that he acted in accordance with purchaser's place of business, to take duplicate bills of lading, and forward one of them to the purchaser by mail, and that from that time the delivery is complete, and the purchaser takes the risk of loss.

In Seavy v. Dearborn, 19 N. H. 351, it was said that if one who has purchased a stock of goods in a shop occupied by the vendor, permit the sign of the vendor to remain over the door, that fact is evidence that the vendor remained in possession after the sale, and is so far evidence of fraud; but it is one which admits of explanation, and evidence that there was a custom or usage to permit signs to remain after such sales, is admissible.

1. In Bailey v. New Haven, etc., R. Co., 107 Mass. 496, which was an action against a railroad corporation for running a train over the plaintiff at a crossing where there was a single track and no flagman, a witness, called as an expert by the defendants, was asked what was the custom of railroads in maintaining a flagman at crossings similar to the one in question, or at crossings where there was one track. The court refused to allow the question. "The thing sought to be proved by these witnesses called expert was not properly a custom by which parties dealing together are bound, and which, when proved, tends to establish their rights as against each other. It was rather a practice of railroad companies as to using or omitting a certain precautionary measure at certain crossings. But the need of a flagman depends much upon the situation and circumstances of each particular crossing." See NEGLIGENCE, vol. 16, p. 462.

In Henry v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 66 Iowa 52, the court held that the railroad rules and usages are mere evidence bearing upon the question of negligence of the defendant or its employees, and the care and diligence of the plaintiff. "And here we may say that the law as to custom, in its legal sense, has nothing to do with such questions as whether, when cars are left upon a side-track, they should be coupled together.

It is not a question of custom; it is merely a question as to how or in what manner a given act should be done, or what is proper to be done in accomplishing it."

In Magee v. Troy, 48 Hun (N. Y.) 383, which was an action for damages for injuries caused by the negligent placing of lumber in a street, whereby the plaintiff was thrown from his carriage and injured, an objection was made by the plaintiff to a question asked by the defendant of the carpenter, who was erecting the building, whether the building materials deposited in the street were not placed as they usually are in such cases. It was held that the trial court properly sustained the objection, for the reasons that if the question was allowed, the defendant might be permitted to substitute a bad custom for the performance of its duty.

In Wright v. Boller, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 77, which was an action for damages for an injury caused by a piece of lumber being blown from a pile of lumber, and striking the plaintiff on the head, the defense was that the lumber was piled in the customary manner. But the court said: "Evidence of a custom, as to the manner in which other persons conduct their business, is not admissible in favor of a defendant sued for negligently conducting his business. The right of the plaintiff to recover depends upon a rule of law, that is, whether the defendants were guilty of negligence that contributed to or caused the injury in question, and whether the plaintiff was free from negligence contributing thereto."

So in Earl v. Crouch (Supreme Ct.), 16 N. Y. Supp. 770, it was held that a person who piles lumber near a sidewalk in such a manner that a child's attempting to climb on it will cause it to fall, is guilty of such negligence as will render him liable for injuries caused to a child thereby, and that, in an action for such negligence, evidence that other lumber dealers were accustomed to pile lumber in the same manner was incompetent.

the usage of his fellow employees.¹ And so, also, when a railroad is in law negligent in respect to the transportation or care of

In Reilly v. Rand, 123 Mass. 215, which was an action for the use of a derrick, upon evidence being put in by the defendant that a block and chain on the derrick broke in using it, the plaintiff may, to rebut the charge of negligence, put in evidence that it is a usual thing for blocks and chains on any derrick to break when in use.

In Merchants', etc., Transp. Co. v. Story, 50 Md. 5, where a number of boxes of books and other property were stowed by a warehouseman on a wharf in close proximity to the water, and by reason of a sudden storm that portion of the wharf was submerged and the goods were injured, it was held that evidence that it was defendant's custom to store goods on the wharf was properly excluded, as such a usage could not free him from responsibility.

In Hibler v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501, a lot of cotton was ignited by a torchlight on the boat on which it was being carried. "The result would not be changed by the existence of a custom to carry torches at night. A custom which would authorize a carrier to carry a torch in such a manner as to endanger the cargo would be violative of law and good faith, and could not receive judicial sanction. If a boat cannot be run at night without the aid of torches, carried in such a manner as to endanger the cotton or freight, to stop is the plain duty of the carrier. Custom cannot relieve from the obligation to bestow, even in guarding against the excepted danger from fire, reasonable care and diligence in taking care of the freight."

In Champaign v. Patterson, 50 Ill. 61, where an injury was caused to the plaintiff resulting from a defective crossing, the court rejected evidence that other cities of a similar character constructed their crossings, on the ground that the condition of like structures in other towns and cities is no criterion for the defendant. If other towns and cities choose to suffer such public necessities to be in an unsafe and dangerous condition, their negligence is no excuse or justification for the defendant. The city authorities of Champaign are to do their whole duty in the premises as prescribed by law, with no reference as to what may be done or left undone by the authorities of other cities. See also Lichtenhein v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 11 Cush. (Mass.) 70; Loveland v. Burke, 120 Mass. 140; 21 Am. Rep. 507; Caswell v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 98 Mass. 194; 93 Am. 1. In Kroy v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 32 Iowa 357, a brakeman was killed while uncoupling cars when in motion. The train men, of whom he was one, had established a custom of uncoupling the train while in motion, at this particular station where he was killed, for their own convenience. The court held that no recovery could be had for injuries received while performing such a duty, because the deceased must be regarded as having assumed the risk incident to such a customary, although hazardous, employment. "If," said Day, C. J., "the deceased had not himself contributed to the establishing of the custom, and remained in defendant's employ with knowledge of its existence, without complaint or protest, and voluntarily taken upon himself the particular act which occasioned his death, our conclusion would be different."

In Sprong v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 60 Barb. (N. Y.) 30, where a brakeman was killed while riding on the locomotive, and the rules of the company prohibited brakemen from leaving their posts while the train was in motion, but the evidence showed that it was customary on the road for brakemen to ride on the engine, and it did not appear that the deceased was aware of the company's rules, it was held that his non-observance of them was not a violation of duty.

In O'Neill v. Keokuk, etc., R. Co., 45 Iowa 546, it was held that evidence showing that the employees of a railroad company were accustomed to act in violation of a rule of the company is not admissible to establish a waiver of the rule, unless it be shown that a knowledge of the custom was known to the officer charged with the enforcement of the rule. It could not be so regarded by reason simply of a custom, on the part of those for whom it was made, to violate it.

In Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Graham, property, it cannot defend its act by proof that other railroads conduct their business in the same manner.¹

94 Ala. 545, it was held that a rule of a railroad company forbidding employees from going between cars in motion to uncouple them is reasonable and wholesome. "Since this rule is clear and explicit, evidence that for many years it had been the custom of brakemen to go between cars in motion to make uncouplings was inadmissible to show that the rule, not having been insisted on, was not binding on deceased. Evidence of usage and custom of its violation by those it was intended to protect, either to exempt them from its obligations or to subject the company to damage because of its repeated violation, is inadmissible."

In Southern Kansas R. Co. v. Robins, 43 Kan. 145, it was held that evidence of the practice and usage of others in climbing the ladder of a box car when a train is in motion, such as deceased fell from, is not admissible to prove due care on his part at the time of the accident. See Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Clark, 108 Ill. 113; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Moranda, 108 Ill. 576; Lawrence v. Hudson, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 671; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Evanisch, 61 Tex. 3; Bailey v. In Glass v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 94 Ala. 581, which was an action against a railroad company for killing a person while walking on its tracks, evidence of a custom by neighboring people to walk on the track without objection by the company was held irrelevant and inadmissible. The court referred to Central Railroad v. Brinson, 70 Ga. 207; 19 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 42, and notes; Hoppe v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 61 Wis. 357; 19 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 74, and notes; Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. Womack, 84 Ala. 149; Mason v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 6 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 1.

In Mayfield v. Savannah, etc., R. Co., 87 Ga. 374, it was said that a custom or usage, obviously dangerous, is not admissible to excuse contributory negligence by the plaintiff, more especially where it did not appear that such custom or usage had been adopted by the defendant railroad company, or that it prevailed at the place or on the particular railway concerned.

In Warden v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 94 Ala. 277, which was an action against a railroad company by an employee, the court held that there was no error in rejecting evidence that it was the custom of the plaintiff and other head brakemen on that train to ride on the pilot. "Custom and usage may be relied upon to excuse the violation of a rule when the act involved is not negligent in itself, but only by relation to the rule violated; and so, when an act may be done in two or more ways, a resort to neither of which involves such obvious peril as raises the legal presumption or conclusion of negligence in the doing of it, a custom or usage to do it in a particular way may be looked to as tending to show that it was not negligence to resort to that method in the instance under consideration. But custom can in no case impart the qualities of due care and prudence to an act which involves obvious peril, which is voluntarily and unnecessarily done, and which the law itself declares to be negligent. Glover v. Scotten, 82 Mich. 369; Hickey v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 14 Allen (Mass.) 429; Judkins v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 80 Me. 417; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Clarke, 108 Ill. 113; Humphreys v. Newport News, etc., Co., 33 W. Va. 135; Hibler v. McCartney, 31 Ala. 501; Bryant v. Central Vt. R. Co., 56 Vt. 710."

In Ferguson v. Central Iowa R. Co., 58 Iowa 293, which was an action for damages against a railroad company by one of its employees, it was held that if the customary and usual way of doing the work of uncoupling cars in the yard was negligent and wrong, although permitted by the company, the plaintiff, being for the time in command of the train and in part responsible for the custom, cannot be heard to complain.

1. In Hill v. Portland, etc., R. Co., 55

But when the question is whether or not there was want of due care in any particular case, evidence of usage is admissible to show what constitutes due care as applied to that particular case. "Ordinary care" is not measured by a fixed rule, but by the usages of different places and trades.¹

Me. 438; 92 Am. Dec. 601, which was an action for personal injury to the plaintiff, caused by being thrown from his carriage in consequence of his horse becoming frightened at the sound of a locomotive whistle at a railroad crossing near a station, a witness was asked whether it was not a custom on other railroads to blow two whistles upon starting the train. The court refused to allow the question, saying: "If such a general custom could be established, it would not be a legitimate defense in this case, or tend to establish it. If all the railroads in the country adopt any rule or custom, which is unreasonable or dangerous and productive of injury, the generality of the custom cannot, in a given case, in any degree excuse or justify the act."

In Bailey v. New Haven, etc., R. Co., 107 Mass. 496, where negligence was alleged in a suit against a railroad company in not keeping a flagman at a crossing, the custom of other railroads not to maintain flagmen at similar crossings was rejected.

In Allen v. Burlington, etc., R. Co., 64 Iowa 94, it was said that the usual custom or practice of railroad corporations in operating their roads, and constructing their machinery and buildings, cannot be the ground of relief from liability for injuries sustained, if the custom or practice disregards the safety of the employees, as required by the law. In that case, it would simply be nothing more than negligence practiced habitually by the corporations. Citing Hamilton v. Des Moines Valley R. Co., 36 Iowa 31.

In Fisher v. Brig Norval, 8 Martin N. S. (La.) 120, cotton was left exposed on a levee without any person to watch it, and was damaged. The court held that there was negligence in the defendants permitting the cotton to be exposed all night on the levee, to theft, fire, and other accidents, without some person to take care of it. "It is not a good excuse to say, that it is not customary to place a watch over property, such as this. If any such custom has been introduced in this city, by those who have had the property of others transmitted to them for sale or transportation, the sooner they are informed that such custom cannot control the law, and will not be recognized by courts of justice, the better."

1. In Whitsett v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 67 Iowa 150, which was an action by a brakeman for a personal injury caused by the negligence of the defendant's engineer, it was competent for the plaintiff, in order to show that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, to prove that, in performing the duty in which he was engaged when he received the injury, he adopted the course usually pursued under the same circumstances by men in that calling, though in the employment of other companies. Jeffrey v. Keokuk, etc., R. Co., 56 Iowa 546, was followed.

In Jochem v. Robinson, 72 Wis. 199, the defendant, in order to unload several barrels of sugar, weighing 300 pounds each, into his store, placed a skid across the sidewalk in front of the store, and the plaintiff, in attempting to pass over it, fell and was injured. There was an alley leading to the rear of the store, but the unloading could not have been there accomplished without great inconvenience, and the defendant followed the customary method of handling such goods. The court held that evidence as to the usual and customary method of handling goods in that vicinity was properly admitted.

In Cass v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 14 Allen (Mass.) 448, the plaintiff sued to recover the value of certain articles stolen from the carrier's wharf before delivery to him, the defendant being charged with want of due care in the

2. Usage in Respect to Trespasses.—Usage has been received in various cases as material to the question whether or not a certain act is or is not a trespass; but if the law decides that a certain act is a trespass, usage is not admissible to show that such an act is not a trespass.¹

custody of the property. The court admitted evidence on the part of the railroad company that they exercised the same care as was usual in Boston. The court said: "If the defendants exercised due and ordinary care in the custody of the property, they cannot be charged for its loss. What constituted such care was a question of fact, to be judged of with reference to all the circumstances, and especially with reference to the degree of care which other persons engaged in similar business in the vicinity were in the habit of bestowing on property similarly situated. The standard of ordinary care varies, necessarily, in different localities. One degree of diligence would be required for the city and a less or greater for the country, depending on a great variety of circumstances. The defendants offered to prove that there was exercised by them in relation to this property that care which other railroad corporations in Boston usually exercised in relation to such property."

In Johnson v. Lightsey, 34 Ala. 169; 73 Am. Dec. 450, goods in the hands of a carrier were injured while he was descending a river with two flat-boats bound together. On the question of negligence in having them thus bound together, the court allowed evidence to show that this was a customary mode of navigating.

In Fiore v. Ladd, 22 Oregon 202, the action was to recover money deposited by one who could not write his name, which money had been paid by the bank to a third person on a forged indorsement. It was the general custom of banks, where a person unknown to a bank brought money for deposit, gave a name as his own, and asked for a certificate, there being no suspicious circumstances, to issue to him such certificate in the name given, on his signing the signature book, if he could write, without further inquiry, and pay the money on return of the certificate indorsed with the name written in the signature book; but that, where the depositor could not write his name, it was the custom to ask questions, the answers to which were entered in the signature book as a means of identification. It was held, that it was error to refuse to instruct the jury that, if they found the custom so to be, the action on the part of defendant's bank in following it was not negligence.

In Barber v. Brace, 3 Conn. 9; 8 Am. Dec. 149, it was held that a charge of negligence and mismanagement in the stowage of certain goods shipped for transportation, may be repelled, by proof of a custom to stow goods of that description, for such a voyage, in that manner.

In Waters v. Moss, 12 Cal. 535; 73 Am. Dec. 561, which was an action against a railroad company for running over a horse and killing him, the plaintiff has the right to prove the custom of the country, "to permit domestic animals to roam at large upon the unclosed commons;" where the defense is negligence on the part of the plaintiff in thus allowing the horse to run at large.

In the following cases various questions have arisen in respect to usages in actions for negligence: McKibben v. Bakers, 1 B. Mon. (Ky.) 122; Chenoweth v. Dickinson, 8 B. Mon. 3. Contract Incorporating Usage.—Parties are at liberty to refer to and adopt any lawful usage as a part of their contract, and the courts will enforce such a contract in accordance with the usage. Such a contract incorporating a usage necessarily requires parol proof to show what the usage is, and evidence is therefore admissible for that purpose.¹

In Codman v. Evans, 5 Allen (Mass.) 308; 82 Am. Dec. 258, it was said, in reference to a bay window erected over the land of an adjoining owner: "If there be a custom in Boston to erect bay windows, balconies, and other structures over the streets, provided they do not interfere with the rights of the public, by proprietors who own the soil of the street, such a custom has no application to the case. If it be the custom to erect them over the land of other people, such a custom is illegal, and the defendant cannot justify himself in occupying his neighbor's property as a part of his dwelling house on the ground that such trespasses are customary in Boston."

In Winder v. Blake, 4 Jones (N. Car.) 332, the court said in reference to an alleged usage to enter upon the land of other parties and fish there: "By the common law an imaginary line is thrown around the land of every one, which may not be entered without subjecting the wrongdoer to an action. No custom or usage can change this law. If the owner of land unreasonably refuses to allow his neighbors to fish in his mill-pond, or to gather strawberries in his old field, the only correction is to arraign him at the bar of public opinion for the violation of the rules of good neighborhood."

1. Contract Incorporating Usage.—In Nordaas v. Hubbard, 48 Fed.

Rep. 921, it was held that a custom of the port of Mobile by which vessels taking on additional cargo at a deeper anchorage bear the cost of lightering, though not so notorious, or so acquiesced in as to have the force of law, is binding on a vessel whose charter-party provides that the custom of the port is to be observed in all cases not especially provided for.

In Dorsey v. Eagle, 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 331, the lease, among other stipulations, contained this one. "In other respects, the said D. is to have and to hold the premises according to manor regulations." The parties "having thus, by their written agreement, made the manor regulations a part of their contract, we are at a loss to discover the force of the argument which would exclude the evidence when offered for this purpose."

In Clem v. Martin, 34 Ind. 341, the parties referred to, and incorporated into their contract, and made a part thereof, the usage that prevailed among farmers in that locality. "A plain and express contract cannot be contradicted, varied, explained, or modified by the custom prevailing in any particular locality; but this does not prevent parties from making the usage of a particular locality a part of their contract, and agreeing that they will be governed thereby, provided such usage is not in conflict with the settled rules of the law, and does not go to defeat the essential terms of the contract."

In Hughes v. Stanley, 45 Iowa 622, it was said that it is competent for parties to enter into a contract in accord with an established usage or custom recognized by both, and the contract will be binding upon them.

In Vose v. Morton, 5 Gray (Mass.) 594, the court said: "We should be sorry to weaken the rule of law, which provides that parol evidence shall not be admitted to contradict, vary, or alter the terms of a written contract; but the stability and value of the rule itself depends on its being applied with care and just discrimination. An undertaking to pay a certain rate of freight,

4. Pleading.—A general custom in the sense of a general rule of law need not be pleaded, as the court takes judicial knowledge of it.¹ The rules as to pleading usages of trade in the various states depend upon local practice.²

5. Customs à Prendre.—A right à prendre, that is, a right to take profit from the land of another, cannot be acquired by custom in its technical sense; much less by mere usage.³

'with primage and average accustomed,' in our opinion, means such primage and average as the custom of that trade warrants and requires; if it requires none, then none is payable by force of the obligation. The parties appeal to such custom, as the test and measure of the liability of the one to the other. The contract itself calls for evidence aliunde to give it effect; and if the fact to be proved is one which can be proved only by parol evidence, parol evidence is necessary and competent."

In Union Bank v. Union Ins. Co. Dudley (S. Car.) 171, it was held that a policy referring to the usages of London, as the standard by which its liabilities are to be fixed, will be construed according to those usages only.

In Goldsmith v. Sawyer, 46 Cal. 209, it was held that when a contract is entered into with reference to the rules of a board of brokers, not rules or usages of trade and commerce, such rules become in effect special terms of the contract, and must be pleaded by the party who claims that he has performed the contract in accordance with them, or that the other party has failed to comply with them.

L. 369, it was held that the right of fishing being a profit à prendre in another's soil, as distinguished from an easement, cannot be claimed by custom, but must be prescribed for in a que estate. Blewett v. Tregonning, 3 Ad. & El. 554; 30 E. C. L. 151; Race v. Ward, 4 El. & Bl. 702; 82 E. C. L. 700; Bland v. Lipscomb, 30 Eng. L. & Eq. 189, note; Pearsall v. Post, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 111; 22 Wend. The defendant cannot justify under a custom, nor will proof of a custom sustain a plea of prescriptive right, because the two rights, though they may co-exist in the same land, are of a completely different nature. Blewett v. Tregonning, 3 Ad. & El. 554; 30 E. C. L. 151; Kent v. Waite, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 138.

In Perley v. Langley, 7 N. H. 233, the court held that the inhabitants of a town cannot claim a right to take sand to mix with lime, for the purpose of making mortar, from the land of another, as a custom. "A distinction has been taken, in all the authorities,

6. English Bankruptcy Usages.—Under the English Bankrupt Act, the courts have taken judicial notice of certain usages of hotel keepers, livery-stable keepers, and others, which in the United States have to be proved as facts. These cases are founded on the terms of the act and must not be relied upon as authorities in cases not dependent upon it.¹

7. Fraud.—In numerous cases evidence of usage has been received to determine whether the acts of parties are with intent to defraud; especially in cases of transactions between husband and wife.²

betwixt a profit taken from the soil of another, and a mere easement upon the soil. Rights à prendre, as the right to taking the herbage of the soil by cattle, a right to take away turf, peat, coal, sand, or gravel, cannot be alleged as in the inhabitants of a town, and as a local custom. . . . Inhabitants may prescribe for an easement in alieno solo; as for a way, for liberty to play at rural sports, to draw nets on another's land, to pass free of toll for a public landing place, etc. . . . But there are no authorities that sustain the removal of the soil, or the taking of profits from the soil of another, as a custom."

Other American cases to the same effect are Littlefield v. Maxwell, 31 Me. 135; 50 Am. Dec. 653, in which the right of a custom to deposit wood upon another's land was held invalid; Hill v. Lard, 48 Me. 83, where a right to take seaweed from another's beach was claimed by custom; Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 145; 16 Am. Dec. 333, where the right of fishing in an unnavigable stream was similarly claimed; Nudd v. Hobbs, 17 N. H. 525; Atty. Gen'l v. Tarr, 148 Mass. 309, in which it was held that a right to maintain a building, a permanent structure, upon the land of another cannot be acquired by custom. Kenyon v. Nichols, 1 R. I. 106; Cobb v. Davenport, 32 N. J. L. 369.

In Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457, the court said that it is well settled that a custom to take or have anything from another man's land, or for a profit à prendre, is bad. The question here was as to the validity of a custom of the inspectors of flour to take to their own use the draft flour, drawn out to be examined. Of this the court said: "No difference in principle is perceived between a custom à prendre, and one to appropriate part of the personal chattels of another, against his will and without his consent, and without any consideration whatever."

1. English Bankruptcy Usages.—In Ex p. Wingfield, 10 Ch. Div. 591, it was held that in order that goods of another person in the possession of a bankrupt should pass to his trustee under the latter words of sub-section 5 of section 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, as goods of which the bankrupt "has taken upon himself the sale or disposition as owner," it is necessary that the bankrupt should have been the reputed owner of the goods.

In Ex p. Powell, 1 Ch. Div. 501, it was held that where a custom of holding certain goods on hire is relied on to take the goods out of the order and disposition of a bankrupt, the custom must be one which the ordinary creditors of the bankrupt may be reasonably presumed to have known. Such custom may be proved, either by reported cases, or by evidence of the custom as on a question of fact.

In Ex p. Turquand, 14 Q. B. Div. 636, it was held that the custom for hotel keepers to hire the furniture of their hotels is so notorious, and has been so often proved, that it need not now be proved, but the court will take judicial notice of it. And the custom extends not only to furniture in the strictest sense of the word, but to all the articles which are necessary for the furnishing of a hotel for the purpose of using it as a hotel. The effect of the custom is absolutely to exclude the reputation of ownership by the hotel keeper of all those articles in the hotel, at the time of his bankruptcy, which are within the scope of the custom, without regard to the question whether the particular articles are or are not in fact hired by him.

So, also, in Crawcour v. Salter, 18 Ch. Div. 30, it was held that the custom of hotel keepers holding their furniture on hire is now so well established that it ought to be taken judicial notice of.

1. Officers' Powers, etc.—In determining questions of the powers, rights, compensation, and proper conduct of officers, evidence of usages has been received in the following cases: *Fennings v. In U. S. v. MacDaniel, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 1, it was said: "Of necessity, usages have been established in every department of the government, which have become a kind of common law, and regulate the rights and duties of those who act within their respective limits. And no change of such usages can have a retrospective effect, but must be limited to the future. Usage cannot alter the law; but it is evidence of the construction given to it, and must be considered binding on past transactions."

2. In Michigan, a chattel mortgage may cover after-acquired stock of a dealer "for use" in his business; but this does not cover the case of goods diverted to another purpose before reception by the dealer. Curtis v. Wilcox, 49 Mich. 427.

Use of Building.—In Spicer v. Bonker, 45 Mich. 630, it has been held that the word "use," in an assignment of "all the use" of certain premises, was too vague and uncertain to cover the rent of the buildings.

"Used in Rivers or Inland Navigation."—In an act of Congress limiting the liability of owners of vessels "used in rivers or inland navigation," the term "used" was said by Nelson, J., to mean, in this connection, "employed," and doubtless in the mind of Congress was intended to refer to vessels solely employed in rivers or inland navigation. Moore v. American Transp. Co., 24 How. (U. S.) 37.

Mechanic's Lien.—Generally, the lien of material-men extends only to the materials, etc., "used" in construction. It has been held that, in the sense of the law, machinery furnished a contractor is not used in erecting the structure. Basshor v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 65 Md. 99. On the other hand, powder furnished a contractor has been held to be "used" in the construction of a railway. Giant Powder Co. v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 42 Fed. Rep. 475. In this case the court distinguishes Basshor v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. 65 Md. 99, in that the powder was expended, whereas the machinery remained after the construction was finished, saying that provisions furnished a contractor would be held to come within the statute. See generally MECHANICS' LIENS, vol. 15, p. 55.

Used as a Beverage.—A statute forbade the sale of liquor by a druggist "to be used as a beverage." It was held that an information charging the sale of liquor "as a beverage" was equivalent to charging that the liquor was sold "to be used as a beverage." People v. Hinchman, 75 Mich. 587.

USE AND OCCUPATION.—When a contract has been made, either by express or implied agreement, for the use of a house or other real estate, where there was no amount of rent fixed and ascertained, the landlord can recover a reasonable rent in an action of assumpsit for use and occupation.¹

USEFUL.—As to the word “useful” in patent law, see PATENT LAW, vol. 18, p. 67.

USEFULNESS.—The word “usefulness” implies capabilities for use, and appertains to the future as well as to the past.²

USER.—The term user may be defined as the actual exercise or enjoyment of any right or property. It is employed particularly in respect of franchises.³ The acceptance of a corporate charter may be established by user of the rights and privileges conferred thereby.⁴ The long-continued user by the public of a road or street will raise a presumption of dedication on the part of the owner.⁵ And, generally speaking, in the United States the grant of any incorporeal hereditament will be presumed upon proof of an adverse user, which has been exclusive and uninterrupted for twenty years, or for the period of time fixed by the respective statutes of the several states for quieting titles to lands.⁶ Opposed to the term user are the expressions non-user

Used Distinguished from Resorted.—A statute prohibited the keeping of a building “resorted” to for illegal gaming. It was held that an indictment for keeping a tenement “used” for illegal gaming was bad, the terms not being synonymous. Comm v. Stahl, 7 Allen (Mass.) 304.

and disuser, which signify the neglect or omission to exercise a right, privilege, or benefit, as the non-user or disuser of a corporate franchise or easement. A right acquired by user may be lost by non-user or disuser.¹ Misuser is the wrongful use or abuse of rights and benefits.² By adverse user is meant such a use of property as the owner himself would exercise, disregarding the claims of others entirely, asking permission from no one, and using the property under a claim of right.³ Right of user has a two-fold meaning: first, it signifies the right to use, as distinguished from ownership; second, the presumptive right arising from continued user.⁴

I. DEFINITION AND ORIGIN OF USES.—A use, as it existed prior to the Statute of Uses, was a mere confidence reposed in another, to whom the estate was conveyed without consideration, to dispose of it upon trusts specified at the time, or to be subsequently appointed by the real owner.⁵

The person to whom the estate was granted was called the feoffee or terre-tenant, and the one for whom it was granted was called the cestui que use.⁶

A modern use is defined as an estate of right, acquired through the operation of the Statute of Uses, and which, when it may take effect according to the rules of the common law, is called a legal estate; and when it cannot, is called a use, with a term descriptive of its modification.⁷

Uses were derived from the fidei commissum of the civil law, the latter being introduced by testators to evade the law which disabled certain persons, as exiles and strangers, from being heirs or legatees. The execution of such trusts having, before the time of Augustus, been left to the honor of the trustee, that emperor, in view of some instances of gross unfaithfulness, instituted a particular magistrate, denominated the prætor fidei commissarius, to compel the observance of the confidence reposed.¹

The notion was transplanted into England during the reign of Edward III. by the foreign ecclesiastics for the purpose of evading the Statutes of Mortmain, by obtaining grants of land to nominal feoffees to the use of their religious houses; and these, the courts of chancery (then under the direction of the ecclesiastics) held to be fidei commissa and binding in conscience, and accordingly enforced them.² But the clergy did not long enjoy the advantage of this new devise, as, during the reign of Richard II. a statute was passed embracing uses within the purview of the Statutes of Mortmain.³

But uses were continued by the laity as a means of securing estates against forfeitures in times of civil commotion, and at length they were applied to a number of civil purposes, and under the forming hand of courts of chancery assumed some regular system.⁴

II. THE STATUTE OF USES.—To avoid many inconveniences and difficulties growing out of the doctrine of uses, the statute 27, Henry VIII., ch. 10, commonly known as the Statute of Uses, or, more accurately, the statute for transferring uses into possession, was enacted. It provides that, "When any person shall be seised of lands, tenements, etc., to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or body politic, the person or corporation entitled to the use in fee simple, fee tail, for life or years, or otherwise, shall, from thenceforth, stand and be seised or possessed of the lands, tenements, etc., of and in the like estate as they have in the use, trust, or confidence; and that the estate of the person so seised to the uses shall be deemed to be in him or them that have the use, in such quality, manner, form, or condition, as they had before in the use." The statute thus executes the use; that is, it conveys the possession to the use, and transfers the use into possession, thereby constituting the cestui que use the complete owner of the lands and tenements, etc., as well at law as in equity.⁵

The terms "use," "trust," and "confidence," are synonymous, so if an estate is conveyed to a person for the use of, or upon a trust or confidence for another, without more, the statute immediately transfers the legal estate to the use, and there is no trust.¹

The statute having thus not abolished the conveyance to uses, but simply destroyed the intervening estate of the feoffee, and turned the interest of the cestui que use into a legal instead of an equitable ownership, the courts of common law began to take cognizance of uses, and very many of the rules before established by equity were adopted with improvement.²

Three circumstances must concur in order that the statute may operate: first, there must be a person seised to a use; second, a cestui que use in esse; third, a use in esse in possession, remainder, or reversion. And when the use is transformed from an equitable to a legal interest, the same qualities, conditions, and limitations that were applicable to it as a use follow it in its new condition as a legal estate.³

III. KINDS OF USES.—1. Generally.—The Statute of Uses worked many changes in the common law. Amongst the most radical and important, was the facility with which estates might be modified and future interests secured by means of springing, shifting, contingent, and resulting uses, and by the reservation of a power to revoke the uses of the estate and appoint others.

2. Springing Uses.—A springing use is one limited to arise on a future event, where no preceding estate is limited, and which does not take effect in derogation of any other interest than that which results to the grantor or remains in him in the meantime.⁴

Springing uses may be raised by any form of conveyance, but in the case of those which operate by transmutation of possession, as a deed of lease and release, and feoffment, the estate must be conveyed and raised out of the seisin created in the grantee by the conveyance. But in conveyances by bargain and sale, and covenant to stand seised, the use is severed out of the grantor's seisin and executed by the statute.⁵

Uses of this class, like executory devises, must be so limited that they must take effect, if at all, within the period prescribed by law to avoid perpetuities.⁶

3. Shifting Uses.—A shifting use is one which takes effect in derogation of some other estate, and is either limited by the deed by which it is created, or authorized to be created by some one named in the deed. These are, also, denominated secondary uses.¹

The rule in regard to perpetuities applies to uses of this class, as well as to springing uses.² If the object of the power is to create a perpetuity, it is void.³

4. Contingent Uses.—Contingent or future uses are limited to take effect as remainders, and are governed by the same rules which prevail in respect to remainders.⁴

5. Resulting Uses.—Whenever the use limited by the deed expires, or cannot vest, it returns to him who raised it, after such expiration, or during such impossibility, and is called a resulting use.⁵

6. Revocable Uses.—The revocability of uses is one of their most notable qualities. By the common law, a power residing in the grantor to revoke a common-law conveyance was deemed repugnant thereto, and never allowed. The utmost that was permitted was a deed of defeasance coeval with the grant itself, and, therefore considered a part thereof, upon events specially designated. But upon the introduction of uses, it was adjudged that the uses originally declared might be revoked at any future time, and new ones declared, provided always that the grantor reserved to himself such a power upon the creation of the estate. And this doctrine having become firmly established before the Statute of Uses, and the statute declaring that he should have the lands as before he had the use, the estate created thus under the statute has always been considered revocable in like manner as the use had been before.⁶

IV. USES UNEXECUTED BY THE STATUTE—TRUSTS.—The purpose of the Statute of Uses was to abolish chancery jurisdiction over landed property, by converting the use into the legal estate; but by a rigid literal construction of the statute, this jurisdiction was increased instead of diminished. Thus, it was decided that "no use could be limited on a use." It was not intended by this that the second and subsequent uses were void, but that they were not executed by the statute, and could take effect only as trusts to be enforced in equity.⁷

Again, terms for years, and other chattel interests in real estate and personal property, were held not to be within the statute. And this, upon the ground that the word "seised" used in the statute, was applicable to freeholds only; that one could not be said to be seised of chattel interests in land, or of personalty, but only possessed. In such cases, the use was unexecuted, and the trustee took the legal title in trust which was cognizable only in equity.¹

And later, it was held that the statute did not execute a use where there was some act or duty to be performed by the donee to uses, which could not be performed by him if the legal estate passed from him under the operation of the statute. Here, also, the party beneficially interested had only an equitable interest to be administered in a court of chancery.²

At length courts of equity determined that, though these estates were not uses which could be executed by the statute, yet they were trusts which in conscience ought to be enforced. In this wise, uses were partially revived under the name of trusts. So, a trust may be said to be a use unexecuted by the Statute of Uses in the cestui que use, but the legal estate is vested in the grantee or trustee.³

In regard to this revival of equity jurisdiction in respect to trusts, Lord Mansfield said: "It has not only remedied the mischiefs of uses so much complained of, but has given occasion to raise up a system of equity, noble, rational, and uniform, in place of a system unjust and inconvenient. Trusts are made to answer the exigencies of families, and all purposes, without producing one inconvenience, fraud or mischief which the statute of Henry VIII. meant to avoid."⁴

Thus, the results would seem to justify the now celebrated observation of Lord Hardwicke that, "A statute introduced in a solemn and pompous manner has had no other effect than to add, at most, three words to a conveyance."⁵

V. USES IN THE UNITED STATES.—The English doctrine of uses, and the modes of conveyance founded thereon, have been very largely introduced into the jurisprudence of the states. In some, the Statute of Uses has been considered to constitute a part of the common law; in others, the main features of the statute have been Passingham, 6 B. & C. 305; 13 E. C. L. 180; Croxall v. Sherard, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 268. But the statute will execute any number of uses, one after another, as they arise. Calvert v. Eden, 2 Har. & M. (Md.) 279.

That is, if prior to the statute A had desired to raise a use in B cognizable only in equity, he would have said: "A bargains for a valuable consideration to stand seised to the use of B;" whereas, since the statute, the words, in order to create a use in B, would be: "A bargains for a valuable consideration to stand seised to use of Z to the use of B." 2 Minor's Inst. re-enacted.¹ In Massachusetts and Rhode Island the statute has been partially adopted, and if, for any reason, it is necessary, in order to give effect to the conveyance, the statute will be construed as operative.² In Ohio, Vermont, and Tennessee it has never been in

1. Virginia.—The English Statute of Uses was deemed to be a part of the colonial law of Virginia, but was repealed in 1792. Subsequently (in 1819, and in the Revised Code of 1849, p. 502), a partial substitute was adopted, the provisions of which only execute the possession to the use in cases of deeds of bargain and sale, of lease and release, and of covenants to stand seised; so if a use is raised by any other form of conveyance, as by devise, it remains, as before the Statutes of 27 Henry VIII., a mere equitable interest not cognizable at law. 1 Lomax Dig. 188; Bass v. Scott, 2 Leigh (Va.) 359; Rowletts v. Daniel, 4 Munf. (Va.) 473; Jones v. Tatum, 19 Gratt. (Va.) 733.

North Carolina.—In this state there exists a statute similar to the present Virginia statute. Den v. Hanks, 5 Ired. (N. Car.) 30.

Alabama.—In this state the statute constitutes a part of the common law, except so far as repealed by the Act of 1812. Horton v. Sledge, 29 Ala. 478; Carter v. Balfour, 19 Ala. 829; Simmons v. Augustin, 3 Port. (Ala.) 69.

New Hampshire.—It is a part of the common law of this state. French v. French, 3 N. H. 234; Chamberlain v. Crane, 1 N. H. 64; Rollins v. Riley, 44 N. H. 11; Hutchins v. Heywood, 50 N. H. 491; Wilcox v. Wheeler, 47 N. H. 490; Hayes v. Tabor, 41 N. H. 526; Dennett v. Dennett, 40 N. H. 498; Pritchard v. Brown, 4 N. H. 397; 17 Am. Dec. 431.

Connecticut.—The statute is held to constitute a part of the common law of this state. Bryan v. Bradley, 16 Conn. 483; Barrett v. French, 1 Conn. 354; 6 Am. Dec. 241; Bacon v. Taylor, Kirby (Conn.) 368.

Maine.—Here the statute is considered a part of the common law. Shapleigh v. Pilsbury, 1 Me. 271; Emery v. Chase, 5 Me. 232; Marden v. Chase, 32 Me. 329; Blake v. Collins, 69 Me. 156.

Missouri.—Here also it is a part of the common law. Guest v. Farley, 19 Mo. 149.

New Jersey.—The statute of this state is substantially the same as the original Statute of Uses. Den v. Crawford, 8 N. J. L. 90.

Pennsylvania.—In this state only §§ 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10, of the Statute of Uses are in force. Report of the Judges, 3 Binn. (Pa.) 618; O'Kison v. Patterson, 1 W. & S. (Pa.) 395; Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Binn. (Pa.) 502; 2 Am. Dec. 474; Ashhurst v. Given, 5 W. & S. (Pa.) 323.

Illinois.—Here the statute of this state is substantially a re-enactment of 27 Henry VIII. Whitham v. Brooner, 63 Ill. 344.

Iowa.—Uses are recognized in Iowa. Pierson v. Armstrong, 1 Iowa 282; 63 Am. Dec. 440.

Kansas.—Also in this state. Bayer v. Cockerill, 3 Kan. 292.

Indiana.—Here the Statute of Uses has been re-enacted in substance. Linville v. Golding, 11 Ind. 374; Nelson v. Davis, 35 Ind. 474.

South Carolina.—Here the statute was re-enacted in terms. Jenney v. Laurens, 1 Spear (S. Car.) 356; McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strobb. Eq. (S. Car.) 74; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 475; Howard v. Henderson, 18 S. Car. 184; Ramsay v. Marsh, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 252; 13 Am. Dec. 717.

Georgia.—The statute is in force in this state. Adams v. Guerard, 29 Ga. 651; 76 Am. Dec. 624.

Maryland.—The Statute of Uses is in full force in this state. Calvert v. Eden, 2 Har. & M. (Md.) 279; Reid v. Gordon, 35 Md. 183; Brown v. Renshaw, 57 Md. 77; Matthews v. Ward, 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 449; Leonard v. Diamond, 31 Md. 541; Ware v. Richardson, 3 Md. 505; 56 Am. Dec. 762; Waters v. Tazewell, 9 Md. 301; Cheney v. Watkins, 1 Har. & J. (Md.) 527; 2 Am. Dec. 530; West v. Biscoe, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 465.

Rhode Island.—Nightingale v. Hidden, 7 R. I. 115; Sprague v. Sprague, 13 R. I. 701.

1. Ohio.—In Doe v. Gibson, 2 Ohio 339, the court was divided in opinion, upon the point whether the Statute of Uses had ever been in force in that state. Two judges held that the statute was in force from 1795 to 1806. The other two judges held differently. The question, however, has been decided in the negative by later cases. Helfenstein v. Garrard, 7 Ohio 275; Williams v. First Presbyterian Soc., 1 Ohio St. 495.

Vermont.—In Society, etc., v. Hartland, 2 Paine (U. S.) 536, Thompson, J., of the circuit court for the district, held the statute to be a part of the common law of the state and in force. But in the later cases of Gorham v. Daniels, 23 Vt. 602, and Sherman v. Dodge, 28 Vt. 26, it was held that the statute did not form a part of the common law of the state, and was never in force.

Tennessee.—Hooberry v. Harding, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 392.

2. New York.—In this state, prior to the year 1827, the Statute of Uses was in full force. See Jackson v. Cadwell, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 622; Jackson v. Myers, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 388; 3 Am. Dec. 504; Jackson v. Fish, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 456. But in that year all uses and trusts were declared abolished, except such as were expressly authorized by the statute. New York Rev. Stat., vol. 2, p. 1105, §§ 45, 46.

Wisconsin.—A statute similar to the New York one exists in this state. Riehl v. Bingenheimer, 28 Wis. 84.

Michigan.—If the Statute of Uses was ever in force in this state, it was repealed by the Act of Sept. 10th, 1810, repealing the acts of Parliament, etc., from which date and until March 1st, 1847, when the Revised Statutes took effect, no statute involving the principles of the Statute of Uses was in force. But by section 3 of the Revised Statutes of 1846, the principles of the English Statute of Uses were adopted. Trask v. Green, 9 Mich. 358; Ready v. Kearsley, 14 Mich. 216. But now by a statute similar to the one in New York, uses and trusts are abolished, except as authorized by the statute. Loring v. Palmer, 118 U. S. 343.

3. Usual Course of Business.—The phrase "in the usual course of business," signifies "according to the usages and customs of commercial transactions," and its application to the purchase of a mercantile note is not confined to persons engaged habitually in banking or purchasing notes. One who in good faith purchases a negotiable note before maturity for value, or who takes it in payment of an antecedent debt, is not out of the usual course of business. Tescher v. Merea, 118 Ind. 586, citing Baily v. Smith, 14 Ohio St. 396; 84 Am. Dec. 385; Kellogg v. Curtis, 69 Me. 212; 31 Am. Dec. 273; Roberts v. Hall, 37 Conn. 205; 9 Am. Rep. 308.

A deposit with an inn-keeper "in the usual course of business," means a deposit of goods with him by a guest for safe keeping. Harris v. Boggs, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 489. See also COURSE, vol. 4, p. 445.

Usual High-Water Mark.—The term "usual high-water mark," signifies the limit reached by neap tide. Teaschmacher v. Thompson, 18 Cal. 11; 79 Am. Dec. 151.

Usual and Customary.—The words "usual and customary," when used with respect to the method of selling coal by agents, import a fixed and established usage which has become general in a particular trade; not something casual or exceptional. Carter v. Philadelphia Coal Co., 77 Pa. St. 286.

Usual Medical Attendant.—As to the facts held sufficient to constitute a physician a "usual medical attendant," within the meaning of a question to an applicant for insurance, see Cushman v. U. S. L. Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. 77.

Usual Stopping Place.—The term "usual stopping place," in a statute relating to the expulsion of passengers, means a regular station for passengers to get on and off the train, and not a water tank. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v.

USUANCE.—When bills of exchange were drawn in one country of Europe on another, it was customary to make them payable at one or two or more usances, instead of at so many days or months. "Usance" is a French term, and signifies the time which, according to the usage of the countries between which the bills are drawn, is appointed for the payment of them. The length of time differs in different countries, and it seems none is fixed between the United States and European nations. The custom is falling into disuse in Europe.¹

USUFRUCTUARY.—A usufructuary right is the right of using and enjoying the profits of a thing belonging to another, without impairing the substance.²

USURPED POWER.—See note 3.

USURPER.—(See also DE FACTO OFFICERS, vol. 5, p. 93).—A mere usurper is one who intrudes himself into an office which is vacant, and ousts the incumbent without any color of title whatever. His acts are void in every respect, and he must, therefore, be distinguished from an officer de facto.⁴

Blackstone speaks of the usus fructus of the civil law as the temporary right of using a thing, without having the ultimate property, or full dominion of the substance. 2 Bl. Com. 327. And see And. L. Dict.

The usufruct is the right of enjoying a thing, the property of which is in another, while the usufructuary is the one who possesses such right of enjoyment. See Black's L. Dict.; Civil Code Louisiana, art. 533.

In Cartwright v. Cartwright, 18 Tex. 628, it is said that "Usufruct is defined by Escriche, as the right of using and enjoying, and receiving the profits of, property which belongs to another; and a usufructuary is one who has the usufruct or right of enjoying anything in which he has no property. The usufructuary has a right to all the fruits produced by the subject of usufruct, whether they be natural, that is, produced spontaneously by the earth or animals, as timber, herbs, fruits, wool, milk, and the young of cattle; or industrial, that is, produced by cultivation, as crops of grain, etc.; or civil, viz.: rents, as the hire of rents of houses, freights, revenues from annuities, etc., and from other effects or rights. But notwithstanding these enlarged rights of the usufructuary owner, to the produce or fruits of the subject of usufruct, yet there is one exception, viz.: the child born of a slave of whom one has the usufruct, shall belong to the master of the slave and not to the usufructuary."

In Hooper v. Goodwin, 48 Me. 80, it is said that "an officer de facto is one who executes the duties of an officer under some color of right and some pretense of title, either by election or appointment. A mere usurper is one who acts without color of title and whose acts are utterly void." And see Tucker v. Aiken, 7 N. H. 130.

I. DEFINITION.—Usury is the act of intentionally taking or reserving a greater compensation for the loan of money or its equivalent, or for the forbearance of a debt, than the highest rate of interest allowed by law.¹

The term was formerly employed to denote the taking of any interest or compensation for the use of money; usury and interest being then synonymous terms. But in more recent times, when the rate of interest on money began to be regulated and restricted by law, "usury" was the distinctive term employed in legal phraseology to indicate an excessive and illegal exaction

1. Definition.—An excessive or inordinate premium paid, or stipulated to be paid, for the use of money borrowed; any such premium in excess of the rate established or permitted by law, which varies locally. Century Dict.

"Usury is the reserving and taking, or contracting to reserve and take, either directly or by indirection, a greater sum for the use of money than the lawful interest." Georgia Code (1882), § 2051.

Usury is "an unlawful contract, upon a loan of money, to receive the same again with exorbitant increase." 4 Bl. Com. 156.

"Usury is the illegal profit which is required by the lender of a sum of money, from the borrower, for its use." 1 Bouv. Inst. 299.

"Usury is commonly defined to be the taking of more for the use of money than the law allows." Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88.

of interest.¹ In the latter sense only, will it be used in this article.

II. HISTORY—1. Under Roman Law.—From a very early period in the history of Rome the rate of interest was regulated by law, changes being frequently made, the authorized rate varying from one-half of one per cent. to twelve per cent.; and at one time all interest was prohibited, to relieve the common people from the oppression of the rich.²

2. At Common Law.—The question whether, prior to the English statutes hereafter referred to, it was lawful in England, to take any interest whatever, and if so how much, for the use of money, is veiled in obscurity, and conflicting opinions have been given by writers in regard to it. It is certain, however, that the practice was severely condemned by the church, by whose laws the taking of interest was branded as a heinous offense, and punished accordingly; and it is also certain that the church was aided in its efforts by the temporal authorities, so that the usurer not only fell under the ban of the church's displeasure, but suffered the forfeiture of his property as well.³

3. English Statutes.—The first enactment regulating the rate of interest was the St. 37 Henry VIII., ch. 9, by which interest "for forbearance or giving day of payment" was limited to ten pounds per cent. per annum, and it was made a penal offense to take

1. 2 Bl. Com. 454.

2. In ancient Rome, according to Tacitus Ann., lib. 6, ch. 16, usury was discouraged in the early period of the republic by the twelve tables which reduced interest to one per cent. per annum. It was subsequently reduced to one-half of one per cent., and was finally prohibited altogether, to satisfy the clamors of the people. In the age of commerce and wealth it was again revived, but placed under wise and necessary restrictions. From four to six per cent. was allowed in ordinary commercial transactions, and even twelve per cent. might be taken for maritime hazards, by the law of Justinian; but severe restraints were imposed upon the exaction of more exorbitant interest. "The Romans, through the greater part of their history, had the deepest abhorrence of usury. They did not derive their objections to usury from the prohibitions in the Mosaic law, nor did they hold it sinful, as the learned fathers of the early and middle ages of the church have done; for they knew nothing of that law. The Roman law-givers and jurists acted from views of public policy. They found, by their own experience, that unlimited usury led to unlimited oppression, and that the extortion of the creditor and the resistance of the debtor were constantly agitating and disturbing the public peace. But it is not only the civilized and commercial nations of modern Europe, and the sage law-givers of ancient Rome, that have regulated the interest of money. It will be deemed a little singular that the same voice against usury should have been raised in the laws of China, in the Hindoo Institutes of Menu, in the Koran of Mahomet, and, perhaps we may say, in the laws of all nations that we know of, whether Greek or barbarian." Hubbard, J., in Gray v. Bennett, 3 Met. (Mass.) 522, said: "Usury was an offense at common law, and the usurer was not only punished by the censures of the church in his lifetime, but was denied a Christian burial; and by the laws of Alfred the Great and Edward the Confessor, if, after death even, a man was found to have been a usurer, his goods were forfeited to the crown, and his lands to the lord of the more. In the following reign, to correct a state of affairs for which it was thought the statute of Henry VIII. was responsible, that statute was repealed by the St. 5 & 6 Edw. VI., ch. 20, which absolutely prohibited the taking of any interest whatever, on pain of forfeiting the entire debt. But public opinion soon proved too enlightened for such legislation, and it was repealed by St. 13 Eliz., ch. 8, and the rate of interest authorized by the statute of Henry VIII. again made lawful. This high rate, however, gave rise to many complaints, and it was reduced to eight pounds per cent. by St. 21 James I., ch. 17, and later to six pounds per cent. by St. 12 Charles II., ch. 13. Finally, by St. 12 Anne, ch. 16, commonly known as the "Statute of Usury," the rate of interest was established at five pounds per cent. per annum.¹

There are a number of subsequent statutes modifying the rate of interest in respect to particular classes of cases, but for all ordinary transactions the statute of Anne, fixing the rate at 5 per cent., continued to be the law of England until the present reign, when, in compliance with what was deemed to be public sentiment, the Statute of Usury was repealed, by St. 17 & 18 Vict., ch. 90, and the parties left to make whatever contract they choose in respect to interest.

III. ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS OF USURY—1. Loan or Forbearance.—It is a principle universally recognized by the courts, that there can be no violation of the statute, unless the transaction is in substance and effect a loan or agreement for forbearance of payment of money, or its equivalent.²

fee. The Statute of 37 Henry VIII., ch. 9, entitled 'A Bill Against Usury,' revised the former acts and laws, and is the foundation of all the statutes prohibiting usury, from that day to this."

1. Statute of Usury.—Inasmuch as all the important English decisions are based upon the Statute 12 Anne, ch. 16, a brief outline of its provisions will not be out of place here. The act declared that no person should thereafter take, directly or indirectly, for the loan of money, wares, merchandise, or other commodities whatsoever, above the value of £5 for the forbearance of £100 for one year, and so after that rate for a greater or less sum, or for a longer or shorter time. Also that all loans, contracts and assurances, made for the payment of any principal or money to be lent, whereby there should be reserved or taken above the said rate of £5 in £100, should be utterly void. Also that any person who should take, accept and receive, by way or reason of any corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, chevisance, shift, or interest of any wares, merchandise or other thing or things whatsoever, or by any deceitful way or means, or by any covin, engine or deceitful conveyance, for the forbearing or giving day of payment for one whole year, or for their money or other thing of value, above the said sum of £5 for the forbearing of £100 for a year, and so after that rate, etc., should forfeit and lose for every such offense the total value of the moneys, wares, merchandise or other things so lent, bargained, exchanged or shifted. It also provided that scrivener, brokers, solicitors and drivers of bargains might take not to exceed five shillings brokerage for procuring the loan or forbearance of £100 for a year, and so ratably.

Statements of the Rule.—In Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Smith, Clarke, Ch. (N. Y.) 540, Whittlesey, V. C., said: "The elements of usury are a loan or forbearance at a greater rate of interest than the law tolerates, in pursuance of a corrupt agreement and with a corrupt intent. It implies a lending and borrowing upon terms which the law will not allow. A debt due, or about to become due, is, perhaps, as much a subject of lending and borrowing as money, goods, or choses in action; and in such case, the creditor may be the lender, and the debtor the borrower."

An extension of time given to sureties on a note, in consideration of their executing a new note, is a "loan of money," within the meaning of the statute.¹ The statute applies not only to

In Tyler, Usury, p. 96, it is said: "The doctrine has long been recognized by the courts, and appears now to be the settled and established law of the land, that to constitute usury, it is requisite that there must be either a direct loan, or there must be some device for the purpose of concealing or evading the appearance of a loan, when in truth there was one. The component parts of a loan are a voucher or contract, specifying the nature of the transaction, the time of payment or redemption, the rate of interest for the use of the money loaned, and the intention of one to loan and the other to borrow; and the real substance of the transaction, and not the color and form of it, will always be examined for the purpose of determining whether it be a loan, or something else."

Transactions Other than Loans.—Thus, a bona fide contract to perform work for a corporation, to be paid for in its bonds, is not usurious, though the contract price greatly exceeds the previous cash estimates. White Water Valley Canal Co. v. Vallette, 21 How. (U. S.) 414.

The purchase by a third person and for his own benefit, of claims against a debtor, is not a loan within the meaning of the statute, though such purchase was made at the debtor's request and to avert a forced sale of his property. Crane v. Price, 35 N. Y. 494.

The payment to the mortgagee of a sum of money as consideration for his consent to change the mortgage security by taking in lieu thereof a number of new mortgages upon separate tracts for the same aggregate sum, and payable at the same time as the original mortgage, does not constitute usury, because there is neither a loan nor forbearance. Neevus v. Vanderveer, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 268.

So, where a mortgagor whose debt was payable in small annual installments at a future time, paid to the mortgagee in advance the sum of $1,400, under an agreement that the mortgagee would apply and indorse as a payment $2,100 on the mortgage, which was accordingly done, it was held that the agreement was not usurious, there being no loan or forbearance by the mortgagor. Righter v. Stall, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 608.

A banker may lawfully charge a correspondent five per cent. for accepting and paying bills with money furnished the latter, for here there is neither a loan nor forbearance. And even if, on such an agreement, a temporary advance of money were contemplated, it would be a question for a jury whether the charge was a device to obtain more than legal interest, or a compensation for the trouble and expense incurred in accepting and paying the bills. Masterman v. Cowrie, 3 Camp. 488; Caliot v. Walker, 2 Anstr. 495.

Where the agreement for excessive interest on advances already made is merely a part of the consideration of the sale of a party's interest in a business venture, it is not a "contract or assurance for the loan or forbearance of money." Eddy v. Northup (Ky. 1894) 23 So. W. Rep. 353.

Wagers.—An action was brought upon the following memorandum: "In consideration of two guineas received of Aaron Lamego, I promise to pay him twenty guineas, upon the decease of my present wife, Annie Gould." The question was whether this was usury, the wife being at the time of the agreement seventy years old. Lord Mansfield stopped the counsel for the plaintiff, under a doubt how it was possible to come at this question about usury, for there was nothing at all stated about a loan. And Wilmot, J., added that the true distinction was laid down in Button v. Downham, Cro. Eliz. 643, between a real, bona fide wager, not at all intended as a loan, and a transaction which is really an usurious loan, but disguised as a wager, Lamego v. Gould, Burr. 715.

loans, but also to agreements to extend the time of, or to forbear the enforcement of payment of an existing indebtedness; and it is usury to stipulate for more than legal interest for the period of extension or forbearance.¹

In ascertaining whether there was a loan or agreement to forbear, the form of the contract adopted by the parties is of little consequence, because the courts always look beyond the form, and search diligently for the substance and intent.²

2. Agreement for Repayment; Contingency.—It is also essential, to bring a contract within the Statute of Usury, that the principal sum loaned is to be repaid absolutely, and at all events, without depending upon any real hazard or contingency.³

The contingency affecting the principal must be bona fide and substantial, for if it appears to the court to be remote and unlikely to arise, it will be disregarded, or treated as a device to evade the statute.⁴ But it is not necessary that there should be an ex-

Contingencies.—In Long v. Wharton, 3 Keb. 304, pl. 44, an agreement, upon a loan of £30, to pay £100 on the marriage of the plaintiff's daughter, and if either the plaintiff or the defendant should die before that time, then to pay nothing, was held not usury, being compared to a contract of matrimony.

In Beddingfield v. Ashley, Cro. Eliz. 741, the question was whether there was usury in an agreement, upon a loan of £100, to pay to each of the lender's five daughters then living, who should be alive at the end of ten years, the sum of £80. All the justices held that it was not usurious, "for it is a mere casual bargain, and a great hazard, but that in ten years all the daughters or some of them will be dead; and if any of them be not alive, he shall save thereby £80. But if it were that he should pay £400 at the end of ten years, if any were then alive, it were a greater doubt."

Insufficient Contingencies.—Instances of contingencies held insufficient are press agreement to repay, if the court can see that repayment was evidently contemplated by the parties.¹ Nor is it necessary that found in the following English cases: In Burton's Case, 5 Rep. 70, Papham, C. J., said: "If A comes to borrow £100 of B, and B lends it to him, upon an agreement that he will give him for the loan of it for a year £20, if the son of A be then alive, this is usury within the statute; for if it should be out of the statute for the uncertainty of the life of the son of A, the statute would be of little effect; and by the same reason that he may add one life, he may add many; and so like a mathematical line, which is divisibilis in semper divisibilia."

In Reynolds v. Clayton, 2 And. 15, pl. 8, it was said: "Reynolds brought an action of debt against Clayton for £60 upon a bond, the condition of which was, that if the defendant should pay £33 to the plaintiff on the 1st of June, if Christopher, the son of the plaintiff, were then alive, or if he died before that day, £26, then the obligation should be void. The defendant pleaded the Statutes 13 Eliz. and 27 Hen. VIII., and that it was agreed as above stated upon a loan of £30 by the plaintiff to the defendant. And all the court held this usury under the statutes; for it was the intention of the makers of those instruments that such subtleties should not be practised. And here the condition might well have been, if twenty persons, or any one of them, be alive at one day; which opinion was confirmed by Papham, Chief Justice, and Periam, Chief Baron." Moore 397; 5 Rep. 70, sub. nom. Clayton's Case.

In Mason v. Abdy, Comb. 125; 3 Salk. 390; 1 Show. 8, the obligor was bound in a bond of £300 to pay £22, 10s. premium at the end of the first three months, and sixpence in the pound at the end of six months as a further premium, together with the principal, in case the obligor should then be living; but in case he died within that time, then the principal was to be lost. Holt, C. J., held that the bond was "manifestly usurious, for dying within half a year is no hazard; and if it should not be so, the statute would be easily evaded, and signify nothing."

In another case it was held that an agreement to pay £10 for the forbearance of £20 for one year, if the lender's son were then alive, would be usury.

Button v. Downham, Cro. Eliz. 643; Moore 398; Noy 73.

The case of Pike v. Ledwell, 5 Esp. N. P. Cas. 164, carries the doctrine of contingency very far. The defendant owned £400 in 3 per cent. consols, and it was agreed in consideration that the plaintiff would lend him £160 from May 5th, 1801 to Feb. 11th, 1804, that the defendant would, within seven days after the latter date, transfer to the plaintiff the sum of £400 in the consols, or pay such sum as they would produce in the market on that date. It was proved that the value of the consols when the agreement was made, was £240, and at the time of the action £225. It was argued that this was usury, for, as the consols were worth £240, and the plaintiff had paid but £160, he had gained £80 by his bargain, and the dividends in the mean time; that the contingency, that the consols might fall to 20 or 30 per cent. was an impossible supposition. But Lord Ellenborough held that, whatever remedy the defendant might have in equity, on the ground of this being a "catching bargain," he had none at law; that contingency in the thing purchased was incompatible with the idea of usury, in which the principal must always be certain. It was admitted that if the stocks, when transferred to the plaintiff, would be worth but £160, it would not be usury; and though it was very improbable that they would suffer that most extraordinary depreciation, still it was within the reach of possibility. He could not therefore say that there was not some contingency in the transaction, and he was consequently of the opinion that the contract was not usurious.

Future Price of Oil.—An agreement to pay an unlawful rate of interest upon a debt which, by its terms, is payable only at such time as the price of petroleum oil shall reach $1.15 per barrel, depends upon a contingency as to the payment of the principal, and is good. Truby v. Mosgrove, 118 Pa. St. 89; 4 Am. St. Rep. 575. In this case it appeared that between the time of the agreement and the time of bringing suit, the market price of oil exceeded $1.15, and it was not shown that that price was unprecedented or even unusual.

1. In Tyson v. Rickard, 3 Har. & J.

the agreement be to repay in money. A contract to pay both principal and unlawful interest in services or property is equally usurious.¹

The ordinary risk of loss by death, or insolvency of the borrower, is not such a hazard or contingency as justifies an excess of interest.²

If the principal and lawful interest, or the principal alone, is to be repaid at all events, no contingency in respect to the excess of interest, or to the entire interest, will be sufficient to remove the contract from the operation of the statute. A stipulation for even a chance of a profit beyond lawful interest is illegal.³

Upon the principle of hazard or uncertainty of repayment, advances of money on contracts of bottomry, post obit, and annuity, are held to be not within the operation of the statute.⁴

3. Unlawful Interest Must Be Agreed Upon.—The very essence of a usurious contract is that, for the loan or forbearance, a greater rate of interest than that allowed by the statute shall be paid or

(Md.) 109; 5 Am. Dec. 424, the court, by Buchanan, J., said: "A stipulation to repay the principal in money is not necessary to constitute a loan. It is enough if the principal is secured, and not bona fide put in hazard; and it matters not what the nature of the security is, if it is sufficient. As if a man borrows twenty pounds upon an agreement to pay ten pounds for interest for one year, and pawns goods to the lender of the value of one hundred pounds, on a stipulation in writing by the lender to return the goods on payment by the borrower of thirty pounds with interest thereon—this is an usurious lending, though there is no undertaking by the borrower to repay the principal."

In the case of Roberts v. Tremayne, Cro. Jac. 507, this distinction is clearly laid down by Doderidge, J.: "If I lend one £100 to have £120 at the year's end upon a casualty, if the casualty goes to the interest only, and not to the principal, it is usury; for the party is sure to have the principal again, come what will come; but if the interest and principal are both in hazard, it is not then usury." But see Grant v. Gordon, Comyn 583, which seems to hold that where the uncertainty goes only to the interest, the contract is not usurious.

An agreement that unless the debt and legal interest is collected upon a certain contingency, the debt shall bear unlawful interest from the outset, is usurious. Cooper v. Tappan, 9 Wis. 361.

An agreement to allow one's name to be used in a banking business, without sharing in the profits and losses, but that he shall receive as "his share of the profits" 10 per cent. per annum on all deposits made by him with the bank, is not usurious, because his right to receive anything depends upon the contingency of there being profits. Clift v. Barrow, 108 N. Y. 187.

Where the amount loaned is to be repaid with legal interest, at all events, and the lender has the privilege of taking certain stock at a specified and unfair price in payment of the loan at any time before maturity, the transaction is usurious. Cleveland v. Loder, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 557.

So, a usurious contract cannot be saved by an agreement that the debtor may forfeit the security given, and thus avoid payment in cash. Chapman v. Clark, 5 Mackey (U. S.) 527.

agreed to be paid.¹ Thus, where by the terms of the contract, the payment of an excess of interest is entirely at the option of the borrower, there is no usury.²

But, as already seen, it is not necessary that the agreement to pay unlawful interest should be absolute. If the principal and lawful interest, or even the principal alone, is to be paid at all events, an agreement for more than lawful interest upon the happening of some contingency other than non-payment of the debt at maturity, is sufficient to taint the transaction with usury.³ Neither is it at all necessary that the parties shall have designated the usurious compensation as interest, eo nomine. If the money, property, or other thing of value agreed upon, is intended as compensation for the use of the principal sum, it is, as a matter of law, interest.⁴

An agreement for unlawful interest may, it seems, be inferred from an unexplained retention by the lender of a portion of the loan, the whole amount of which bears interest at the highest rate.⁵

4. Corrupt Intent.—(See also, infra, this title, Mistake.)

Lastly, to constitute usury, it must, in all cases, be clearly proven that the contract was entered into with a corrupt usurious

The test as to whether a contract is usurious, is whether, if performed, it will result in securing to the lender a greater rate of interest than is permitted by law. Smith v. Parsons (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 311.

Promissory notes given when there was no statute on the subject of usury and no limit as to the amount of interest, are not usurious, no matter how much past interest or usury was embraced in them as a part of the principal. Neal v. Reynolds (Ga. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 530.

Indemnity.—In New York, where the highest lawful rate is six per cent., it is held that an instrument bearing eight per cent., of which two per cent. was intended by the parties as indemnity to the obligee for loss of interest in withdrawing deposits from a savings bank, is usurious, if the time for which interest is payable extends beyond the period necessary for such indemnity. In re Valentine's Estate, 63 Hun (N. Manure on Mortgaged Land.—An agreement, as a condition of a loan on a mortgage at the highest legal rate, to give the lender all the manure made on the mortgaged property, estimated at $100 per year, renders the mortgage usurious. In this case the mortgagee claimed and appropriated the manure for several years. Vilas v. McBride (N. Y. Sup. Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 171.

5. Egbert v. Peters, 35 Minn. 312. In this case, the only evidence was that of the debtor, to the effect that the creditors, at the time the note sued on was given, and which called for $200 at 10 per cent., gave him but $190, and told him that when he paid the note he would get the remaining $10. It was held that on this evidence the question of usury should have been submitted to the jury.

In the recent case of Barr v. African M. E. Church (N. J. 1887), 10 Atl. Rep. 287, it was held that the retention, by the lender's agent, of the money loaned, for several months after the intent.¹ But this means no more than that the parties must be shown to have knowingly agreed upon a rate of interest greater than that allowed by law. It is not necessary that they, either of them, actually intended to violate, or knew that they were violating the statute. If they have agreed upon a rate which, though unknown to them, exceeds the statutory limit, their contract is, notwithstanding their honesty of purpose, usurious.²

There are numerous dicta, and some decisions, to the effect that the usurious intent must be mutual, i. e., shared by both lender and borrower.³ On the other hand, recent and well-considered cases have repudiated the doctrine that the borrower's deliberate execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, and the collection of interest thereon from this date, constituted usury.

After a loan has been agreed upon at lawful interest and the securities executed, a refusal by the lender to pay the borrower the whole amount of the loan, and his retention of a part of it as a bonus, is not usury, because in violation of the contract. *Howell v. Though a security be in an amount greater than the debt, yet if the intention of the creditor is clear not to assert or enforce the security except for the sum actually payable, there is no usury. Bardwell v. Howe, Clark Ch. (N. Y.) 281.

A sum added to a note as a consideration for forbearance, must be treated as so much interest agreed upon, though the parties did not so understand it. Reed v. Helm, 15 Ind. 428.

In Burwell v. Burgwyn, 100 N. Car. 389, the court, by Smith, C. J., said: "The nature and terms of the contract determine its character and purpose; and, if usurious in itself, it must be understood to have been so intended by the parties, and they cannot be heard to the contrary."

Mistake of Law.—But where both parties honestly believed that the stipulated rate of interest was recoverable under the law, in which belief they were mistaken, it was held that the note was not void for usury. Thompson v. Jones, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 556.

assent is a necessary ingredient, and hold that there may be usury of which the borrower may avail himself, though he was ignorant of it at the time. These cases refuse to furnish the usurer with the means of escape from the law by permitting him to show that he deceived the borrower with false pretenses.¹

Snodgrass, 4 How. (Miss.) 573; Fay v. Lovejoy, 20 Wis. 407.

Mutual Intent.—Tyler, Usury, p. 103, gives the rule that, "It is not enough that the borrower intended to make a usurious agreement, but the intention to take the usury must have been in full contemplation of the parties, not of one party, but of both, to the transaction. There must be an aggregation mentium."

In Price v. Campbell, 2 Call (Va.) 110, 1 Am. Dec. 535, the court says, that usury "presupposes the consent of both borrower and lender to this effect; and without it there is no usurious contract, whatever may be the hopes, wishes, or expectations of either party."

In Smith v. Beach, 3 Day (Conn.) 268, it was held that where more than legal interest was reserved, with the knowledge of the creditor, but unknown to the debtor, the defense of usury could not be raised.

In the recent case of Smyth v. Allen, 67 Miss. 146, where the defense of usury was interposed in an action on a note, the trial court charged the jury that, "No express contract to pay usury is necessary to forfeit all interest; if the effect is that one realizes more than ten per cent. per annum, the law says that all the interest charged is forfeited and cannot be recovered." In reviewing this instruction the supreme court, by Woods, C. J., said: "The statute against usury is penal in its character, and no one should be made to suffer its forfeitures until first clearly shown to have fallen under its condemnation. Everything must be proven which is necessary to constitute the offense of usury before subjecting the supposed offender to the penalty of absolute forfeiture of all interest. Now, as was said by this court in Planters' Bank v. Snodgrass, 4 How. (Miss.) 573, 'there must be an agreement between the lender and the borrower of money by which the latter knowingly gives or promises, and the former knowingly takes or receives, a higher rate of interest than the statute allows, and with an intention to violate the statute,' in order to constitute usury. In the very nature of the case, in every usurious contract there must exist these two elements of knowingly taking or receiving a greater rate of interest than that fixed by statute, and of doing so intentionally. It follows, therefore, that when, by mistake of fact, by error in calculation, or by inadvertence in insertion of date, the effect of an engagement to pay money may be to receive a greater rate of interest than the statutory rate, yet such mistake, error or inadvertence will not stamp the taint of usury on such engagement, nor cause to be visited upon one who did not knowingly and intentionally disregard the law in this behalf the highly penal consequences of an usurious offense. In the light of the appellants' testimony, this was a case in which the excessive interest, if any there was, found its way into the notes of Houston by inadvertence in the insertion of an erroneous date of maturity." The instruction was held erroneous, and the judgment reversed.

In New York, the mutual assent of both parties is regarded as essential, and accordingly it has been held that where the creditor falsely caused the debtor to believe that a usurious bonus deducted from the amount of the loan was to pay for certain expenses claimed to have been incurred, there was no usury in the loan. Morton v. Thurber, 85 N. Y. 550. See also Aldrich v. Reynolds, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 43; Woodruff v. Hurson, 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 557; Powell v. Jones, 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 521; Guggenheimer v. Geiszler, 81 N. Y. 293.

In Madison University v. White, 25 Hun (N. Y.) 490, it was held that where the borrower received the full amount of the loan, the fact that, without his knowledge or consent, a third person paid the lender a bonus to induce him to make the loan, did not render it usurious.

1. Wright v. Elliott, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 391; Craig v. Pleiss, 26 Pa. St. 271.

Knowledge of Borrower Not Essential.—The doctrine that there can be no usury without the concurrence of both borrower and lender, was repudiated by the supreme court of Minnesota in the recent case of Lukens v. Hazlitt, 37 Minn. 441. The facts were that the plaintiff had given a usurious note to the defendant, which had become payable, and the defendant pretended that he would not consent to a renewal, but referred the plaintiff to one Kelly, from whom, he said, he thought the plaintiff could borrow the money with which to pay the note. The plaintiff accordingly applied to Kelly, and borrowed from him a sum sufficient to cover the amount due on the defendant's note, giving a new note for that amount to Kelly as payee, secured by a chattel mortgage. With this money he paid off the defendant's note. The fact was, as the jury found, that Kelly was acting secretly as the agent of the defendant, and that the transaction was merely a scheme to evade the appearance of receiving a renewal note. The plaintiff, however, had no suspicion but that he was actually borrowing the money from Kelly. In an action to recover the value of the property taken by virtue of the chattel mortgage, on the ground that the new note was merely a renewal of, and tainted with the usury in, the original note, the court held that the fact that the plaintiff was not a party to the arrangement described, did not prevent him from asserting the usury. Mitchell, J., in delivering the opinion, said: "There are some loose statements in the text-books, and perhaps some judicial authority to the effect, that to render a contract usurious both parties must be cognizant of the fact constituting usury, and must have a common purpose to evade the law. But it seems to us that it would be contrary, both to the language and policy of the usury law, to hold any such doctrine, as thus broadly stated. These laws are enacted to protect the weak and necessitous from oppression. The borrower is not particeps criminis with the lender, whatever his knowledge or intention may be. The lender alone is the violator of the law, and against him alone, are its penalties enacted. It would be indeed strange if the only party who could violate the law had intentionally done so, and could escape its penalty because by some devise or deception he had so deceived the borrower as to conceal from him the fact that he was taking usury."

In Otto v. Durege, 14 Wis. 574, Dixon, C. J., made use of the expression that, "To render a contract usurious, both parties must be cognizant of the facts constituting the usury, and have a common purpose of evading the law." The facts of that case, however, were that the lender was ignorant of his agent's act in taking usury, which was known to the borrower.

In the later case of First Nat. Bank v. Plankinton, 27 Wis. 177; 9 Am. Rep. 453, the court denied that the language quoted above was intended to apply as well to the borrower as to the lender. Dixon, C. J., speaking for the court, referring to the former case, said: "It was intended to assert no more than that in a case of that kind both parties must know the facts and intend the usury, or that the lender as well as the borrower must know them and intend it. And it was not intended to assert the opposite proposition, that if the lender knew and intended usury, but the borrower did not, the usurious nature of the transaction would not be established. No such proposition as this was involved in the case, or could have been adjudicated, and it was not intended to be. And it seems to us that it would be contrary to the language, spirit, policy, and intent of all our usury laws, and to the construction they have uniformly received, were it to be held that such proposition is in all cases true, or that it is true in a case like the present. It is a familiar doctrine or rule of construction with respect to these laws, supposed to be enacted to protect the weak and necessitous from being overreached and oppressed by the powerful and the rich, that both parties are not particeps criminis, but only the lender can be regarded as the oppressor, and he alone is within the pale of the law. All the penalties of the law are enacted against him, and he alone can be guilty of a violation of it. From the advantages of his position it is supposed he may dictate such terms and conditions as he chooses, while the borrower, from the necessities of his, is bound to submit to his demands. Hence the borrower, whatever his knowledge or intention may be, is always regarded as innocent. . . . And it would be very strange, we think, in view of this settled doctrine and policy of the law, it clearly appearing that the only party who could commit the offense had in fact intended to commit, and had committed it, were it to be held that he was innocent and had incurred no penalty,

Where a corrupt agreement for usury has been made, it is not purged by the fact that the lender, through mistake, actually paid the borrower more than the sum expressed in the contract.¹

IV. USURY STATUTES AND THEIR CONSTRUCTION—1. Statutory Provisions.—The existing statutory provisions in the various states relating to the rate of interest, and the consequences of usury, are outlined and summarized below.²

merely because the other party to the contract, whom the law regards as blameless, and who could not commit the offense, did not know such unlawful intent, or the fact that the contract was usurious, at the time of entering into it. To illustrate, we might suppose the parties, in a proper case, to be contracting with reference to the laws of some other state or country, which are taken notice of as facts, and that the borrower, being ignorant of or mistaken as to the true and lawful rate of interest fixed and allowed by such laws, should pay or agree to pay a greater rate, and one which was unlawful and usurious by those laws, believing it to be lawful; and that the lender, well knowing it to be unlawful and usurious, should bargain for and accept the same; would not the promise or obligation of the borrower be usurious and void in the hands of the lender? It seems to us very clearly it would; and just so we would say of any other fact constituting usury, known to the lender and showing his actual and intended violation of the law, no matter whether the same fact was known to the borrower at the time or not. And we believe there is nothing in the case of Otto v. Durege, either in the point decided or in the language of the opinion, in conflict with this view."

1. Cantey v. Blair, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 41.

2. Alabama.—In this state the maximum rate of interest is eight per cent. Usurious contracts cannot be enforced, except as to the principal, "and if any interest has been paid, the same must be deducted from the principal, and judgment rendered for the balance only." If usury be proved, the defendant is entitled to full costs. See Alabama Civil Code (1886), §§ 1750, 1754, 2839.

It is held that the provisions of the statute are not applicable to an action to recover specific property in which the usurious contract is material only as evidence of title. Bradford v. Dan- iel, 65 Ala. 133. But see Gardner v. Matteson, 38 Mich. 200.

Arizona.—Here there is no usury law. Parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest whatever on money due or to become due, and the judgment on such contract shall bear the agreed rate. See Arizona Rev. Stat. (1887), § 2162.

Arkansas.—"All contracts for a greater rate of interest than ten per centum per annum shall be void as to principal and interest, and the general assembly shall prohibit the same by law." Arkansas Const., art. 19, § 13. All bonds, bills, notes and all other contracts or securities whatever, at more than ten per cent., are declared void. Mansf. Arkansas Digest (1884), § 4735.

In California, there is no usury law. "Parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest, and it shall be allowed, according to the terms of the agreement, until the entry of judgment." California Civil Code (1876), § 1918.

Colorado.—"Parties to any bond, bill or promissory note, or other instrument of writing, may stipulate therein for the payment of a greater or higher rate of interest than eight per cent. per annum." Mills Anno. Colorado Stat. (1891), § 2253.

Connecticut.—The legal rate, in the absence of agreement, is six per cent. 360 days may be computed as a year. "Interest at the rate of six per cent. a year, and no more, may be recovered in civil actions including actions to recover money loaned at a greater rate as damages for the detention of money after it becomes payable." No borrower shall be permitted to set off or recover back any sum paid as interest, discount, or damages, in excess of six per cent. Connecticut Gen. Stat. (1888), §§ 2941, 2942, 2943.

Under a statute allowing a certain rate of interest to be contracted for "in writing," a note, the principal of which includes interest computed at such rate, but not designated in the note as interest, does not constitute an agreement in writing for such rate of interest, and is not within the protection of the statute. Rosenbluth v. Dunn, 41 Conn. 619.

In Delaware, if any person directly or indirectly takes more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum, he shall forfeit and pay to anyone who will sue for the same, a sum equal to the money lent—one-half for the use of the person so suing, the other half for the use of the state. Delaware Rev. Code (1874), ch. 63, § 1.

District of Columbia.—Here parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Usury forfeits all interest, but does not affect the debt. All payments of interest under a usurious contract may be recovered back by suit within one year from the time of payment. District of Columbia Rev. Stat., §§ 713-716.

The defendant in a suit to recover a debt upon which he had paid usurious interest more than a year before the suit, is not entitled to have such payments deducted from the debt, either under the statute or at common law. Carter v. Carusi, 112 U. S. 478. See also Kleindienst v. Johnson, 7 Mackey (D. C.) 356.

Florida.—Here the legal rate is eight per cent., but "It shall not be usury to loan or to borrow money, etc., at rates beyond those now allowed by law." McClellan's Florida Dig. (1881), ch. 123, §§ 1, 2.

Georgia.—The legal rate is seven per cent., and any higher rate must be specified in writing, but in no event to exceed eight per cent. Any person taking or agreeing to take more than eight per cent. forfeits the excess of interest, and the amount of such forfeit may be pleaded as a set-off. All titles to property made as a part of an usurious contract or to evade the laws against usury, are void. See Georgia Code (1882), §§ 2050, 2057(b), 2057(c), 2057(f).

It is held that where the contract sued on calls for more than seven per cent., but the plaintiff fails to show what rate of interest was actually taken, no interest whatever can be recovered, and payments of interest must be applied on the principal. Lilly v. De Laperiere, 76 Ga. 348; Crane v. Goodwin, 77 Ga. 362.

Mortgages.—Though the statute declares all "titles" void for usury, a mortgage to secure a usurious debt is not absolutely void, because a mortgage does not pass title; but to the extent that usury affects the debt, the mortgage security is also impaired and can be enforced only as to the residue. Hodge v. Brown, 81 Ga. 276.

But an absolute deed, though intended as an equitable mortgage, is utterly void under the statute, and cannot be treated as a mortgage. McLaren v. Clark, 80 Ga. 423.

Under the Georgia Act of Feb. 24th, 1875, a parol contract for twelve per cent. interest, secured by an absolute deed of land, does not render the deed void; and the debtor must offer to pay the amount actually due with seven per cent. interest. Evans v. Dial, 88 Ga. 209.

Idaho.—The legal rate is ten per cent. Parties may agree in writing for any rate not to exceed one and one half per cent. per month. Compound interest is not allowed, but a debtor may agree in writing to pay interest upon interest overdue at the date of such agreement. Usury works a forfeiture at the rate of ten per cent. per annum upon the amount of the contract, in favor of the school funds. The creditor cannot recover any interest or costs. Bona fide indorsees of negotiable paper are protected. See Idaho Rev. Stat. (1887), §§ 1264, 1265, 1266.

Illinois.—The parties may agree in writing for eight per cent. The penalty for usury is the forfeiture of all interest. Twelve months of thirty days each may be treated as a year. No corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action. All contracts providing for a greater rate than eight per cent. as penalty for non-payment at maturity are usurious. Starr & C. Illinois Annot. Stat. (1885), ch. 74, §§ 4-11.

An agreement to pay two per cent. damages for non-payment of a note within three days after maturity is within the statute. McNail v. Welch, 26 Ill. App. 482.

Agreement Essential to Forfeiture.—In order to work a forfeiture under the statute, there must have been an agreement for usury. A payment of excessive interest without any agreement therefor will simply be applied on the principal. Hawke v. Snyder, 86 Ill. 197.

In Indiana, the parties may agree in writing for eight per cent. Usury works a forfeiture of the excess reserved beyond six per cent. Indiana Rev. Stat. (1888), §§ 5198, 5201.

In Iowa, the parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Usury works a forfeiture in favor of the school fund, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. The assignee in good faith of any usurious contract may recover from the usurer the full amount paid by him for the assignment. McClain's Iowa Annot. Code (1888), §§ 3253, 3257.

Forfeiture to School Fund.—The court in an action on the contract may determine the amount of the forfeiture in favor of the school fund. Seekel v. Norman, 71 Iowa 264.

The right of forfeiture to the state cannot be affected by any settlement or stipulation between the parties pending a suit on the debt. Reynolds v. Babcock, 60 Iowa 289.

Where part payments have been made upon a usurious debt, in rendering judgment in favor of the school fund, interest should be computed upon the unpaid balance of the debt. Sheldon v. Mickel, 40 Iowa 19; Lombard v. Gregory, 81 Iowa 569.

Contract Necessary.—The statutory forfeiture is incurred only where unlawful interest has been received in pursuance of the contract of loan. Sexton v. Murdock, 36 Iowa 516.

Kansas.—Here parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Usury forfeits the excess over that rate, and also a sum of money, to be deducted from the amount due for principal and lawful interest, equal to the amount of interest contracted for in excess of ten per cent. Bona fide indorsees of negotiable paper before maturity are protected. Kansas Gen. Stat. (1889), §§ 3498, 3499.

In Kentucky, all contracts and assurances, made directly or indirectly, for the loan or forbearance of money, or other thing of value, at a greater rate than six per cent. are void as to the excess. Such excess may be recovered from the lender or forbearer, although the payment thereof was made to his assignee. Kentucky Gen. Stat. (1888), ch. 60, §§ 1-4. Usury paid must be sued for within a year after payment. Kentucky Gen. Stat., ch. 71, art. 3, § 4.

Where the defendant paid a judgment on a usurious debt, and eighteen months later appealed and obtained a reversal, it was held that the statute did not begin to run against his right to recover back until the reversal of the judgment. Kendall v. Crouch, 88 Ky. 199.

It is held that the statute does not bar a debtor from setting up usury as a defense when sued on the debt, and recovering an affirmative judgment for the amount of payments of interest in excess of the principal and legal interest. Rudd v. Anderson (Ky. 1890), 14 S. W. Rep. 340.

In Louisiana, the parties may agree in writing for eight per cent. If any person pays more, he may sue for it within a year from the time of payment. Interest upon interest cannot be recovered, unless it be added to the principal and by another contract made a new debt. No stipulation to that effect in the original contract is valid. Louisiana Rev. Civ. Code (1882), arts. 2923, 1939.

A negotiable promissory note including more than eight per cent. interest or discount, is enforceable, but it shall not bear more than eight per cent. after maturity. Louisiana Rev. Civ. Code, (1882), art. 2924.

Under this statute, one who discounts a note for the maker at a discount of nine per cent. is entitled to recover the whole amount of the note, where by its terms it bears only eight per cent. interest after maturity. Mutual Nat. Bank v. Regan, 40 La. Ann. 17.

In Maine, the only provision in regard to interest seems to be the following: "In the absence of an agreement in writing, the legal rate of interest is six per cent. a year." Maine Rev. Stat. (1883), ch. 45, § 1.

In Maryland, interest may be charged or deducted at the rate of six per centum per annum, and the same may be calculated according to the standard laid down in Rowlett's Tables. Usury forfeits the excess above legal interest. After the debt has been paid, the debtor has no cause of action on account of the usury. Innocent purchasers of negotiable paper are protected. Maryland Pub. Gen. Laws (Rev. 1888), art. 49, §§ 1-6.

The word payment, as used in the statute denying the right to recover back usury paid, means an actual bona fide payment, and not merely a new security without any change in the debt. Border State, etc., Bldg. Assoc. v. Hayes, 61 Md. 597; Border State, etc., Bldg. Assoc. v. Hilleary, 68 Md. 52.

In Massachusetts, the legal rate, in the absence of agreement, is six per cent., "but it shall be lawful to pay, reserve, or contract for any rate of interest or of discount," if contracted for in writing. Bonds of corporations must not bear interest at a greater rate than seven per cent. Massachusetts Pub. Stat. (1882), ch. 77, § 3.

By a recent act, it is provided that all loans for less than $1,000 shall be dischargeable upon the payment of principal with interest at eighteen per cent. All payments made in excess of that rate shall be applied on the principal. Act of May 22d, 1888. (Supp. to Massachusetts Pub. Stat., ch. 388, § 1.)

In Michigan, the parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Contracts for usurious interest are not void, but the excess cannot be recovered. Innocent purchasers of negotiable paper are protected. Howell's Michigan Annot. Stat. (1882), §§ 1594-1596.

The language of the statute being that usury does not avoid the contract, but that "in an action on the contract" the amount of usury shall be excluded, it is held that the question of usury may be raised in an action of replevin for goods seized by a creditor under a chattel mortgage given to secure an existing usurious debt. Gardner v. Matteson, 38 Mich. 200.

Minnesota.—Here the parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Interest cannot be compounded except by agreement after due. An agreement for a greater rate of interest after maturity than before works a forfeiture of the entire interest. Usurious contracts and securities are absolutely void, but innocent purchasers of negotiable paper are protected. A debtor may sue to have a usurious contract canceled. Interest may be computed according to Rowlett's Tables. Kelly's Minnesota Stat. (1891), §§ 2089, 2092.

In Mississippi, the parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. An agreement for more works a forfeiture of all interest. Mississippi Rev. Code (1880), § 1141.

It is held that where usurious interest has been paid under a contract fully executed, only the excess over ten per cent. can be recovered back. Dickerson v. Thomas, 67 Miss. 777.

In Missouri, the parties may agree in writing for eight per cent. Usury forfeits all interest. Interest may be compounded annually, by agreement in writing. Missouri Rev. Stat. (1889), §§ 5972-5977, as amended by Act of April 23d, 1891, reducing the rate from ten to eight per cent. Proof of usury renders void all mortgages and pledges of personal property, and all liens whatsoever thereon. Missouri Act of April 21st, 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 170).

In Montana, the legal rate is ten per cent., but parties may agree in writing for the payment of any greater rate. Montana Comp. Stat. (1888), §§ 1236-1238.

In Nebraska, ten per cent. may be contracted for. Usury does not render the contract void, but forfeits all interest, and entitles the defendant to costs. If the interest has been paid, it must be deducted from the principal. "The acts and dealings of an agent in loaning money shall bind the principal, and in all cases where there is illegal interest by the transaction of the agent, the principal will be held thereby as if he had done the same in person. Where the same person acts as agent for the borrower, who obtains the money from the lender, he shall be deemed to be the agent of the loaner also." Nebraska Consol. Stat. (1891), §§ 2021-2025.

In Nevada, the legal rate is ten per cent., but parties may agree in writing for any greater rate. Nevada Gen. Stat. (1885), §§ 4900-4904.

In New Hampshire, the legal rate is six per cent., and if any person receives more, he shall forfeit three times the sum so received in excess of six per cent. to the person aggrieved, who will sue therefor. Usury does not invalidate the contract, but the amount actually due may be recovered, with six per cent., after deducting as payments any excess of interest received. New Hampshire Pub. Stat. (1891), ch. 203.

In New Jersey, the highest legal rate is six per cent. New Jersey Act of March 27th, 1874, as amended by act of Feb. 26th, 1878.

Usury forfeits all interest and costs of suit, and if any premium or illegal interest has been paid, such payment must be deducted from the principal. All usurious contracts made in Monmouth County are utterly void. New Jersey Revision (1877), pp. 519, 520.

In New Mexico, the parties may agree in writing for twelve per cent. To charge or receive more is a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, and also by forfeiture to the debtor of double the amount collected or received, if sued for within three years. New Mexico Comp. Laws (1884), §§ 1736-1739.

In New York, the highest legal rate is six per cent. Usury renders the contract void. A party paying usury may sue to recover it within one year from the time of payment. A borrower is entitled to be relieved from contract, and to have discovery without offering to pay principal or interest. The use of Rowlett's Tables is allowed. "No corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action." New York Rev. Stat. (8th ed.), vol. 4, pp. 2512-2515. In the by-laws of 1882, ch. 237, it is provided that advances payable on demand to an amount not less than $5,000, on warehouse receipts, bills of lading, certificates of stock, certificates of deposit, bills of exchange, bonds, or other negotiable instruments pledged as security, may bear any rate of interest agreed on in writing. Under this act it is held that a loan of certificates of stock in the hands of third persons as trustees comes within the protection of the act, since the possession of the certificates by the trustees does not affect their negotiability. Frost v. Stokes, 55 N. Y. Super. Ct. 76.

Bank Act.—By New York Laws (1882), ch. 409, § 68, it is provided in substance that every banking association and every private and individual banker doing business in New York, may charge six per cent. interest; and that if they knowingly charge a greater rate, the entire interest shall be forfeited, and, if it has been paid, double the amount may be recovered "from the association or private or individual banker receiving the same." By § 69, it is declared that the true intent and meaning of the preceding section is to place and continue such banking concerns on an equality with national banks in the particulars referred to.

It is held that a partnership engaged in the business of banking is within the meaning of this act, and exempt from the general usury law. Perkins v. Smith, 116 N. Y. 441, affirming 41 Hun (N. Y.) 47.

In North Carolina, the legal rate is six per cent., but parties may agree in writing under signature, for as high as eight per cent. Usury forfeits the entire interest, and the debtor may recover back, within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred, twice the amount of interest paid. North Carolina Code, (1883), §§ 3835, 3836.

Running of Statute.—The expression "from the time the usurious transaction occurred," has reference to the time when the usury was paid. Pritchard v. Meekins, 98 N. Car. 244.

Assurances.—An absolute deed of land given as security for a usurious loan, is an "assurance for the payment of money," within the meaning of a statute declaring such assurances void. Shober v. Hauser, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 91.

In North Dakota, the legal rate is seven per cent., but parties may agree in writing for twelve per cent. Usury renders all contracts void ab initio, except as to negotiable paper in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity. In all written contracts for the loan of money, the exact amount agreed upon to be received for the use, by the borrower, shall be stated, and, separately therefrom, the rate per cent. thereon of interest contracted to be charged; and if in any contract, either verbal or written, for the loan of money, the borrower receives a less sum than the principal sum so agreed upon and contracted to be loaned to and received by the borrower, the said contract shall be deemed to be usurious, except as otherwise herein provided. It is then provided that any broker, loan agent, or other person may receive a compensation for obtaining a loan, or forbearance, where such compensation, added to the interest expressed, does not exceed twelve per cent. per annum. If such compensation and interest exceed that rate, the whole contract is usurious and void. North Dakota Laws (1890), ch. 184.

Compensation Added to Interest.—Where a loan was made without the assistance of an agent, the borrower received from the lender $500, and gave his note for $575, payable in five years with interest at seven per cent. The $75 was by agreement retained by the lender as a bonus for making the loan. The defense of usury being set up in an action on the note, the court held that although the bonus added to the seven per cent. rate of interest would not exceed twelve per cent. per annum for the five years, yet the lender could not avail himself of the statutory provision in regard to adding the compensation and interest. Vermont L. & T. Co. v. Whithed, 2 N. Dak. 82.

By a later act, usury is defined as "the taking, receiving or accepting" of a greater rate of interest than allowed by law. It is made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person, company, or corporation to take, receive, or accept usury or to sell or assign any usurious contract without first notifying the purchaser of its usurious character. North Dakota Laws (1891), ch. 124.

In Ohio, the parties may agree in writing for eight per cent. The payments of usurious interest may be deducted from the principal. Bona fide indorsees of negotiable paper before maturity are protected. Ohio Rev. Stat. (Smith & B. 1890), §§ 3179-3183.

In Oregon, the highest legal rate is ten per cent. Usury works a forfeiture of the entire debt to the school fund, and judgment may be rendered therefor against the defendant without interest, and against the plaintiff for costs. The bona fide assignee of any usurious contract without notice of the usury, may recover against his assignor or against the usurer the full amount paid by him. Agreements for payment of taxes on the debt, credit, or mortgage are valid. Hill's Oregon Annot. Laws (1892), §§ 3587-3594.

Forfeiture to School Fund.—It is held that the state is not authorized to intervene in a suit on the debt, for the purpose of having the same forfeited to the school fund on the ground of usury. Holladay v. Holladay, 13 Oregon 523.

In Pennsylvania, the highest legal rate is six per cent. Usury forfeits the excess merely. If the debt and excessive interest have been paid, the borrower may sue to recover back the excess within six months of the time of payment. Bona fide purchasers of negotiable paper are protected. Bright. Purd. Pennsylvania Dig., vol. 1, p. 926.

In Rhode Island, there is no usury law. The interest, in the absence of an agreement, is six per cent. Rhode Island Pub. Stat. (1882), ch. 141.

In South Carolina, the legal rate is seven per cent., but parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Usury forfeits all interest and costs of suit, and where the illegal interest has been paid, the debtor may recover double the amount paid, either by separate suit or by counterclaim in an action on the debt. South Carolina Acts of 1882, p. 36.

Discounting.—Under this statute, where a note drawing ten per cent. per annum is discounted by a bank at ten per cent. on the principal and interest not yet due, the excessive charge of discount (three per cent.) on the interest, is usury. It is not necessary that the taking of excessive interest should be willfully or knowingly corrupt. Carolina Sav. Bank v. Parrott, 30 S. Car. 61.

Agreement in Writing.—An agreement in writing between the maker and payee of a note bearing seven per cent., made eight months after maturity in consideration of an extension of time, to pay ten per cent. interest from maturity, is valid, under the statute. Utley v. Cavender, 31 S. Car. 282.

Double Recovery.—It is held that the borrower can recover, under the statute, double the amount of the excess only, not double the whole amount of interest paid. Hardin v. Trimmier, 30 S. Car. 391.

In South Dakota, the territorial law is still in force. The highest legal rate is twelve per cent. Usury forfeits all interest, but does not affect the debt. Payments of usury may be recovered back. One year's interest may be taken in advance. Dakota Comp. Laws (1887), §§ 3715-3725.

By a later act, it is declared that, "Every person who directly or indirectly receives any interest, discount, or consideration upon the loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action, greater than is allowed by law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." South Dakota Laws (1889), ch. 133.

National Banks.—The penal provisions of this act are held applicable to national banks. State v. First Nat. Bank (S. Dak. 1892), 51 N. W. Rep. 587.

In Tennessee, the highest legal rate is six per cent., and every excess over that rate is usury. A defendant may avoid the excess over legal interest by a plea setting forth the amount of usury. Payments of usury may be recovered back by the debtor or his representatives, or they may be subjected by any judgment creditor of such party to the satisfaction of his debt. Tennessee Code (1884), ch. 17.

Chartered Banks.—Tennessee Pub. Acts. (1859-60), ch. 129, entitled, "An Act to Encourage the Use of Private Capital," and which provides that, "All persons, partnerships, and associations of persons paying taxes for use of money as money dealers," shall be allowed to receive deposits, issue drafts, make discounts, etc., but shall not be allowed to take more than lawful interest on discounts, under a prescribed penalty, does not apply to chartered banks. State v. Lookout Bank, 89 Tenn. 278.

In Texas, the parties may agree in writing for twelve per cent. Usury avoids all interest, but does not affect the debt. The defense of usury must be specially pleaded and verified. Sayles Texas Stat., arts. 2972-2981.

2. Statutory Construction—a. IN GENERAL.—The word "void," in statutes relating to usurious contracts, is ordinarily used in the sense of voidable at the option of the debtor.¹

Usury statutes are not to be regarded as impairing the validity of the principal debt, unless such intention is expressed. The interest alone is deemed forfeited.²

The true construction of statutes regulating interest upon the loan or forbearance of money, goods, or things in action, is that no greater rate of compensation than that prescribed shall be taken upon a loan or forbearance of money, directly or indirectly, by way of loan of property or in any other manner, no matter how disguised.³

b.* EFFECT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.—In some of the

In Utah, there is no usury law. The lawful rate, in the absence of an agreement, is ten per cent. Utah Comp. Laws (1888), § 2119.

In Vermont, the highest legal rate is six per cent. Overdue installments of interest bear interest from maturity. Payments of excess over lawful rate may be recovered back by action of assumpsit. Savings banks may receive six per cent. payable semi-annually. Vermont Rev. Laws (1880), §§ 1996–2001, 3590.

In Virginia, the highest legal rate is six per cent. Usury forfeits all interest, but does not affect the debt. Banks may compute interest according to Rowlett's Tables, and receive the same in advance. Payment of excess over legal interest may be recovered back, by suit brought within one year. Any judgment creditor may compel by bill in equity, another creditor to pay over all excessive interest received from a common debtor. No corporation shall plead usury, by way of defense or otherwise, to defeat its contracts for interest. Virginia Code (1887), §§ 2814–2826.

In Washington, the legal rate is ten per cent., but "any rate of interest agreed upon by the parties to a contract, specifying the same in writing, shall be valid and legal." Hill's Washington Annot. Stat. (1891), §§ 2397, 2398.

In West Virginia, the highest legal rate is six per cent. Usury avoids the excess of interest only. In actions on the debt, payments of excess must be credited thereon. West Virginia Code (1891), ch. 96.

No corporation shall interpose the defense of usury in any suit or proceeding, nor shall any of its debts or obligations be set aside, impaired, or adjudged invalid under the usury laws. West Virginia Code (1891), p. 500, § 22.

In Wisconsin, the legal rate is seven per cent., but parties may agree in writing for ten per cent. Interest cannot be compounded, unless agreed on in writing. Usury forfeits all interest, but does not affect the debt. No corporation shall interpose the defense of usury. Any person paying or delivering usury may recover treble the excess over the lawful rate, by suit brought within a year from time of payment. Sanb. & B. Wisconsin Annot. Stat., §§ 1688–1692.

Treble Recovery.—The delivery of possession of land by the debtor, under an agreement to convey in payment of usury, but not accompanied by any conveyance, is not a "delivery" sufficient to sustain the action. Howe v. Carpenter, 49 Wis. 697.

The provision in regard to treble recovery does not preclude the debtor from recovering back the excess paid as at common law. Schriber v. Le Clair, 66 Wis. 579.

In Wyoming, any rate of interest may be agreed upon; but if above twelve per cent. must be in writing. In the absence of an agreement, twelve per cent. is the legal rate. Wyoming Rev. Stat. (1887), §§ 1310, 1311.

2. Dawson v. Burrus, 73 Ala. 111.

Recovery upon a usurious note is not defeated by a statute making usury a misdemeanor, where a civil statute provides that a person taking a higher interest than a specified rate shall forfeit all interest so taken, without forfeiting any of the principal, and that the excess paid may be recovered from the person taking it. Waite v. Bartlett, 53 Mo. App. 378.

states there are constitutional provisions limiting the rate of interest and directing the legislature to enact the proper penalties and forfeitures for usury. The tendency of the courts is to hold that such provisions are self-executing, requiring no legislative action to make them operative, and that all contracts for more than the constitutional rate are unlawful and void.¹

c. "BORROWER."—In some of the states, notably in New York,² the right is given to the "borrower" to have a usurious contract annulled and the securities restored without offering to pay the amount actually due. The question who are included within the term "borrower," has frequently been considered by the courts, and the rule is now well established that the statutory privilege is strictly personal to the original debtor, and does not pass to his assignee for the benefit of creditors, nor to a creditor,³ nor to the debtor's heirs, devisees, or personal representatives,⁴ nor to mere accommodation parties to negotiable paper,⁵ nor to the grantee of property covered by a usurious mortgage.⁶

It is even held that where the original borrower parts with his title to the property mortgaged as security for the usurious debt, either by conveyance or by assignment in bankruptcy, and subsequently reacquires the title by purchase, he thereby becomes a purchaser and not a "borrower," within the meaning of the statute.⁷ But parties jointly liable with the principal debtor, as sureties, are held to be "borrowers."⁸

d. PENALTIES NOT ENFORCIBLE ELSEWHERE.—The general rule that the penal provisions of a statute have no extra-territorial operation and will not be enforced outside of the state where enacted, applies to penalties imposed by usury laws. Unless the nature of the penalty is such as to avoid the contract itself, courts of other states will decline to enforce it.¹ Thus, a statutory provision forfeiting three times the amount of usurious interest paid, cannot be enforced outside the state;² nor can a forfeiture in favor of the public-school fund³ be enforced.

In Maryland, the constitutional provision was that no higher rate of interest than six per cent. should be taken or demanded, and that the legislature should provide suitable penalties. It was held that such provision did not, in the absence of legislative enactment, render a contract void under which a higher rate had been taken or reserved. Bandel v. Isaac, 13 Md. 202.

5. Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373; Toole v. Cook, 16 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 142.

6. Mortgagor's Grantee.—The word "borrower" was extended to the grantee of a mortgagor, in the case of Cole v. Savage, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 583; but such construction was overruled by the court of errors in Post v. Bank of Utica, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 391. Also by the court of appeals in Rexford v. Widger, 2 N. Y. 131; Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 93; Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373. See also Beecher v. Ackerman, 1 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 141.

e. EFFECT OF REPEAL OR AMENDMENTS.—It is clear that the legislature cannot constitutionally, by any new enactment, render usurious an existing contract valid under the law in force at the time it was made, because such an act would impair the obligation of contracts.⁴ But such new act may properly govern a subsequent agreement for an extension of time upon the original terms, that being in effect a new contract.⁵

Where an amendment was to take effect "on and after" a day named, a contract made on that day has been held to be subject to its provisions.⁶

It would seem clear, also, that a contract declared to be void by the law in force at the time of making it, cannot be rendered valid or enforceable by the subsequent repeal of the law; and some courts so hold.⁷ But, on the other hand, it has been held that the repeal of a statute forfeiting a debt for usury precludes

If a contract for interest was valid when made, it will be enforced, notwithstanding a change in the statute reducing the rate of interest below the rate agreed upon. Richardson v. Campbell, 27 Neb. 644.

5. Story v. Kimbrough, 33 Ga. 21.

Under a provision that the act should not apply to existing contracts, a usurious bond subsequently given in place of a note executed before the enactment of the statute, cannot be enforced, but a recovery may be had on the note, under the law in force at its date. Webb v. Bishop, 101 N. Car. 99.

Where the interest reserved in a note was lawful at the date of its execution, but afterward a statute was passed fixing a lower rate, a new note subsequently given for the unpaid balance, with interest reserved at the original rate, is usurious. Watson v. Mims, 56 Tex. 451.

Where, on the execution and delivery of a note bearing legal interest, a check is given for the amount loaned, the enactment, subsequent to such delivery but before the payment of the check, of a law reducing the rate of interest, cannot operate to invalidate such note. Jump v. Johnson (Ky. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 843.

Agreement for Future Transactions.—An agreement for a certain rate of interest on future transactions cannot prevail over the terms of a statute enacted subsequently to the making of the agreement, but before closing the transactions. Norcum v. Lum, 33 Miss. 299.

the defense and entitles the creditor to recover the usurious debt.¹ Also, that an act validating and confirming contracts for the payment of a rate of interest illegal at the time of contracting, is constitutional.² And where at the time a usurious contract was made the statute in force declared it null and void, but at the time of entering a decree in an action thereon the statute had been changed so as to avoid such contracts only as to the interest, it was held that the decree should be for the principal of the debt.³

Securities given after the repeal of the usury laws, in renewal of others which were usurious, and given while such laws were in force, are held to be valid, the original receipt of the money being a sufficient consideration for the new promise to pay it.⁴

In respect to matters affecting merely the remedy and procedure, the statute in force at the time of suit governs.⁵ Thus, a forfeiture for usury cannot be enforced after the repeal of the law under which it was incurred,⁶ and a statute changing the penalty applies to suits thereafter brought, though based upon contracts made before such enactment.⁷

After the repeal of the usury law, a stipulation by which interest at a higher rate than allowed under that law was computed from a date prior to such repeal, was held valid, in Taylor v. Thomas, 61 Ga. 472.

Voluntary Payment After Repeal.—

After the repeal of a law authorizing the recovery of three times the amount of usury paid, a voluntary payment of usury, according to the terms of a contract entered into prior to such repeal, cannot be recovered back, even though the repealing act declared that it should not affect "any existing contract, or action pending, or existing right of action." Seavey v. Moors, 103 Mass. 317.

Accrued Rights.—But the repeal of the usury law does not destroy a right of action for the recovery of usury paid while the law was in force. Whitaker v. Pope, 2 Woods (U. S.) 463; Hunter v. Hatch, 45 Ill. 178.

At the time a note bearing more than six per cent. interest was given, a statute allowed the maker to file a plea that it was not given for money loaned, and thus escape liability for the excess over six per cent. It was held that the repeal of the statute did not deprive the maker of the benefit of such plea. Seegar v. Seegar, 19 Ill. 121.

But see Maynard v. Marshall (Ga. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 403, where it was held that the Georgia Act, Sept. 27th, 1881, amending Georgia Act, Oct. 14th, 1879, by making the forfeiture for usury merely the excess of interest, instead of the whole interest charged, does not, in view of the rule that amendatory statutes are to be construed as prospective and not retroactive in their operation, unless the intent that they shall apply to past transactions is plainly expressed, operate upon contracts entered into before its passage.

New Penalties.—By the law in force at the time a usurious loan was made and a note given therefor, the only penalty incurred by the lender for charging more than lawful interest was a forfeiture of all interest and costs in a suit to recover the debt. Three days after the loan was made, a law was passed providing that anyone "who shall receive as interest, any greater amount than is herein pro-

A statute reducing the penalty prescribed by a law in force at the time of making a contract, and permitting its enforcement to the extent of its validity under the prior law, does not impair the obligation of the contract.¹ And it has been held that where the rate of interest contracted for is unlawful at the time, but when suit is brought the law allows such rate to be contracted for, the latter law governs.²

The law in force at the time of suit governs as to the recoupment of usurious interest paid.³

An act declaring that an earlier act shall not be construed to apply to suits pending at the time of its passage, is not unconstitutional as interfering with vested rights or as an encroachment upon the judiciary.⁴

V. USURY AS A CRIMINAL OFFENSE.—The question whether the taking of usury was an indictable offense at common law, after the enactment of the statute prescribing a penalty, is not well settled. Some early cases expressly hold that if judgment cannot be given under the statute, it shall be given at common law, as where there has been a taking of usurious interest without a previous express contract; and the proper punishment is said to be fine and imprisonment.⁵

vided for, shall, in addition to the forfeiture herein provided for, forfeit also double the sum so received." After the passage of that act the lender received payment in full of his debt, together with interest and a usurious sum included in the note. In an action against the lender to recover the penalty provided by the new law, it was contended that, inasmuch as there was no such penalty at the time the contract was made, that contract could not be affected by the subsequent statute, nor any penalty imposed upon the defendant for acts done in carrying it out; that a different construction would give the act a retrospective operation, and impair the obligation of the contract. But the court held that the only valid contract made by the parties was one for the repayment of the principal sum loaned, without interest, for the reason that as to the interest, the law then in force made it void, and that the subsequent act, imposing a penalty for receiving the usurious interest, did not interfere with the said valid part of the contract; also that the act was not retrospective because its only operation was to punish the defendant for the commission of an act since its passage, viz., the receiving of interest at a rate which was unlawful at the time the contract was made. Hardin v. Trim-mer, 27 S. Car. 110.

An agreement for twelve per cent. on a loan was made at a time when the law limited interest to six per cent. and forfeited all interest for usury. Subsequently the law was amended so as to allow a recovery of six per cent. if more was reserved. While that law was in force, a new note was given for the debt, with compound interest at twelve per cent. included. Thereafter the law was again amended so as to make ten per cent. the maximum rate. Subsequent to that amendment, two renewal notes were given in which compound interest at twelve per cent. was also included. In an action on the last note, it was held that only the original debt with interest at ten per cent. to maturity of the last note, could be recovered. Colehour v. State Sav. Inst., 90 Ill. 152.

On the other hand, an indictment

In some of the American statutes the taking of usury is declared to be a misdemeanor and indictable, but the reported cases of such method of punishment are not numerous. The gist of the offense consists in actually taking unlawful interest, not merely in stipulating for it.¹

The indictment must set forth the time of making the usurious agreement,² the place where it was made,³ the amount and character of the money taken,⁴ and must aver that the taking was with a corrupt and usurious intent.⁵

The evidence must strictly agree with the indictment as to the terms of the contract, the time of taking, the sum taken, and the character of the money.⁶

for usury was quashed in one case on the ground that the statute had prescribed a method of punishment which was exclusive of all others. Reg. v. Dy, 11 Mod. 174. And in another case, on a motion for an information against a pawnbroker for taking sixpence in the pound per month as interest, the court thought the offense was not serious enough to warrant an information, especially as the statute had marked out a particular course of proceeding; and it was added, generally, that the party could not be indicted. Rex v. Cawket, 1 Barnard 209.

Opinion of Comyn.—"The truth seems to be, that considering the odium in which usury was held at the time of the first statute's enactment, the courts were either unable or unwilling to suppose that a crime of equal magnitude with murder should be expiated by pecuniary forfeiture, without corporal punishment; and, therefore, they allowed the course of indictment to be proceeded in, as if no statute had been passed, and no penal action established. No indictment, as far as appears from the reports, has been prosecuted since the seventh year of the reign of Queen Anne (Reg. v. Dy, 11 Mod. 174), and as that occurred five years before the passing of the statute now in force, and was then quashed as bad, it is hardly to be expected that the courts will ever again be called upon to speak as to the validity of an indictment for usury." But the amount of the loan with legal interest is not forfeited by usury under a statute which does not declare that the contract shall be void, although it makes the usurious transaction a misdemeanor, punishable by fine, and also by forfeiture of double the amount of illegal interest received. *McBroom v. The Tennessee Code, § 1944a, authorizes contracts in writing for interest not exceeding ten per cent. per annum. Section 1944d declares that a violation of section 1944a is usury and indictable. Duplicity.—An indictment under South Dakota Laws (1889), ch. 133, § 1, making it a misdemeanor to receive unlawful interest for the "loan or forbearance of any money," etc., is not bad as charging two offenses, by reason of an allegation that the unlawful interest was received for the "use and forbearance" of money; since it may have been that the taking was a single act, covering both the period of the loan and forbearance. State v. Security Bank (S. Dak. 1892), 51 N. W. Rep. 337.

VI. STATUTORY ACTIONS FOR PENALTY.—Under the English statutes of usury, and also under many of the American statutes, the usurer is subjected to pecuniary penalties, recoverable either at the suit of the debtor, of a common informer, or of public officials, for the benefit of some public fund. The amount of such penalty differs in the various states, and the course of procedure in each is usually regulated by the statute. These penal provisions are not intended to affect the debtor's right of recovering back payments of excessive interest.¹

Contrary to the holding of some of the old English cases, it is universally held by the American courts that the right of the debtor or any other person to sue for the statutory penalty does not accrue until the usury has actually been paid, taken, or received.²

Kind of Money Taken.—An indictment charging a loan of "money" has been held to be supported by evidence of a loan of bank notes. Graham v. State, 5 Humph. (Tenn.) 40.

But where the indictment charged the defendant with usuriously receiving and reserving four dollars for the loan and forbearance of twenty dollars for sixty days, and the evidence was that he received "United States bank notes," it was held a fatal variance. M'Auley v. State, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 526.

1. But in Alabama it has been held that the statute authorizing an action to recover a penalty for usury, the amount so recovered to be paid into the state treasury, impliedly abolishes the common-law right to recover in assumpsit all excess of interest paid. Carlisle v. Gray, 10 Ala. 302.

2. Simpson v. Warren, 15 Mass. 460; Stevens v. Lincoln, 7 Met. (Mass.) 525; Gardner v. Daniel, 2 Houst. (Del.) 300; Upson v. Austin, 4 Ala. 124; Stedman v. Bland, 4 Ired. (N. Car.) 296; Henry v. Bank of Salina, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 523; Livingston v. Indianapolis Ins. Co., 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 134.

In Hallenbeck v. Getz (Conn. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 519, it was held that to render a pawnbroker liable to the penalty for taking unlawful interest, he must have actually taken and received such interest, and the pawner must have parted therewith, it being insufficient that the pawnbroker demanded such interest and upon its being refused, declined to deliver up the property pawned.

What Constitutes Payment.—The payment need not be in money. The giving a note against a third person is sufficient to support an action for the penalty. Cavaness v. Troy, 10 Ired. (N. Car.) 315; Jackson v. Garner, 79 Ga. 415.

The indorsement of such a note to the creditor without recourse is a sufficient payment. Pritchard v. Meekins, 98 N. Car. 244.

In an action under Wisconsin Rev. Stat. (1878), § 1691, authorizing a recovery by the debtor of "treble the amount of money so paid, or value delivered, above the rate aforesaid," the evidence showed that the creditor agreed to cancel a certain usurious note against the debtor, and assume all existing incumbrances against a farm owned by the debtor, in consideration that the debtor would convey the farm to him. Accordingly the debtor delivered possession of the farm to the creditor, and the notes were surrendered, but no deed was ever executed. The court held that the plaintiff had not proved a payment or delivery within the meaning of the statute, and was not entitled to recover the penalty. Howe v. Carpenter, 49 Wis. 697.

English Rule.—It was at one time held in England that the very act of making a usurious contract subjected the creditor to the penalties of the statute, although he had never received anything under it. Whinton v. Marine, Dyer 95 b; Hedgeborrow v. Rosenden, 1 Ventr. 254.

In Mallory v. Bird, Cro. Eliz. 20, it was said by the court that if one contracted to have £20 upon a loan of £100, if he took nothing of the £20 he could not be punishable under the statute; but that if he took anything, even one shilling, this was an affirm-

The right to penalties and forfeitures for usury is not a vested right within the meaning of the constitution, and may be taken away by subsequent legislation.¹

The rules of pleading and evidence applicable to actions for the penalty are very strict, the complainant being required to set out the facts constituting the offense with great precision, and to prove them strictly as he has pleaded them.²

It is held to be no defense to a proceeding to recover the statutory penalty, that the defendant acted merely as the agent of another.³

VII. EFFECT OF USURY—1. As to Interest.—While executory contracts for the payment of illegal interest cannot be enforced,⁴ yet the disposition of courts at the present time is to discard the old doctrine that all usurious contracts are essentially iniquitous and void, and to treat them as illegal only to the extent of the excessive interest, unless the statute otherwise directs.⁵

ance of the contract and rendered him liable. But the severity of this doctrine was considerably softened by the interpretation of Mr. Justice Aston that by "one shilling" is to be understood one shilling beyond the legal interest. Fisher v. Beasley, Dougl. 362.

Other cases seem to establish the rule that the penalty is not incurred until the excessive interest has actually been received. Brown v. Fulsbye, 4 Leon. 43; Martin Van Henbeck's Case, 2 Leon. 38; Fisher v. Beasley, Dougl. 235; Wade v. Wilson, 1 East 195; Scurry v. Freeman, 2 Bas. & Pul. 381; Maddock v. Hammet, 7 Tr. 184; Brooke v. Middleton, 1 Camp. 445; Borrodale v. Middleton, 2 Camp. 53. 1. Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149; 79 Am. Dec. 239; Parmelee v. Lawrence, 44 Ill. 405; Wood v. Kennedy, 19 Ind. 68; Pollock v. Glazier, 20 Ind. 262.

2. Evart v. Barr, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 99; Taylor v. Cobb, 3 Jones (N. Car.) 138; Wilmot v. Monson, 4 Day (Conn.) 114; Drake v. Watson, 4 Day (Conn.) 37; Hutchinson v. Hosmer, 2 Conn. 341.

3. Com. v. Frost, 5 Mass. 53.

An attorney who, without the authority of his client, takes usurious security for the client's debt, is subject to prosecution under the statute. Wells v. Garland, 2 Va. Cas. 471.

4. Brown v. Nagel, 21 Minn. 415; Goodrich v. Buzzell, 40 Me. 500. Thus, a note bearing no interest, but given solely for usurious interest on another debt, is entirely void. In Bridge v. Hubbard, 15 Mass. 96; 8 Am. Dec. 86, the court, by Parker, C. J., said: "The whole sum secured by this last-mentioned note was the interest beyond six per cent. upon a contract or loan previously subsisting between Blanchard & Ford and Eaton. That note, we all agree, was usurious and void, notwithstanding the objection that there was no promise in it, or reservation of unlawful interest upon the capital thus secured. For within the equity, if not the words, of the statute, a note or other instrument given to secure the unlawful interest, itself must be void. Otherwise, by giving one note for the principal, and another for the unlawful interest, they would both be good; the first as containing no reservation of interest, and the second as not containing any promise to pay any interest on the sum secured by it. Whereas, both notes, given under such circumstances, would be void, being evidence of one contract, and that an unlawful one. And if it were not so, the Statute of Usury would be effectually repealed by the court, which is bound to execute it."

Offer to Restore.—Where part of a usurious loan was in the shape of notes drawn by third persons, which the lender transferred to the borrower, it was held in an action on a note given for the loan, that the borrower was entitled to defend on the ground of usury, without offering to restore the notes he had received in lieu of money. Train v. Collins, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 145.

5. Farmers', etc., Bank v. Harrison, 57 Mo. 503; Bedle v. Wardell, 25 N. J. Eq. 349; Turner v. Calvert, 12 S. & R. (Pa.) 46; Kupfert v. Guttenberg Bldg.

In some of the states, however, the effect of the statute is to forfeit all interest, legal as well as illegal.¹ And in a few states, the statute operates to render the entire debt, principal and interest, void.²

2. As to Securities.—The rule is established that mortgages, trust deeds, and all other forms of securities, are mere incidents of the debt, and that if the debt be infected with usury, all securities connected with it are thereby vitiated and rendered unenforceable.³

In Josey v. Davis (Ark. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 185, Hemingway, J., said: "The common law prohibited the collecting of only excessive interest, and contained no rule against the collecting of the principal and lawful interest, even upon a usurious contract. On the contrary, it recognized the existence of the moral obligation resting upon the debtor, and courts of equity, in view of such obligation, refused relief against the usurious contract, except upon the condition that the principal and lawful interest be paid."

In Illinois, where the defense of usury is set up in an action on a note, and the plaintiff offers in court to strike off all in excess of the amount actually loaned and unpaid, he is entitled to judgment for such amount, in case the defense is established. Willetts v. Wheeler, 33 Ill. App. 629.

In Georgia, under the Georgia Code, § 2057a, usury only forfeits the excess of interest taken or charged, and the lender is entitled to recover the sum loaned with legal interest. Parker v. Lowery, 79 Ga. 740. See also Brooks v. Todd, 78 Ga. 692.

2. See supra, this title, Statutory Provisions.

The Minnesota statute (Laws 1879, ch. 66, § 3), declares that "all bonds, bills, notes, assurances, conveyances, chattel mortgages, and all other contracts and securities whatsoever" which are usurious, shall be void. The supreme court holds that the effect of this statute is to not merely vitiate the security or evidence of indebtedness, but to absolutely extinguish the debt itself. Ormund v. Hobart, 36 Minn. 306.

Trust Deeds.—In the recent case of Central Trust Co. v. Burton, 74 Wis. 329, the supreme court of Wisconsin approved and adopted the following language of the court below: "The first position taken by the demurrant was, substantially, that the trust deed was an independent contract, separate and distinct from the notes, and could not be affected by the fact that the notes were usurious, or at least that the only effect of usury in the loan would be to reduce the amount due to beneficiaries, but not to impair the right of the trustee to a decree of foreclosure. Certainly the trust deed is in form a separate and distinct contract, but no more so than a mortgage given to secure payment of a note or bond. The inclination of our courts is to treat all conveyances of real estate, whatever their form, as mortgages, when it is shown that their purpose is to secure the payment of the debt. This is eminently logical, as well as just. The debt is the thing—the basis and foundation of the whole transaction. When the debt is extinguished, or for

The consequences of usury cannot be avoided by the creditor giving up his security for the usurious debt, and taking a new mortgage on the same property therefor.¹

If, however, there be included in the same security both usurious and valid debts, the former separate and distinct from the latter, the rule is that the creditor may still enforce the security to the extent of the valid claim.²

Though the security be in form an absolute conveyance to the creditor, the existence of usury in the debt entitles the debtor any reason ceases to exist, no logical reason can be assigned for endeavoring to keep up an appearance of life in the mortgage, which is simply an accessory of the debt. The sole object and purpose of the mortgage is to secure the payment of the debt. If there be no debt, if it is paid or extinguished in any way, the mortgage has no earthly reason for its existence; it is functus officio. These remarks appear to me to apply as well to a trust deed, whose sole purpose is to secure a debt, as they do to a mortgage. The fact that the nominal conveyance is to a third person, other than the creditor, makes no difference in the substantial character of the transaction. It is still an accessory—a mere security dependent on the existence of a debt for its life."

Mortgagee Not in Fault.—A case illustrating the hardships sometimes imposed upon a party to a contract tainted with usury, but who was entirely ignorant of that fact, was recently decided by the supreme court of Arkansas. The material facts sufficiently appear from the following portion of the opinion of the court, by Hemingway, J.: "A loan of money at the highest lawful rate of interest, made under the inducement of a promise by the borrower that he would make a valuable gift of personal property to the lender, is usurious. The gift is such only in name; in law and in fact it is a part of the price paid for the use of money. The loan by Julia Godsey of money, a part of which belonged to her and the remainder to Mary Godsey, was induced by the promise that Hendrickson would pay the highest rate of interest allowed by law, and in addition thereto permit Julia to take from his store merchandise of a value equal to interest on the sum lent at the rate of five per cent. per annum. . . . It appears that Mary Godsey had no knowledge of, and received no part of, the excessive charge; and there was nothing in the written contract, or in the character of the transaction, to give her notice thereof.

. . . But the loan of Julia's money was made in violation of law, and one note and one mortgage taken to secure the entire sum lent. In a suit founded upon that note and mortgage, can Mary recover the amount lent by her? This question must be answered in the negative, for if any part of a consideration is illegal, the whole consideration is void." The court accordingly held that the bill to foreclose should be dismissed, but without prejudice to the right of Mary Godsey to bring an action for money lent. Thus, without fault on her part, she lost the benefit of her security on the ground of usury. Hendrickson v. Godsey, 54 Ark. 155.

But in Maryland it is held that a mortgage given to secure the amount actually loaned and a large sum additional, as bonus for the lender, can be enforced as to the actual debt. Smith v. Myers, 41 Md. 425.

In Alabama, it is held that usury in a debt does not, at law, affect the validity of a mortgage given to secure it. Kelly v. Mobile Bldg., etc., Assoc., 64 Ala. 501.

Usury in a debt secured by chattel mortgage, though the transaction took the form of a purchase of the mortgaged property by the creditor from a former legal owner and a sale thereof to the mortgagor, prevents the mortgagee from claiming as a bona fide purchaser as against one asserting a prior equitable ownership. Meyer v. Cook, 85 Ala. 417.

In New York, a usurious mortgage is void as against the mortgagor's judgment creditors. Carow v. Kelly, 59 Barb. (N. Y.) 239.

to have the conveyance declared void, and possession restored to him.¹ But where an absolute deed is given as security for a valid debt, the security is not rendered void by the fact that usury was included in a subsequent renewal note.²

The creditor who is guilty of usury, and who loses his security, is not entitled to any relief from a third person not a party to the usury, merely because a portion of the loan was used in satisfying a prior lien on the latter's property.³

The defeat of the security carries with it all waivers by the debtor of homestead and exemption rights in the property mortgaged.⁴ And the waiver remains void, notwithstanding a subsequent judgment purging the debt of all usury.⁵

Sureties are not bound by a waiver of homestead and exemption rights in a note signed by them, when they have no notice of the existence of usury therein.⁶

Statutes in some of the states provide that the defense of usury cannot be raised against negotiable paper in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value before maturity; and it has been contended that his immunity should be construed to extend also to the securities, upon the faith of which the negotiable instrument itself was purchased; but where the question has been fairly presented, the courts have held that the mortgage, or other security, must be regarded in this respect as separate and distinct from the negotiable

Where a note is made up in part of a pre-existing valid debt, and in part of usurious interest on another account, the note is not void, but the maker is entitled to an abatement thereof to the extent of the usury. Smith v. Heath, 4 Daly (N. Y.) 123.

Absolute Conveyances.—Land having been forfeited to the state for delinquent taxes, the owner borrowed money under a usurious contract, with which to redeem it, and caused the land to be conveyed by the state to the lender by absolute deed, as security for the loan. In an action of ejectment brought by a purchaser from the state's grantee, with notice of the usury, the defendant pleaded the usurious contract, and sought to have the deeds and notes canceled. The court held that the state not being a party to the usury, its deed was not affected by it; that the lender took the title as trustee for the owner; and that the debt being void, the defendant was entitled to the relief sought. Lowe v. Loomis, 53 Ark. 454.

Upon the sale of the land under execution, the debtor induced J to bid it in, and made a verbal agreement to repay him the amount of his bid with usurious interest. J accordingly bid in the land, and the sheriff conveyed it to him. Afterward, at the debtor's request, J conveyed the land to H, who paid J the amount of his bid, and agreed in writing with the debtor to give him the title, upon being reimbursed, with usurious interest. It was held that these usurious agreements did not affect H's legal title. Pope v. Heartwell, 79 Ga. 482.

3. A agreed to pay B $1,700 for a mortgage of $2,000 to be procured from C, the owner of the land, which mortgage was to draw legal interest. B delivered the mortgage, and a portion of the money was applied to the payment of a valid prior mortgage upon the same land. It afterward transpired that A's mortgage was a forgery. It was held that as A had acted in pursuance of a usurious contract, he was not entitled to any relief against C, even as to the amount so applied for his benefit. Thomas v. Fish, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 478.

instrument, and entitled to none of its peculiar privileges; the result being, that while the innocent purchaser is allowed to maintain an action on the note, yet, if the defense of usury is established, he loses the benefit of the security which made the note marketable.¹

Where the creditor has taken possession of property mortgaged or pledged as security for a usurious debt, and the statute declares the security void for that reason, the debtor may maintain an action to recover the possession of the property or its value.² And it seems that no demand is necessary before bringing suit, the possession by the creditor being tortious.³ But notwithstanding a mortgage or trust deed may be void on account of usury, it is held that when the power of sale has been executed, and the property purchased thereunder in good faith by an innocent third party, his title cannot be affected by the usury.⁴ But when the mortgagee himself becomes the purchaser at a foreclosure under a power of sale, his title is subject to be defeated on the ground of usury in the mortgage.⁵

3. As to Debt Originally Valid.—Where a debt is valid and free from usury in its inception, the courts unanimously hold that it cannot be vitiated or destroyed by any subsequent usurious agreement in respect to it, such as the giving of security, extend-

1. Scott v. Austin, 36 Minn. 460.

In Doll v. Hollenbeck, 19 Neb. 639, the court held that where the purchaser for value of a note and mortgage before maturity and without notice of usury failed to have the holder put his indorsement on the note itself, which was payable to order, and could show only a written assignment upon the mortgage, he could not enforce the security on account of the usury which infected the debt. The decision, however, was based upon the ground that the purchaser was not the indorser of the note, within the meaning of the law merchant, although he actually owned it, and had given value for it.

Where the nominal mortgagee is in fact the agent of the mortgagor, and negotiates the mortgage for the latter's benefit, to one who knows that the mortgagor is the real party in interest, and who takes usurious interest for the amount advanced, the note and mortgage are void in the hands of a subsequent purchaser after maturity. Aldrich v. Wood, 26 Wis. 168.

2. So held in a case where a chattel mortgagee had taken possession of the goods under a clause in the mortgage, but against the consent of the debtor, who had, however, previously given a writing stating that the goods were

Thus, where land was conveyed to trustees to secure payment of usurious bonds, it was held that an absolute conveyance by the trustees, in consideration of a surrender of certain of the bonds, could not be avoided on the ground of usury. Butler v. Myer, 17 Ind. 77.

Title by Foreclosure.—After the foreclosure of a usurious mortgage, the mortgagee resold the property to the mortgagor for the full amount of the debt and usury, the mortgagor paying part of the purchase price, and giving a note for the balance. It was held that he could not plead the original usury as a defense to the new note. Switz v. Platts, 15 Iowa 298.

ing time of payment, executing a new form of obligation, or by any other transaction tainted with usury.¹

If the new obligation be sold to a third person, though he cannot enforce it on account of the usury, he stands in the shoes of his vendor, and is entitled to recover on the antecedent indebtedness.² But if a valid contract has been transferred for a usurious

S.) 170, the court, by Mr. Justice Swayne, said: "It is well settled that if a security founded upon a prior one be fatally tainted with that vice (usury), and the prior one were free from it, but given up and canceled, and the latter one thereafter be adjudged void, the prior one will be revived, and may be enforced as if the latter one had not been given. The cases to this effect are very numerous."

English Cases.—The rule has long been settled in England, that no subsequent taking of, or agreement to take, illegal interest will vitiate a contract, debt, or security free from usury in its inception. Farrall v. Shaen, 1 Saund. 294; 2 Keb. 525; Anonymous, 1 Bulstr. 19; Rex v. Allen, Sir T. Raym. 196; Reg. v. Sewel, 7 Mod. 118; Ex p. Jennings, 1 Madd. 331; Bradley v. Manning, 3 Keb. 142; Nichols v. Lee, 3 Anstr. 940; Pollard v. Scholy, Cro. Eliz. 20; Gray v. Fowler, 1 H. Bl. 462; Phillips v. Cockayne, 3 Camp. 119; Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Bwn. 2253.

In Viner's Abr., "Usury" H. pl. 6, it is laid down that, "If the first contract is not usurious, it shall never be made so by matter ex post facto." See also 2 Hawk. P. C. 377, § 17.

In Adlington v. Cann, 3 Atk. 154, Lord Hardwicke is reported to have declared, that though a mortgage be drawn for lawful interest, yet, if the mortgagee afterward take more, the mortgage would be void "upon the word take." Such a doctrine is certainly opposed to all the English authorities, and the reported dictum is of very doubtful authenticity.

In Nichols v. Lee, 3 Anstr. 940, Baron Thompson observed that, "Lord Hardwicke never could have meant to lay down the proposition that is reported in Atkins."

2. Gerwig v. Sitterly, 56 N. Y. 214.

In Oneida Bank v. Ontario Bank, 21 N. Y. 495, Comstock, J., used the following language in delivering the consideration, no action can be maintained upon it by a party to such usury.¹

After the valid debt has been changed in form and made the subject of a usurious agreement, the creditor ought not to be allowed, on his own motion, to disregard the new agreement and sue upon the old debt. The right to enforce the debt may be said to be in obedience until the debtor has elected to set up the defense of usury against the substituted contract.²

A mere statement by the debtor that he would not pay the usurious contract is not sufficient to justify the creditor in bringing suit on the pre-existing debt.³

On the other hand, usurious agreements by the creditor to extend the time of paying a valid debt are void and bind neither party; the creditor may sue as if no extension had been promised, and the debtor, after pleading the usury, cannot insist upon the benefit of the extension.⁴

If the debtor's plea of usury is sustained, it seems that the creditor may still recover the debt in the same action under the opinion of the court: "A note or bond may be void for usury, but being founded upon some antecedent claim or contract, free from that defect, there may be a just and legal right to recover the original consideration. The note or bond may be sold, and it will be void even in the hands of an innocent purchaser. But will it be pretended that the purchaser gets absolutely nothing? It is impossible to doubt that he will stand in the shoes of his vendor."

1. Gaither v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 43.

2. Though a note taken in satisfaction of a former valid note is in law void on account of usury, the creditor cannot sue on the original note and defeat the defendant's plea of satisfaction by disclosing the usury and claiming that the new is therefore void. That defense is a privilege which the debtor alone can assert. Austin v. Chittenden, 33 Vt. 553.

But in the recent case of Tillman v. Thatcher 56 Ark. 334, where the plaintiff took a usurious note in settlement of a valid debt, he was allowed by the court, on the theory that the note was void for the usury, to sue on the original debt, in spite of the defendant's plea that the note was a satisfaction of the account. An instruction was approved, that, "If a security founded upon an antecedent lawful consideration becomes void, or tainted by an usurious element, the original demand will be revived, and may be enforced." The only case cited by the court in support of this proposition is Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. Car. 107, the circumstances of which were that the plaintiff sued on a note, alleging its consideration to be a balance of account. The defendant answered, setting up usury in the note, but it was not disputed that the original debt was valid. The court merely held that even if the note was usurious, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the antecedent debt.

In Eastman v. Porter, 14 Wis. 39, a creditor who had taken a usurious note for a prior valid debt, had previously brought an action on the note and it had been adjudged void for the usury. He then brought this action on the debt, and it was held that he was entitled to recover without first tendering the usurious interest paid on the note, which was a matter of set-off.

3. In Bost v. Smith, 4 Ired. (N. Car.) 68, where A gave B a usurious bond for $220 in discharge of a valid debt of $220, it was held that, although the debt was not thereby vitiated, B could not recover on the debt of $220 merely because A had said to a third person that he would pay that sum, but would never pay the usurious bond.

4. Hunt v. Bloomer, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 202; Church v. Malay, 70 N. Y. 63; Beauchamp v. Leagan, 14 Ind. 401; Pyke v. Clark, 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 262. But see Kelly v. Gillespie, 12 Iowa 55; 79 Am. Dec. 516, which holds that a usurious note is a sufficient considera-common counts.¹ But under the rules of code pleading, no recovery could be had in such case, unless the former contract or debt was relied on in the pleading.²

4. As to Executed Contracts.—After a contract tainted with usury has been, in all respects, fully executed and performed, it is, unless otherwise provided by statute, too late to set it aside on the ground of usury.³

VIII. WHO MAY TAKE ADVANTAGE OF USURY—1. Defense Personal to Debtor.—It is settled by a multitude of decisions that the right to plead usury is a privilege personal to the debtor.⁴ The defense has been compared to that of infancy.⁵

The rule that parties in pari delicto are both equally precluded from assistance by the courts, does not apply against a borrower tion for an agreement to extend the time of payment of a previous note.

1. Philadelphia Loan Co. v. Towner, 13 Conn. 249; Edgell v. Stanford, 6 Vt. 551.

Injunction.—Where, pending an action at law on a written contract for money loaned at usurious rates, the plaintiff was enjoined from proceeding further on the contract, it was held that he was not entitled to recover on the common money counts. Ambler v. Ruddell, 17 Ark. 138.

2. Hansee v. Phinney, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 153; Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. Car. 107.

In Barrows v. Thomas, 43 Minn. 270, which was an action to recover personal property, the plaintiff based his right to recover solely upon a specified mortgage of the property given by the defendant. The defense of usury being interposed, the inquiry upon the trial of that issue extended to the question of usury in a prior note and mortgage, in renewal of which, the mortgage relied on by the plaintiff was given. The latter having been found to be usurious, but the prior note and mortgage free from usury, the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the property in that action by virtue of the prior mortgage, for the reason that no such right was in issue.

3. Where a debtor has conveyed land by absolute deed to his surety as indemnity, and the surety subsequently pays the debt and takes the land in satisfaction, his contract with the debtor becomes fully executed, and neither the debtor nor any of his creditors can set it aside for usury. Irwin v. McKnight, 76 Ga. 669.

Under a statute allowing parties to contract in writing for any rate of interest, but if not in writing, no recovery can be had for more than six per cent., an executed verbal contract, under which more than six per cent. has been paid, is as valid as though in writing. Fessenden v. Taft (N. H. 1889), 17 Atl. Rep. 713.

4. Dix v. Van Wyck, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 522; Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Kasson, 37 N. Y. 218; Bullard v. Raynor, 30 N. Y. 197; Billington v. Wagoner, 33 N. Y. 31; Williams v. Tilt, 36 N. Y. 319; Mechanics' Bank v. Edwards, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 271; Wells v. Chapman, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 561; Austin v. Chittenden, 33 Vt. 553; Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh (Va.) 478; Campbell v. Holladay, 13 Oregon 523; Cramer v. Lepper, 26 Ohio St. 59; 20 Am. Rep. 756; Smith v. Exchange Bank, 26 Ohio St. 141; Studabaker v. Marquardt, 55 Ind. 341; *Loomis v. But it has been held in Texas that under the constitution and statutes of that state, a debtor cannot waive his right to insist that a contract entered into by him is usurious. Miles v. Kelly, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 25 S. W. Rep. 724.

5. Ransom v. Hays, 39 Mo. 445.

or debtor who has paid or agreed to pay usury. It is deemed that his consent to the corrupt contract was obtained by moral duress, such as to take from him the character of particeps criminis. To hold otherwise would render usury laws nugatory.¹

The debtor's sureties, guarantors, heirs, devisees, executors, and administrators are also entitled to make the same defense to the contract which he might have made, whenever the usurious contract affects their rights and interests.²

But if, for any reason, the maker or drawer of a bill or note is precluded from pleading usury thereto, as in the case of corporations in New York, his sureties are also precluded.³

A widow whose claim to dower and homestead is superior to the lien of a mortgage on the land of her husband's estate, cannot attack it for usury, because she is not an interested party.⁴

It seems that an accommodation maker or indorser of a note, which has been transferred upon a usurious contract, cannot take advantage of such usury.⁵

The opinion has been judicially expressed, by way of dictum,

The opinion of Jones, J., at special term, was quoted with approval by the court of appeals in Merchants' Exch. Nat. Bank v. Commercial Warehouse Co., 49 N. Y. 635, in the following terms: "All privies to the borrower, whether in blood, representation, or estate, may, both in law and equity, by the appropriate legal and equitable remedies and defenses, attack or defend against any contract or security given by the borrower which is tainted with usury, on the ground of such usury, where such contract or security affects the estate derived by them from the borrower."

An heir-at-law is entitled to recover back payments of usury made by him to clear his inheritance from an incumbrance given by his ancestor to secure a usurious debt. Pope v. Marshall, 78 Ga. 635.

Sureties.—In Culver v. Wilbern, 48 Iowa 26; 30 Am. Rep. 38, it was held no defense to an action on a note, that it was given by a surety in part payment of his principal's usurious debt.

And in Lamoille Co. Nat. Bank v. Bingham, 50 Vt. 105; 28 Am. Rep. 490, it was decided that the surety was not entitled to the benefit of usury paid by the principal.

Indorsers.—In South Carolina it is held that an indorser of a note void for usury is not bound by his indorsement, made when he was ignorant of the usury. Brummer v. Wilks, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 178; Flemming v. Mulligan, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 173; 13 Am. Dec. 707. Otherwise, if he makes false representations to the purchaser as to its validity. Odell v. Cook, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 59.

In Bank of Newbury v. Sinclair, 60 N. H. 100; 49 Am. Rep. 307, it was held that usurious interest paid by the maker could not be taken advantage of by an indorser.

that the right to recover back usury paid is assignable;¹ but there are, on the other hand, a number of decisions holding that the right does not pass to the debtor's assignee for the benefit of creditors.²

2. The Usurer Cannot.—Being an offender against the law, the usurer is not under any circumstances permitted to set up his own usury for the purpose of avoiding any of his undertakings or liabilities connected with the usurious transaction; what he has done or bound himself to do, he must stand by, as if no usury were involved.³

3. Subsequent Incumbrancers.—According to some authorities, the existence of usury in a mortgage debt cannot be taken advantage of in order to defeat the mortgage, by the holder of a subsequent incumbrance, who takes with actual or constructive notice of the prior lien;⁴ particularly if the junior incumbrance was by its terms made subject to the former lien;⁵ or if a sale under foreclosure of a second mortgage is made subject to the first, in which case the purchaser cannot impeach the first mortgage for usury.⁶ But if the circumstances were such that the second mortgagee had the right to attack the first mortgage, neither he nor the purchaser at his foreclosure sale is deprived of the right by a recital in the sheriff's deed that it is subject to the first mortgage.⁷

Some courts, however, hold that a junior incumbrancer has the same right to make the defense of usury against a prior incumbrance, that the debtor himself would have.⁸

Under Texas Rev. Stat., art. 2980, declaring all contracts for more than twelve per cent. per annum void for the whole rate of interest, the holder of a junior mortgage has the right to pay off a prior usurious mortgage by paying the principal debt without interest; and this, notwithstanding the prior mortgagee has in the meantime procured a deed from the mortgagor. *Maloney v. Where securities are given for the common benefit of two or more creditors, the rule seems to be, that neither can attack the other's claim, on the ground of usury.¹

4. Subsequent Purchasers.—The grantee of the mortgagor's equity of redemption merely, pays therefor only what the equity is supposed to be worth, on the basis that the mortgage is valid; and if he were to be allowed to defeat it for usury between the mortgagor and mortgagee, he would thereby acquire a much more valuable estate than he bargained for. The rule, accordingly, is that such purchaser must abide by his contract, and submit to the enforcement of the mortgage.²

This rule applies with additional force, in cases where the purchaser takes his deed expressly subject to the mortgage, and deducts the amount thereof from the agreed purchase price.³ It also applies, with even greater force, in cases where the deed contains an "assumption clause," whereby the purchaser covenants

It has been said that the right to set up the defense of usury is to be distinguished from the right to sue to avoid usurious securities; and that it is only where the grantee of mortgaged premises seeks affirmative relief as a plaintiff, that the question arises whether he is one of the persons authorized by law to attack the mortgage. *Chamberlain v. The acceptance of a deed expressly subject to an outstanding mortgage finally precludes the grantee from pleading usury against such mortgage; nor will the substitution of a new deed with the assumption clause omitted, under a claim that it was inserted in the first deed by mistake, enable the grantee to plead the usury. Barthet v. Elias, 2 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 364.

In Trusdell v. Dowden, 47 N. J. Eq. 396, Van Fleet, V. C., in delivering the opinion of the court after stating the rule as given in the text, said: "But this doctrine does not at all rest on the theory that the taint, by the conveyance, has, as between the original parties, been purged from the mortgage. On the contrary, the fact is that the taint as to them still exists in all its original force; but the doctrine rests on this foundation: That the purchaser, by taking title subject to the mortgage, and retaining, out of the price he agreed to pay, sufficient money to pay the mortgage, places himself in a position where he cannot allege usury without attempting to keep back part of the money which he agreed to pay for the mortgaged lands. Having retained enough of the purchase-money to pay the mortgage, under a promise that he would apply the money to the payment of the mortgage, it is plain that if he were allowed to make the defense of usury, and should make it successfully, he would defraud both his grantor and the mortgagee. He would be permitted and agrees to pay the mortgage, as a part of the purchase price.¹ A grantee from such purchaser is subject to the same rule.²

The fact that the mortgagor agreed with the purchaser that he would assert his personal rights, and defend on the ground of usury, does not entitle the purchaser to defend.³

Where payments have been made and credited generally upon a mortgage debt wherein usurious interest was reserved, and the amount of such payments is sufficient to extinguish the valid portion of the debt, a purchaser of the mortgaged property may insist that it is free from the mortgage.⁴

A purchaser of mortgaged property with covenants of warranty, and against incumbrances, has his remedy upon his covenants, and therefore ought not to be allowed to defeat foreclosure of the mortgage on the ground of usury.⁵

For an entirely different reason, it is held that a purchaser of land from trustees cannot avoid his mortgage given for the purchase price, on the ground of usury in the debt to secure which the conveyance to the trustees was made. He stands in the position of one claiming under the usurious security.⁶

to speculate on a violation of law that had done him no harm, and to keep back money to which he has no right whatever; and to do so in direct violation of his promise. To prevent this, equity says that he shall not make the defense of usury; but it says so, not because the mortgage has been purged of its taint, but because he kept back enough of the purchase-money to pay the mortgage, under a promise that if the money were left in his hands he would pay the mortgage debt. This is the foundation on which the doctrine just mentioned rests, and it has no other."

St. 527, where a purchaser who had assumed a mortgage was allowed to set off payments of usurious interest.

What Constitutes Assumption.—A

purchaser of mortgaged property gave a bond and mortgage for a portion of the purchase price equal to the amount of a prior usurious mortgage then outstanding, and deposited them with a third party, to be delivered to the grantor in the event that the latter should succeed in setting aside the usurious mortgage; but if he should fail to do so, then the purchaser was to raise money on his own mortgage, and pay off the prior mortgage therewith. It was held that there was no assumption of the prior mortgage so as to estop the purchaser from attacking it for usury. Berdan v. Sedgwick, 44 N. Y. 626.

Security Given by Purchaser.—When the purchaser of land subject to a mortgage which he assumed, gave his own valid note and mortgage to discharge the former, it was held that he could not set up as a defense to his own mortgage, that the former was in fact usurious. Hollingsworth v. Swickard, 10 Iowa 385.

6. Stoney v. American L. Ins. Co., 11 Paige (N. Y.) 635.

In one instance a purchaser at an execution sale, subject to all prior legal incumbrances, was allowed to plead usury against a prior mortgage;¹ and in another, a purchaser from the mortgagor, who agreed to pay whatever might be due from the latter, was allowed to make the same defense.² And when a party purchased the property with the information from the grantor of the usurious character of the prior mortgage, and with a view to avoiding the incumbrance, it was held that the defense of usury was available to him.³

In Mississippi, the purchaser of an equity of redemption is allowed by statute to have usurious interest paid by the mortgagor applied to the principal debt.⁴

Another result of conveying the land to a grantee who assumes the mortgage is, that the mortgagor himself cannot thereafter attack it for usury in proceedings to foreclose where no personal judgment is sought against him.⁵ But if the conveyance to a purchaser who assumes the mortgage be afterwards surrendered, or the title becomes revested in the mortgagor, by deed not subject to the mortgage, he becomes restored to his right of attacking the mortgage for usury.⁶

5. Creditors.—Some courts hold, consistently with the doctrine that usury is a personal defense, that one creditor cannot plead it for the purpose of defeating another's claim or security against the common debtor;⁷ while other courts show a disposition to allow contests of this character, particularly where the debtor is insolvent, and the fund is in court for distribution.⁸

Where the purchaser of a mortgagor's equity of redemption at a sheriff's sale, afterward procured an assignment of the mortgage, and thus acquired the absolute legal title, it was held, upon a writ of entry brought by him against the mortgagor in possession, that usury in the mortgage notes could be set up to defeat his title. *Richardson v. A subsequent creditor cannot object to the payment of illegal interest on a judgment, unless it can be shown that the debtor and judgment creditor had colluded to defraud other creditors under the appearance of usury. Nicholson's Appeal (Pa. 1887), 11 Atl. Rep. 562.

Creditors Against Surety.—Where, at the request of the principal debtor, a usurious note secured by mortgage is paid by a surety, junior mortgagees cannot, in an action by the surety to foreclose the first mortgage, have the amount of the usury charged against him. Foard v. Grinter's Exrs. (Ky. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 1034.

Assignee of Mortgage.—In La Farge v. Herter, 9 N. Y. 241, it was held that a creditor to whom a mortgage has been assigned in payment, cannot treat the assignment as a nullity and proceed to enforce his original debt, merely because the mortgagor has filed a bill to restrain foreclosure on the ground of usury. Such defense must first be established by a final judgment.

It is also generally held that the debtor's assignee in bankruptcy, receiver, or trustee for the benefit of creditors, is entitled to set up the defense.¹

6. Usury Between Subsequent Parties.—It is no defense to the maker or indorser of a negotiable instrument, that a subsequent transfer was upon a usurious consideration.²

In Stein v. Swensen, 44 Minn. 218, it was held, under the Minnesota statute making all usurious contracts and securities void, that a sheriff holding mortgaged property under a writ of attachment was entitled to defend against the mortgage on the ground of usury.

Insolvency.—In Pope v. Salomon, 36 Ga. 541, it was held that where the money of an absconding debtor was in the hands of a trustee, to be applied in payment of a usurious contract, a court of equity would enjoin such payment, at the instance of a creditor whose debt was not tainted with usury.

The same court, however, holds that one creditor cannot maintain an action to recover usury paid by his insolvent debtor to another creditor. Singleton v. Patillo, 78 Ga. 267; Harris v. Hull, 70 Ga. 832; Hicks v. Marshall, 67 Ga. 714.

The maker of a note cannot take advantage of usury between subsequent parties. Conwell v. Pumphrey, 9 Ind. 135; 68 Am. Dec. 611; Littell v. Hord, Hard (Ky.) 87; Clapp v. Hanson, 15 Me. 345; Knights v. Putnam, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 184.

It is no defense to the maker of a note that a certain guarantee thereon was tainted with usury. Armstrong v. Gibson, 31 Wis. 61; 11 Am. Rep. 599.

Opposite Doctrines.—Some authorities hold that the maker of a valid note, when sued by an indorsee, may show in defense that the transfer to the plaintiff was usurious.

In Lloyd v. Keach, 2 Conn. 175; 7 Am. Dec. 256, the court, by Swift, C. J., said: "On this point there can be no doubt. The indorsee of a note must show a legal right, that he came lawfully by the possession of it, to entitle him to recover. Of course, it is competent for the defendant to show that he had no legal right, or that the possession was not lawful." See also Fish v. De Wolf, 4 Bosw. (N. Y.) 573.

It has been decided that the maker of a valid note may take advantage of usury between an indorser and indorsee, when the latter sues on the note, but not so as against a subsequent bona fide holder. Freeman v. Brittin, 17 N. J. L. 191.

It is, however, somewhat difficult to see why the maker should be any more concerned with the usury in the one case than in the other. The note being his valid obligation, he ought not to be allowed to avoid paying it on account of usury which did him no harm, and to which he was a stranger.

Mortgagor.—The mortgagor in a valid mortgage is not entitled to defeat it by reason of its having been assigned by the mortgagee as security for a usurious debt. Warner v. Gouverneur, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 36; Stevens v. Reeves, 33 N. J. Eq. 427.

Between Indorser and Indorsee.—But in an action by an indorsee against an other and separate dealings between the same parties does not constitute any defense against an action upon a contract not itself so tainted.¹

8. Strangers to the Usury.—If a third person, either for accommodation, or in payment of his own debt, contracts to pay the usurious debt of another, he cannot avoid the contract on the ground of such usury.² Conversely, if a third person at the debtor's request furnishes the means with which to discharge a usurious debt, the debtor cannot plead usury against the claim of such third person for reimbursement, nor to defeat the original securities in indorser, the latter may show that the indorsee received the paper as security for a usurious contract made between him and the maker. Dunscumb v. Bunker, 2 Met. (Mass.) 8; Wiemer v. Shelton, 7 Mo. 237.

But usury between the first indorsee of a note and another, will constitute no defense to an action against him on his indorsement, brought by a subsequent indorsee. Morford v. Davis, 28 N. Y. 481.

1. Smead v. Chrisfield, 1 Disney (Ohio) 18; Primrose v. Anderson, 24 Pa. St. 215.

The payment of usurious interest upon the first four notes of a series, does not entitle the maker to plead it as a defense to an action on the fifth. Riddle v. Rosenfeld, 103 Ill. 600.

2. Bearce v. Barstow, 9 Mass. 45; 6 Am. Dec. 25; Gathercole v. Young, 61 N. H. 121; Dennistoun v. Potts, 26 Miss. 13.

B was indebted to the plaintiff for a usurious loan. The defendant was indebted to B in an amount larger than his debt to the plaintiff. The defendant, in payment of his own debt, gave a note to the plaintiff for the amount of B's debt, including the usury, and paid B the balance in money. In an action on the note, it was held that the defendant, not being a party to the usury, and having given the note at legal interest in payment of his own valid debt, could not set up the original usury to defeat the note. Bearce v. Barstow, 9 Mass. 45; 6 Am. Dec. 25. This case is cited with approval in Green v. Kemp, 13 Mass. 515; 7 Am. Dec. 169; Cook v. Dyer, 3 Ala. 646; Reading v. Weston, 7 Conn. 413; *Botsford v. A fortiori, one who assumes payment of an indebtedness incurred by another under a series of current dealings, cannot take any advantage of the fact that usurious interest had been paid by the debtor on items of the account which had been fully paid and settled before the indebtedness in question accrued. Burwell v. Burgwyn, 100 N. Car. 389; 105 N. Car. 498.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage given by A to B to secure C's debt, upon which C had made usurious payments, C consented that the amount of such payments might be applied upon the principal debt, "if the law will so apply it." It was held that such application would be made by the court. First Nat. Bank v. Wood, 53 Vt. 491.

In Coulter v. Robertson, 14 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 18, A held B's note, given for a usurious loan. B arranged with C, who owed him, to have C give his own note to A and take up B's note, which was accordingly done, and B discharged and satisfied C's debt. In an action on C's note to A, it was decided that C could plead the original usury.

In an action upon a note given by the president of a corporation, in his own name, in settlement of a usurious debt of the corporation, the defendant having received from the company the amount of such note, it was held that he could not take advantage of the usury, because he was not privy to the usurious contract. Drake v. Lowry, 14 Iowa 125.

Husband and Wife.—Where a usurious note given by the husband alone, was secured by a mortgage on the homestead, and executed by both husband and wife, in an action to foreclose, it was held that the wife, though not a

his hands.¹ It has also been decided that a note given in settlement of a usurious debt, but made payable and delivered to a creditor of the usurer in payment of his valid debt, and received by the creditor without notice of the usury, cannot be attacked therefor in his hands.²

IX. ESTOPPEL—1. As Between Original Parties.—As the prime object of usury laws is to protect the debtor from the oppressive exactions of the creditor, all agreements to the effect that the debtor will not take advantage of the usury are regarded as obtained by the creditor's coercion, and constitute no bar to relief.³ This is equally true whether such agreement be contemporaneous with, or subsequent to, the usurious transaction;⁴ unless, of course, the subsequent agreement amounts to a purging of the usury. Thus, the acceptance by the debtor, without objection, of accounts rendered which include usurious interest, does not estop him to plead the usury when sued for a balance of the account.⁵

2. As to Third Parties.—Notwithstanding the favor with which the victim of usury is regarded, he is sometimes estopped by his representations to third parties who have succeeded to the rights of the creditor, in ignorance of the usury and in reliance upon the debtor's statements.

Thus, if the maker of a usurious note or mortgage induces an innocent party to purchase it from the holder, he is estopped, as against such purchaser or his transferee, to set up the usury.⁶ So also is the assignor of a bond upon which usurious interest had been received by him for forbearance before the assignment.⁷ But clearly there would not be an estoppel as against a purchaser with actual or constructive notice of the usury.⁸

Mere subsequent promises by the debtor to pay the debt do not estop him as against assignees or purchasers, any more than as against the original party.⁹ Nor is he estopped, as against an indorsee of his usurious note, by a previous agreement to give a party to the usury, could attack the mortgage as usurious. Lyon v. Welsh, 20 Iowa 578.

Jones*, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 54; 5 Am. Dec. 538.

mortgage to any holder to secure it, nor by actually giving such mortgage to the indorsee at the time of the transfer.¹

It has been held that a party to accommodation paper who sells it as bona fide business paper at a discount exceeding lawful interest, cannot impeach the sale as usurious.²

This doctrine is, however, not in harmony with the prevailing rule that a bona fide purchaser, at a discount, of accommodation paper from an original party is himself the real lender.³

Affidavits or certificates attached to a negotiable instrument or other contract by the debtor, to the effect that it is subject to no defenses and will be paid according to its terms, operate as an estoppel, when relied on by bona fide assignees.⁴

The debtor is also estopped by the acts and representations of his authorized agent,⁵ even though such agent is the nominal creditor.⁶

The guarantor of a usurious contract is not estopped by his guaranty to plead the usury,⁷ particularly as against one knowing its true character.⁸

3. By Conduct.—The debtor may, as against an innocent purchaser, estop himself without making any actual representations. Thus, where a mortgagor suffered the mortgaged property to be foreclosed, and took no steps to prevent it on the ground of usury, or to warn bidders, he was precluded from afterwards questioning the title of a bona fide purchaser.⁹

The maker of notes to his own order, indorsed and delivered them to his broker, who sold them to the defendant at a discount exceeding legal interest, upon the broker's assurance that the notes were valid business paper. The maker had had previous dealings with the broker, and presumptively knew the custom among purchasers of exacting such representations as were made by the broker. The maker received the proceeds, less the broker's commissions. In an action to have the notes canceled, it was held that he was estopped to plead usury. Ahern v. Goodspeed, 72 N. Y. 108.

Affidavit of Validity.—The defendant was an accommodation indorser of a note for $5,000 at nine months with interest, which had its inception on its transfer to the plaintiff, who gave for it $3,000 in money and $1,500 in notes. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiff had notice that it was an accommodation note, though he claimed that he bought it as business paper, and in reliance upon a contemporaneous affidavit made by the defendant that the note was subject to no defense of "want of consideration, usury or otherwise." It was held that this affidavit did not estop the defendant from setting up the defense of usury. Lewis v. Barton, 106 N. Y. 70.

one time held in England, that the borrower was in pari delicto with the lender, and therefore could not recover back usury voluntarily paid;¹ but this doctrine was finally repudiated.²

And the prevailing doctrine now is, that the debtor does not pay usury voluntarily, but rather under the constraint and oppression of the creditor.³

The common-law rule that when a debtor has paid usury he may bring an action to recover it back, as for money had and received, has been followed in a large number of the states of the Union, in some of which the right of action is, expressly or by implication, given by statute.⁴

Indebitatus assumpsit lies to recover back usury paid, and the borrower need not join with him a co-obligor who was his surety. Davis v. Hoy, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 303.

But one of two joint makers of a note on which illegal interest is charged by a national bank, cannot recover from the bank the penalty allowed by the United States Rev. Stat., § 5198, authorizing the person who pays usurious interest to a national bank to recover twice the amount paid, where the illegal interest was paid by the other maker. Concordia, etc., Bank v. Rowley (Kan. 1894), 34 Pac. Rep. 1049.

The borrower is entitled to recover back usurious interest, without offering to return a quantity of worthless railroad stock, which the lender had pretended to sell to him as a part of the usurious transaction. Heath v. Page, 48 Pa. St. 130.

But where the contract of loan is not void, except as to the excess of interest stipulated to be paid, the lender is not liable to an action for excess of interest paid, so long as the principal debt, with legal interest thereon, after deducting all payments, is unpaid. McBroom v. Scottish Mortg., etc., Co., 153 U. S. 318.

Recovery from Loan Agent.—Where an agent to negotiate a loan did so at usurious rates and received a bonus, and afterward bought the note and collected the principal and interest, it was held that he was a party to the usury, and that the borrower could recover back from him. Williams v. Wilder, 37 Vt. 613.

Form of Action.—The action given by the statute may be brought either at law or in equity, though the usury was paid under a decree in equity. Sherley v. Trabue, 85 Ky. 71.

Judgments.—It is not a sufficient answer to an action to recover back usurious interest paid, that the defendant has recovered judgment upon the debts embracing the usury, and has satisfied the judgment out of the plaintiff's property. Scott v. Shropshire, 2 Duv. (Ky.) 153.

But in Kearney v. First Nat. Bank, 129 Pa. St. 577, following Hopkins v. West, 83 Pa. St. 109, it was held that

In a number of states, however, the rule is established that in the absence of a statute clearly giving the right, no recovery can be had, either at law or in equity, of excessive interest voluntarily paid.¹ Also that, in the absence of statute, volunusury included in a judgment which had been paid, could not be recovered back.

The statutory right of a debtor to recover back usurious interest, is not affected by the fact that at the time the debt was created he gave the creditor a power of attorney to confess judgment thereon, and expressly waived his right to set up the defense or claim of usury. Mellon's Appeal (Pa. 1886), 7 Atl. Rep. 201.

Payments by Third Party.—In an action by the debtor to recover back usury paid under a mortgage, it is sufficient that such payments were made to the mortgagee by a subsequent purchaser of the mortgaged property, under an agreement with the mortgagor to pay the debt as part of the purchase price. Nelson v. Cooley, 20 Vt. 201.

In Hazard v. Smith, 21 Vt. 123, it was held that, under similar circumstances, the action must be brought in the name of the original debtor, and not of the third person who had assumed the debt and made the payment.

Where A, at the instance and request of B, borrowed money from C at usurious rates to loan to B, it was held that A could not recover from B the usury so paid to C. Swift v. Adkins, 2 Lea (Tenn.) 137.

A owed B, and C owed A; A procured C to pay B the amount of A's debt to B, with usurious interest, and gave C credit for the amount so paid. It was held that this was in effect a payment by A to B, and that A could recover of B the amount of usury paid by C. Naylor v. Hays, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 478. But where, under like circumstances, C gave his note to B at A's request, and also paid B usurious interest, it was held that the note was usurious and void. Thompson v. Thompson, 8 Mass. 135.

Payment to Innocent Purchaser.—In an action by the borrower against the lender to recover back usurious interest paid on a note in the hands of an indorsee, it must be alleged, not only that the note was transferred before maturity and without notice by the indorsee of the usury, but also that he purchased for value. Dunn v. Moore, 26 Ohio St. 641.

Corporations.—The New York statute forbidding corporations to set up the defense of usury by implication, prevents them from suing to recover back usury paid. Butterworth v. O'Brien, 23 N. Y. 275.

In Illinois, it is held that where the debtor does not take steps to prevent the foreclosure of a deed of trust, by means of which the debt and usurious interest are collected by the creditor, it is a voluntary payment, and the usury cannot be recovered back. Tyler v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co., 108 Ill. 58; Lake v. Brown, 116 Ill. 83.

Where a mortgagor has conveyed the mortgaged property to the mortgagee, in consideration of being released from personal liability on the debt, this amounts to a voluntary payment of the entire debt; and he cannot afterward attach the mortgage or deed on the ground that the debt was usurious. Mason v. Pierce, 142 Ill. 331.

tary payments of usury cannot be set off in an action on the debt.¹

It has been held that under a statute authorizing a suit by the borrower to recover usury paid, it cannot be recouped in an action on the debt; that the remedy provided is exclusive.²

Actual payment of the usury is indispensable to support an action to recover it back. It is not sufficient that the debtor has given an obligation for its payment, to which the defense of usury could be pleaded.³

In accordance with the rule that payments made by the debtor will be applied to the valid part of the debt, it has been held that so long as the whole amount paid does not exceed the debt and lawful interest, the debtor cannot maintain an action to recover back.⁴

But it has also been held, in the same state, that one who pays money upon a contract absolutely void for usury, may recover back, not merely the amount of usury, but the entire amount paid, upon the ground of failure of consideration. Town v. Wood, 37 Ill. 512.

In Minnesota, it is held that the debtor's allowing a mortgage to be foreclosed for an illegal excess of unpaid interest, claimed in the notice of sale to be due, is equivalent to a voluntary payment, which cannot be recovered back. Taylor v. Burgess, 26 Minn. 547.

Absolute Conveyance.—Upon the principle that when a debtor voluntarily pays a usurious debt he cannot recover it back, it is held in Georgia that a deed given in absolute payment of an existing debt is not affected by usury therein. Harris v. Hull, 70 Ga. 831.

In Maine, the same doctrine is applied to absolute conveyances in payment of usurious debts, though the right to recover back usury is recognized. Hale v. Jewell, 7 Me. 435; 22 Am. Dec. 212. But see Reading v. Weston, 7 Conn. 409.

Payment to Purchaser.—Where a note tainted with usury is sold by the payee for no more than the sum actually loaned, with lawful interest, and the maker pays to the purchaser the full amount of the note, he cannot, in the absence of statute, sue the original payee to recover back the usury. Atwell v. Gowell, 54 Me. 358.

The purchaser of a note at a discount of twenty-five per cent., cannot lawfully recover from his indorser more than the amount he paid, with interest. But if the indorser voluntarily pays the whole amount of the note, he is not entitled to recover back the excess, because there was no usury in the transaction. May v. Campbell, 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 450.

National Bank Act.—The same construction has been placed upon analogous provisions of the Act of Congress of June 3d, 1864. Barnett v. Muncie Nat. Bank, 98 U. S. 555; Cook v. Lillo, 103 U. In New Hampshire, payment of illegal interest on a note subsequently transferred by the plaintiff, may be set off in an action on another note. Ashland Sav. Bank v. Bailey (N. H. 1890), 21 Atl. Rep. 221.

3. Chaplin v. Currier, 49 Vt. 48.

Where the lender, at the time of making the loan, counted out $1,000, and handed $900 of it to the borrower, retaining the balance as a bonus, and taking the borrower's note for $1,000, the Statute of Limitations did not begin to run against an action to recover back the usury, until the payment of the note. Harvey v. National Life Ins. Co., 60 Vt. 209.

4. Josey v. Davis (Ark. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 185; Hawkins v. Welch, 8 Mo. 490; Tyler on Usury, p. 421 et seq.

Where both debt and usurious inter-

Statutes authorizing an action to be brought within a short period of limitation, have been regarded as cumulative, and not as prohibiting the common-law action at any time within six years.¹

It has also been held that the general Statute of Limitations will not, so long as any part of the debt remains unpaid, cut off the debtor's right to recover back, by way of set-off, usurious payments made on the debt.² But the soundness of this proposition has been questioned upon the ground that the right of action to recover back the usurious interest accrues immediately upon its payment, and if the debtor neglects to sue during the statutory period, he ought not to be allowed to afterward assert the same cause of action by way of set-off or recoupment. And it has been so decided in well-considered cases.³

The statute begins to run against the right to recover back, from the time of actual payment, and not from the time of the agreement to pay.⁴

Equity has jurisdiction of suits to recover back usurious payments.⁵

2. By Third Parties.—Although the general rule is that the right to plead usury is a privilege personal to the debtor, it is held that his cause of action to recover back usury is a vested right and passes to his assignee in bankruptcy, or for the benefit of creditors;⁶ to a receiver appointed in supplementary proceed-est are included in a note, payment of the usury may be deemed a payment on the principal; but if the usury is evidenced by a separate note, which the debtor pays, he may treat such payment as having no connection with the debt, and sue to recover it back. Nichols v. Bellows, 22 Vt. 581; 54 Am. Dec. 85. See also Davis v. Converse, 35 Vt. 503.

The doctrine stated in the text is criticised and referred to as an "indefensible theory," in the recent case of Cummings v. Knight, 65 N. H. 202.

Notwithstanding a statute requiring suits to recover usury to be brought within a year from time of payment, the debtor when sued may, more than a year after making a partial payment, interpose a plea of usury. He has the option to treat such payment as applied on the principal and lawful interest and not on the usury. Neale v. Rouse (Ky. 1892), 19 S. W. Rep. 171.

Even where the right to recover back voluntary payments is denied, the maker of a usurious note, who has been compelled to pay it in the hands of a bona fide holder, may, by a bill in equity, recover from the payee the amount of usury, on the ground that the payment was compulsory. Woodworth v. Huntoon, 40 Ill. 131; 89 Am. Dec. 340. And in stating an account, equity will credit the debtor with all payments of usurious interest. Parmelee v. Lawrence, 44 Ill. 405.

ings against him;¹ and to his administrator.² But a judgment creditor, it seems, cannot recover usury paid by his debtor to another, unless the debtor consents or assigns the claim to him.³

A surety who pays his principal's debt with knowledge of its usurious character, is entitled to recover back from the creditor, but not from the principal.⁴ And when the surety has been reimbursed by the principal, the latter cannot sue to recover back from the creditor, but the action must still be brought by the surety.⁵ A surety sued on the debt is not entitled to plead by way of set-off the payment of usurious interest by the principal.⁶

3. Demand Before Suit.—It seems that no demand by the debtor is necessary before bringing suit to recover back the usury paid, for the reason that the creditor had no legal right to receive it.⁷

XI. APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS.—The general rule, recognized by all the courts, is that so long as any part of the principal debt remains unpaid, the debtor has the right to have all payments previously made, applied by the court as so much paid on the debt itself, whether such payments were made as for usurious interest, or generally, and without reference to the usury.⁸

If the statute declares a forfeiture of all interest for usury, as in Illinois, all payments of interest must be applied on the principal debt.⁹ And the right to such application is not affected by the debtor's giving a renewal note subsequently to the usurious payments.¹

If the obligation sued on is separate and distinct from that upon which the usurious payment was made, the defendant is not entitled to have such payment deducted; thus, usurious interest paid on one series of notes cannot be deducted in a suit upon a later series given by one who was an accommodation indorser on the first.² Nor can usurious interest paid on one note be deducted from another note of the same series.³ But payments on a note given as a usurious bonus for a loan will be applied on the actual debt.⁴

Some courts hold that the debtor's right to have such application made of payments of usurious interest is lost, if the Statute of Limitations would bar his common-law right to recover back the amount so paid.⁵

XII. HOW USURY MAY BE PURGED.—Usurious contracts, even though declared void by the statute, may nevertheless be so thoroughly purged by the subsequent acts of the parties, as to become valid and enforceable. To have that effect, the usurious contract must be abandoned, the usury already paid be returned to the debtor, or credited upon the valid portion of the debt with his full knowledge and consent, and a new contract made, free from all taint of usury.⁶ The settlement must be free from sus-

Drake v. Chandler, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 909; Phillips v. Columbus City Bldg. Assoc., 53 Iowa 719.

In Trusdell v. Dowden, 47 N. J. Eq. 396, Van Fleet v. C., speaking for the New Jersey court of chancery, said: "The principle is settled that the parties to a usurious contract can do nothing which will have the effect to validate it, so as to deprive the debtor of his right to defend on the ground of usury, except by expunging the usurious element."

What Constitutes Purgation.—On a settlement of several notes, some of which were usurious, the debtor gave the creditor certain judgments and claims against third parties, and agreed to make good any deficit resulting from a failure to collect them, and all his notes were surrendered to him. Subsequently he gave a note for the amount of such deficit. It was held that he could not plead the original usury. Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. (Va.) 698.

Where a borrower received from the lender only $1,300, for which he gave his note for $2,000 at an unlawful rate of interest, a subsequent written agreement on his part to treat the note as valid and binding, in consideration of picion, and the debtor's knowledge of all the facts in relation to the usury must be made to appear.¹

The doctrine that to constitute purgation there must be a restoration of whatever usury has been paid, and a complete removal of the usurious element, seems to have been departed from in a number of cases which hold that where a usurious contract is canceled, the usury paid or secured by a separate obligation, and a new contract made for the valid portion of the debt, with legal interest, the latter is free from usury.² It has also been held that a new contract executed by a third party for the amount due, upon

$1 and the repayment of all usurious interest previously paid, and a stipulation for lawful interest thereafter, did not in any manner purge the transaction, the chief element of usury consisting of the $700 over the amount actually loaned, being allowed to remain in the note. El Paso Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Lane, 81 Tex. 369.

Usury in a loan association is not purged by a subsequent agreement reducing the number of shares, the premium, and payments, where the premium to be paid at the longest time the loan can run, as modified, in addition to the specified rate of interest, amounts to more than the legal rate. International Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Biering (Tex. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 622.

New Promise.—If the parties to a usurious engagement state an account, and in good faith agree upon a sum which would be due for principal and legal interest, after deducting all that has been paid beyond legal interest, and a new promise is thereupon made to pay that sum, such promise is free from the original usury, and valid in law. Barnes v. Hedley, 2 Taunt. 184; Wright v. Wheeler, 1 Camp. 165; Gray v. Fowler, 1 H. Bl. 462.

In Taylor v. Morris, 22 N. J. Eq. 606, De Pue, J., speaking for the court of errors and appeals, said: "If the immediate parties to the transaction repent, and by mutual consent the usurious security be surrendered, a new promise to pay the sum loaned, with legal interest, may then be enforced, on the principle that the parties have purged the transaction of its original vice. But, as between the parties to the usurious instrument, or as against a subsequent holder with knowledge of the defect, the original taint attaches to all substituted obligations or securities, however remote, unless the original vice be removed by expunging the usurious element."

In Phillips v. Columbus City Bldg. Assoc., 53 Iowa 719, the court, by Rothrock, J., said: "It cannot, we think, be seriously questioned that the parties in interest to a usurious contract may, by a new contract, purge the transaction of usury. Suppose, in the case of an ordinary loan of money at usurious rates of interest, after the payment of several installments of such interest, the lender should credit the note with the full amount thereof, and call the attention of the borrower thereto, and the borrower should assent to such credit, and afterward make his payments in such time and in such amounts as that no usury whatever is exacted. Surely such a modification of the original contract would be binding upon the parties. It purges the original contract of usury. Under such a modification the usurious interest is in effect paid back, and a new contract is made which is free from the original taint of usury."

2. Fowler v. Garret, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 682; Postlethwait v. Garret, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 345; Chadbourn v. Watts, 10 Mass. 121; 6 Am. Dec. 100; Kilbourn v. Bradley, 3 Day (Conn.) 356; 3 Am. Dec. 273; Gerlaugh v. Basset, 20 Wis. 671. The soundness of these decisions may be questioned, on the ground that neither the payment of the usury, nor the giving of a separate obligation therefor, indicates any repentance for the unlawful transaction, but rather tends to prove the contrary.

Separation of Usury.—In the case of Siesel v. Harris, 48 Ga. 652, it was decided that the payment of a portion of a usurious debt and the giving of new notes for the balance did not amount to a purgation, notwithstanding such settlement was made upon the

the surrender of the usurious contract, is valid,¹ particularly where the original debtor has paid, or promised to pay, such third party the full amount for that purpose.²

It is not essential that the amount of usury paid should actually be returned to the debtor; it is sufficient if he receives a valuable and bona fide consideration for the settlement and release of the usury; as where the debtor, in payment of a usurious debt, conveys property to the creditor at a price greatly exceeding its real value, in consideration of releasing the usury.³ Of course, if no usury has been paid, but merely reserved, it is sufficiently purged by a surrender of the contract, and the giving of a new one with the usurious element excluded.⁴ But if there is any uncertainty as to whether the usury was entirely excluded, the whole matter will be judicially investigated.⁵ Though a release under seal of all claim on account of the usury, made contemporaneously with the loan, is treated as a mere subterfuge, and no bar to a recovery debtor's threatening to plead usury against the enforcement of the original security.

2. Wales v. Webb, 5 Conn. 154.

Promise by New Party.—In the case of Turner v. Hulme, 4 Esp. 11, a debtor had been lodged in prison upon execution, the debt originally being usurious; and the creditor released him upon receiving the note of two other persons for the entire amount claimed. Lord Kenyon ruled that usury could not be objected against this new note. The doctrine of this decision at nisi prius was strongly disapproved and rejected in Bridge v. Hubbard, 15 Mass. 96; 8 Am. Dec. 86, in which case Parker, C. J., speaking for the majority of the court, said: "It can hardly be supposed that a usurious lender of money can screen himself from the effects of the law by giving up the security originally taken, and substituting another in its place. If this can be done, much ingenuity is not required to evade and defeat the statute."

Renewal Note.—The indorser of a note, being ignorant of the fact that it was usurious, gave the payee, who was a party to the usury, a new note signed by him as maker, for the amount. In an action on the new note, it was held that the trial court erred in charging the jury that the note in suit was a new contract, purged of the taint of usury. It was in effect merely a renewal note, and open to the same defense as the former. First Nat. Bank v. Plankinton, 27 Wis. 177; 9 Am. Rep. 453.

3. Broadwell v. Lair, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 220.

Reconveyance.—Property having been sold and bought in by the creditor, under a trust deed securing a usurious loan, the parties agreed upon a settlement under the terms of which a portion of the land was reconveyed to the debtor, and he gave his note and a deed of trust for the purchase price. It was held that the usury in the original loan did not affect the new note. Ryan v. Newcomb, 125 Ill. 91.

Where usurious interest had been paid on notes given for a portion of the purchase price of land, and afterward the land depreciated in value to less than the amount of principal and legal interest then due, whereupon the purchaser reconveyed to the vendor and the notes were surrendered, it was held that the purchaser could not maintain a bill to recover back the usurious interest paid. Smith v. Berry, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 317.

After Repeal of Statute.—After the abolition of the usury laws, the parties to a mortgage, usurious when made, agreed upon a settlement whereby the mortgagor conveyed the land absolutely to the mortgagee in payment of the debt. It was held that the settlement was valid. Bullard v. Jones, 68 Ga. 472.

4. DeWolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 367; Martin v. Hall, 9 Gratt. (Va.) 8.

5. Denny v. Williamson, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 372.

A note tainted with usury was by agreement of the parties resurrendered and a note for a certain quantity of wheat, estimated at a price equal to the

of the usury paid,¹ still it seems that such a release, executed long after the payment, is effectual, though without actual consideration, the absence of which is, in contemplation of law, supplied by the seal.² If the contract is wholly void in its inception, no subsequent act of the parties, however formal, can make it valid;³ thus, a title absolutely void under the Georgia statute on account of usury does not become a valid security by subsequently purging the debt.⁴ Ordinarily, however, there is a moral obligation to pay the principal and legal interest, which furnishes a good consideration for a new promise of such payment.⁵

Where a usurious obligation has been canceled, and a new one given for the valid debt, an agreement that a security given for the former shall stand as security for the latter is valid and enforceable in equity.⁶ But a usurious mortgage is not rendered valid by a subsequent agreement to treat it as purged in consideration of a deduction allowed by the creditor in the settlement of other and separate matters.⁷

The creditor cannot of his own motion purge a contract and escape the penalty by merely indorsing or crediting the amount of the usury as so much paid upon the principal. The full consent of the debtor is indispensable.⁸

There is, however, one case in which the creditor alone may escape from his usury; as where he has made a contemporaneous or subsequent oral agreement to extend the time of payment of an obligation valid by its terms, upon payment of usurious interest, which agreement has not been executed; and by bringing suit on the original obligation, he is deemed to have abandoned such agreement, and thus the usury contemplated is purged.⁹

XIII. SUBSTITUTED AND RENEWED CONTRACTS.—So long as the original element of usury remains, and until it has been thoroughly purged by the deliberate act of the parties, the taint of usury attaches to all subsequent contracts and securities, substituted for full amount of the cash note, was given in its place. It was held that the wheat note was a mere substitute, and usurious. Dunning v. Merrill, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 252.

Unauthorized Credit.—In Jackson v. Cassidy, 68 Tex. 282, Willie, C. J., said: "This vice in the contract was not cured by the entry, after the sale, of a credit to the borrower sufficient to reduce the interest to twelve per cent. per annum. The law does not allow the usurer to evade punishment in that way. It will not allow him to violate its provisions, take the chances for collecting the unlawful interest, and, when detected, by a stroke of his pen to place himself in the position of one who has demanded no more than the law allows him. If this can be done, the statute against usury had as well be repealed."

or given in renewal of the original debt, no matter how many times removed; and the debtor has the same right of defending against the last substitute or renewal as if it were the original contract.¹ Such changes in the form of the obligation have been designated as merely "items in a running account."²

When it is shown that the obligation in suit was given as a

Instances of Renewals.—Where in pursuance of an agreement to pay twenty-three per cent. interest, a loan was made, and a note given drawing twelve per cent., the highest legal rate, which was several times renewed, the excess of interest being paid at each renewal except the last, which was for the sum loaned and twelve per cent. interest, it was held that equity would not attempt to separate the transactions, but would treat the last note as usurious. Lee v. Peckham, 17 Wis. 383. And see Doyle v. Holland (Neb. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 989.

Notes given for a debt bore a valid rate of interest on their face, but it was orally agreed between the parties to pay a usurious rate, and afterward renewal notes were given, but no credit allowed for the payments of excessive interest previously made. It was held that the renewal notes were subject to the defense of usury. Koehler v. Dodge, 31 Neb. 328.

Incorporation of Usurious with Non-Usurious Loan.—The mere fact that a note which, at the time of obtaining a new loan, was incorporated in a new note given for both debts, was tainted with usury, will not taint the new loan with usury. Porter v. Jefferies (S. Car. 1894), 18 S. E. Rep. 229.

Valid Compromise.—In Hooper v. Ferguson, 57 Iowa 39, a debt bearing usurious interest was paid by giving the creditor a lease of a certain building. Subsequently the lessee executed a release of the lower floor, and in consideration thereof the lessor gave him the note sued on, which was on the basis of the original usurious debt. It was held that the latter note was free from the taint.

Pleading.—An allegation that a final settlement was agreed upon between the payee and maker of certain notes, but that, as the maker was not at that time prepared to pay in cash, a new note for the sum found due was given "in payment of said former notes and not in renewal," is not a sufficient reply to an answer setting up usury in the former notes, in that it does describe a settlement and voluntary payment of interest. Hardman v. Wilson, 40 Ohio St. 630.

substitute or renewal of a usurious one, the presumption arises that the taint entered into it also.¹ A substitute or renewal is none the less tainted because it calls for legal interest on the balance of a usurious loan after previous payments of the usury have been deducted.² If the original obligation was free from usury, a renewal or substitute which is tainted with that vice is unenforcible;³ but, as is elsewhere in this article more fully explained, the original obligation is not thereby destroyed or affected.⁴ In ascertaining whether a new contract is a substitute or renewal, the fact that there are new or different obligors is a circumstance of some importance, but not necessarily conclusive evidence of a novation so as to exclude the original defense. Illustrative cases are given in the note.⁵

Usurious Renewals.—A valid note for $500 in sixty days not being paid at maturity, the holder agreed to extend the time sixty days upon payment of $50 for forbearance; whereupon the debtor gave a new note for $500 payable in sixty days, and also gave a due bill for the $50. It was held that the new note was usurious and void. Motle v. Dorrell, 1 McCord (S. Car.) 350; 10 Am. Dec. 675.

But where a usurious note was renewed by giving two notes, one for the principal debt with legal interest, and the other for the usurious interest, and the former was, after maturity, transferred to the plaintiff without notice of the usury, it was held in an action on the note, that the defense of usury could not be interposed. Aiken v. Waco State Bank (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 747. It may be observed that no authorities were cited in support of the view taken by the court in this case, which was that all the usury had centered in the interest note, thus eliminating the vice from the renewed principal note.

Where, on a sale of land, seven notes were given for annual installments of the purchase price, and on the vendor's failing to pay the first note at maturity, a new note was given for a sum much larger than the aggregate of all the seven notes and interest, the latter note was held usurious, the court refusing to regard it as evidence of a new sale of the land at a higher price. Ogden v. Yoder, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 424.

But the mere fact that a renewal note is for a larger sum than the principal and interest then due on the old note, is not sufficient to establish usury, there being nothing to show the intention of the parties or the consideration of the new note. Morrison v. Verdinal, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 63; Tallman v. Sprague (N. Y. Super. Ct.), 18 N. Y. Supp. 207.

It is not usury to take a new note in lieu of others, one of which was not then due, and to make no allowance for the time the latter had yet to run. Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 458.

Renewal Payable in Gold.—A note payable in gold, given in renewal of one for a like amount payable in treasury notes, is usurious where the gold premium was at the time of renewal greatly in excess of legal interest on the debt. Yates v. Hackethal, 57 Ill. 534; 11 Am. Rep. 45.

Recovery Under Original Contract.—In replevin under a mortgage to secure a usurious note, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover by reason of a former valid note and mortgage, in renewal of which the note and mortgage in the suit were given. Barrows v. Thomas, 43 Minn. 270.

4. See supra, this title, Effect of Usury.

Where, in consideration of an extension of time upon an overdue note, the maker agrees to pay usurious interest, and the same is afterward included in the amount of another note, a plea of usury must be made to the latter, and not to the former. Collier v. Soule (Tex. 1892), 19 S. W. Rep. 506; Aiken v. Waco State Bank (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 747.

5. New Parties.—A new note given in renewal of a usurious one, some of the obligors in the latter being omitted from the renewal note, is not payment,

Whatever usury the debtor has paid on the original obligation, or on a previous substitute, he is entitled to have deducted from the last substitute.¹

XIV. MISTAKE.—To rebut the presumption of usurious intent arising from the taking or reserving of interest greater than the legal rate, it is always competent for the party to show that the excess was the result of an honest mistake, and that there was in fact no intentional agreement for usury.² Such mistakes most freand the taint of usury is carried into it. Kendall v. Crouch, 88 Ky. 199.

After the death of the obligor in a usurious bond, a friend of his, who was ignorant of the usury, and to prevent a law suit, gave his own bond in lieu of the former. It was held that the new bond was usurious and void. Edwards v. Skirving, 1 Brev. (S. Car.) 548.

Renewals by Sureties and Indorsers.—A surety upon a note tainted with usury, to which he was a party, received it from the holder for the purpose of getting it secured by the maker, and gave the holder his own note in place of it. It was held that this was a mere substitution, and usury could be pleaded to the new note. Botsford v. Sanford, 2 Conn. 276.

Where the sureties on a bond tainted with usury gave a note to the payee, it was held, in an action on the note, that the sureties were entitled to credit for all usurious interest paid under the bond. Moore v. Johnson, 34 W. Va. 672.

A substituted note given by a surety in settlement of his liability on a former note which was given by his principal for a balance due upon a debt, upon which usurious interest had previously been paid, is not a usurious contract or assurance within the meaning of the statute. Craig v. Butler, 9 Mich. 21.

Substituting an acceptance for a bill on which the acceptor was an indorser, without any new consideration, does not cut out the defense of usury. Jones v. Holcombe, 60 Ga. 665.

To Creditor's Representatives.—The debtor can plead usury in the original debt, as against a renewal note given to a deceased creditor's personal representatives. Van Ausdale v. Potter, 41 Ohio St. 677.

Renewal notes given to a residuary legatee in place of usurious ones given to the testator, do not prevent the makers from defending against them to the extent of the original usury. Smith v. Broyles, 15 B. Mon. (Ky.) 461.

Where principal and usurious interest under a previous note are included in the amount of a new one to the payee's legatee, and the latter note is paid, the maker may sue the legatee to recover the usurious interest. Eggen v. Huston (Ky. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 919.

Clerical Mistakes.—A bond was executed on the 23d of May, 1617, for the repayment of a loan of £120 then made, which by its terms was to be paid, together with £12 as interest, "upon the 24th day of May next ensuing." It was shown that in drawing the bond the scrivener had inserted the words "next ensuing" by mistake, and that the parties intended that it should be paid on the 24th day of May in the year next ensuing. The court unanimously agreed that this was not usury, for there was no corrupt agreement between the parties. Buckley v. Guildbank, Cro. Jac. 678; 2 Rall. 414.

So where the scrivener had inserted "eleven months," when the actual agreement was for a whole year. Clarke's Case, cited in 2 Rall. 414.

So if a mortgage be for £100, with a proviso to be void on payment of £106 at the end of a year, but by mistake of the scrivener it contained no covenant for the mortgagor to have the rents and profits until default, so that in strictness the mortgagee would be entitled both to the interest and the profits, yet this not being expressed, the agreement was not usurious. Ballard v. Oddey, 2 Mod. 307.

So where an illiterate scrivener drew a bond for £50 payable in half a year, with £4 interest, instead of payable in one year, as the parties intended. Nevison v. Whitby, Sir W. Jones 396; Cro. Car. 501.

Though the lender has notice of the quently occur in the computation of interest for fractional parts of a year; and whenever the creditor can show where the mistake occurred, and that he acted in good faith, the charge of usury is thereby rebutted.¹ It is usually a question for the jury, whether a sum in excess of lawful interest was taken through an honest mistake, or corruptly.²

Ignorance of the law in respect to usury, or of its effects upon the contract, is not, ordinarily, such a mistake as will relieve the creditor from the consequences of taking a rate of interest beyond that authorized.³ If, however, the mistake of law was made under the influence of false or deceptive appearances, and not merely from the suggestions of the creditor's own mind, he is entitled to relief from the penalties of usury.⁴

XV. CONFLICT OF LAWS.—The general rule is that the question whether a contract is usurious or not is to be determined by the law of the state where it was made, unless the parties have contracted for performance elsewhere.⁵ It is equally well settled mistake in the instrument at the time of bringing suit upon it, this does not make him party to a corrupt agreement. Bush v. Buckingham, 2 Vent. 83; Buckler v. Millard, 2 Vent. 108.

Error in Computing Interest.—A mistake in computation of interest, by which the amount of a bill was made too large, does not prevent a recovery on the bill for the sum really due. Glasfurd v. Laing, 1 Camp. 149; Booth v. Cooke, 1 Freem. 264.

An account, in settlement of which the note in suit was given, contained various items of debt and interest, and in two items the amount of interest stated exceeded the lawful rate. At the foot of the account was a statement that "in case of errors either way, should any be discovered, they are to be corrected." It was held that the evidence did not establish a usurious agreement. Stockett v. Ellicott, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 123.

Where the maker of an accommodation note drawing the highest legal rate, sold it a few days after its date for its face value, and by oversight, no allowance was made for the accrued interest, there was no usury. Benjamin v. Rogers (Supreme Ct.), 10 N. Y. Supp. 777.

A recital in a mortgage that the note secured by it bore interest at twelve per cent., when in fact the note called for only ten per cent. (a lawful rate), does not render the mortgage void for usury. Ward v. Anderberg, 31 Minn. 304.

Where a debt is contracted in one country, and afterward, in consideration of forbearance, the debtor in another country agrees to pay interest on the debt at a rate higher than that that it is competent for the parties to contract in good faith for the payment of the debt in another state, with the higher rate of interest allowed there; and such contract will be enforced even in the state where it was made.¹ Where an evidence of debt is made payable in another state, it will be presumed that the parties adopted the interest laws of that state, and the contract will be good, though such rate of interest is higher than allowed by the

A contract made in Rhode Island was valid by the laws of that state, but usurious by the law of New York. Notes were given under the contract purporting to be made in New York, payable there, and the contract was to be substantially performed there, but the notes were negotiated in Rhode Island. It was held that the Rhode Island law governed. Brown v. American Finance Co., 31 Fed. Rep. 516.

A note dated, executed, delivered, and made payable in New York, given for an existing debt arising in and owned by a resident of another state, is governed by the usury laws of New York. Merchants' Bank v. Southwick, 67 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 324.

The law of the state where the payee resides and the note is made payable, governs, and not the state where the maker resides and receives the money. Sharp v. Davis, 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 607; Bowles v. Eddy, 33 Ark. 645.

Under a contract to loan money in Germany, the borrower drew notes in the city of New York, made payable there, and mailed them to the payee in Germany. It was held that the notes were governed by the usury law of New York. Mailing was a delivery in that state. Heidenheimer v. Mayer, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 506.

Georgia Doctrine.—A resident of Massachusetts lent money through an agent to a resident of Georgia; the money loaned was delivered to the borrower in Georgia, and the note for its payment was executed in Georgia, secured by mortgage on land situate there, but it was made payable in Massachusetts. Under the laws of Georgia, the loan would be usurious, by reason of certain deductions from the amount stated in the note; but under the laws of Massachusetts the transaction would be valid. In an action brought in Georgia upon the note, it was held that to the extent of the usury under the laws of that state, the note could not be enforced. Blandford, J., speaking for the court, said: "If this court should hold that a note made in this state, but payable in the State of Massachusetts, for money advanced by the agent of a person who resided in Massachusetts, could be collected notwithstanding it contained sixteen per cent. usurious and unlawful interest, then the law of this state as to usury would be inoperative and useless. The money lenders of those states which have no usury laws, but which allow to be collected any rate of interest contracted for, could flood this state law of the former.¹ But as the courts look to the real intention and not the outward expression of the parties in all cases, contracts with their agents, and, by the loan of money, exact the highest rates of interest—even one hundred per cent. The contract of lending and borrowing money always includes two agreements—one, by the lender, to deliver the money; and the other, by the borrower, to repay it. As the pleas do not allege that the agreement to deliver the money was to be performed elsewhere, the place of delivery was Georgia. It was in the performance of this agreement that the usury was reserved. The whole amount of the usury was deducted from the money delivered, and this was done in Georgia. The taint of usury does not result from payment, but from agreement, performed or unperformed. Were payment necessary, the deduction of the usury from the amount of the loan is equivalent to payment, not for the purpose of recovering it back, but for the purpose of affixing the taint, and resisting ultimate payment pro tanto. The note bears no usurious interest, but a part of the principal is usury already reserved in Georgia, by holding back a part of the loan. That part of the note represents money now in the creditor's possession, and which he has never delivered to the borrower. Suppose the note were for that money only, with eight per cent. interest on it. Would it be collectible because payable in Boston? Would it not be a contract to pay in Boston usury reserved in Georgia? Is usury reserved in Georgia, by deducting it from the loan, less usury because agreed to be actually paid elsewhere? The parol agreement out of which the note sued on in this case sprung, was made in this state. Part of that agreement was performed in this state. The usury set forth in defendant's plea was paid in this state, and all that was left to be performed of that agreement was the payment of the notes sued on in this state. Whether a contract is made with reference to the place, or state, or county in which it is to be performed is a question of no easy solution. However this may be, there is enough in this case to show that in all likelihood the parties to the contract sued on, contemplated the law of the domicile of the maker as the law which should govern this contract in all respects. There is a portion of this contract which, under no circumstances, could be enforced in the State of Massachusetts—that as to the land upon which it is sought to set up a lien. Nor can we very readily see how any portion of this contract could be enforced in the State of Massachusetts against a person resident in the State of Georgia." Martin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 481.

Louisiana Decision.—A decision which has excited considerable criticism is that of Depau v. Humphreys, 8 Martin N. S. (La.) 1, where the question was as to the validity of a note executed and delivered in New Orleans, and made payable in New York, bearing interest at ten per cent., which was a lawful rate by the law of Louisiana, but higher than that allowed by the law of New York. If the note had been made in the latter state, it would have been entirely void. The supreme court of Louisiana decided that it was not usurious; and that, although made payable in New York, the interest might lawfully be stipulated for, according to the rate sanctioned in either state; that there may be two places of contract, the place where the contract is actually made, and that in which it is to be paid or performed; and that the contract for interest will be valid unless the law of both places be violated.

Mr. Justice Story dissents from the doctrine of that decision, and cites the views of many continental jurists as opposed to it. Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), § 298 et seq.

In Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 627; 31 Am. Dec. 264, Walworth, Ch., expresses his entire concurrence in the Louisiana decision. To the same effect, see Kilgore v. Dempsey, 25 Ohio St. 413; 18 Am. Rep. 306; Bank of Louisville v. Young, 37 Mo. 398; National Bank v. Smoot, 2 MacArthur (D. C.) 371.

In Pratt v. Adams, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 615, it was held in effect, that a contract for a loan of money may stipulate for a rate of interest lawful where the contract was made, though greater than that where it is to be performed, if it was not intended as a means of evading the usury law of the place of performance.

made payable elsewhere will be denied the protection of the rule under consideration, if it be made to appear that the parties were not acting in good faith, but resorted to that method for the purpose of concealing a transaction, usurious by the law to which they were actually subject.¹ If no place of payment be specified, the law of the place where the debtor resided and where the loan was made and the contract drawn will govern.²

The fact that a contract made and to be performed in one state is secured by a mortgage upon land in another, does not affect the rule that the lex loci contractus governs. The security is a Tiffany*, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 298; Junction R. Co. v. Bank of Ashland, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 226; Bolton v. Street, 3 Coldw. (Tenn.) 31; Parham v. Pulliam, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 497; Story on Conflict of Laws (8th ed.), § 293a.

In Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet. (U. S.) 65, the court, by Taney, C. J., said: "The defendants allege that the contract was not made with reference to the laws of either state (New York and Alabama), and was not intended to conform to either. That a rate of interest forbidden by the laws of New York, where the contract was made, was reserved on the debt actually due, and that it was concealed under the name of exchange in order to evade the law. Now, if this defense is true, and shall be so found by the jury, the question is not which law is to govern in executing the contract, but which is to decide the fate of a security taken upon a usurious agreement, which neither will execute. Unquestionably, it must be the law of the state where the agreement was made, and the instrument taken, to secure its performance. A contract of this kind cannot stand on the same principles with a bona fide agreement made in one place to be executed in another. In the last-mentioned cases, the agreements were permitted by the lex loci contractus, and will even be enforced there if the party is found within its jurisdiction. But the same rule cannot be applied to contracts forbidden by its laws and designed to evade them. In such cases the legal consequences of such an agreement must be decided by the law of the place where the contract was made. If void there, it is void everywhere."

The maker of a note resided in Boston, and it was dated and made payable there. The payee and the maker's agent resided in New York, where the contract for the note was made, one of the agreements being that the consideration for the note, in lieu of money, should be certain greatly depreciated bonds, to be taken by the maker at their par value to the amount of the note, it being understood that he was to raise the money he needed by selling the bonds. It was also agreed that he might, at his option, replace the bonds by others of the same value, by paying interest on the face of the note at the rate of twenty-five per cent. for the first year and six per cent. thereafter. In an action on the note brought in Massachusetts, where such a contract is not contrary to the statute, it was held that the laws of New York governed the contract, and rendered it usurious and void. Holmes v. Manning (Mass. 1888), 19 N. E. Rep. 25.

Where a citizen of New York lent money to a firm in Iowa, and took a certificate of indebtedness therefor, dated at the office of the firm in Iowa, and in which no place of payment was specified, the interest reserved being valid by the laws of Iowa, but usurious by those of New York, it was held an Iowa contract, and valid. Potter v. Tallman, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 182.

The Ohio courts hold that when a note is executed there by a citizen of another state, for money to be used by him in such other state, at a rate of interest valid there, and no place of payment is specified, the usury laws of Ohio will not be enforced against it. Scott v. Perlee, 39 Ohio St. 63; 48 Am. Rep. 421.

mere incident, and its locality cannot control the rate of interest.¹ Sometimes, however, the locality of the security assists in determining what law the parties had in view in making the contract; as where the land is located in the domicile of the debtor, and the money is received by him there.²

Where accommodation paper is executed and made payable in one state, and is given its inception by being discounted in another state, the question of usury in the discount is to be determined by the law of the former state.³ This is the rule, in the absence of evidence that the original parties intended that the paper should be negotiated elsewhere. If, however, such intention is clearly shown, and it appears that the transaction was bona fide, the law of the place of discount will govern.⁴

In a suit in Virginia on a note given by a resident of Texas for money borrowed of a resident of Virginia, and remitted to Texas, the note being dated in Texas and signed by two sureties, residents of Virginia, it was held that it was a Texas contract. *Backhouse v. Where a loan was contracted for in Philadelphia, payable in New York and secured by mortgage on land in Alabama, where the borrower resided, and where the money was delivered and the securities executed, and the rate of interest reserved was higher than that allowed in New York, but was lawful in Alabama, and there was no evidence of intention to evade the New York law, it was held that the contract should be governed by the laws of Alabama. Hitchcock v. U. S. Bank, 7 Ala. 386.

An agreement in good faith between a citizen of Nebraska and a citizen of New York for a loan by the latter to the former at a rate valid in Nebraska and to be secured on land in Nebraska, is good, even though actually executed in New York, where such rate is usurious. Kellogg v. Miller, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 395.

Where a note was given in South Carolina, secured by mortgage on land in that state, but payable in North Carolina at a rate of interest unlawful in the latter state, but lawful in the former, the court of South Carolina refused to be governed by the law of North Carolina. Thornton v. Dean, 19 S. Car. 583; 45 Am. Rep. 796.

In Dickinson v. Edwards, 77 N. Y. 573; 33 Am. Rep. 671, Folger, J., remarked: "It is said that there is no violation of the law of this state in the simple act of paying money in solution of a promise to do so, and that, as the act of taking a discount at a rate unlawful by our law was not done in this state, no act against its law was done or to be done here. But the act of taking the unlawful discount is not complete until the note has been paid. It rests in agreement until then. When the note has been paid at the place of payment and the amount gone to the credit of the holder, then is the act first complete, and the law is then also violated, and within this state. It would be a novel and startling doctrine, that the usury laws of a state could not be violated by a transaction agreed upon outside its bounds."

If the note be made in one state and discounted in another, at a rate

Judicial notice will not be taken of the usury laws of another state to aid a plea of usury; they must be proved as facts.¹ It has been held also that in the absence of proof, it will not be presumed that another state has any statute against usury;² but the better doctrine is in favor of the presumption that the statutes of the sister state are the same as those of the state in which the court is held.³

XVI. IN RESPECT TO NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—1. In General.—A negotiable instrument is a species of personal property, which may be sold and transferred for whatever price the owner may see fit to accept, even though much less than its face value; and such a transaction, being a mere sale, cannot be affected by the Statute of Usury.⁴ Under this head are included bonds, as well usurious in both, the law of the state where the discount was made governs as to the penalty. Heath v. Griswold, 18 Blatchf. (U. S.) 555. See also Connor v. Donnell, 55 Tex. 167.

Where usury is not pleaded, the court will not declare usurious a contract made in another state, though the rate of interest reserved is higher than allowed by the law of the former. In such case it is not incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that such rate was authorized by the law of the state where made. Reiff v. Bakken, 36 Minn. 333.

On the other hand, it is held that where the defense of usury is interposed, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any interest, though a certain note be expressly reserved, where he offers no evidence of his right to such interest by the law of the place of payment. *Camp v. In Nichols v. Fearson, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 107, in regard to the validity of an indorsement of a bill at a discount greater than legal interest, the court, by Johnson, J., said: "The courts of New York have gotten over these difficulties by adjudicating that whenever the note or bill, in its inception, was a real transaction, so that the payee or promisee might at maturity maintain a suit upon it, a transfer by indorsement on a discount, though beyond the legal rate of interest, shall be regarded as a sale of the note or bill, and a valid and legal transaction. But not so where the paper, in its origin, was only a nominal transaction."

Where a note was given by a judgment debtor to the sheriff as security for the payment of an execution, with instructions to sell it and apply the proceeds upon the execution, if the debtor should fail to satisfy the same within ten days, and the sheriff, after the expiration of that time, the execution being unpaid, sold the note at a discount greater than as bills and notes.¹ The circumstance that the seller accompanied the transfer with his indorsement, guaranty or absolute warranty of payment by the maker, does not convert the transaction into a loan, if the parties acted in good faith.² Some authorities, however, hold that a transfer of this character practically amounts to a loan from the indorsee to the indorser, and that if more than legal interest be deducted it becomes usurious.³

The mere intention of the parties to a negotiable instrument to raise money upon it at usurious rates, does not vitiate it as between them, when no act has been done to carry the intention into effect.⁴

A common device for concealing usury is to draw a negotiable instrument at legal interest, for an amount larger than the actual debt; but when it is shown that the excess was in the nature of additional interest, the instrument is vitiated as usurious.⁵ So, though legal interest, it was held that the note was valid in the hands of the purchaser. Tuttle v. Clark, 4 Conn. 153.

The payee and indorser of a bill, who has been compelled to pay it to one to whom it had been indorsed at a discount greater than legal interest, is entitled to recover the full amount from the drawer and acceptor. Hosier v. Eliason, 14 Ind. 523.

A party to negotiable paper void in the hands of the holder on account of usury is entitled to have it delivered up and canceled. Taylor v. Grant, 35 N. Y. Super. Ct. 353.

Purchase of Own Note.—In Young v. Miller, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 540, it was considered usurious for a creditor to receive his own note, not yet due, at a discount greater than the highest legal rate of interest, in payment of a debt due from the payee. But unless the transaction was in pursuance of a prior understanding, from which a usurious intent could be inferred, it would seem that the creditor did no more than to buy the paper, as a third person might have done, at an agreed price.

Payment of Discount by Debtor.—The purchase of a note and mortgage for less than its face value, the debtor paying to the mortgagee, with the knowledge of the purchaser, the amount of the discount, is not necessarily usurious. The real intention of all the parties to the transaction is to be inquired into. Stewart v. Hamel, 91 N. Y. 199.

The purchase of a note in the regular course of business, at a discount greater than legal interest, is not usurious, even though the amount of the discount was, without the knowledge of the purchaser, furnished by the debtor. Colehour v. State Sav. Inst., 90 Ill. 152.

Where a purchaser of several notes at less than their face value, takes a new note from the maker for the full amount, it is not usury, as the relation of borrower and lender does not exist. Appeal of Donehoo (Pa. 1888), 15 Atl. Rep. 924.

In Lloyd v. Keach, 2 Conn. 175; 7 Am. Dec. 256, it is held that the sale of a note or bill with warranty, at an unusual discount, is not even prima facie evidence of usury.

the instrument be only for the actual debt, and bears lawful interest on its face, it is vitiated by a contemporaneous oral agreement to pay an additional sum or value as interest.¹ And the taking of separate notes, one for the principal debt, and another for the unlawful interest, is a device which will not save the former from the consequences of the statute.²

The defense of usury in one obligation cannot be set up in an action on a separate and distinct obligation between the parties.³

2. Exchange.—Where a note or bill is, for the convenience of the maker, made payable at a place outside of the state, it is not usury to include, besides the highest rate of interest, the current rate of exchange between the two places.⁴ But an agree-

But an agreement by which a borrower agrees to pay a smaller rate of interest than the highest legal rate, without any date being fixed for the payment of the loan, is not usurious, although the note is given for a much larger sum than the amount borrowed. International Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Biering (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 621; Abbott v. International Bldg., etc., Assoc. (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 629.

Parol Evidence.—In the case of Butterfield v. Kidder, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 512, however, it was held that evidence of a contemporaneous parol agreement to pay unlawful interest could not be admitted to defeat a note bearing on its face lawful interest.

In Cousins v. Grey, 60 Tex. 346, it was held that an agreement, made at the time of executing a note drawing legal interest, that thereafter a new contract should be made with interest usurious by the law in force at the date of the note, renders the note itself usurious.

In Glisson v. Newton, 1 Haywood, (N. Car.) 336; 1 Am. Dec. 559, the court said: "Any shift or device whatsoever, to take more than the interest allowed, and particularly the device of securing the principal and interest by distinct assurances, is incompetent to the purpose of taking the case out of the operation of the act.

... Were the act to be evaded by so simple a contrivance as that of taking two securities, the one for principal, the other for the unlawful premium, it would answer no purpose whatsoever."

3. In Taylor v. Breisch (Pa. 1887), 11 Atl. Rep. 388, Green, J., said: "All our recent decisions are to the point that a defense of usury against one obligation cannot be set up against an action upon an entirely distinct and independent obligation, even if it be between the same parties, much less can it be done where the parties are not the same." In Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. (U. S.) 151, Curtis, J., said: "The reason why the addition of the current rate of exchange to the legal rate of interest does not constitute usury, is that the former is a just and lawful compensation for receiving payment at a place where the money is expected to be less valuable than at the place where it is advanced and lent; and this reason exists, where the lender discounts the drawer's bill, as well as when he buys a bill in the market of the payee. In neither case is it usury to take the regular and customary compensation for the loss in value by change of place of payment."

An agreement by the maker of a note drawn in Illinois and payable in New York, to pay exchange at the time of extending or paying the note, is not per se usurious, because exchange may then be in his favor. Griffin v. Marine Co., 52 Ill. 130.

ment for exchange in addition to the highest rate of interest upon a note or bill between parties in the same state and payable there, is usurious, being merely another name for additional interest.¹ But it matters not that the creditor had previously paid exchange in order to bring the money with which to make the loan from another state.² Where both debtor and creditor reside in the same place, an agreement to pay the debt and interest with exchange on a distant city is regarded as a device to cover usury.³ In respect to foreign exchange, it is held that funds situated in a foreign country are the subject of commerce, and may be sold by the owner at home for the best price he can obtain.⁴

Generally, it may be said that the taking of the amount of actual

Knowledge of Lender.—Where the money loaned was sent by the lender to a middleman engaged in making the loan, the fact that the latter, without the lender's knowledge, deducted for his own benefit a small sum to cover exchange, in addition to his commissions, does not constitute usury. Riley v. Olin, 82 Ga. 312.

1. Mix v. Madison Ins. Co., 11 Ind. 117; Towslee v. Durkee, 12 Wis. 480.

As a matter of law, a given sum of money is of the same value in all parts of the same state. Hence, where a bank at Lyons, N. Y., on discounting a note payable at Albany, N. Y., took in addition to the highest legal rate of interest, one-half of one per cent. as the difference of exchange between Lyons and Albany, at that time it was held that the transaction was usurious. Price v. Lyons Bank, 33 N. Y. 55; 88 Am. Dec. 368.

But where a note payable in the city of New York is discounted in the country, it is not usury to pay the borrower the proceeds by a draft on the city at the usual rates of exchange. Union Bank v. Gregory, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 98.

But a loan is not usurious by reason of an understanding that the lender is to receive the borrower's deposits and pay them over on demand, and that all notes discounted for the borrower shall be paid in the city of New York, by means of which the lender is enabled to receive, in addition to legal interest, the benefit of an exchange of one-half of one per cent. in favor of New York. Beals v. Benjamin, 33 N. Y. 61.

2. In Jacks v. Nichols, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 313, the facts were that the lender had brought his money to New York from Georgia, at a cost of nine per cent. for exchange. He subsequently loaned it in New York, payable there, and stipulated for legal interest and also seven and one-half per cent. exchange; his object being to partly reimburse himself for the expense of getting his money to New York. It was held that there was no justification for the charge, and that the loan was usurious.

3. Siter v. Sheets, 7 Ind. 132.

Where a note is executed and payable in Wisconsin, a provision for payment of exchange on New York is usurious, if its purpose is to conceal the taking of illegal interest. Rock Co. Bank v. Wooliscroft, 16 Wis. 22.

Question for Jury.—The question whether a reservation of exchange, in discounting bills and making advances upon goods to be sold elsewhere, is usurious, depends upon the actual intention of the parties, as determined from all the circumstances, and is for the jury. Grand Gulf Bank v. Archer, 8 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 151; Commercial Bank v. Nolan, 7 How. (Miss.) 508.

4. In Leavitt v. De Launy, 4 N. Y. 363, Harris, J., said: "Foreign exchange is a commodity which may be bought or sold like merchandise. Its price is governed chiefly by the state of trade between the place where it is negotiated and the place where it is payable. The sale of exchange is, in effect, a transfer of funds which the drawee has, or is supposed to have, in another country, to the purchaser. Such funds are more or less valuable, according to circumstances. Such value is chiefly affected by the state of trade between the country where the funds are owned and that where they are held. To some extent, also, such value is affected by the time required to transfer funds from one country to another, and the hazard incurred in making such trans-difference of exchange between the place of payment and the residence of the creditor, is not usury, unless resorted to in bad faith and as a mere device to evade the law.¹

3. Usury Between Indorser and Indorsee.—A note or bill valid in its inception, but which has been transferred by the holder for a usurious consideration, clearly cannot be enforced as between the immediate parties to the usury.² It is also clear that the payee of a note or bill who sells and indorses it to a bona fide purchaser cannot, when sued on his indorsement, plead that the instrument was usurious.³ But the authorities are not agreed upon the question whether the indorsee who is party to the usury can recover from the maker or prior indorsers. In support of such right it is maintained that, notwithstanding the usury, the indorsee acquired title to the paper, by an executed contract, and that prior parties, having no connection with the subsequent usury, cannot avoid their obligations by setting it up against the holder.⁴ And it is

fer. Funds thus situated are the subject of commerce. The owner may sell them for the best price he can obtain, without the hazard of having the sale avoided for usury."

Armstrong v. Gibson, 31 Wis. 66; 11 Am. Rep. 599; Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (3d ed.), § 759.

In Knight v. Putnam, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 184, which was an action by the indorsee of a note against the maker, and the defense was that the indorsee had received it upon a usurious contract with his indorser, the court, by Wilde, J., said: "But it is objected that, as the transfer is usurious, the plaintiff's title fails, although the original contract remains good, and that he cannot derive title from an illegal transaction, in which he was a guilty party. This objection would have weight, if a usurious contract were malum in se or merely void. But it has been frequently held, that a contract contaminated with usury is only voidable by the party injured or those claiming under him. Now, it is manifest that the maker of a note is not affected by a usurious agreement between the indorser and indorsee. He is liable on his contract, and it is immaterial to him whether the action be brought in the name of the indorser or in that of the indorsee. But I hold further, that the transfer of a note on a usurious consideration is neither void nor voidable. So far as the indorsement operates as a transfer of the note, it is an executed contract, and the statute against usury is not applicable. It only applies to the implied promise or guaranty of the indorser, which being an executory contract may be avoided. But in no case can an executed contract be set aside on the plea of usury. It is not, however, nec-

so held, even though the indorsee received the paper merely as collateral security.¹ On the other hand, it is maintained that if the indorsee acquired title through a usurious transaction, prior parties have the right to take advantage of his violation of the statute.²

Another question upon which the authorities are at variance is as to the right of an innocent indorsee, under a valid transfer subsequent to the usurious indorsement, to recover against those who became parties to the instrument prior to the usury. The cases which hold that the indorsee may himself recover, under such circumstances, would à fortiori hold that the same right exists in favor of a subsequent innocent purchaser.³ Other authorities, essary to insist on this distinction for the purpose of sustaining the present verdict. It is sufficient for this purpose, that the transfer is voidable only, and that it is not competent for the defendant, he not being a party to the transfer, to avoid it. The note being free from usury between the immediate parties to it, no after transaction with another person can, as respects those persons, invalidate it."

In Collier v. Nevill, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 31, which was an action on a valid bond, brought by an assignee, who purchased it from the obligees upon a usurious contract, Ruffin, J., said: "If the security be in its origin usurious, it is void, into whose hands soever it gets, by the words of the statute. If it be good in its origin, a subsequent usurious agreement between the same parties does not avoid it, though it may subject the one party to the penalty, if anything be received under the corrupt agreement. And if it be good in its origin, the subsequent transfer of it, usuriously, does not affect it as against the maker. No redress can be had on the indorsement as between the parties to it. The very object of the statute is to protect the borrower as an oppressed man. But there is here no oppression on the obligor, who is a true debtor. The law was not intended for his protection."

If a note has a legal inception in the hands of the payee, no subsequent transfer upon a usurious consideration can defeat recovery by the holder against the maker. Catlin v. Gunter, 11 N. Y. 368; 62 Am. Dec. 113; Bush v. Livingston, 2 Cal. Cas. (N. Y.) 66; 2 Am. Dec. 316.

Thus, the accommodation maker or indorser of a note, which has been deposited by the payee as collateral security for a usurious loan, cannot take advantage of the usury when sued on the note. Kendall v. Vanderlip, 2 Mackey (U. S.) 105.

In the leading case of Lloyd v. Keach, 2 Conn. 175; 7 Am. Dec. 256, Swift, C. J., said: "On this point there can be no doubt. The indorsee of a note must show a legal right, that he came lawfully by the possession of it, to entitle him to recover. Of course, it is competent for the defendant to show that he had no legal right, or that the possession was not lawful."

"The better opinion," according to Daniels on Negotiable Instruments (3d ed.), § 760, "is, that the holder without notice may sue and recover against all the parties save the indorser from whom the usury was exacted. As to him, in so far as his contract is an assurance for the payment of money, it cannot be enforced. But nevertheless, in so far as it evidences the fact that he has transferred the legal title, it seems to us that the indorsement would be sustained as valid for that purpose, upon the ground that the object and spirit of the statute

however, consider that the usurious indorsement has the effect to vitiate all subsequent transfers, both as against the indorser who was party to the usury, and all prior parties.¹

It has been suggested by text-writers that the difficulty may be obviated by the subsequent indorsee striking out the usurious indorsement, and asserting the title under a prior indorsement in blank, a course of procedure not always practicable or desirable.²

4. Innocent Purchasers.—Under the English Statute of Usury, which declared all usurious contracts void, an innocent purchaser for value, and before maturity of a negotiable instrument tainted with usury, as between the original parties, was held to stand in no better position than the payee. Being void in its inception, it was considered that the instrument could not acquire validity by a transfer.³ In many of the states of the Union, under similar statutes, the same ruling prevails, and no immunity is allowed an

would be subserved, and no violence done to its letter fairly interpreted. The objection to this view lies in the difficulty in distinguishing a note usurious as between the maker and payee, from an indorsement usurious as between the indorser and indorsee. In the first case, the note would be void in the hands even of an innocent holder, and some of the authorities have held that, as the indorsement would in like manner be void, no title could be traced through it, and no recovery had against the indorser. That no recovery could be had against him we concede; but if the indorsement be declared so far void that title could not be traced through it, it would throw the forfeiture of the debt, not upon the usurer, as the law throws it, but upon the innocent holder; and to construe the statute to contemplate and design such a result would reverse the rule that courts should construe statutes so as to favor the remedy. The instrument, being valid in its inception, stands on the same footing as a chattel, which the holder may sell at any price; and if operated with, like a horse or goods, under a usurious contract, a subsequent purchaser without notice would be protected, at least so far as the title is concerned, upon the principle that the wrongdoer will not be heard to deny rights acquired under executed contracts, to which he is a party. . . . If this be not true, the legal debtor would be exonerated from the debt, and the usurer escape punishment, while the innocent holder alone would suffer. No such result can have been contemplated. The title having actually passed from the indorser, we think he could be no more heard to controvert it against an innocent party, than he would be to recover back money paid under a usurious bargain, or to recover in trover the instrument itself."

In Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 735, the rule was laid down that a bona fide holder of a bill valid in its inception, cannot recover when the payee's indorsement, through which he must claim title, has been made upon a usurious consideration. But if the first indorsement was valid, a subsequent usurious indorsement will not affect such bona fide holder; because such intermediate indorsement is not necessary to his title to sue the original parties to the bill. *Parr v. 3. The leading English case upon this point is Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 735, the plaintiff in which was the indorsee of a bill of exchange originally made upon a usurious consideration, and it appeared that he purchased it in good faith and for value, and was entirely ignorant of the usury; but it was determined by the court of king's bench, after extended consideration and able argument by counsel, that the innocent purchaser.¹ If, however, the purchaser has been induced to take the instrument through the fraudulent representations of the maker, it is held that the latter will not be allowed to take advantage of the usury as against such purchaser, or those language of the Statute of Usury was so broad and clear, that it must be held to render the bill void in the plaintiff's hands.

Where, however, a broker had agreed with the defendants to get their bills discounted, and that he should retain out of the proceeds the exorbitant brokerage of ten shillings per cent., but he was not to advance the money himself, nor was his name on the bills, in an action by the indorsee of one of such bills against the defendants as acceptors, it was contended that the bill was usurious in its inception, and therefore void even in the hands of an innocent holder, as the plaintiff was admitted to be. But the court held that, as there was no actual loan of money for a usurious consideration by the plaintiff who advanced the money on the bill, the taking of exorbitant brokerage by the broker for getting it discounted could not affect it in the hands of an innocent indorsee, who had deducted only legal interest. Dagnall v. Wigley, 11 East 43; 2 Camp. 33.

In Flemming v. Mulligan, 2 McCord (S. Car.) 173; 13 Am. Dec. 707, Colcock, J., said: "According to the well-settled construction of the statute, where unrestricted by any subsequent enactment, a negotiable instrument, if usurious in its original concoction, is void in the hands of a bona fide holder. The circumstances of the order in which the names of the parties to the loan appear upon the instrument is not the criterion of determining its validity. The question is, whether it was in the first instance employed with a view to a usurious contract. Thus, a note indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, who procures it to be discounted at an illegal rate of interest, is void as against both maker and indorser, in the hands of an innocent indorsee; for, notwithstanding the indorsement, the transaction contemplated in the creation of the note was between the maker and the person discounting it. And whether the lender's name appears on it or not in no wise varies the case."

In Solomons v. Jones, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 54; 5 Am. Dec. 538, Brevard, J., said: "That the plaintiffs were indorsees without notice, cannot be admitted as a sufficient reason to repel the charge of usury; because the original usurious contract is to be viewed in the light of a criminal transaction, which no subsequent circumstance, or acts, can purge away, and render innocent or lawful. As between the original parties to the transaction, where the contract on which a promise or contract is founded is illegal, the plaintiff ought not to recover, and by positive statute law, made to prevent gaming and usury, which are regarded as public mischiefs, the innocent indorsees of negotiable instruments, which have been given upon such illegal considerations, are equally disentitled to recover against the makers of such instruments. The contracts in such cases are void in their inception, as never having had any legal existence. Such innocent indorsees, however, may have recourse to their indorsers, for every indorsement is in the nature of a new bill or note."

In Bridge v. Hubbard, 15 Mass. 96; 8 Am. Dec. 86, Parker, C. J., said: "The action is brought by persons claiming to be, and who must from the evidence be taken to be, innocent indorsees, who have purchased the note bona fide and for a valuable consideration. This character, however, will not avail them if the note is evidence of a contract originally usurious, or if it was security for a loan of money upon which more than six per cent. had been reserved or taken. To this point no authorities need be cited, for since the great struggle to protect contracts claiming through him.¹ In some other states, however, the rule prevails that the defense of usury between the original parties cannot be interposed as against an innocent purchaser before maturity; and if it be the correct view that the word "void" in the statute is to be construed in the sense of voidable merely, it is difficult to see why the right to plead usury should be extended further than is allowed in respect to other equities between the original parties.²

so situated from the effects of the Statute of Usury, in the case of Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736, no attempt has been made, with any seriousness, to give validity to such notes for the benefit of indorsees." Followed in Kendall v. Robertson, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 158.

The defendant, the indorser on a note, gave his own note in lieu of it. Unknown to him, the original note was usurious. It was held, that he could defend on the ground of usury, against a bona fide purchaser of his own note for value and before maturity. First Nat. Bank v. Plankinton, 27 Wis. 177; 9 Am. Rep. 453.

A usurious note in the hands of an indorsee was surrendered, and a new note given to him which included the usury. He sold the latter note for value to a bona fide purchaser. It was held that the purchaser could not maintain an action against the maker under the statute, authorizing a bona fide assignee of a usurious contract to recover from the usurer the consideration paid, but that he must look to his indorser, the payee. Brown v. Wilcox, 15 Iowa 414.

In Jackson v. Cassidy, 68 Tex. 282, the sale of a member's stock by a building association under a contract void for usury, was held to pass no title, even to a bona fide purchaser.

Holder of Usurious Mortgage.—In Alabama it is held that the holder of a usurious mortgage cannot be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice, and that he is not entitled to any protection against prior incumbrances or secret equities of which he had neither actual nor constructive notice. Saltmarsh v. Tuthill, 13 Ala. 390; McCall v. Rogers, 77 Ala. 349; Le Grand v. Eufaula Nat. Bank, 81 Ala. 123; 60 Am. Rep. 140; Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88.

Exception.—Where a note, though given without consideration and for the purpose of raising money by its sale, has passed through the hands of persons who supposed it to be valid business paper, and after being discounted at a rate exceeding legal interest, it is purchased at its full value by one who has no notice of its true character, the rule that a note usurious in its inception is void in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, does not apply; and the last indorsee is entitled to recover upon it from the maker. Ayer v. Tilden, 15 Gray (Mass.) 178.

Purchase at Maker's Request.—The plaintiff induced the defendants, for his accommodation and to gain time, to advance the money due upon a mortgage given by him to a third person, and to hold the mortgage as security for the advance. The mortgage debt was in fact usurious, but the defendants had no knowledge of it. It was held that the plaintiff could not set up the usury against the mortgage in the defendant's hands. Perdue v. Brooks, 85 Ala. 459.

But the maker of a note showing on

In a number of states, it is now provided by statute that the defense of usury in a negotiable instrument cannot be pleaded against it in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice.¹

When it has been shown that a negotiable instrument was usurious in its inception, the burden of proof devolves upon the party claiming to be an innocent purchaser, of showing that he purchased it for value, before maturity, and without notice of the usury.²

The courts are agreed upon the proposition that where a negotiable instrument or other debt has come into the hands of an innocent purchaser, and the maker or debtor thereafter voluntarily gives him a new evidence of debt in renewal or as a substitute for the usurious one, the original usury cannot be pleaded against such new obligation.³ And it is held that the giving of a new its face that it is usurious, is not estopped from setting up the defense of usury as against a transferee of the note, who admits that he knew, at the time he purchased it, of its usurious character. Miles v. Kelly (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 25 S. W. Rep. 724.

Minnesota Statute.—The defendants gave valid notes to S. which were indorsed and delivered by S to the plaintiff's bank before maturity, as collateral security for a loan then made to S. After the maturity of these notes, the defendants applied to S, supposing he still held them, for an extension of time, which S agreed to allow provided the defendants would pay interest at eighteen per cent. per annum for the extension. Accordingly a new note was made for each of the original notes, the principal in each case being the principal and legal interest then due on the original; and a separate note was given to S for the excess of interest. S then went to the plaintiff and obtained the original notes, by leaving in their place the substituted notes, but he retained the new note for usurious interest. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the unlawful agreement between the defendants and S. In an action on one of the substituted notes, it was held that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder and entitled to recover under the statute; also that the plaintiff was not chargeable with notice of the agreement made by S, because S was not in any sense the plaintiff's agent. First Nat. Bank v. Bentley, 26 Minn. 87.

The fact that a prior usurious contract is made the consideration of a new agreement with an innocent third party, and which is not intended as a device to evade the usury laws, does not affect the new agreement. Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 98.

A note payable to a person other than the creditor, given in renewal of a usurious loan, and delivered by the creditor to the payee, is void in the hands of the latter, even though he note to an indorsee by the maker without objection, is of itself a binding admission that he is a bona fide purchaser without notice of the usury.¹

It is immaterial that the first note or bill was non-negotiable.² Also that the new security was given after the former had become due and the holder had learned of the usury.³ But it has been held that a mortgage given to an innocent holder of a usurious note, after he had learned of the usury, was unenforceable.⁴

If a note or bill be free from usury in its origin, the tendency of the courts is to hold that an innocent indorsee may recover upon it against the maker, notwithstanding previous usurious transfers.⁵

5. Accommodation Paper.—A negotiable instrument which is without valuable consideration as between the original parties, and is made for the purpose of enabling one or the other of them to raise money by negotiating it, is held to have no legal inception until it comes into the hands of some person who gives value for it. And when attempted to be enforced by a purchaser, the amount of consideration paid for the transfer frequently gives rise to perplexing questions of usury, upon which the courts have always been, and still are, much divided in opinion. Unquestionably, if the purchaser from the original holder has actual or constructive knowledge of the true character of the instrument, and that until its transfer it is mere waste paper, he is bound to pay its full face value, deducting no more than the lawful interest for the time it has to run, otherwise he commits usury through a transaction in substance and effect a loan to the original maker or payee at unlawful interest.⁶ But when such a purchaser has no received it in good faith, and without notice of the usury. Treadwell v. Archer, 76 N. Y. 196.

Purchaser at Mortgage Sale.—Analogous to the case of a new security given to a bona fide purchaser of negotiable paper, is that of an innocent purchaser of property at a sale under a power in a usurious mortgage. He is held to be protected from the effects of the usury. Jackson v. Henry, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 185; 6 Am. Dec. 328.

Evidence.—In an action against the maker and indorser of notes which had been delivered by the former to the latter, and by the indorser to the plaintiff, the defense of usury was interposed. The indorser testified that he requested the plaintiff to discount the notes for the witness and the maker. It was held that the witness should have been allowed to testify fully as to knowledge of the fact that it was made for accommodation, and takes it under the belief that it is valid business paper, the question arises whether the Statute of Usury can be pleaded against him because he purchased it for less than the nominal value. One class of decisions holds, that notwithstanding the absence of any intention on his part to commit usury, he is the actual lender, with the maker or payee as borrower, and that the deduction of more than legal interest renders the instrument usurious in its inception, and open to attack in whosoever hands it may come.¹

In a number of states, however, the better rule has been adopted that inasmuch as a usurious intent on the part of the lender is the circumstances under which he received the notes from the maker, with a view to showing that they had no inception until the plaintiff discounted them. Schnitzer v. Husted, 14 N. Y. Supp. 918.

A "grave suspicion" that a note which was sold for considerably less than its face value had its first inception at the time of such transfer, is not sufficient, in the absence of more tangible proof, to establish the defense of usury. Vosburgh v. Diefendorf, 1 N. Y. Supp. 58.

Thus, a note given by the maker to the payee, to be shown to others as evidence that the maker was willing to take certain stock in a proposed company, and discounted by the payee at more than legal interest, was held usurious in the hands of the purchaser. Eastman v. Shaw, 65 N. Y. 522.

The fact that the maker gave the payee, for whose accommodation the note was made, security for its payment at maturity, does not affect the rule. Dowe v. Schutt, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 621.

In Dickerman v. Day, 31 Iowa 444; 7 Am. Rep. 156, Miller, J., stated the doctrine of the cases as follows: "In respect to an accommodation note sold or discounted at a greater rate of discount than legal interest, the authorities are not uniform; some of the cases holding that the purchaser of such note from the payee, being the first party paying anything for it, is therefore the first owner, and that as the payee before the sale of the note had not acquired a legal right to sue the accommodation maker, the purchaser must pay the full face of the note, or the transaction will be usurious. That, as between the maker and the payee, the note is without consideration and void in the hands of the payee, and becomes valid only upon being negotiated to a bona fide purchaser, and hence a party who buys an accommodation note before it has been used for any business purpose, stands in the same situation in respect to the defense of usury, as if he were the payee named therein, and this though an indispensable element of usury, a bona fide purchaser of accommodation paper, supposing it to be valid business paper, will be fully protected in dealing with it, as such, and it is no defense to the maker that he bought it for less than its nominal value.¹

It is suggested that the adoption of the first-mentioned doctrine was the result of regarding a purchaser of accommodation paper as being in a position similar to that of an innocent purchaser of paper usurious in its inception, and applying the same rule to both; whereas in fact there is no analogy between the two cases. In the latter, the only question is, usury being admitted, shall its penalties be inflicted upon a subsequent party who has purchased in good faith from the usurer; while in the former, the existence of usury is the very matter in issue. Ignoring the absence of usurious intent, the act of the innocent purchaser in buying the paper is what the courts hold as constituting a usurious transaction.²

he had no knowledge that the note was accommodation paper and supposing it to be business paper." This doctrine, however, was not approved in the case cited.

In Campbell v. Nichols, 33 N. J. L. 81, it was held, after an exhaustive review of the decisions, that the purchase by a third person of a note which had no previous legal inception, at a discount greater than legal interest, amounts to a usurious loan, even though the purchaser was deceived by the representations of the maker's agent into believing that the note was put into the market for value in the regular course of business.

New York Cases.—In Cohn v. Husson, 13 Daly (N. Y.) 334, and Jackson v. Colden, 4 Cow. (N. Y.) 266, it was held that usury could not be pleaded as against a purchaser of negotiable paper after delivery to the payee, at a discount greater than legal interest, but without notice that it was made for accommodation. See also Ely v. Britton, 15 N. Y. Supp. 101.

In Van Duzer v. Howe, 21 N. Y. 531, it was held that a draft was not usurious in the hands of a purchaser, by reason of the fact that the drawer paid an accommodation indorser a sum of money for his indorsement and services in procuring the discount.

Where two persons exchanged their own notes with each other, with a view to raising money upon them, and a third person purchased them at a discount exceeding lawful interest, it was held that the notes were not thereby rendered usurious. Cobb v. Titus, 10 N. Y. 198; Rice v. Mather, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 62.

2. In the recent case of Jackson v. Travis, 42 Minn. 438, where the payee of a note secured by mortgage sold them to the defendants at a discount greater than the lawful interest, the defendants being ignorant of the fact that in the whole transaction the nominal payee was merely the agent of the maker, and was selling the note for the latter's benefit, it was held that there was no usury as to the defendants. In delivering the opinion of the court, Gilfillan, C. J., after stating that it was not always necessary that both parties to a usurious contract should be equally cognizant of the device adopted to evade the law, said: "But it is necessary that the party upon whom its penalties are to be imposed should know of and be a party to the intent to violate

6. Discounts.—The custom among banks and merchants of deducting in advance the highest legal rate of interest, upon the discounting of negotiable paper, is uniformly held to be free from usury, even in those states where it has been considered usurious for private persons to stipulate for payment of interest in advance.¹ Unless otherwise provided by their charters, banks occupy the same position in respect to the usury laws as do private individuals, and must take, whether by discount or otherwise, no more than the legal rate of interest on loans.²

It is, of course, usury for the party making the loan to deduct as discount more than the lawful rate of interest for the time the instrument has to run.³

In discounting a note, it is not usury to include in the computation the three days of grace allowed by the law merchant.⁴ Nor to include both the first and last day of a note at thirty or sixty days.⁵ Nor to discount a note as of a prior date, where the bank

it. If the assumed borrower might set up his own device and secret intent to evade the law against usury, to give the transaction a character different from what the other party in good faith supposed and intended it to be, and thus be enabled to avoid his own engagements, he would be taking advantage of his own wrong."

In referring to the taking in advance, on a discount, of the entire amount of interest, Denio, J., speaking for the court, in Marvine v. Hymers, 12 N. Y. 223, said: "It is obvious that in this way the lender, by investing the money thus retained, may realize more than at the legal rate of seven per centum per annum, and if the case were res novum, it would be difficult to sustain the practice. But we are not authorized to disregard the uniform course of decisions which for a long series of years have declared it to be legal."

A note for $6,000 was discounted by a bank, with the indorsement, "Discounted for $4,000 only, and should be so read." It was held that there was no usury in the transaction. Merchants, etc., Bank v. Evans, 9 W. Va. 373.

A. sold his land to the defendant at the agreed price of $350, for which sum the defendant gave his note and mortgage, payable to the order of the plaintiff. Pending the negotiations, A. had arranged to sell the note and mortgage to the plaintiff for $275; and for convenience A. caused the defendant to execute them directly to the plaintiff. It was held a case of discount on the sale of negotiable paper, and valid. Armstrong v. Freeman, 9 Neb. 11.

had previously paid checks drawn by the applicant on the strength of the proposed discount.¹

A requirement by the bank that the proceeds of the discount, or any part of them, shall be kept in the bank during the period of the loan, renders the transaction usurious, for the reason that the borrower thus pays interest on money which he does not receive or have the use of.² But the giving of a certificate of deposit, payable at a future day, for the proceeds of a note discounted, does not constitute usury, when done at the request and solely for the accommodation of the person procuring the discount.³

XVII. STIPULATIONS CONCERNING INTEREST—1. Payable in Advance.—It has long been the settled doctrine that the taking of interest in advance, at the highest legal rate, upon the discounting of negotiable paper by banks in the regular course of business, is not a violation of the statute against usury.⁴ Most statutes now contain an express permission to do so.

Double Interest.—A note was discounted by a bank, and the interest taken in advance at a regular discount day occurring a few days before the maturity of the note; the note was renewed, the interest again being taken in advance from the date of renewal. It was renewed a third time in the same manner, the result being that for the few days between the time of renewal and the maturity of the notes, double interest was taken; but it did not appear that there was any previous agreement to make the renewals in that manner, or that there was any intention to evade the law. It was held not usury. Bank of Utica v. Wager, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 712; Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 770.

1. Walker v. Bank of Washington, 3 How. (U. S.) 62.

2. East River Bank v. Hoyt, 32 N. Y. 119.

Where a bank, in discounting a note, required the customer to keep deposited in the bank a portion of the proceeds until the note matured, it was declared to be a clear case of usury, "without even the decencies of a cloak to cover its nudity." East River Bank v. Hoyt, 32 N. Y. 119; 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 280.

For the same reason, a requirement that the person procuring the discount shall accept as cash certain post-dated notes, renders the transaction void for usury. State Bank v. Ayres, 7 N. J. L. 130; Gaither v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 44.

3. Knox v. Goodwin, 25 Wend. (N. Y.) 643.

Though a person procuring a discount or loan may, without rendering the transaction usurious, receive a certificate of deposit from the bank, drawing a lower rate of interest than the discount, yet it is not enough to repel the imputation of usury that the proposition for the certificate came from the borrower and not from the bank. It must be shown to have been given at the bona fide request of the borrower, and solely for his accommodation. Gillett v. Averill, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 85.

In an early case decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, the court, by Story, J., said: "The next point arising on the record is, whether the discount taken in this case was usurious. It is not pretended that interest was deducted for a greater length of time than the note had to run, or for more than at the rate of six per cent.

A private person has the same right as a banking concern, to make discounts, and deduct the interest.¹ The doctrine also very generally prevails that in loans and money transactions other than discounts, the highest rate of interest may be stipulated for, payable in advance, without violating the statute.² The objection, however, has been made to this rule, that it enables the lender, by the use of the sum taken in advance, to obtain a greater compensation for the use of his principal than the highest legal rate.³

2. Payable at Short Intervals.—If the taking of interest in advance at the highest rate is not usurious, it necessarily follows that stipulations for the payment of accrued interest at intervals shorter than a year, are not within the statute; and the courts so hold.⁴

per annum on the sum due by the note. The sole objection is the deduction of the interest from the amount of the note at the time it was discounted; and this, it is said, gives the bank at the rate of more than six per cent. per annum upon the sum actually carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank. If a transaction of this sort is to be deemed usurious, the same principle must apply with equal force to bank discounts generally, for the practice is believed to be universal; and probably few, if any, charters contain an express provision authorizing in terms the deduction of the interest in advance, upon making loans or discounts. It has always been supposed that an authority to discount or make discounts did, from the very force of the terms, necessarily include an authority to take interest in advance. And this is not only the settled opinion among professional and commercial men, but stands approved by the soundest principles of legal construction. Indeed, we do not know in what other sense the word discount is to be interpreted. Even in England, where no statute authorizes banks to make discounts, it has been solemnly adjudged that the taking of interest in advance by bankers upon loans, in the ordinary course of business, is not usurious." *Fleckner v. In Lloyd v. Williams, 3 Wils. 262; 1 W. Bl. 793, it was held that the taking of interest in advance constituted usury. To the same effect, see Floyer v. Edwards, Cowp. 112; Marsh v. Martindale, 3 B. & P. 154.

3. Interest from Prior Date.—An instrument is not on its face usurious by reason of a provision for interest from a period prior to its date. The courts recognize the fact that agreements for the payment of money are frequently executed subsequently to the transactions which form their consideration.¹ Clearly, however, if it be shown that a note or other evidence of debt was antedated for the purpose of obtaining more than legal interest, usury is thereby established.²

It has been held to be usury to include in a note given for the price of goods sold on a term of credit which had expired, interest from the date of sale, in the absence of an agreement for interest made at the time of granting the credit.³

As it often becomes necessary, in the making of loans, to subject the borrower to delays pending the examination of the securities offered, the execution and approval of papers, etc., even after the agreement to make the loan has been entered into, it is no more than reasonable that the borrower should be required to pay interest during that time on the amount which has been set aside for his use, and remains idle in the lender's hands. And such is the doctrine, subject only to the limitation that the delay shall be reasonable and bona fide.⁴

year." Hawley v. Howell, 60 Iowa 79; Ragan v. Day, 46 Iowa 239.

English Cases.—The earliest English decision upon the validity of contracts for the highest legal rate of interest payable at intervals of less than a year, is Barnes v. Worlich, Cro Jac. 25, where it was held by the court of king's bench (two judges dissenting), that it was not usury to stipulate for £10 interest on a loan of £100, £5 to be paid at the end of six months and the other £5 at the end of the year.

A similar ruling, upon the same state of facts, was affirmed in the exchequer chamber in the case of Grysill v. Whichcott, Cro. Car. 283; Sir W. Jones 303, sub nom Whichcot v. Grysell.

California Civil Code, § 1918, provides that parties may agree in writing for any rate of interest, which shall be allowed up to the entry of judgment. It is held that an agreement to pay one and one-half per cent. interest per month, payable monthly, is valid, and the court cannot afford any relief. Coleman v. Commins, 77 Cal. 548.

A note expressed for "eighty-five dollars with three years interest at six per cent.," payable one year after date, is not on its face usurious, because it does not appear but that, at the date of the note, there was a debt due with two years' interest already accrued. *Scheidig v. Retention by Lender.—Upon the acceptance of an application for a loan, a note and mortgage were forwarded to the borrowers by mail for execution, and the sum to be loaned was set apart for them, awaiting the return of the securities, and the examination and approval of the abstract of title, which was examined immediately upon its receipt, and a draft for the amount of the loan sent to the borrower by return mail.

The fact that, pending the examination of the security, the lender's agent, without authority, used the money temporarily for his own purposes, does not render the loan usurious, though the borrower pays interest during the time.¹

Clearly it is not per se usurious for the lender to retain in his hands a portion of the loan upon which interest has been reserved, where the money is held subject to the call of the borrower and for his convenience.²

4. Use of Rowlett's Tables.—There is a conflict of authorities upon the question whether the practice among banks of computing interest according to Rowlett's Tables, by which thirty days constitute a month, or three hundred and sixty days a year, is usurious where the highest legal rate of interest is taken. The better rule, however, is that, in the absence of a deliberate intention to take illegal interest by that method, and where it appears that the tables were used only for convenience of computation, there is nothing usurious in their use.³

The court held that the fact that the note was bearing interest from its date, and during the interval, did not necessarily make it usurious, the transaction having been in the usual course of business, and well understood between the parties. Daley v. Minnesota Loan, etc., Co., 43 Minn. 517.

The borrower gave notes for a year's interest on the amount of the loan, but the money was not paid to him until some time after the date of the notes. At the time of receiving the money, however, pursuant to a previous agreement, the interest accrued up to that time was indorsed on the note. It was held that there was no usury. *Scruggs v. In the case of Agricultural Bank v.

Bissell, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 586, it appeared that the bank, in discounting a note at sixty days, computed interest according to Rowlett's Tables, by which three hundred and sixty days, or twelve months of thirty days each, are counted as a year, and by that method of computation the amount deducted slightly exceeded the lawful rate of interest; but there was no intention to take unlawful interest. It was held that there was no usury. Shaw, C. J., speaking for the court, said: "As the statute prescribes the rate of interest for one year, and so at the same rate for a longer or shorter time, it is obvious that when the interest is to be computed in days or months, it is impossible to follow the prescribed rule precisely without taking the fraction of a day; and that this is not required, is now settled by the whole current of authorities. From the impossibility of executing the statute with literal exactness, has resulted the necessity of resorting to an execution cy-près, in many cases, where it is intended to conform to the intent and spirit of the statute. So it has been the practice to consider a contract for money payable in months, to be payable in calendar months, and to consider a calendar month as the twelfth part of a year, and to compute interest accordingly, though they are of different lengths. A note given in February at two months will have fifty-nine days to run and pay one per cent. interest, as for the sixth part of a year; but a note given in December at two months will

By statute in some states, it is now provided that interest computed at the rate of one-twelfth of the highest legal rate per annum for every thirty days shall not be construed to exceed the legal rate.¹

5. Interest After Maturity.—Stipulations to the effect that, if the debt be not paid at maturity, it shall draw interest thereafter at a rate greater than the statutory limit, are now generally regarded as penalties to induce prompt payment, and as the debtor has it in his power to avoid paying the penalty by discharging the debt when due, such agreements are held free from usury.² The par-have sixty-two days to run and pay the same rate of interest. The same difficulty arises in computing interest for a small number of days; and therefore some approximation, which can be made by an easy and practical mode of computation, if made in good faith and without being intended as a cover for usury, has been considered allowable, without drawing after it the penalty of the statute. Such being the universal practice of other persons, as well as banks, we think a jury would not be warranted, from the mere fact that the interest thus computed slightly exceeds the legal rate, to infer a corrupt and usurious agreement. And we think the present case comes within this rule." To the same effect, see Planters' Bank v. Bass, 2 La. Ann. 430.

New York Rule.—In New York Fireman's Ins. Co. v. Ely, 2 Cow. (N. Y.) 678, the court, by Sutherland, J., said: "That the principle of calculation adopted by the plaintiffs was the one in general or universal use among banks, cannot alter the sense of the case. A statute cannot be obviated by the custom or usage of a particular trade. . . . The custom or usage of banks or individuals cannot shorten a year to three hundred and sixty days." In the leading case of Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 225, McLean, J., speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, said that where a person undertakes to pay "a specific sum exceeding the lawful interest, provided he does not pay the principal by a day certain, it is not usury, for the reason that by a punctual payment of the principal he may avoid the payment of the sum stated, which is considered as a penalty."

But notes given to secure usurious interest on the principal debt, are not rendered valid by a provision that they may be avoided by punctually paying the principal. Seekel v. Norman, 78 Iowa 254.

Though a contract is for the payment of a larger sum than the debt with legal interest, yet if by its terms the debtor may discharge it in full by paying only the actual debt within a certain time, it is not usurious. Cutler v. How, 8 Mass. 257; Cutler v. Johnson, 8 Mass. 266.

A provision in a note drawing the highest legal rate of interest "from date until paid," that the principal shall become payable sixty days before the date specified as the maturity of the note, does not render it usurious. Telford v. Garrels, 132 Ill. 550.

A testatrix, by writing under seal, acknowledged the receipt of $200 from one of her executors, which she promised to pay during her lifetime, but that if she should fail to do so, her executors were directed to pay the $200 upon her death and the death of another, together with twenty per cent. per annum from date. In her will she recited this promise, and directed payment to be made accordingly. It was held that the executor was entitled, as against a legatee, to retain the whole amount. Watson v. McClanahan, 13 Ala. 57. But see Fry v. Coleman, 1 Grant's Cas. (Pa.) 445, where an agreement to give a third note of $100, if the other two of the same amount were not paid within ten days after maturity, was regarded as usurious.

Forfeiture of Security.—In Ramsey v. Morrison, 39 N. J. L. 591, an agreement by the borrower that in case of non-payment of the debt and interest at maturity, the lender should be entitled to hold absolutely certain stock pledged as collateral security, was held free from usury.

Minnesota Doctrine.—Under a statute limiting conventional interest to twelve per cent., and providing that "all contracts shall bear the same rate of interest after they become due as before, if it clearly appears therefrom that such was the intention of the parties," the supreme court of Minnesota held that a provision in a note, "with interest after maturity at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum until paid," could not be enforced; that it was not competent for the parties to agree upon a higher rate of interest after than before maturity; that the allowance after default was strictly damages and not interest, and that only the legal rate of seven per cent. after maturity could be recovered. Newell v. Houlton, 22 Minn. 19; White v. Ilitis, 24 Minn. 43.

Earlier decisions, under a law allowing any rate of interest to be contracted, for in writing, are to the same effect, the reasoning of the court being that no agreement of the parties as to interest after maturity can affect the statutory rate of damages fixed at seven per cent. Talcott v. Marston, 3 Minn. 339; Kent v. Bown, 3 Minn. 347. See also Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 350; 72 Am. Dec. 102.

Where a note drew interest at five per cent. per annum, but was silent as to interest after maturity, the court held that it was proper to allow interest at seven per cent. as damages for non-payment. Moreland v. Lawrence, 23 Minn. 84; Lash v. Lambert, 15 Minn. 416; 2 Am. Rep. 142.

English Cases.—The doctrine laid down by Lord Mansfield is now well established, that whenever it is, by the contract, within the power of the borrower to pay the principal debt within a certain time, without interest, or only lawful interest, the reservation of a greater rate in the event of non-payment is not usurious. Folger v. Edwards, Cowp. 112; Hawkins P. C., ch. 82, § 119; Garret v. Foot, Comb. 133; Burton's Case, 5 Rep. 68; Long v. Storie, 10 Eng. L. & Eq. 182; Roberts v. Fremaine, Cro. Jac. 509; Garnet v. Ferot, Camp. 133; Oliver v. Oliver, 2 Roll. 469; King v. Drury, 2 Lev. 7; Nicholls v. Maynard, 3 Atk. 520; Morripet v. King, 2 Bur. 891.

In Garnet v. Ferot, Camp. 133, Holt, C. J., said: "If I covenant to pay £100 a year hence, and if I do not pay it, to pay £20, it is not usury, but only in the nature of a nomine pænæ."

In Roberts v. Tremayne, Cro. Jac. 509, the rule was stated by Doderidge, J., as follows: "If I secure both interest and principal, if it be at the will of the party who is to pay it, it is no usury; as if I lend to one £100 for two years, to pay for the loan thereof £30, and if he pay the principal at the year's end he shall pay nothing for interest, this is not usury; for the party hath his election, and may pay it at the first year's end, and so discharge himself."

Principal Due on Default in Installment.—Where a note payable in installments is given for the amount of the debt and legal interest up to the time of maturity, a stipulation that on default in the payment of any installment, the whole sum shall immediately become payable, does not render the contract usurious, because by paying the installments as agreed, nothing more than legal interest is paid. Wells v. Girling, 4 Moore 78; 5 E. C. L. 733; Moore v. Cameron, 93 N. Car. 51.

Rates After Maturity Held Lawful.—Twenty-five per cent; Gould v. Bishop Hill Colony, 35 Ill. 324. Twenty-four per cent; Davis v. Rider, 53 Ill. 416; Weyrich v. Hobelman, 14 Neb. 432. Twenty per cent; Conrad v. Gibbon, 29 Iowa 120. Thirty per cent; Peavler v. McLaughlin, 20 Ill. App. 536. Fifty per cent; Wight v. Shuck, 1 Morris (Iowa) 425; Shuck v. Wight, 1 Greene (Iowa) 128.

Damages on Foreign Bills.—In Miller v. Bates, 35 Ala. 580, it was held that if a bill of exchange between citizens of the same state was made payable in ties may also stipulate that, in case of non-payment at maturity, the debt shall draw interest at an excessive rate from the date of the contract.¹ Within the same rule are agreements to pay certain sums as penalties or stipulated damages for failure to perform contracts other than money obligations.²

The true test is—has the debtor the absolute right to discharge and satisfy the contract at maturity by paying the principal debt and lawful interest? If he has, the contract is not vitiated by providing for the payment of an additional sum after maturity. It is otherwise, if by the terms of the contract the debtor is obliged to make the additional payment at all events.³

If the circumstances surrounding the transaction indicate that the parties did not intend that payment should be made at the date ostensibly fixed therefor, a provision for excessive interest will be regarded as a shift to evade the statute.⁴

It is clear that agreements made after maturity, to pay unlawful interest in consideration of further forbearance, are not within the protection of the rule.⁵

6. Interest for Past Forbearance.—An agreement to pay interest at a higher rate than allowed by law, in consideration of past forbearance, is held to be free from usury, though it may be unenforceable for want of consideration.⁶

another state for the purpose of obtaining statutory damages for non-payment, and not as a device to evade the usury law, it would be good.

Change in Statute.—A note payable in one year, "with interest at the rate of fifteen per cent. after maturity," was executed prior to, but became due after, the enactment of a statute prohibiting the recovery of more than seven per cent. per annum for the forbearance of a debt after maturity. It was held that the fifteen per cent. was recoverable as interest under the contract, and not as a penalty, and that the statute was not intended to apply to contracts in which the rate after the maturity was agreed upon. Hubbard v. Callahan, 42 Conn. 524.

Intent Not to Pay at Maturity.—An agreement in a note to pay after maturity an illegal rate of interest was held usurious, where, by the terms of a prior contract of sale between the parties, out of which the note arose, such interest was contemplated, the parties evidently intending at that time that the debt should be allowed to stand for some length of time after maturity. Carroll Co. Sav. Bank v. Strother, 28 S. Car. 504.

5. Wiley v. Hight, 39 Mo. 130.

6. For Past Forbearance.—In an action on a note given for interest on a prior indebtedness, where the defense was usury, it appeared that the face of the note represented the difference between twelve per cent. (the highest legal rate) accrued on the debt according to its terms at the time the note sued on was given, and a still higher rate then agreed upon by the parties as "extra interest." It was held that there was no usury, the agreement being merely for past forbearance. Berry, J., speaking for the supreme court, said: "Upon careful consideration of the pleadings and the testimony reported, we have come to the conclusion that the only contract which there is anything in the case tending to establish, is a contract to make up the amount of interest which, at the time of the execution of the note, had accrued on certain prior indebtedness of defendant, at the stipulated rate of twelve per cent., to such an amount as would have accrued thereon at some rate higher than twelve per cent. A contract to pay interest is a contract to pay a compensation for the future use of money. The contract in this case was a contract to pay a compensation for the past use of money, and therefore not a contract to pay interest, in any proper or legal sense, or within the meaning of the statute. It follows that the contract was not invalid under the statute, as stipulating for interest in excess of twelve per cent. But the evidence in this case tending to show that the contract was of the character ascribed to it, and that it was without consideration, the want of consideration furnished a good defense to the note in suit as against the payee." Daniels v. Wilson, 21 Minn. 530.

7. Interest in Gold.—It is held that where a note stipulates for interest "in gold or its equivalent," payment of a sum in legal-tender notes equal to the agreed interest in gold is not usurious.¹

8. Interest on Interest.—The decisions upon the question whether stipulations for compound interest, or interest upon interest, are usurious where the rate reserved is the highest allowed by the statute, are not harmonious. It was formerly held, and is still the rule, in some states, that agreements made at the time of the principal contract to the effect that as installments of interest mature they shall become a part of the debt, and thereafter draw interest—in other words, agreements for compounding interest at the highest rate—enable the creditor to get more than legal interest for the forbearance of the principal debt, and are usurious.²

Three months after notes bearing ten per cent. interest had matured, the debtor signed an agreement that, in consideration of an extension of two years from their maturity, he would pay twelve per cent. per annum (the highest legal rate) upon the notes, from the date of maturity until paid. The defense of usury being set up, the supreme court of Texas held that this was in effect an agreement to pay twenty-four per cent. for a period of less than two years, inasmuch as the debtor had already received the benefit of the three months' forbearance, without any additional consideration, and was accordingly usurious, but that the original promise to pay ten per cent. was not affected or impaired. Krause v. Pope, 78 Tex. 478.

To constitute usury in the taking of interest on interest, it is not necessary to show that the agreement therefor was made in advance. Leonard v. Patton, 106 Ill. 99.

In Peddycord v. Connard, 85 Ill. 102, it was held usury to compound interest every sixty days on overdrafts.

In North Carolina, it is considered that the usury act forbids compound interest. Cox v. Brookshire, 76 N. Car. 314.

Rule in Colorado.—On a loan of $150, a note of $177 was given, at three per cent. interest per month after maturity. The $27 was the amount of interest at that rate from the date of the note to its maturity. The supreme court of Colorado held that, as to the latter amount, the note was usurious and void, notwithstanding the statute (Colorado Gen. Stat. § 1708) allows parties to contract for any rate of interest. The ground of the decision is that the agreement was in effect to pay compound interest, and the Colorado rule is, that such agreements, made in advance, are unlawful. In delivering the opinion of the court, Helm, C. J., said: "A disposition undoubtedly appears in some of the modern decisions and text-books to reject the doctrine that compound interest contracted for in advance is per se unlawful. But, the question being stare decisis in this state, and

A more common form of agreement is to pay the reserved rate of interest at stated intervals, with a further stipulation that if such interest be not paid when due, it shall itself draw interest thereafter. The more reasonable doctrine is that such stipulations are not usurious, being merely intended as compensation to the creditor for being deprived of the use of his interest.¹ But in a number of states the courts have drawn a distinction between agreements of this character made prior to default in payment of interest, and similar agreements made after such default; and they hold that only in the latter case can agreements for interest on interest be lawfully made.²

there being much to commend the doctrine, it will not now be disturbed. We do not intimate that the arrangement would have been illegal had the promise of appellant to pay compound interest been made after, instead of before, the interest to be compounded accrued." Hochmark v. Richler, 16 Colo. 263.

The earlier decisions of the supreme court of Colorado, which were relied upon as establishing the rule for that state, are the following: Denver Brick, etc., Co. v. McAllister, 6 Colo. 261; Fillmore v. Reithman, 6 Colo. 121; Beckwith v. Beckwith, 11 Colo. 568.

In Minnesota, it was held at an early day that an agreement to pay interest on interest, if not paid when due, would not be enforced, the decision being based on State v. Jackson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 13; Mason v. Callender, 2 Minn. 302; Talcott v. Marston, 3 Minn. 238.

In Dyar v. Slingerland, 24 Minn. 267, Gilfillan, C. J., said, "If the question might be considered open in this state, we could see no satisfactory reason, based either on principle or public policy, why it might not be allowed," but the court felt bound to follow the rule established by the earlier cases.

Compound Interest Not Usury.—Notwithstanding the respectable array of authorities against the validity of agreements for compounding interest, it is difficult to find any good reason for calling it usury. Suppose the transaction is in the form of a loan of $1,000 for five years, at ten per cent. interest, payable annually. It is obvious that at the end of the first year the borrower will owe an additional $100. If he desires the use of that $100 during the next year, the lender may lawfully lend it to him the instant he pays it, and take interest on the new loan at the highest rate. Each successive year during the whole period of the loan the lender could lawfully make a new loan to the borrower of the various installments of interest as the same were paid in. Why should it not be equally lawful for the parties to agree in advance, the one to borrow, and the other to lend, these installments of interest from time to time, at the same rates?

A note due one year from date, with interest at eight per cent. "from maturity until paid," provided that "if the interest be not paid when due, to become as principal and bear the same rate of interest." The court held that this clause did not render the note usurious, because no time was fixed when the interest would become due, and hence the provision was nugatory. Hoskins v. Cole, 34 Ill. App. 541.

The fact that interest on a trust deed is to be paid by coupon notes semi-annually, and that such coupons bear interest at twelve per cent. after maturity, does not constitute usury in Texas. Martin v. Land Mortg. Bank (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 1032.

9. Interest as Part of Purchase Price.—Where property is sold at a cash price, it is usury to stipulate for more than legal interest on deferred payments.¹

Agreement After Due.—In Austin v. Bacon, 28 Wis. 416, Cole, J., said: "That compound interest, or interest upon interest, was included in this note and mortgage, does not admit of doubt, but I am satisfied from the evidence that this was done by the agreement of the respective parties, debtor and creditor, and without any corrupt intent to violate the law upon the subject of usury. It was nothing more than a contract for the payment of interest upon interest previously due and payable according to the note and mortgage given June 15th, 1852. Such contracts have been sustained by this court."

In Stansbury v. Stansbury, 24 W. Va. 517, it was held usurious to stipulate for interest on interest already due, as a condition of granting further forbearance.

Where the amount of a renewal note is ascertained by taking the amount of the principal and interest at the maximum rate due on the former note, and adding thereto compound interest computed on the former note for a part of the time, the new note is usurious, or at least without consideration, as to the excess of interest thus computed. Simpson v. Evans, 44 Minn. 419.

Mistake.—In the recent case of U. S. Mortgage Co. v. Sperry, 138 U. S., 313 reversing the decision below, 26 Fed. Rep. 727, the debtor applied to his creditor for a loan, to be used in part in paying past due interest on previous loans made to him by the creditor. Out of the new loan, the creditor retained not only the amount of interest due on the previous loans, but in addition thereto interest on the overdue interest coupons, both parties in good faith believing that these coupons bore interest after maturity; but it was subsequently decided by the court that the coupons did not bear interest. Upon this state of facts, the Supreme Court of the United States held that, although the amount thus retained was greater than the maximum rate allowed by the statute upon the original loans, yet as the parties had not intended to contract for such excessive rate, but had arrived at it by mistake, there was no usury.

1. Irvin v. Mathews, 75 Ga. 739; Mitchell v. Griffith, 22 Mo. 515.

Usurious Devices.—A, the owner of a slave, asked $1,000 for him, which B, was willing to give, but could not pay cash. A was willing to allow time, provided the price was increased by ten per cent. per annum until payment. After discussing the best method of avoiding usury, A told B to name the time he wanted, and A would then name his price. B said three years, whereupon A said he must have $300 more. A bill of sale was then drawn, expressing the price as $1,000 and B gave A his note for $1,300 payable in three years, but "to be paid at such time as I please, and to deduct ten per cent. per annum off of the amount paid at each payment." It was held to be usury. Thompson v. Nesbit, 2 Rich. (S. Car.) 73.

The defendant bought certain milling machinery of the plaintiff, and gave a mortgage for $10,000, payable in five years with interest. As part of the same transaction, the parties made an agreement that until the payment in full of the mortgage debt, the defendant should pay the plaintiff five cents per barrel for every barrel of flour manufactured in the defendant's mill, not to be less than 30,000 barrels or $1,500 per year. Also that the interest on the mortgage should be regarded as included in the five cents per barrel. It was also agreed "that upon the payment in cash of the said sum of $10,000 at any time within the five years, the payment of five cents per barrel shall cease and determine." It was contended by the plaintiff that the payment of five cents per barrel was a part of the purchase price, but the supreme court held that it was merely a device for usury, Gordon, J., saying: "If, then, these five cents per barrel were to continue to be paid as long as the principal debt remained unpaid and no longer, and if the payment thereof was to cease eo instante the debt was extinguished, what was it, if not a compensation for the use of money? If this was a part of the bona fide price of the machinery, how does it come that its payment depended upon the continuance of the principal debt, and was to cease just as soon as that debt was extinguished? It is too plain for discussion that this was a device, and a clumsy one at that, to evade the Statute of Usury." Hartranft v. Uhlinger, 115 Pa. St. 270.

But if the parties act in good faith, and without design to evade the statute, they may lawfully agree that the price on credit shall be a certain sum designated as principal and a further sum designated as interest, though the latter exceeds the legal rate on the former for the period of credit. In other words, they may agree that both sums shall constitute the purchase price payable at the time fixed.¹

An agreement on the purchase of land, to pay $1,500 cash, and $500 more with $100, "for interest on it," at the purchaser's death, is not usurious. The $100 is a part of the purchase price, being so intended by the parties. Parker v. Coburn, 10 Allen (Mass.) 82.

It is not usury to agree, upon the sale of goods at a certain price, that if payment be not made in thirty days, fifteen per cent. additional shall be included as part of the purchase price. Bass v. Patterson, 68 Miss. 310; 24 Am. St. Rep. 279.

The vendor of land asked $10,000 cash, but, the vendee being unable to pay cash, it was agreed that a deed and a bond and mortgage for $12,000, payable at a future date with interest, should be executed, to be held by the vendor until he could dispose of the bond and mortgage for $10,000, when he would deliver the deed. This arrangement was carried out, the seller delivering the deed upon receiving $10,000 for the sale of the securities. It was held that the bond and mortgage were not usurious. Brooks v. Avery, 4 N. Y. 225.

In Long v. Israel, 9 Leigh (Va.) 556, A agreed that B might buy C's land as cheap as he could, and that he would give B $900 for it. B bought the land for $750, and it was conveyed directly to A, who gave B his note for the $900. It was held that the note was not usurious.

In Jones v. Hubbard, 6 Call (Va.) 211, A had agreed to buy B's land, which was about to be sold under a trust deed, at the amount of the creditor's claim, and to sell it again to B at a price to be subsequently agreed upon, which sum, though never actually agreed upon, was understood by the parties to be such an amount as would reimburse A for the money paid out, the sacrifices he might have to make to obtain it, and liberally compensate him for all his trouble in the premises. The court held that the transaction was entirely free from usury.

In Matlock v. Cobb, 62 Miss. 43, it was held that the fact that the creditor in a trust deed purchased the property at a sale under the deed, and subsequently conveyed it to the debtor for a consideration equal to the original debt and accrued usurious interest, did not render such sale and conveyance usurious.

In Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, Brannon, J., said: "Usury is interest

XVIII. DEPRECIATED CURRENCY AND FUNDS.—Where a loan is made in bank notes, stocks, or other funds which are at the time substantially depreciated in market value, upon a contract to repay the full par value of such funds, and the difference between the actual and par values, or such difference added to the interest reserved, exceeds lawful interest for the period of the loan, the courts are inclined to regard the transaction as a cover for usury.¹ But usury cannot be predicated as a matter of law from the mere inequality between currency loaned or exchanged and that agreed to be repaid for it. The intention is a question of fact, to be determined from all the circumstances.² Where the depreciation is but slight, and the funds loaned commonly pass current in business transactions, agreements to repay their par value in current money exceeding the lawful rate for the loan or forbearance of money, and does not exist where such interest is essentially and honestly a part of the consideration in the purchase of land, even though it be called for in the form of a percentage on a principal sum, and be called 'interest,' and be in excess of the lawful rate; the interest, in such case, of an honest purchase, where it is not a mere cover for what is in fact a loan, being as much a part of the purchase price as that part appearing as the principal."

Thus, a note payable in specie, drawn for the nominal value of a loan made in bank notes, which were depreciated nearly one half, is usurious. Fleming v. Thomas, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 48.

So of a loan of Tennessee bank notes, which same were at twenty-five per cent. discount, to be repaid at their nominal value in specie. Weatherhead v. Boyers, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 545.

So of an agreement, upon discounting a note, to pay the borrower the proceeds in bank notes at their nominal value, which were in fact worth only fifty-four per cent. Bank of United States v. Owens, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 537.

It is not usury, however, for a bank to give its own bills, at their nominal value, in making a loan, though such bills are below par, on account of the bank having suspended specie payments. Maury v. Ingraham, 28 Miss. 171.

In determining the question of usury, it matters not what use the borrower intends to make of the depreciated funds received. Archer v. Putnam, 12 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 286. As that he professed his ability to use them at par in paying debts. Ehringhaus v. Ford, 3 Ired. (N. Car.) 522.

2. Hamilton v. Moore, 7 Humph. (Tenn.) 35; Talbot v. Warfield, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 83; Stevenson v. Unkefer, 14 Ill. 103.

An agreement to pay, at the end of one year, $90 in state notes, worth at the time of the contract only fifty per cent., in consideration of a loan of $37.50 in specie, was held not a usurious transaction, the value of the notes at the time of payment being uncertain. Wilson v. Kilburn, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 494.

Intent.—In Doak v. Snapp, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 180, depreciated state bonds of the nominal value of $2,250, were transferred to the plaintiff under an agreement to pay "interest on said bonds at the rate of six per cent., in half-yearly payments, from this date. And I moreover promise to pay, on or before April 5th, 1845, to the said Snapp or order, the $2,250 in Georgia state bonds, or their equivalent in other money." On a bill brought to have the contract declared usurious, the plaintiff having appealed from a decree against him below, the supreme court, by Caruthers, J., said: "It would not necessarily follow, if the bonds were sold for their nominal value, where they were much depreciated, to be paid in full at a given time, that it would be usurious. That would depend on the intention and purpose of the parties, whether it was a contrivance to get usurious interest or not. The stocks, are not usurious in the absence of evidence that usury was intended.¹ If the borrower has the bona fide privilege of paying the loan in the same kind of funds, at their par value, the transaction cannot be said to be usurious, no matter what the extent of the depreciation.² And where the agreement is to repay in depreciated funds, it is not usury to exact the nominal amount and interest, though their value is greater at the time of payment than at the date of the agreement.³ So where a loan of coin is to be repaid in kind, a stipulation that if paid in paper money then at the rate of one dollar and a half in such currency for every dollar in coin, is not prima facie usurious.⁴

Of course, if the transaction is a bona fide sale of property, and not a loan, it is not rendered usurious by the fact that payment is made in depreciated funds.⁵

or even depreciated bank notes, might be worth to the purchaser or borrower more than they would then sell for; or even the lender might prefer to keep them, for the chances of improvement in value, rather than to part with them at less than the amount for which they called on their face. Upon the whole, we think the decree is right, and affirm it."

Upon a loan of $6,500, it was stipulated that $5,000 of the amount should be accepted by the borrower in bills of a bank which had suspended specie payments some time before, and whose bills were commonly refused by business men. A large quantity of these bills were at that time held by the lender as security against the bank, and the lender entertained a hope that the bank would re-establish its credit, but it soon after proved to be insolvent. It was held that the burden was upon the borrower to prove that the lender knew of the insolvency at the time of the loan. Stuart v. Mechanics, etc., Bank, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 508.

1. Slosson v. Duff, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 432; Lowry v. Chautauqua Co. Bank, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 67; Hayward v. Le Baron, 4 Fla. 404.

A loan at the highest rate of interest, made in bills taken by the borrower at par, but which were in fact one per cent. below par and unbankable, yet currently circulating at par among individuals, is not necessarily usurious. The intent is a question of fact for the jury. Robbins v. Dillaye, 4 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 71.

A creditor of an insolvent estate borrowed a sum made up in part of cash, but principally of promissory notes somewhat below par in market value, and gave the assignees his note for the nominal amount. The assignees had no intention of making a usurious loan, and acted in entire good faith. It was held that the transaction was valid. Sizer v. Miller, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 227.

A loan, at par, of the bills of a bank which had stopped specie payments, but which was not shown to be insolvent or embarrassed, and whose bills were not shown to be held below par in the market, made to a borrower not shown to be in necessitous circumstances, was held free from usury. Stuart v. Mechanics, etc., Bank, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 496.

In Codd v. Rathbone, 19 N. Y. 37, the defendant drew checks, payable in foreign bank bills which were currently received by the drawee and other banks at a discount, but which circulated at par among merchants, and the checks were thus paid by the drawee. In an action on a note given for the amount of the checks, it was held that the transaction was not usurious, in the absence of a prior agreement that the checks should be drawn payable in such bills.

2. Caton v. Shaw, 2 Har. & G. (Md.) 13.

For a loan of $80 in specie, the borrower promised to pay "$88 in current bills, such as pass at A between man and man." Usury having been set up as a defense, it was held proper for the plaintiff to show that the kind of bills referred to were, at the time of the loan, depreciated ten per cent. below par. Phelps v. Riley, 3 Conn. 266.

XIX. AGENT'S COMMISSIONS ; BONUS—1. Borrower's Agent.—Payment or agreement for payment by the borrower of commissions for services in procuring the loan, rendered by a third person acting bona fide as the agent or broker for the borrower, and of which commissions the lender receives no part, directly or indirectly, can never render the loan usurious, for the plain reason that the lender is no party to the transaction.¹ The fact that the lender is cognizant of the agreement between the borrower and his own agent does not affect the rule, so long as the commissions are solely for the latter's benefit ;² nor does the fact that the borrower's

Where the lender neither takes nor contracts to take usury, he is not affected by a contract between the borrower and a loan broker to pay the latter out of the loan for his services, the lender having no interest in the broker's business or its proceeds. Weems v. American Mortg. Co., 86 Ga. 760.

In Richards v. Purdy (Iowa, 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 886, it was held that a loan was not rendered usurious by the borrower giving a note to the lender's agent, who was also the borrower's agent, as a commission for securing the loan, although it was made payable to the lender as a matter of convenience, to have it secured by the mortgages, if the lender did not authorize the charge for commissions or know of it.

A procured B to borrow money for him, and agreed to pay three per cent. per month therefor. B obtained the money from a third person at legal interest, and the latter took a note from A for the amount; but B received from A the three per cent. per month for his own use. It was held that A's note for the amount so loaned was not usurious. Coster v. Dilworth, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 299. To the same effect, see also Barretto v. Snowden, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 181.

It is not a usurious loan for a guardian to take a bonus for his own benefit, on lending his ward's money to one who has knowledge of the ownership. Fellows v. Longyor, 91 N. Y. 324.

But it is held that a usurious bonus taken by an executor for his own benefit in lending the estate's funds, must be deducted from the face of the note. Landis v. Saxton, 89 Mo. 375.

Double Brokerage.—One of the earliest cases holding that the payment of commissions by the borrower to a broker for obtaining a loan does not render the loan usurious, is Dagnell v. Wigley, 11 East 35. The facts were that the defendants, for the purpose of obtaining money, accepted a bill of exchange, and gave it to one Rimmer to negotiate, under an agreement to pay him double the usual brokerage. Rimmer deducted the amount of his brokerage from the proceeds of sale of the bill, and, as it came due the defendants accepted another bill for the purpose of raising funds to pay the first, which latter bill Rimmer also negotiated for them, receiving therefor double brokerage. This arrangement was resorted to several times. In an action by the holders of the last bill against the acceptors, the payment of exorbitant brokerage to Rimmer was relied on as vitiating the bill; but the defense was overruled by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., who said: "It does not appear that Rimmer's name was on the bill at all, nor was he to advance the money. It does not therefore strike me as a security given for a usurious consideration, but Rimmer was to receive an exorbitant brokerage for his trouble in getting the bill discounted." To the same effect see Salarte v. Melville, 7 B. & C. 427.

2. Crane v. Hubbel, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 413; Merck v. American Freehold, etc., Co., 79 Ga. 213; Ottillie v. Waechter, 33 Wis. 255.

In the absence of collusion, com-agent shares his commissions with the lender's agent.¹ But if, by previous agreement or tacit understanding, the commissions are shared between the borrower's agent and the lender himself, the taking of the commissions thereby becomes the act of the lender, and must be regarded as additional interest.²

2. Lender's Agent.—The general rule is now well settled that commissions paid or agreed to be paid by the borrower to an agent of the lender for his services in procuring or advising the loan, and which, if added to the stipulated interest, would exceed the statutory limit, do not render the contract of the loan usurious, provided that such commissions are not in any manner shared by the lender, and are not exorbitant or unreasonable in amount; or, if excessive, that they were exacted by the agent without the lender's knowledge or consent.³ So the lender may, without incurmissions paid by the lender, out of the loan, to third persons at the borrowers' request, and not for the benefit of the lender or his agents, do not make the loan usurious. Kihlholz v. Wolf, 103 Ill. 362.

2. Collamer v. Goodrich, 30 Vt. 628; McBroom v. Scottish Mortg., etc., Invest. Co., 153 U. S. 318.

An allowance to a mortgagee of four per cent. in addition to the legal rate of interest is usurious, although such allowance is called a "banker's commission." Bowdoin v. Hammond (Md. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 769.

Gratuity.—In Eslava v. Crampton, 61 Ala. 507, it was held that the fact that the loan broker, as a mere gratuity, shared his commissions with the lender, did not infect the loan with usury.

Knowledge of Lender Essential.—The following cases hold that to charge the lender with the agent's exactions, it must be shown that he had previously authorized them, or made the loan with knowledge of the facts. Fisher v. Porter, 23 Fed. Rep. 162; Call v. Palmer, 116 U. S. 98; Palmer v. Call, 2 McCrary (U. S.) 522; Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446; Van Wyck v. Watters, 81 N. Y. 352; *Phillips v. To sustain a plea of usury paid to the plaintiff's agent who negotiated the loan, the defendant must prove, not only that the agent retained money in excess of lawful interest, but that such act was either authorized, known, or ratified by the plaintiff. Greenfield v. Monaghan (Iowa, 1892), 52 N. W. Rep. 193.

Where the agent's charge for services is manifestly an excuse to cover the taking of a usurious bonus, it is immaterial whether the lender shared in it or not, if he knowingly allowed its payment to be a condition of the loan, or assisted in its exaction at the time of the loan. Pfenning v. Scholer, 43 N. J. Eq. 15; Borcherling's Ex'r v. Trefz, 40 N. J. Eq. 502; Demarest v. Vandenberg, 41 N. J. Eq. 63; Bennett v. Hadsell, 23 N. J. Eq. 174; Meeker v. Disse, 26 N. J. Eq. 218.

In Condit v. Baldwin, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 181; affirmed by the court of appeals in 21 N. Y. 219, the supreme court, by Johnson, J., said: "Courts ought and will look with jealous scrutiny upon all such practices by the agents of lenders, and see that the statute is not violated, and its provisions evaded under the cover of an agency. But they should be equally careful to protect the honest and innocent lender from the secret and unauthorized agreements between such agent and the borrower." The court in this case refused to hold that the lender had ratified the act of his agent by bringing an action to enforce the security, the evidence showing that the lender had no knowledge of the fact that his agent had taken commissions from the borrower. This case was followed in North v. Sergeant, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 350; Fellows v. Com'rs, etc., 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 655; Bell v. Day, 32 N. Y. 165. In the case last cited the court of appeals recognized the authority of Condit v. Baldwin, and followed it on the ground of stare decisis, though several members of the court expressed themselves strongly in disapproval of the reasoning by which that decision was reached.

The lender is not chargeable with his agent's unauthorized act in taking commissions, notwithstanding the borrower supposed the agent was the lender. Lee v. Chadsey, 3 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 43.

An exaction by the agent of the lender, without his knowledge or consent, of a sum of money from the borrower, under a false pretense that a part of it was a bonus for the lender, does not taint the debt or security given for the exact amount loaned. Estevez v. Purdy, 66 N. Y. 446.

In Alger v. Gardner, 54 N. Y. 360, it was held that a loan was void for usury, because the lender's agent, for his own benefit and without the knowledge or consent of his principal, agreed with the borrower for the payment of illegal interest, and appropriated the excess.

In Iowa, it is held that, in the absence of evidence that the principal authorized his agent to loan money for him at illegal interest, it will be presumed that no such authority was given. And, under such state of facts, a note payable to the principal for the amount loaned and an additional sum charged by the agent as his commission from the borrower, is not usurious in the hands of the principal. Ammerman v. Ross (Iowa, 1892), 51 N. W. Rep. 6; Gokey v. Knapp, 44 Iowa 32.

The rule applies, even though the agent and principal are husband and wife. Brigham v. Myers, 51 Iowa 397.

But where the agent conducts himself in the negotiations as the real creditor and takes unlawful interest, and the debtor, being unable to read, supposes that the note given by him for the loan is payable to the agent personally, but it is in fact payable to another, the alleged principal, the latter is bound by the acts of the agent. Glick v. Bramer, 78 Iowa 568.

Question for Jury.—Where the lender's agent charged the borrower, for whom he had rendered services in procuring the loan, the sum of $1,700 for a loan of $8,000, with the knowledge of the lender, it was held a question for the jury, whether the charge was a reasonable one and authorized by the borrower, or a mere cover for usury on the part of the lender. New England, etc., Security Co. v. Gay, 33 Fed. Rep. 636.

Middlemen.—Where a contract for a loan and the acceptance of the security were made by the owner of the money in person, who paid over the full amount of the loan to a middleman engaged in procuring it, the facts that without his knowledge the note and mortgage were taken in the name of one of the middlemen, and excessive commissions were deducted by them from the amount paid over, and shared among them, do not infect the loan with usury. Hughes v. Griswold, 82 Ga. 279; Riley v. Olin, 82 Ga. 312. These two cases also hold that the fact that the middlemen, in pursuance of a known custom in their business, but without express contract with any of the parties, rendered services beneficial to the lender in attending to the payment of taxes on the mortgaged property, and collecting and remitting installments of interest on the loan, but the value of which services was not shown, does not mark the loan as usurious.

Lender's Agents.—B applied to a firm ring the consequences of usury, consent to the borrower's paying the lender's agent a fair and reasonable compensation for services actually rendered by the agent to the borrower in connection with the loan.¹ It does not follow, however, that because the lender is not chargeable with usury when his agent has made an agreement for his own benefit to receive an excessive bonus or commission from the borrower, such agreement can be enforced. On the contrary, it can be defeated by a plea of usury.² But a note given to an agent for his services in connection with the loan is presumptively valid when not shown to be excessive in amount.³

It may also be stated as settled doctrine, that if the lender's of attorneys for a loan of $1,000, agreeing to pay them twenty per cent. for acting as his agents in procuring it. After having the title examined at B's expense, the attorneys forwarded the application, the title papers, their contract with B for commission, and a certificate by them as to B's financial responsibility, to one O at Memphis, who forwarded all the papers to a bank in New York. The bank took the papers to a loan company in that city, and solicited the loan. This, the loan company agreed to make, and the bank caused interest-bearing notes for $1,000 and a mortgage to be prepared, which, together with its check for $1,000, it forwarded to O. O kept the check, and sent to B's attorneys his own check for $800 with the notes and mortgage. The attorneys got B to execute these and gave him the check. They recorded the mortgage, had the abstract of the title completed, and forwarded the papers to O, who in turn forwarded them to the bank in New York who delivered them to the loan company and received $1,000. During a period of eleven years previous to this transaction, the loan company had made about thirteen thousand loans, of which all but about five hundred had been negotiated through this bank. Members of the bank were also stockholders and directors of the company. The notes in this case, as in all the others, were made payable at the bank, and collections were made through it. O was employed by the bank to make loans, under an agreement that out of a commission of twenty per cent. to be exacted from borrowers, O was to pay the local attorney or agent two per cent., defray the expenses of his office, retain five hundred dollars per month for his services, and remit the balance to the bank. This arrangement was carried out in making B's loan. The loan company denied any connection with the attorneys or with O, but it was shown that, in several cases of loans previously made in a similar way through the bank, the defense of usury had been interposed, and that the company were fully aware of the facts. It was held that the bank, O, and the local attorneys, were all agents of the loan company, and that the defense of usury could be set up against it. Banks v. Flint, 54 Ark. 40.

1. Hopkins v. Baker, 2 Patt. & H. (Va.) 110.

A loan and trust company procured a loan of $15,000 for the defendant from a third party, the payment of which it guaranteed, and the proceeds of which it used, by previous agreement, in paying the defendant's debts. The loan was for five years, at six per cent., and the company, by the terms of the agreement, charged the defendant $1,500 as "brokerage," covering its services in disbursing the money and guaranteeing the loan. The lender was a stockholder and director of the company. It was held that these facts did not show that the charge of $1,500 was a mere device to evade usury. Keagy v. Prout, 85 Va. 390.

Parol Evidence.—It can always be shown by parol that the sum nominally paid by the borrower to an agent as commission for making the loan, was actually a part of the consideration for the loan, and a device to conceal usurious intent. Stein v. Swensen, 44 Minn. 218.

Also that a sum specified in writing as the price of goods sold in connection with a loan, actually included a usurious commission. Lewis v. Willoughby, 43 Minn. 307.

agent, with the knowledge and approval of his principal, exacts a bonus or commission from the borrower, though for the agent's sole benefit, which, together with the interest reserved, amounts to more than the legal rate, the lender is chargeable with usury. In other words, the borrower must not be required to pay the agent for services beneficial to the lender.¹ It is not necessary that the lender be actually a party to the taking of the usury ; it is sufficient that he makes the loan with knowledge of the agent's act.² The decided tendency of the courts is to charge the lender as a party to the usury, where he has placed his money with an agent under an agreement that the agent is to secure for him the best possible rate of interest, and look to the borrower for his own compensation.³ If the agency is general, embracing the business of making, managing, and collecting loans for the principal, and with large discretionary powers, an authority to make loans by exacting excessive commissions from the borrower may be presumed.⁴ And it has been held that the exaction of usurious

General Authority to Agent.—An agreement by a broker with a lender, to procure applications for loans, on condition that he will look to the borrowers exclusively for his compensation, together with the fact that the broker thereafter styles himself as the lender's agent in correspondence relating to loans, constitutes him the lender's agent, and commissions exacted by him must be regarded as exacted by the lender. Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co., 141 U. S. 384; Payne v. Newcomb, 100 Ill. 611; 39 Am. Rep. 69.

Where a person appoints an agent with general power to lend money, under an agreement that the agent is not to make any charge against the principal, but to "make what he could out of it," and the agent exacts from a borrower an excessive and unreasonable commission for making the loan, the transaction is, as against the principal, tainted with usury. Avery v. Creigh, 35 Minn. 456.

In the earlier case of Acheson v. Chase, 28 Minn. 211, the same court held that where the agent is restricted by the lender to exacting "a reasonable commission" from borrowers, the lender is not chargeable with anything taken by the agent in excess of such compensation.

The mere fact that the lender supposed that the agent was to receive some compensation from the borrower for his trouble in effecting the loan, is not of itself sufficient to charge the lender with knowledge of and assent to an exaction, by the agent, of a sum from the borrower in the nature of usury. Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473.

4. Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Sherwood v. Roundtree, 32 Fed. Rep. 113; Kemmitt v. Adamson, 44 Minn. 121.

To charge the lender with notice of usury in a loan made by his agent, evidence is admissible to prove the general manner in which the agent conducted the lender's business, that he used a certain kind of blanks, made loans only on one month's credit, and extensions for but one month at a time, and that he charged commissions of a percentage on the amount of each loan and extension. Stein v. Swensen, 46 Minn. 360. In this case the court, by Gilfillan, C. J., said: "The authority being general to conduct the business without any restrictions upon the agent in the manner of conducting it, the principal would be presumed to know the agent's general mode of carrying it on. If the agent conducted it usuriously, the principal would be presumed to know it, and, if he permitted it, he would be responsible to the same extent as if he authorized it in advance. If the general manner of doing it was by the use of particular blanks, by making loans and extensions for only one month at a time, charging upon each loan and extension, in addition to the interest by the agent raises the presumption that the lender was aware of it.¹ The exorbitance of a charge by the lender's agent for commissions is evidence tending to prove that the charge was intended for the benefit of the lender, and a device to cover usury.² The fact that the borrower expressly designates the person receiving the commission as his own agent is of no consequence, if in reality the agent represented the lender.³

Of course, any commission or bonus beyond legal interest, taken either directly or indirectly by the lender for his own profit, in consideration of the use of the money, renders the loan usurious.⁴ And to sustain a charge by the lender for "commissions," in addition to lawful interest, it must be shown to be based on some actual service rendered, some trouble encountered, or some risk assumed by the lender, apart from what is involved ordinarily in full legal rate of interest, a percentage on the loan, he would be presumed to know it. Certainly, if the business was conducted in that manner, with his knowledge, it would have the same force as evidence upon a particular transaction in issue that his personal conduct of the business in that manner would have."

In Lewis v. Willoughby, 43 Minn. 307, Mitchell, J., in holding the principal liable for the act of his general agent in exacting a usurious bonus, the amount of which was included in the securities, said: "The presumption in such a case ought to be that what the agent assumed to do for his principal was done by his authority; and, if any facts exist which would relieve him from responsibility for the unlawful exactions of his agent, he ought to prove them."

Where a note was made for the payment of seventeen dollars, with interest at the highest legal rate, but was in fact given for a loan of fifteen dollars only, the extra two dollars being agreed upon as additional interest, the note was held usurious and void. Also that it was immaterial that the loan was made, not by the payee in person, but by an agent who held in his hands money belonging to the latter, with general authority to make loans. Kemmitt v. Adamson, 44 Minn. 121.

In Philo v. Butterfield, 3 Neb. 256, the court said: "It is a settled rule of law, which will not be questioned, that in all cases where a person employs another as his agent to loan money for him, and places the fund in the hands of the agent for such purpose, the principal is bound by the acts of his agent, and if the agent charges the borrower of such money unlawful interest, or even demands and receives from the borrower a bonus for such loan, and appropriates it to his own individual use, either with or without the knowledge of his principal, the principal is affected by the act of his agent." Quoted with approval and followed in Cheney v. White, 5 Neb. 261; 25 Am. Rep. 487.

2. Stein v. Swensen, 44 Minn. 218.

In the federal courts it is held that if the commissions are unreasonably large, it is the duty of the court to declare the transaction usurious as a matter of law, without submitting the question to the jury. See Sherwood v. Roundtree, 32 Fed. Rep. 113.

Pretense of Agency.—Where a person, pretending to act as agent, made a loan, taking the note and mortgage in his own name, and deducted twenty-five dollars beyond lawful interest as his commission, and afterward transferred the securities to his principal, but at foreclosure sale bought the property for himself, the court held, on a plea of usury, that he was the real party in interest, and that the so-called commis-

the advance of money.¹ In cases where the fact of agency is concealed from the borrower, who deals with the agent supposing him to be the lender, and pays him a bonus beyond legal interest, the rule is that he may plead usury when sued on the contract by the actual principal.²

3. Ratification of Agent's Act.—Where the contract between the lender's agent and the borrower was made without the lender's authority or knowledge, an action by him to collect the debt or enforce the security does not constitute a ratification, so as to charge him with usury, even though he had knowledge of the transaction before bringing suit.³

4. Bonus Added to Interest.—It frequently occurs that in addition to the interest stipulated for, the parties have by agreement paid and received, or included in the note to be paid to the lender or his agent, a sum intended as a bonus or commission. The rule adopted by the courts in such cases is, that if the amount of the bonus, added to the interest reserved, does not exceed the maximum rate that might lawfully have been agreed upon for the entire period of the loan, the transaction is not usurious. It is otherwise if the amount is greater than such rate.⁴

sion rendered the loan usurious. Sanford v. Kane, 133 Ill. 199; 23 Am. St. Rep. 602.

Exactng a commission upon the exchange of notes, not exceeding legal interest upon the notes of the party charging it, is not usury. Dey v. Dunham, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 182.

An agreement for reasonable commission to an agent for his services in accepting and paying bills with funds furnished by his principal, is not on its face usurious. Suydam v. Bartle, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 94.

2. Erickson v. Bell, 53 Iowa 627; 36 Am. Rep. 246; Wilkes v. Coffield, 3 Hawks (N. Car.) 28.

In the recent case of Trimble v. Thorson, 80 Iowa 246, an instruction that if an agent "ostensibly loans money for himself, but really for another, and exacts a commission in excess of the legal rate for his own benefit, without the knowledge of such other, it would not necessarily make the loan usurious, even though the borrower believed the agent was the principal," was held erroneous; but, as the evidence showed that the note which the borrower signed named the real principal as payee, it was decided that he thereby received notice of the agency, and that the error in the instruction was not prejudicial.

Thus, where upon a loan of $1,100 for five years at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, the borrower agreed to pay the agent $200 to procure the loan, and that sum was included in the mortgage, it was held that as the bonus and interest together did not exceed the highest legal rate of ten per cent. per annum for the five years, there was no usury. Upton v. O'Donahue (Neb. 1891), 49 N. W. Rep. 267.

But a loan to a corporation is usurious where, in addition to the legal rate of interest, the lender exacts from the corporation a transfer of corporate stock having a cash value at the time; and the stock is properly treated as a payment pro tanto on the debt, although it may have become practically worthless since the loan was made. Holiday v. Lowry Banking Co. (Ga. 1894), 19 S. E. Rep. 28.

The reservation, by the agent of the holder of a promissory note held by the former for collection, of $10, as a

5. Contracts With Commission Merchants.—Agreements entered into between owners of produce and commission merchants, by which the latter are to make advances upon the credit of consignments, and receive interest on the amounts advanced, and also commissions for their services in selling, are not usurious if made in good faith, and without design to conceal unlawful interest under the guise of commissions.¹

A common feature of such agreements is that if the principal fails to consign the quantity of goods agreed upon, he shall pay to the commission men, in addition to interest on the advances, certain sums either as liquidated damages, or as commissions. The courts held that such provisions do not necessarily stamp the transaction as a cover for usury, but that the question of inten-bonus for forbearing present payment of a balance due on the note, renders a note given for the balance usurious. Anderson v. Vallery (Neb. 1894), 58 N. W. Rep. 191.

On a loan of $4,000 for five years at eight per cent., the lender as a bonus took notes from the borrower for $350, with interest after maturity, payable within a year. In ascertaining whether more than ten per cent.—the highest legal rate—had been exacted for the loan, the court refused to compute interest on the bonus notes for the period of the loan. Tepoel v. Saunders Co. Nat. Bank, 24 Neb. 815.

Where ten per cent. per annum is lawful, the exaction of a commission of $225 upon a loan of $4,500 at nine per cent. for five years is not usurious. Brown v. Scottish-American Mortgage Co., 110 Ill. 235. To the same effect, see Fowler v. Equitable Trust Co., 141 U. S. 384.

For the purpose of determining whether the loan is usurious, the bonus is to be deducted as of the date when it is payable, and if payable at the time of the loan, it is to be deducted as of that date from the principal, and the remainder, which the borrower receives, is to be taken as the basis of computation. Smith v. Parsons (Minn. 1894), 57 N. W. Rep. 311.

1. In Woolsey v. Jones, 84 Ala. 88, the court, by Somerville, J., said: "If an extra and reasonable amount be charged for some incidental service, expense or risk assumed by the lender or his employees, this is not for the use of the money—it is not interest—and cannot render the contract of loan usurious, unless the transaction be a shift or device intended in substance and legal effect to cover a usurious loan. Contracts to pay the usual commissions to a commission merchant for making advances of money and sales of products consigned, are of this character, and, though often liable to suspicion, are not necessarily usurious. The onus of proving them such is cast on the party seeking to impeach their legality, and this he can do only by showing the guilty intent to evade the laws against usury." And see Morrissey v. Broomal (Neb. 1894), 56 N. W. Rep. 383.

A commission merchant agreed to receive produce from a country dealer, and accept his drafts, the produce to be delivered before the drafts became payable. He reserved and charged a commission of two and a half per cent. on all advances made by him beyond the amount of produce or funds of the dealer in his hands at the time, and also legal interest upon all items of the account in his favor after maturity. It was held, that the commissions were not necessarily usurious. Trotter v. Curtis, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 160; 10 Am. Dec. 211.

Extra charges for advances made in the course of a legitimate commission business, designed to cover both the use of the money and the trouble incurred in making sales and attending to the goods, are not usurious per se. Seymour v. Marvin, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 80.

Where a commission merchant makes advances on consignments, and takes a note for the amount, including interest and a further sum as commissions for selling, the note is not necessarily usurious, even though the goods are withdrawn without sale. The tion and good faith is for the jury.¹ But where, in addition to the regular commissions for selling, the factor stipulates for compensation for making advances at a rate greater than legal interest, question of good faith is one of fact for the jury. Bartlett v. Williams, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 288.

1. Norwood v. Faulkner, 22 S. Car. 367; 53 Am. Rep. 717.

In Harris v. Boston, 2 Camp. 348, the plaintiffs were seed factors, and purchased large quantities of rape seed for the defendant, for which they advanced the money, charging the highest legal rate of interest for the advances, and in addition it was agreed that they should have a commission of two and a half per cent. upon all seed purchased. It was proved that the customary commissions for purchasing such seed did not exceed one per cent. Lord Ellenborough said: "It will first be a question of fact, whether the commission of two and a half per cent. exceeds what can be fairly and reasonably referred to the plaintiff's trouble and risk in making these purchases. If it does, then, by inference of law, it must be ascribed to the advance and forbearance of the money, and the contract is usurious. If the plaintiffs would have duly made the purchases for one per cent., but charge two and a half, besides legal interest, where they advance the money, this commission must be considered an expedient for enhancing the rate of interest beyond five per cent. and a mere color for usury."

Failure to Make Consignments.—An agreement to pay a commission merchant legal interest on advances, and also commissions, whether he makes sales or not, is not usurious unless shown to have been so intended by the parties. Cockle v. Flack, 93 U. S. 344.

So of an agreement to pay the usual commissions, though the debtor should fail to make shipments. Pollard v. Baylors, 6 Munf. (Va.) 433.

An agreement to deliver to the lenders, commission merchants, for every $10 lent, one bale of cotton for storage and sale on commission, and also to pay legal interest on the loan, is not necessarily usurious where there was a reasonable expectation that the borrower would be able to deliver the cotton. But an agreement between commission merchants and a person to whom they were to advance money upon interest, that the borrower should furnish them with cotton to sell on commissions averaging from thirty to fifty per cent. higher than the commissions usual where no advances are made, stamps the transaction as a cover for unlawful interest. Harmon v. Lehman, 85 Ala. 379.

A stipulation, coupled with a loan, that the borrower would deliver a large quantity of cotton for storage and sale by the lender, or pay storage and commission as liquidated damages for non-delivery, the lender not being engaged in the storage business, and the borrower having, as the lender well knew, no means of complying with the requirement, was held to be a cover for usury. Uhlfelder v. Carter, 64 Ala. 527.

Cotton factors agreed to advance money to a merchant, he to ship to them for sale on commission at least one bale of cotton for every $10 advanced, and if he failed to do so, he should repay them the full amount advanced, with eight per cent. interest, and $2 additional for each bale of cotton not shipped as agreed. Also to repay them for all advances at a certain time, and all costs and attorneys' fees in case of suit. It was held a question for the jury whether this agreement was intended as a cover for usury. White v. Guilmartin, 83 Ga. 640.

So of a contract to pay commission men, making advances in addition to the usual commissions, the sum of $1.50 for each bale of cotton not delivered according to agreement. Calaway v. Butler, 79 Ga. 356.

Notes for a loan of money were given bearing the highest legal rate of interest, and at the same time the borrower agreed, in consideration of the loan, to ship the lenders a certain number of bales of cotton for sale at a stipulated commission, and in case of non-shipment, to pay them one dollar for each bale not shipped. In an action on the contract, after the payment of the notes, the transaction was held usurious. Mackenzie v. Garnett, 78 Ga. 251.

An agreement by a debtor to pay his debt, with interest, by shipments of tobacco, out of which the creditors were to take the usual factor's commissions, and, in case of non-shipment, to receive certain sums equivalent to and in lieu

he is guilty of usury;¹ and such compensation is none the less interest because the parties choose to designate it as additional commission.²

XX. AGREEMENT FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES.—Though the authorities are not entirely unanimous, the prevailing rule is that stipulations by the debtor to the effect that if the debt be not paid at maturity he will pay the creditor's attorney's fees or commissions for enforcing payment, are valid and free from usury if made in good faith, and not as a device to evade the statute.³ Such agreements, it has been said, are not only not usurious, but are eminently just.⁴

In mortgages and trust deeds it is customary to insert a stipulation for payment by the debtor of the costs, and attorney's fees for foreclosing; and unless the amount specified is so unreasonable as to be suggestive of usury, the courts hold such stipulations valid and enforceable.⁵

It seems that, even though a mortgage debt be infected with usury, an agreement in the mortgage to pay a reasonable attorney's fee in case of foreclosure, can be enforced against the mortgagor.⁶

The fact that the statute declares usurious all contracts for additional interest or compensation on account of non-payment at maturity, does not render usurious a note providing for the

of such commissions, was held usurious. Pollard v. Baylor, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 223.

An agreement in a note to pay "all costs for collecting the above, not less than ten per cent.," does not render the note usurious; but only a reasonable attorney's fee can be collected as costs. Williams v. Flowers, 90 Ala. 136.

But see Ohio v. Taylor, 10 Ohio 378, where an agreement to pay five per cent. as collection fees, in addition to legal interest, was held usurious.

But in Kentucky it is held that an agreement in a note and mortgage to pay an attorney's fee in case of foreclosure is usurious, for the reason that to enforce it would be to recover more than the debt with legal interest and costs. Thomasson v. Townsend, 10 Bush (Ky.) 114.

6. Matzenbaugh v. Troup, 36 Ill. App. 261.

payment of an attorney's fee if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, because this is neither interest nor compensation.¹

If securities in the hands of the creditor's attorney are to be collected and the proceeds applied to the debt, it is not usury for the debtor to agree to pay the attorney a reasonable commission for making the collection.²

An agreement to pay expenses already incurred by the creditor in procuring judgment, and also to pay his attorney's collection fees, exceeding legal interest, in consideration of forbearance, has been held usurious in several cases,³ but in one case it has been sustained.⁴

XXI. EXPENSES INCURRED BY LENDER.—The making of loans and the examination of the securities offered, frequently involve labor and expense on the part of the lender, which, according to good business principles, ought to be paid by the borrower, without being regarded as a part of the compensation for the use of the money; and accordingly, the courts hold that a fair and reasonable charge made by the lender for services actually rendered, or expenses incurred in connection with the loan, does not render it usurious.⁵

But because charges of this character are often resorted to as a plausible pretext for obtaining illegal interest, and are usually made at a time when the borrower is at a disadvantage, a very strict degree of proof is required of their reasonableness and of the bona fides of the lender, when challenged as usurious.⁶

It is a circumstance in the lender's favor, that the expenses were incurred, or the labor and services expended, at the instance and request of the borrower.⁷

It is not necessary for the purchaser of property at a judicial sale to allow the former owner to remain in possession under an agreement that in addition to legal interest on all advances made by the purchaser, the owner shall pay him an annual sum, reasonable in amount, to compensate him for the trouble and responsibility incurred. Case v. Fish, 58 Wis. 56.

6. Heldenheimer v. Mayer, 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 506; Van Tassell v. Wood, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 388. See also cases cited in preceding note.

To rebut the defense of usury against a debt larger than the sum actually loaned with legal interest, it was claimed that the excess was by way of compensation for services rendered by the creditor to the debtor, but it appeared that there was no prior agreement to pay for such services, which were of a neighborly character, and generally rendered without charge. The court held that the evidence did not disprove usury. Humphrey v. McCauley (Ark. 1891), 17 S. W. Rep. 713.

7. Harger v. McCullough, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 119; Thurston v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281; Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa 289.

But an unconditional agreement by the borrower to pay expenses and commissions, whether or not they shall be incurred, is evidence of a usurious intent.¹

It is for the jury to determine, in view of all the circumstances, whether the charges were fair and reasonable, and made in good faith, or were merely a usurious device.²

A very common item of expense incurred by the lender is in the examination of the securities, and the reasonableness of such charges depends upon the nature and extent of the labor involved. If the land is to be mortgaged, the borrower can lawfully be required to pay the usual and proper fee for examining the title and drawing the mortgage.³

So, the lender may lawfully charge for the expense of making a personal examination and inspection of the security.⁴ And the cost of keeping the property insured,⁵ and of paying taxes thereon,⁶ may properly be charged to the borrower, who would naturally be at the same expense if the loan had not been made.

As the lender's funds are not always at hand, or available, at the time of the application, the courts hold that he may charge the borrower with the loss, expense, and trouble incurred at the latter's request in collecting or otherwise providing the ready money.⁷ And it has been held that the expenses of a journey taken by the creditor, at the debtor's request, for the purpose of settling the demand, may be properly included in the securities so obtained,

An alternative agreement by the borrower to pay interest above the legal rate, or to pay whatever taxes might be "exactd" on the mortgaged property, is not usurious. Home Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 33 Hun (N. Y.) 415.

7. Eaton v. Alger, 2 Abb. App. Dec. (N. Y.) 5; Thurston v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281; Atlanta Min., etc., Co. v. Gwyer, 48 Ga. 11.

Where the lender sold stock in order to raise funds for the loan, upon the borrower's agreement to pay, in addition to the interest, any advance that might occur in the market value of the stock during the period of the loan, it was held that a note given for the amount due, including an actual advance that occurred in such market value during that time, was not usurious. Snow v. Nye, 106 Mass. 413.

The defendant borrowed of the plaintiff $3,600 and gave her a mortgage therefor. Afterward he applied to her for a further loan, which she was unable to make, but at his instance she sold the $3,600 mortgage for $3,400, to a third person whom he brought to her. She then loaned him this $3,400, for which he gave her his note for $3,600, he allowing her the $200 to compensate her for the discount and for the expenses of examining the title to the new security. It was held that there was no usury in the second note. Comstock v. Wilder, 61 Iowa 274.

But where the borrower bound himself to pay the lender a certain sum as a compensation for his trouble and anticipated loss in selling securities to raise the money for the proposed loan, it was held that such agreement made the loan usurious. Van Tassell v. Wood, 12 Hun (N. Y.) 288.

the debtor having previously promised reimbursement.¹ It is otherwise, as to the traveling expenses of the creditor incurred in demanding security for a pre-existing debt, in the absence of such previous request or agreement.²

An agreement to the effect that if the creditor should find it necessary to sell certain collaterals given to secure the debt, he should be entitled to retain a commission of two and a half per cent. and the expenses of the sale, has been sustained, it appearing that the parties acted in good faith.³

Past services rendered by the creditor to the debtor in matters not connected with the debt, furnish a good consideration for a promise by the debtor, on obtaining forbearance, to pay for such services a sum exceeding lawful interest on the debt.⁴

XXII. AGREEMENTS TO PAY TAXES.—A requirement, as a condition of making a loan, that the borrower shall reimburse the lender whatever he may be compelled to pay in the way of taxes levied on the amount of the loan, is not per se usurious.⁵

It has been held, however, that an agreement on the part of the borrower to pay all taxes that might be assessed against the principal or interest is usurious.⁶ But unless the interest reserved be at the maximum rate, such an agreement cannot be said as a matter of law to be usurious, because the amount of taxes actually levied, added to the agreed rate of interest, might not exceed the maximum rate.

XXIII. COMPENSATION FOR USE OF CREDIT.—It is not usury for a person, acting in good faith and without usurious design, to charge a compensation exceeding legal interest, for the use of his financial credit for the benefit or accommodation of another, whether as maker, acceptor, indorser, guarantor, or surety of commercial paper; the reason being that credit, a "capacity of being trusted," is neither money, goods, nor a chose in action, within the meaning of the statute.⁷

And in Jackson v. May, 28 Ill. App. 305, a note which included items of charges for the lender's expense and trouble in obtaining the money to make the loan, was held usurious.

1. Harger v. McCullough, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 119.

Where a note given for a pre-existing debt included a sum as compensation for the creditor's delay and expense in waiting, after the debt had become due, which sum was inserted at the debtor's request, and not in pursuance of any understanding or agreement to pay the same as interest for forbearance, the note was held free from usury. Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa 289.

2. Williams v. Hance, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 581. But see McKesson v. Mc-

Dowell, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 120, where a small sum besides legal interest was taken to cover the trouble and expense of traveling to make a demand upon the maker of a note, and the court held that the question of usury should have been left to the jury as to the intention of the parties.

XXIV. PARTNERSHIP TRANSACTIONS.—Agreements between members of a partnership for the payment of more than legal interest on overdrafts or balances due from one member to the concern are not affected by the usury laws, for the reason that the relation of debtor and creditor does not exist, in the ordinary sense.¹

v. American L. Ins., etc. Co., 3 N. Y. 344; Commercial Bank v. Cameron, 29 N. Y. Supp. 505; Mumford v. American L. Ins., etc., Co., 4 N. Y. 463; Ketchum v. Barber, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 224; Flint v. Schomberg, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 532; More v. Howland, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 371; 4 Den. (N. Y.) 264; Chatham Bank v. Betts, 23 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 476; 37 N. Y. 356; Kitchel v. Schenck, 29 N. Y. 515; DeForest v. Strong, 8 Conn. 513; Beckwith v. Windsor Mfg. Co., 14 Conn. 594; Hutchinson v. Hosmer, 2 Conn. 341; Jones v. McLean, 18 Ark. 456; Brown v. Harrison, 17 Ala. 774.

A provision in an agreement between an individual and a corporation, that the former will make or procure advances for the latter on its notes, and that in addition to interest he shall be paid a commission in case it becomes necessary for him to furnish credit as security in order to raise money on the notes, is not per se usurious. McComb v. Barcelona Apartment Assoc., 134 N. Y. 598.

But where a borrower gave a guarantee company a note for $210, for the purpose of obtaining a loan of $600, which the company obtained for her from a bank in which its funds were deposited by indorsing her note for $600, it was held, in an action by the guarantee company upon the $600 note, which had been dishonored and taken up by it, that the transaction was usurious. Gross v. Kellard, 6 Misc. (N. Y.) 27.

The defendant made her note for $3,000, payable to the plaintiff's order, which the plaintiff indorsed for her accommodation, and the defendant got it discounted, receiving for her own benefit but $2,700. In an action to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendant to protect the plaintiff from liability under his indorsement, the defendant testified that she made no bargain with the plaintiff for commission, but that she heard her agent tell the plaintiff that he was to "have the three hundred dollars." It was held that no usurious contract was shown. Culver v. Pullman, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 615.

In Moore v. Vance, 3 Dana (Ky.) 361, an agreement to sign a replevin bond as surety, on condition that the principal would give the surety a note for the amount of the bond with about thirty per cent. added, to be collected by the surety in the event that he should be compelled to pay the bond, was held usurious.

Guaranty as Cover.—In Linde v. Grant, 59 Hun (N. Y.) 624, the evidence was that the plaintiffs did business, both as warehousemen and as bankers. They issued to the defendant a warehouse receipt for property deposited, and this he indorsed in blank and gave to them, together with his promissory note in blank, upon the receipt of which the plaintiffs paid him the face of the note, less six per cent. and certain commissions. They then guaranteed the note and got it discounted. Upon this state of facts, the defense being usury, the court refused to hold as a matter of law that the fact that the plaintiffs had advanced the money before the note had been negotiated, proved the transaction to be a cover for usury, and sustained a verdict for the plaintiffs.

Exchange of Notes.—The rule does not apply in favor of one who lends another his notes and takes the latter's notes in exchange therefor, and also charges a commission exceeding legal interest. Fanning v. Dunham, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 122; 9 Am. Dec. 283.

Retiring Partner.—It has been held that a bond given to a retiring partner for the amount of capital he had advanced for the other partner, together with a share of the profits estimated at twelve per cent. on such amount, and a bond of indemnity against liability for the firm debts, was not usurious. Huston v. Moorhead, 7 Pa. St. 45.

Overdrafts.—An agreement between

Even in the absence of an actual partnership, a loan is free from usury where, in lieu of interest, a share of the profits expected to be realized by the borrower is agreed bona fide to be given to the lender as compensation for the loan.¹ But a stipulation for a share of the profits in addition to the principal and legal interest is plainly usurious.²

It seems that one partner cannot sue alone, either during the continuance of the firm or after its dissolution, to recover back usurious interest paid under a loan to the firm.³

XXV. RENTS.—The attempt is often made to conceal usury under the guise of rent; but whenever it can be shown that the relation of debtor and creditor existed, and that the so-called rent was intended as compensation to the creditor for forbearance, it partners for the payment of more than legal interest on the amount of their respective overdrafts is not usurious, being merely a provision for contribution to profits equal to the estimated earning capacity of the capital so withdrawn. Payne v. Freer, 91 N. Y. 43; 43 Am. Rep. 640. In this case, Finch, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If such an arrangement is a loan, in any just and proper sense, and the rate allowed is interest for the use of money, the transaction is usurious; and right here comes the collision of the respective litigants. Is such an arrangement, therefore, a loan of which usury can be predicated? If the partner who makes the overdraft is borrower, he is, at least, that kind of borrower who to some extent borrows of himself. This fact interweaves his debt, so far as it is one, with the business results and risks. To call his overdraft a loan, and hold it tainted with usury, is in practical effect to say that one may take usury of himself. As a borrower he is a victim of usury, while as a lender he is one of the usurers. One who has paid usurious interest may sue to recover it back, but if he has paid it to himself jointly with others, his co-partners, he must sue himself jointly with them, if he sues the firm. Such an action would be at least a novelty." The same principle has been recognized and applied to the case of loans to a member of a mutual benefit society, in the leading case of Silver v. Barnes, 6 Bing. N. Cas. 180.

1. Johnston v. Ferris, 14 Daly (N. Y.) 302.

Share of Profits.—A merchant gave a bill of sale of his stock of goods to one who advanced him money, under an agreement that the merchant should continue the business at a salary and one-half the profits, with the privilege of purchasing the stock back at the end of a year. It was held that the transaction was not usurious, even though one-half the profits greatly exceeded the legal interest on the sum advanced. Goodrich v. Rogers, 101 Ill. 523.

Where A agreed with B, in consideration of B's advancing him $600, to make B his sole agent for selling his goods in a given locality for ten years, B to be responsible for all sales made by him, and to receive as his compensation twenty per cent. on all sales, and to apply one-third of the remaining net proceeds to payment of the $600 advanced, it was held that the agreement was not usurious. Hall v. Daggett, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 653.

Where A advances money to B to be used in the purchase and improvement of land for purposes of sale, an agreement that B shall pay A out of the proceeds of such sale the amount advanced, with interest, and in addition thereto one-third of all profits realized, is not usurious, because the parties are joint investors rather than debtor and creditor. Niebuhr v. Schreyer, 13 N. Y. Supp. 809.

A mortgage on a printing office, which had theretofore been carried on at a loss, stipulated that the mortgagee should not be required to account for any profit or revenues he might derive from its use. It was held to be not usurious. Rapier v. Gulf City Paper Co., 77 Ala. 126.

2. Sweet v. Spence, 35 Barb. (N. Y.) 44.

will be treated as interest, no matter in what form the contract may be.¹ It will not be presumed, however, that rent was intended as a cover for usury unless it is so excessive as to indicate, in connection with all the facts, a corrupt intent.²

XXVI. ANNUITIES.—Contracts for annuities, if made in good faith and not designed to conceal usurious interest, are not within the statute, an annuity being regarded as property capable of being sold on such terms as the parties may agree upon.³ It is regarded as a suspicious circumstance that the agreement for annuity grew out of an application for a loan, but this is not

1. Wells v. Robinson, 53 Vt. 202; Morrison v. Markham, 78 Ga. 161; Mobile Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Robertson, 65 Ala. 382; Montague v. Sewell, 57 Md. 407; Grand United Order, etc., Assoc. v. Merklin, 65 Md. 579; Hammond v. Alexander, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 333; Grimes v. Shrieve, 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 546; Wright v. McAlexander, 11 Ala. 236.

In Baggett v. Trulock, 77 Ga. 369, Bleckley, C. J., said: "To stop interest by its own name and continue it under the name of rent, is one of the most common devices to cover up usury. The note for rent only serves to cover up the transaction a little more plausibly."

Usurious Agreements for Rent.—In the recent case of Gaither v. Clarke, 67 Md. 18, a lease of land from the vendee to the vendor for a term of ninety-nine years, at an annual rental of twelve per cent. on the sum for which the land was conveyed, was treated as a mere security for a loan, and held usurious.

Where property pledged to secure a loan is left in the possession of the borrower, an agreement by him to pay rent for its use, in addition to the highest legal rate of interest on the debt, is usurious. Hill v. Maddox, 11 La. Ann. 511.

So of a loan of money coupled with a deed from the borrowers to the lender, and the giving of a lease to the borrower at a rental equal to twelve per cent. on the amount loaned. Phelps v. Bellows, 53 Vt. 539.

In Scofield v. McNaught, 52 Ga. 69, an agreement by the vendee to pay the vendor ten per cent. per annum on the purchase price until final settlement, under the name of rent, was held usurious on its face.

So of an agreement for the use of a slave worth $80 per year as compensation for a loan of $200. Richardson v. Brown, 3 Bibb (Ky.) 207.

A contract by which property is conveyed as security for a loan, and the lender is to receive the rents and profits for the use of his money, is usurious where such rents and profits are reasonably sure to be much greater than legal interest on the debt. Robertson v. Campbell, 2 Call (Va.) 421; Reynolds v. Carter, 12 Leigh (Va.) 166. But other wise, if it is not clear that the value of the use of the property exceeds legal interest. Joyner v. Vincent, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 512; Wurtz v. Thynes, 2 Hill Eq. (S. Car.) 171.

Valid Transactions.—An agreement, on making a loan, to receive the rents and profits of land for a term of years in lieu of interest, is not usurious, though they amount to more than lawful interest, where no intention appears to evade the statute. Cross v. Hepner, 7 Ind. 359.

Under an order of court, a commissioner was appointed to rent lands belonging to the judgment debtor for a period of five years, at a rental sufficient to satisfy the judgment and costs. The commissioner rented the lands to the judgment debtor, who gave five bonds, without interest, in an amount sufficient to pay the judgment debt and interest, and these bonds were approved by the court. It was held that they were free from usury. Moore v. Leftwich (Va. 1889), 9 S. E. Rep. 1013.

2. Sessions v. Richmond, 1 R. I. 298; Succession of Hickman, 13 La. Ann. 364.

3. Howkins v. Bennet, 97 E. C. L. 507; 7 C. B. N. S. 507; Finch's Case, 1 And. 121, pl. 169; Tanfield v. Finch, Cro. Eliz. 27 E.; Fuller's Case, 29 Eliz., 4 Leon. 208; *Fountain v. L. 154; Chesterfield v. Janssen, 1 Atk. 340; In re Naish, 7 Bing. 150; 20 E. C. L. 81; 20 Eq. Cas. 81; Lloyd necessarily conclusive evidence of usury.¹ Nor does the fact that payment of the annuity is secured by mortgage, or by insurance upon the life of the grantor, necessarily make the transaction usurious.² It has been remarked by Lord Hardwicke, that when annuities are made redeemable, the court will regard them as an evasion of the statute, and only a loan of money.³

XXVII. POST OBITS.—Agreements by a borrower to pay a sum much larger than the amount loaned, upon the death of an ancestor or other person standing between the borrower and his estate in expectancy, are not within the statute, because of the uncertainty in the time of payment.⁴ However, post-obit agreements have not been favored by the English courts, and in numerous

v. Scott, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 205; Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 418.

Rent Charge.—The purchase of a rent charge is not affected by the statute of usury, unless intended by the parties as a cover. Gordon v. Dooley, 3 Hughes (U. S.) 182; Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 418; Rowe v. Bellaseys, 1 Sid. 182.

1. Symonds v. Cockerill, Noy 151; Cotterel v. Harrington, Brownl. 180; Fountain v. Grymes, Cro. Jac. 252; 1 Bulstr. 36.

Application for Loan.—A clear statement of the rule applicable to annuities is the following: "Communications covering a loan have sometimes infected the case and turned it into usury. But then the communications must be mutual. Application for a loan is not such a case, provided the party applied to refuses a loan, and treats for an annuity. And this more especially where the party applied to is an attorney, and the real seller is ignorant of the whole conversation. I know of no case where even a meditated loan has been bona fide converted into a purchase and afterward held to be usurious. To be sure, it is a very strong and suspicious circumstance, but if the purchase comes out to be clearly a bona fide purchase, it will, notwithstanding, be good. Inequality of price is also a suspicious circumstance, especially if very inadequate. But this of itself will not make any contract usurious, though it may upon circumstances make it unfair and unconscientious, and, as such, relievable in equity. If a power of redemption be given, though only to one side, it is a strong circumstance to show it a loan." De Gray, C. J., in Murray v. Harding, 2 W. Bl. 859; 3 Wils. 390.

2. In re Naish, 7 Bing. 150; 20 E. C. L. 81; 20 Eq. Cas. 81; Tanfield v. Finch, Cro. Eliz. 27 E.

Secured by Insurance.—In the case of Howkins v. Bennet, 7 C. B. N. S. 507; 97 E. C. L. 507, the payment of annual sums exceeding lawful interest upon the amount advanced was secured by an annuity deed upon land, and the principal was provided for by an insurance policy upon the life of one of the grantors, with a covenant for payment of the insurance premiums. It was held that there was some uncertainty and risk as to the principal, because the insurance policy might be avoided, and that therefore the transaction was not usurious.

3. Floyer v. Sherard, Ambli. 19; Lawley v. Hooper, 3 Atk. 278. But a power of redemption is not conclusive of a loan. Murray v. Harding, 2 W. Bl. 859; 3 Wils. 390; Irnham v. Child, 1 Bro. C. C. 93.

4. Post Obits.—Batty v. Lloyd, 1 Vern. 141, is the leading case upon the validity of post obits. There the plaintiff was entitled to a reversionary estate after the death of two persons, both advanced in years, and the defendant loaned her the sum of £350 upon her agreement to pay him therefor £700 upon the death of the life tenants, both of whom actually died within two years after the date of the loan. The plaintiff having brought a bill for relief from the bargain, Lord Keeper North refused to interfere, saying that although, as it happened, the defendant had made a very good bargain, yet it might have been that he would not have received his money under the terms of the agreement for twenty years, and that this risk, regarded as from the date of the loan, fully justified the agreement to repay instances courts of equity have relieved against them as unconscionable bargains.¹

XXVIII. BOTTOMRY — (See also BOTTOMRY, vol. 2, p. 483).—As there can be no usury where the principal sum is bona fide put in hazard, loans made on bottomry bonds, whereby the repayment of the loan is contingent upon the safe arrival of the vessel from a voyage, are not within the statute, and the parties are allowed to stipulate for more than the statutory rate of interest.²

double the amount advanced. To the same effect see Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. 125; 1 Atk. 347; Flight v. Chaplin, 2 B. & Ad. 112; 22 E. C. L. 38; Wharton v. May, 5 Ves. 27; Lushington v. Waller, 1 H. Bl. 94; Lamego v. Gould, 2 Burr. 715.

Equitable Relief.—Though not usurious within the meaning of the statute, courts of equity will relieve against post-obit contracts, where there is great inequality and hardship, and will not allow the creditor to have more than the sum loaned and lawful interest. Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Bro. C. C. 1; Bill v. Price, 1 Vern. 467; Berny v. Pitt, 2 Vern. 14; Nott v. Hill, 1 Vern. 167; Ardglasse v. Muschamp, 1 Vern. 237; Knot v. Johnson, 2 Vern. 27; *Lamplugh v. Contingency Must Be Actual.—In order to bring a maritime loan within the protection of the rule, the condition for the loss of the principal, in case of loss of the vessel, must be actually and in good faith a part of the agreement, and not a mere cover. Wynne v. Crosthwaite, 4 C. & P. 178; 19 E. C. L. 329.

What Is Bottomry.—A loan secured by a bill of sale of a vessel and an assignment of policies of insurance upon the vessel and cargo is not a case of bottomry, and an agreement for more than seven per cent. on the loan, as marine interest, is usurious. Braynard v. Hoppock, 32 N. Y. 571.

In Thorndike v. Stone, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 183, a bond recited that the defendant had borrowed of the plaintiff $18,000, to enable the defendant to dispatch the ship "Israel" to sea, "which sum is to run at bottomry on the hull, appurtenances and freights" of the ship, at and from Boston to and in any ports and places, during the term of three years from the date of the bond, at the interest and premium of twelve per cent. per annum; also, that the defendant should, from time to time, pay the plaintiff one-half the gross earnings of the ship, to be applied on the loan; and that, whether the ship should be lost or not, the plaintiff should be entitled to retain all payments previously made. The condition of the bond was that, if the ship should safely pursue her voyages during the term, dangers of the sea excepted, and if the defendant should make the above-mentioned payments of one-half the gross earnings, and should, at or before the end of the three years, pay the plaintiff any balance of the $18,000 and interest remaining due, after deducting all necessary payments for general average or partial loss that might occur during the voyages; or, in case of total loss of the vessel by marine perils, if the defendant should pay to the plaintiff such salvage as an insurer would be entitled to, and also one-half the gross earnings previously accrued, then the bond was to be void. The defendant at the same time further secured the bond by a mortgage on land, conditioned upon the performance of the bond. In an action of debt on the bond, it was objected that it was a usurious contract, and not a nine thousand bottomry bond, for the reason that the principal loaned was not put in hazard of marine loss, but the court held otherwise. Putnam, J., speaking for the court, said: "It is

XXIX. INSURANCE AS CONDITION OF LOAN.—Where, as a condition of making a loan, the borrower is required to take policies of life insurance from the lender, and pay premiums thereon, in addition to the highest legal rate of interest on the amount loaned, it is generally held that the profit thus derived by the lender is equivalent to additional interest, and therefore usurious.¹

XXX. SALE AS COVER FOR USURY.—A device often resorted to for the purpose of concealing usury, is that of an apparent sale of property, the usury being hidden under the form of purchase-money. The universal rule applicable to such transactions is that no matter how positive and unambiguous the expressed intention of the parties to buy and sell may be, the court will examine all the circumstances of the transaction, lay hold of the usury, if it be found concealed therein, and enforce the statute against it.² In determining whether a transaction in form of a sale was intended as argued that the payment of the money borrowed is secured in such manner as to make it a certainty that the plaintiff would receive his money, with twelve per cent.; that it is secured by a mortgage of real estate as well as by a mortgage of the ship, and an assignment of half the freight and earnings for the term of the loan; and it is further objected, that the loan is upon time and not for a voyage, as it is usually made. But the answer to these objections is, that if the ship should be lost within the time of three years, for which the money was lent, the plaintiff was to lose all the money which should be then due upon the bond. It is the essence of the contract of bottomry and respondentia, that the lender runs the marine risk, to be entitled to the marine interest. The rate of interest, and the manner of securing the payment of what may become due upon such contract, are to be regulated by the parties. Those considerations are not to be regarded by the court, excepting only to ascertain whether they were colorably put forth to evade the statute against usury. We do not perceive anything in the facts which would warrant that conclusion. If the ship had been lost immediately after she sailed, it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff would have lost all his money."

Not Per Se Usurious.—In New York and New Jersey it is held that conditions of this character are not per se usurious, but depend upon the real intention of the parties. Utica Ins. Co. v. Cadwell, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 296; Washington L. Ins. Co. v. Paterson Silk Mfg. Co., 25 N. J. Eq. 160; Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 25 N. J. Eq. 418.

See also cases cited in the following notes.

In the unique language of Bleckley, C. J., in Pope v. Marshall, 78 Ga. 635, the question "whether a given transaction is a purchase of land or a loan of money with title to the land taken as security, depends, not upon the form of words used in contracting, but upon the real intent and understanding of the parties. No disguise of language can avail for covering up usury, or glossing over a usurious contract. The theory that a contract will be usurious or not, according to the kind of paper bag it is put up in, or according to the more or less ingenious phrases made use of in negotiating it, is altogether erroneous. The law intends that a search for usury shall penetrate to the substance."

Presumption of Usury.—In Davis v. Hardacre, 2 Camp. N. P. Cas. 375, Lord Ellenborough said: "When a party is compelled to take goods in discounting a bill of exchange. I think a presumption arises that the a cover for usury, it is deemed a very important and suspicious circumstance that the purchaser had first applied to the seller for transaction is usurious. To rebut this presumption, evidence should be given of the value of the goods by the person who sues on the bill. I must require such evidence to be adduced; and I wish it may be understood that, in all similar cases, this is the rule by which I shall be governed in the future."

Rescission and New Sale.—A vendee of land, after paying three fourths of the purchase price, applied to the vendor for an extension of time on the balance of $710, then past due. As the result of the negotiations the vendor gave him a deed of the land and took back a mortgage payable in four months for $1,010, with interest. In an action to foreclose the mortgage, the mortgagee claimed that the deed was given upon a resale, and that the original contract had been forfeited by reason of the vendor's failure to pay the balance of the purchase price at maturity. It was shown that when the vendor applied for the forbearance, the vendee had answered that he could not "fix it," so as to wait on him at the desired time, without making a new sale at the increased figure. It was held that the equitable title was in the vendee at the time of the pretended resale, and that the mortgage was usurious. Crippen v. Heermance, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 211, reversing Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 133.

An executory contract for the sale of land, assigned by the purchaser, may, upon default in the terms of the sale, be surrendered by the assignee and a contemporaneous agreement entered into for a new sale of the same land to the assignee at larger price and upon a longer credit; and, in the absence of evidence of intent to evade the statute, such new sale will not be held usurious. Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. Smith, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 540.

Where an executory contract for the sale of land is, by agreement of both parties, rescinded on account of the vendee's failure to make the payments, and a new sale made to the same vendee at a higher price and longer time, with interest, proper credit being given for the amount paid by the vendee under the first contract, and there is nothing to indicate an intention to evade the statute, the transaction will not be held usurious. Shirkey v. Hunt, 18 Tex. 883.

Statute of Frauds.—Where a written contract for the sale of land was for a price equal to that previously agreed on by a parol contract, usurious in its terms, it was held not usurious, because the oral contract was void under the Statute of Frauds. Newkirk v. Burson, 28 Ind. 435.

Bona Fide Sales.—The following transaction was held to be a sale, and not a loan: One Mrs. Gilreath bid in a tract of land at a master's sale for $1,045, but did not make the cash payment. She offered to transfer her bid to the defendant at the same price, provided she should be given five and one-half acres of the tract. The defendant, wishing longer time for payment than allowed by the terms of sale, applied to the plaintiff to advance the cash payment. This the latter agreed to do, and to sell the defendant the tract, less the five and one-half acres, for $1,306, on the terms of $400 cash, and the balance deferred. Upon receipt of the cash payment, the master conveyed the tract to Mrs. Gilreath, who conveyed all but the five and one-half acres to the defendant. Thereupon the defendant paid the plaintiff the $400, and gave her a note for $906, in return for which the plaintiff gave a written agreement to convey the land to the defendant on payment of the note. The court took the view that the defendant was not able to buy the land herself, and allowed the plaintiff to buy it, and then sell to her at a price agreed upon between them. Wheeler v. Marchbanks, 32 S. Car. 594.

The defendant, having purchased land covered by two mortgages of $20,000 and $10,000 respectively, and foreclosure being threatened, the defendant got the plaintiff to purchase the $20,000 mortgage, which he obtained for $15,000. The other mortgage was assigned to a third person. The plaintiff agreed to extend the time of payment, and the defendant agreed that the whole amount of $20,000 was due and that there was no defense to it, and he executed a new bond and mortgage to the plaintiff for the full amount. It was held that the transaction was in effect a purchase of the original mortgage, and was free from usury. Sweeney v. Peaslee (N. Y. Sup. Ct.), 17 N. Y. Supp. 225; 62 Hun (N. Y.) 621.

Though usurious interest be calcua loan, and that he was known to the latter to be in a needy financial condition. The cases cited in the note show that proof of these facts is often decisive of the question of usurious intent.¹ Where, on an application for a loan of money, the lender requires lated upon an existing indebtedness, and the amount of principal and interest adopted as the price for a reconveyance of land purchased by the creditor at a sheriff's sale, there is no usury in the transaction, it being a bona fide sale and not intended as a loan. Mills v. Crocker, 9 La. Ann. 334.

A sold B, on credit, certain bank stock at par, which was then worth in the market but eighty per cent., to enable B to raise money thereon at the bank. B pledged it at the bank as security for his note for the amount of the market value of the stock. It was held that there was nothing usurious in the sale. Selby v. Morgan, 3 Leigh (Va.) 577.

It is not usury to sell mortgage securities at a premium, whether such premium be computed at a rate of interest in excess of the legal rate for time past, or as compound interest, or stated at a gross sum. Culver v. Bigelow, 43 Vt. 249.

If it clearly appears that a sale of stock, on credit and at par, worth but ninety per cent. was not intended as a loan, though the purchaser gave his note at legal interest for the price, it will not be held usurious. Willoughby v. Comstock, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 424.

A contract for sale of $6,000 worth of United States eight per cent. bonds, to be delivered at a future day for $6,000 in hand paid, is not usurious. Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. (Va.) 303; 6 Am. Dec. 518.

The owner of stock sold it for the same price he had paid, which was greatly in excess of the market price; but his purchaser afterward sold it for much less, the latter's loss being in excess of the legal rate of interest on a loan of the amount he paid. It was held that the transaction was not necessarily usurious, unless the parties intended it as a mere device to evade the statute. Kelley v. Sprague, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 611.

The fact that before a mortgage loan was made, a person other than the mortgagee had signified his willingness to purchase the debt and mortgage at a discount greater than legal interest, does not affect the validity of such purchase, it not being otherwise shown to be intended as a loan. Dunham v. Cudlipp, 94 N. Y. 129.

Where property is sold absolutely in payment of a debt, the conveyance to the creditor is not vitiated by a subsequent agreement to reconvey to the grantor on payment of a sum larger than the original debt and lawful interest. Barfield v. Jefferson, 78 Ga. 220. To the same effect, see Matlock v. Cobb, 62 Miss. 43. And see Frank v. Davis, 23 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 419.

Prior Application for Loan.—The plaintiff, a college student, applied to a Jew to borrow money. The latter introduced him to some silk merchants who, after ascertaining that the plaintiff had an estate in expectancy, agreed to let him have a quantity of silks at a price which they fixed at £2,224, and he gave them his note payable in one year for that amount. The silks were then delivered to the Jew, who sold them on the plaintiff's account for £799, somewhat less than their actual value. Lord Chancellor Thurlow held that this was a usurious loan under the guise of a sale. Barker v. Vansommer, 1 Bro. C. C. 149.

A firm of merchants, learning that the defendant was in need of £200, sent word to his broker that they could let him have half that sum in money and the other half in goods, which they assured him were of choice quality, and that he would lose nothing by them. When he applied to them, however, they professed to be unable to let him have any money, and persuaded him to take the whole amount in goods, upon receiving which he gave them a bill of exchange for £220. The goods were immediately taken by his broker to an auctioneer, who sold them for £117. In an action on the bill, a verdict that the transaction was usurious was sustained. Lowe v. Waller, 2 Doug. 736.

The owner of certain stock, whose cash market value was ninety-one per cent., being applied to by the agent of A for a loan of money, replied that he had none. The agent then suggested that perhaps A could use the stock, and the owner said that in that case he could accommodate him. As the result of these negotiations, the owner transferred a quantity of the stock to A, and took his note for its par value payable in three years with legal interest. It was held a fair sale. Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. (Va.) 21.

To require the borrower, as a condition of the loan, to purchase notes held by the lender against one known by him to be insolvent, would be usury. But if the lender bona fide supposed that the maker of the notes had requested the borrower to purchase them, and the lender did not know they were uncollectible, this would disapprove his intent to take illegal interest for the loan. Shober v. Hauser, 4 Dev. & B. (N. Car.) 91.

Where a note for $350 was given for a loan of $200 in cash, and a transfer by the lender to the borrower of a note, guaranteed by the lender, for $150 against a third person who was then insolvent, an instruction was sustained to the effect that, though the transfer was coupled with the loan, and though the note finally proved uncollectible, by reason of the insolvency of the maker and indorser, this would not render the loan usurious, if the lender at the time believed the parties to be solvent, and if the transfer was made in good faith without unlawful intent. Thomas v. Murray, 32 N. Y. 605.

A and B desiring to purchase public lands upon which they had made improvements, applied to C to lend them $1,100 for that purpose. He advanced the money, took the title in his own name, under an agreement by which A and B were to pay him $330 per year for four years, and the principal at the end of that time, when he would convey to them. If they should fail to make the payments, the contract would be forfeited, and they would become his tenants at will at an annual rental equal to ten per cent. on $2,400. It was held to be usurious. Ferguson v. Sutphen, 8 Ill. 547.

The defendant being desirous to buy a piece of land costing $1,550, the plaintiff agreed to lend her $1,800 at six per cent., and to retain $75 as a bonus. The defendant bought the land for $1,550, and assigned her contract to the plaintiff, who paid that amount to the owner, received a deed, and then conveyed to the defendant, who gave back a mortgage to the plaintiff for $1,800. In addition to the $1,550 paid for the land, the plaintiff gave the defendant only $162. The consideration named in the deed to the defendant was $1,625. It was held that the entire transaction was usurious and void, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to a lien for the $1,550 purchase-money. Terwilliger v. Beecher, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 605.

A contract for the purchase of cotton on credit, at a price higher than the market value, is usurious, when it grew out of an application to the vendor for a loan, and he knew that the vendee intended to sell the cotton immediately for cash at a lower price, in order to raise money. Collier v. Barr, 64 Ala. 543.

The purchaser of a mule at the agreed price of $102.50 applied to a merchant, who was advancing him means, for money to pay for the mule. The merchant paid the owner the $102.50, and delivered the mule to his debtor. The latter gave him a mortgage, in which there was an item of $130, which the merchant claimed was the agreed price at which he sold the mule to the mortgagor on credit. The latter testified that he made no agreement in relation to price. It was held that it was not a sale, but a usurious loan. Meyer v. Cook, 85 Ala. 417.

The plaintiff, a merchant, had been furnishing the defendant with goods on credit, under an agreement that he was to charge a profit of twenty per cent. on the cost of the goods. The defendant, wishing to buy a mule, applied to the plaintiff to borrow money for that purpose, which the plaintiff declined to lend him, but agreed to buy the mule for him, and charge to his account the usual twenty per cent. profit. In an action to recover the mule under a purchase-money mortgage, it was held that the evidence justified a verdict for the plaintiff. Brakefield v. Halpern (Ark. 1891), 15 S. W. Rep. 190.

The defendant desiring to purchase a lot and make improvements, requested the plaintiff, his employer, to loan him $270 for that purpose at the highest legal rate of interest. The plaintiff refused, saying his money was worth more than that, but offered to advance the money, and take the title in his own name, the defendant to pay him, as rent, the sum of $30 per month for twelve months, at the end of which time he would reconvey to the defendant. Accordingly the defendant as a condition of making the loan, that the borrower shall buy something of him at an exorbitant price, and particularly where the borrower does not need or want the property offered, the transaction becomes thereby marked as a cover for usury.¹ The same principle applies to cases where the lender procures the accepted the $270. and a deed was executed to the plaintiff, though the grantor supposed it ran to the defendant. The defendant made the improvements. It was held a mere cover for usury. Tillar v. Cleveland, 47 Ark. 287.

English Authorities.—The English courts have always been very suspicious of transactions taking the form of a sale of goods on credit to a needy person, and wherever the circumstances indicate a probable device to obtain more than legal interest, the transaction has been treated as a loan. Reynolds v. Clayton, Moore 398; Barker v. Vansommer, 1 Bro. C. C. 149; Lowe v. Waller, Doug. 736; Pratt v. Willey, 1 Esp. N. P. Cas. 40; Davis v. Hardacre, 2 Camp. N. P. Cas. 375; Coombe v. Miles, 2 Camp. N. P. Cas. 553.

In Rich v. Topping, 1 Esp. N. P. Cas. 176, it was held to be the province of the jury to decide whether the difference in the price at which the goods were taken, and the price for which they were sold by the party taking them, was so great as to make it apparent that they were taken only as a cover for usury.

In Chesterfield v. Janssen, 1 Atk. 340, Lord Hardwicke said: "It is lawful, likewise, for a man to sell his goods as dear as he can in a fair way of sale; but if A applies to B to lend money, and offers to allow more than the real interest, and B says, 'No, I will not agree to your proposal on these terms, but I will give you cash or quantity, of goods, and you shall pay me so much at a future time for them beyond the price I now fix,' and then charge an extraordinary profit, this is a shift to get more than the legal interest, and is usurious."

A case difficult to reconcile with the doctrine of other English cases is that of Yeoman v. Barstow, Lutw. 271. The plaintiff declared in assumpsit that he had sold and delivered to the defendant certain pieces of "hammered silver money, the coin of this realm, amounting to the sum of £300 English money," and that the defendant agreed to pay therefor "£300 in new milled English money, together with £4, 10s for every hundred, amounting to £13, 10s of the said new milled money by way of interest," at the end of eight months. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the court granted judgment accordingly, holding that, as the verdict established a sale, they would not presume usury. It was remarked by some of the judges that if a man had a great occasion for guineas, and could make great advantage of them, and for this he gave money for them beyond their value, this was not usury. The soundness of this decision is very questionable. A more palpable attempt to evade the statute would be difficult to conceive of. See criticism in Marsh v. Martindale, 3 Bos. & Pul. 154.

Exorbitant Price.—A sale of property to the borrower in connection with a loan, at a price much greater than its value, of which fact both parties were aware, though nothing was said as to its real value, is usurious. Low v. Mussey, 36 Vt. 183.

A tacit understanding, based on the lender's well-known practice, that the borrower would buy a horse of him at an exorbitant price, renders the loan usurious. Douglass v. McChesney, 2 Rand. (Va.) 109.

A note for $2,800, at four months, was given for a pretended purchase of stock, which it was stipulated should not be delivered until the note was paid. At the same time the seller lent the buyer $2,600 and took the stock as collateral, it being a condition of the loan that the borrower should buy the stock. It was held that the jury were warranted in finding that the note was usurious. Black v. Ryder, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 304.

In Hathway v. Hagan, 59 Vt. 75, one of the items of consideration in the note sued on was $70 as the price of a borrower to sell property to him at an inadequate price, either in connection with an actual loan of money, or in lieu of it, together with an agreement to reconvey for a higher price.¹

The question whether, in view of all the facts, a bona fide sale or a usurious loan was intended, is in most cases to be submitted to the jury.²

sleigh worth about $5. In delivering the opinion of the court, Rowell, J., said: "The defendant did not want the sleigh and had no use for it; but the orator took advantage of his situation, and compelled him to buy it at fifteen times its value in order to get extension on his notes, which were then in the hands of an attorney for collection. These circumstances make that transaction usurious, notwithstanding the subterfuge of a sale resorted to to cover it; for the law is quick to discern the intents of men, and piercing even to the dividing of the joints and marrow of sham and pretense."

1. Sales to Creditor.—A sale of chattels under an agreement that the seller may repurchase them within six months by paying the amount advanced with two and a half per cent. per month for the use thereof, is usurious on its face. Starkweather v. Prince, 1 MacArthur (D. C.) 144.

A sale of land by one known to be in embarrassed circumstances, with an accompanying guaranty that it would increase in value fifty per cent. per annum for two years, at the end of which time the purchaser was to tender back a deed and receive twice the amount he had paid, was held to be a usurious loan. Delano v. Rood, 6 Ill. 690.

A contract to purchase land at a very inadequate price and to reconvey to the vendor, if paid, a price larger than the sum advanced and legal interest, the vendor being at the time in necessitous circumstances, is a usurious loan. Heytle v. Logan, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 529.

Buying a slave at half his value, and at the same time lending the seller a sum of money, with an agreement that if security is given for a sum larger than the price of the slave, the loan and interest, the slave shall be returned and the loan considered as paid, is a usurious transaction. Shanks v. Kennedy, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 65.

A conveyed slaves to B for $2,335, under an agreement that A should have the use of them on hire for one year, at the end of which time B would reconvey them to A, if he should pay B

$2,935; but if he should fail to pay that sum punctually, the agreement to reconvey should be void. The sale was made for the purpose of enabling A to raise money. It was held that it was a mere cover for usury. Clarkson v. Garland, 1 Leigh (Va.) 162.

A debtor on a single bond transferred to his creditor other bonds of solvent and responsible parties with sureties, to an amount nearly double the amount of his own bond, but at an agreed price of only half their actual value; and for the difference between such price and his own bond he gave a new bond with sureties, payable at a future day, with legal interest. At the time of making this settlement, the debtor was about to leave the state, and was being urged by the creditor for payment. It was held that the transaction was a usurious agreement for forbearance. Gibson v. Fristoe, 1 Call (Va.) 62; 1 Am. Dec. 502.

Fair Price.—Though a loan was made conditional upon the borrower selling land to the lender at a specified price, it was not usury if the price paid therefor by the lender, was all the land was then worth. Fellows v. American L. Ins., etc., Co., 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 203.

A judgment debtor sold all her property to a friend for $6,000, he agreeing to pay all liens and expenses against her out of that sum and give her the balance. He also executed an agreement to reconvey to her for $7,000 in ten annual installments, with interest, the $1,000 being designated as a fee for his services. It was held that there was no usury in the arrangement, which was in effect a contract to resell. Myers v. Roller, 85 Va. 621.

2. Chase v. New York Mortg. Loan Co. (Minn. 1892), 51 N. W. Rep. 816; Tyson v. Rickard, 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 109; 5 Am. Dec. 424; Monroe v. Foster, 49 Ga. 514.

Question for Jury.—Whether a transaction which was in form a sale was resorted to by the parties as a cover for a usurious loan, is a question to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances surrounding the transaction, and not from the secret

XXXI. LOAN OF CHATTELS; PAYMENT IN KIND.—Usury cannot be predicated of a loan of chattels, stocks, or choses in action, to be returned in kind, unless the appearance of a loan is resorted to as a cover for an actual usurious transaction.¹ The same intention of one of the parties not communicated to the other. Ayrault v. Chamberlain, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 229.

Burden of Proof.—It is the settled rule in New York that the burden of proving that a sale of property in connection with a loan was a usurious transaction is upon the party who sets up that defense. Stuart v. Mechanics, etc., Bank, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 508; Thomas v. Murray, 32 N. Y. 605; Frank v. Davis, 23 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 419.

Evidence of Intent.—The exchange of a state bond of $1,000 for a note of the same amount at three months, indorsed by a third party, the payee knowing that the maker of the note intended to sell the bond in open market immediately at ninety-three per cent. of its par value, is not usurious, in the absence of proof of intent to disguise a loan. England v. Moore, 4 Houst. (Del.) 289.

The facts that a sale was made on credit at a much higher price than the seller had offered to take in cash, and that he was in the habit of lending money at usurious interest, do not prove that the sale was a cover for usury. There must be some other evidence that a loan was intended. West v. Belches, 5 Munf. (Va.) 187.

1. Dry Dock Bank v. American L. Ins., etc., Co., 3 N. Y. 344; Hall v. Haggart, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 280; Cumming v. Williams, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 680; Perrine v. Hotchkiss, 2 Lans. (N. Y.) 416; Smith v. Price, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 293.

United States Bonds.—The following contract was held to be not usurious: "Received, Nashville, August 9th, 1871, of Mrs. Maria Lou Lyle, one United States bond for one thousand dollars, No. 165,810, also one thousand U. S. bond, No. 879,748, making together two thousand dollars, the interest arising on said bonds, which are due January, 1872, belonging to said Mrs. Maria Lou Lyle, and any interest thereafter; also, if said G. Rice & Co. and Mrs. Lyle agree that G. Rice & Co. shall keep said bonds after January 1st, 1872, the interest every six months is thirty dollars in gold on each of said bonds, which we will pay to Mrs. Lyle. G. RICE & Co.

"N. B.—We also agree to pay six per cent. interest on the above-named bonds, outside of the interest accruing on them. G. RICE & Co." The court, by Turney, C. J., said: "The contract was merely one of renting or hiring, and was legitimate, as would have been the hiring of a horse, or the renting of a house and lot, with the agreement that the party might pledge or sell, but at the same time undertaking, with security, the return of the property in kind to the original owner, or account for its value." Marshall v. Rice, 85 Tenn. 502.

Use of Cattle.—In Bull v. Rice, 5 N. Y. 315, the following agreement was held free from usury, no intention appearing to evade the statute: "Whereas John Bull . . . has leased unto Wilder Rice . . . eleven cows for the term of two or four years, at the option of the said Rice, for $50.75 per year, to be paid on the first day of May in each year following this date; and I, the said Rice, hereby agree to deliver said cows to said John M. Bull, with calf, or with calves by their sides, on the first of May, 1836, or 8, as I shall elect, worth $203, or that amount in cash, as I, the said Rice, shall choose. And the said John M. Bull hereby authorizes said Rice to exchange said cows, if he, the said Rice, shall deem it profitable for him, the said John M. Bull. The said John M. Bull to sustain all losses that shall appear to be providential, such as said cows being killed by lightning, murrain, etc."

It is not usury, upon the letting of a cow and calf, to stipulate for the return of the cow at the end of four years with another cow three years old. Cummings v. Williams, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 679. Nor to stipulate for 30 additional shares of bank stock as compensation for a loan of 142 shares for a year. Stephoe v. Harvey, 7 Leigh (Va.) 501.

A contract for the letting of sheep, that the borrower should return the same number and quality of sheep on a year's notice, and in the meantime pay, annually, fifty cents per head for their use is not usurious, though such compensation exceeds legal interest on the value of the sheep. Hall v. Haggart, 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 280.

The sale of a number of cows, to be rule applies to agreements made between the parties to pay a debt in commodities of fluctuating value.¹

paid for at the end of four years by twice the number of the same quality, is not usurious. Spencer v. Tilden, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 144.

A contract by the borrower of corn to return therefor at the end of the season a greater amount of corn, is not usurious. Easterlin v. Rylander, 59 Ga. 292; Morrison v. McKinnon, 12 Fla. 552.

A sale of sheep for a specified sum of money and "two pounds of wool per year for each sheep so sold and delivered, for two years," is not necessarily usurious. First Nat. Bank v. Owen, 23 Iowa 185.

Upon a sale of sheep on credit, at the then market price, an agreement by the buyer to deliver to the seller a certain quantity of wool per head, annually, during the period of credit, is not usurious, though the value of the wool is much greater than the highest legal rate of interest on the price. Gilmore v. Ferguson, 28 Iowa 220.

Exchange of Securities.—It has been held that an exchange of certain securities for others of a like nominal amount, but of much greater actual value, made in good faith and not as a cover for a loan, was not usurious, even though the assignee of the bonds and mortgages was required to guarantee their payment. Western Reserve Bank v. Potter, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 432; Bank of U. S. v. Waggener, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 378. See also Willoughby v. Comstock, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 424; Talmdge v. Pell, 7 N. Y. 328; Rockwell v. Charles, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 499.

A loan or delivery of stocks to be replaced by a like number of shares at a future day, is not usurious, for the reason that it is uncertain whether the lender will gain or lose by the transaction. The stocks may be lower at the later day. But the transaction must be bona fide. Tate v. Wellings, 3 Tenn. 531; Chesterfield v. Janssen, 1 Atk. 340.

Foreign Exchange.—In Leavitt v. DeLauny, 4 N. Y. 363, where the question was whether foreign bills of exchange loaned by the drawees to a banking company, to be paid by a like amount in similar bills with seven per cent. interest and a commission of one and one fourth per cent. added, constituted a usurious loan, Harris J., speaking for the court of appeals, said: "I agree with the learned assistant vice chancellor by whom this cause was first heard, that these transactions were not sales of exchange, but were loans. There was no price fixed upon the transfer, but the bills were delivered to the banking company upon a contract to return the same amount, in kind, at a stipulated time. Can usury be predicated upon such a loan? I think not. It was well said by the counsel for the plaintiff, upon the argument, that 'the Statute of Usury applies only to a loan of money, or to a transfer of something else as money, for the purpose and as the means of obtaining money, on time.' A loan, therefore, to be usurious, must be in fact, if not in form, a loan of money. But here, unless the transactions were made to assume the shape they bear, merely to disguise their true character, there was no loan of money, either directly or indirectly. The defendants loaned to the banking company their bills, payable in Paris; an article of commerce, having no standard price or value, but, like other commodities, subject to the vicissitudes and fluctuations of trade. They were to receive in return, not a specified amount in money, or money's worth, but bills to the same amount, payable at the same place. Whether they would receive more or less than the value of their bills, with interest, would necessarily depend upon the comparative value of exchange, at the time of the loan, and when it should be repaid. It is very likely that, in the whole series of the transactions between the parties, the advantage was in favor of the defendants; but that no one could foresee this result, or that any one of the transactions would insure to the defendants more than the market value of their exchange, with legal interest, is entirely certain. The object of the banking company in making the loan was undoubtedly to raise money. Nor have I any doubt that the defendants knew this. If, therefore, they had stipulated for the repayment of the value of the bills loaned, with interest, in money, I am inclined to think the transactions would have been usurious. But this essential element of usury seems to be wanting."

XXXII. MUNICIPAL SECURITIES.—It has been held usury for a city to issue its warrants at a discount of twenty-five per cent. in payment of a judgment against it;¹ also for a city to sell its bonds at auction for confederate money worth but ten cents on the dollar, though the bonds brought more than twice their face value.² Very recently, however, the doctrine has been judicially advanced that municipal securities may be sold in the first instance for whatever they will bring in the market.³

XXXIII. CORPORATIONS.—Unless specially protected by statute, corporations are subject to all the provisions of usury laws, the same as private persons.⁴ They may be indicted and punished for

So of an agreement to give, in payment of a loan of money, a certain number of shares of stock at a future day, or their then market price in money. Pike v. Ledwell, 5 Esp. N. P. 164; Maddock v. Rumball, 8 East 304.

Sale of Bonds at Discount.—In the case of Memphis v. Bethel (Tenn. 1875), 17 S. W. Rep. 191, it was held, that in view of the peculiar character of municipal bonds, it was not usury for the city of Memphis to sell its bonds having six per cent. interest, at a discount greater than the lawful rate. In delivering the opinion of the court, Nicholson, C. J., said: "It is well settled that if a person make his note for the purpose of raising money, and sell it at a discount greater than six per cent., the transaction is usurious, and neither the purchaser of the notes, nor his assignee with notice, can recover more than the amount paid, with legal interest. But does this rule apply to the city bonds issued by authority of law, having thirty years to run, bearing interest at six per cent., payable to bearer, and authorized to be issued by the city for the purpose of funding its indebtedness? It is fully established by a great preponderance of authorities that there is a marked difference between individual securities and the bonds of municipal corporations in their origin, character, and purposes. The bonds of municipal corporations are now recognized as negotiable in as full and complete a manner as bank-bills or the national currency of the country; and now they stand not only equal before the law to the negotiable paper pertaining to the commercial business of the country, and to our circulating medium, but they are also, for their greater advantage and for the purpose of causing them to be accepted as money, the most desirable investments for capital in the monetary centers of the world, regarded as chattels, in so far as that character shall tend to relieve them from defenses and burdens incident to choses in action merely, and give to them a merchantable and vendible quality. Griffith v. Burden, 35 Iowa 143. Further, 'this character of chattels, which by the modern rule is attached to these securities, must also, upon principle, exempt them from the defense of usury; for, if they are regarded as chattels, then, since usury cannot be predicated upon a sale of chattels merely, neither can it be predicated upon a sale of bonds having the recognized character of chattels.' . . . Assuming that these authorities establish the entire negotiability of the city bonds, and the right of the city officers to sell them in the market as chattels, it is clear that under the authority to sell them at their market value, although that might be a greater discount than legal interest, the transaction would be neither usurious nor illegal, and therefore the city can neither raise a question of usury nor of scaling. The demurrer to this return was therefore properly sustained."

Unexecuted Agreement.—A board of education gave bonds at the highest legal rate of interest, but agreed to pay an additional sum for the loan. This agreement, however, was never executed. It was held that a recovery could be had on the bonds. Ohio v. Board of Education, 35 Ohio St. 519.

taking usury.¹ And corporate charters will not be construed to alter the usury laws in favor of the corporation, if a contrary construction is equally reasonable.² A statute authorizing railroad corporations to sell their own bonds at a discount will not be construed to embrace foreign corporations.³ Statutes preventing corporations from pleading usury are constitutional, and are held to apply to actions pending at the time of their enactment.⁴

By statute in New York, it is provided that, "No corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action."⁵ Similar statutes have been enacted in Illinois,⁶ Virginia,⁷ West Virginia,⁸ and Wisconsin.⁹ This prohibition prevents the corporation from bringing an action to cancel securities given by it, on the ground of usury.¹⁰ It has been held that the New York statute applies to a foreign corporation maker of a usurious note executed and payable in New York, and sued on in another state.¹¹ The prohibition is held to extend to the collateral contracts of individuals as indorsers, grantors, or sureties for corporations.¹² The statutory prohibition, however, applies only to contracts made by

But a contrary decision was reached by the supreme court of North Carolina, in Com'rs of Craven v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 77 N. Car. 289, in which case Rodman, J., said: "It is said, however, for the defendants that these bonds were delivered in New York, and are made payable there, and that consequently they are governed by the law of New York in respect to the rate of interest which they may legally be made to bear, and we are referred to a statute of New York by which corporations are forbidden to plead usury as a defense. It will be admitted that the statutes of the state can have no extra-territorial operation. The act cited cannot and does not profess to control corporations other than those created by the law of New York; or if it be regarded as an act regulating the practice of the courts of New York, it might perhaps apply to corporations created by a foreign state when sued in the courts of that state. It cannot govern a corporation of this state sued in this state."

12. Stewart v. Bramhall, 74 N. Y. 85; Rosa v. Butterfield, 33 N. Y. 669; Smith v. Alvord, 63 Barb. (N. Y.) 415. Lane v. Watson, 51 N. J. L. 186, follows the New York ruling as to the indorsers of a corporation's note.

It was held, however, at one time in New York, that accommodation the corporation; hence, where it has succeeded to the rights of a party, who might have set up usury, the corporation may also set it up. Thus, where a corporation acquired the rights of a pledgor, it was held that the corporation could recover the property pledged on the ground of usury in the debt.¹

Under the general principles of agency, knowledge by the president of a banking corporation of the usurious character of a note discounted by the bank, imputes knowledge on the part of the bank.²

XXXV. NATIONAL BANKS.—(See also NATIONAL BANKS, vol. 16, p 143). The peculiar position occupied by national banks, in respect to usury, under the provisions of the Acts of Congress, has been fully discussed elsewhere,⁴ and it is only necessary to refer the reader to that article.

An important decision has very recently been rendered by the supreme court of the State of South Dakota, involving the application to national banks of a state law making usury a criminal offense. This is apparently the first instance where such laws have been held to apply.⁵

Biering* (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 621; Abbott v. International Bldg., etc., Assoc. (Tex. Civ. App. 1894), 23 S. W. Rep. 629.

A provision of a mortgage to a building and loan association for the payment of interest on premiums which are deducted from the amount paid the mortgagor for the mortgage at the time it is given, is usurious. Goodman v. Durant Bldg., etc., Assoc. (Miss. 1894), 14 So. Rep. 146.

An agreement that the premium payable by a borrowing member of a building and loan association, organized under the New Jersey statute providing that such associations may agree with their members for a premium upon their loan, shall be deducted from the sum loaned and the balance only be paid to him in cash, and to pay interest on the whole sum loaned, is valid and not usurious. Bowen v. Lincoln Bldg., etc., Assoc. (N. J. 1894), 28 Atl. Rep. 67. But in Texas, a building association will not be allowed to secure a price greater than that allowed by law for the use of the money, under the guise of a premium for the privilege of borrowing. *International Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. XXXVI. JUDGMENTS TAINTED WITH USURY—1. In General.—When a usurious debt has been sued on without collusion and put into judgment in an action wherein the debtor might have interposed the defense of usury, but neglected to do so, it is generally held that he cannot afterwards attack the judgment on that ground. He has had his day in court, and it was his own fault that he allowed the usury to go unchallenged.¹ Nor will a court of equity of the state to punish a national bank for a violation of its police laws cannot be predicated upon it. For any public offense which it can commit, a corporation may be indicted the same as a natural person. A national bank, or any other corporation, which Congress, in the exercise of its legal powers, may authorize to be organized and operated, must be allowed to pursue the business and purpose of its organization, and exercise all the powers necessary or incident to such business without any restraint by or accountability to state laws; but, in the absence of other expression by Congress, this is the extent of its exemption from subjection to state legislation. The state law makes the taking of illegal interest a misdemeanor, and, in case of a corporation, punishes the same by fine. To require a national bank to so pay money to the state is not necessarily such an interference with the proper discharge of its duties to the government as will make such requirement invalid. One of the powers included in the authorized business of a national bank is to receive interest on loans, which power is thus defined in the law: 'Every association may take, receive, reserve, and charge, on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more,' etc. A state law, making it a misdemeanor for the bank to do an act which the creative law has expressly refused to authorize or allow it to do, cannot 'interfere with or impair its efficiency in performing its functions,' or, if enforced against it, 'incapacitate it from discharging its duties.' With a few exceptions, having no pertinency to this case, the police power in the United States belongs to and resides in the states. The police power of the state yields to the act of Congress, for it is 'the supreme law of the land;' but it yields only when and to the extent that an enforcement of the police law would interfere with the act of Congress, or with the free exercise of rights conferred, or the discharge of duties enjoined, by it. State sovereignty remains unabridged for the punishment of all crimes committed within the limits of a state, except so far as they have been brought within the sphere of federal jurisdiction by the penal laws of the United States. The provisions of section 30 of the act referred to, declaring what results should follow the taking by a national bank of a greater interest than that allowed by law, is only a declaration of the legal effect of taking such unlawful interest upon the rights of the parties under the contract. It is a civil punishment, as distinguished from a criminal punishment, and penal only in the sense that exemplary damages are penal. The provisions of said section 30, imposing consequences purely civil, were not intended to take the place or prevent the operation of the police laws of the state upon the act of taking illegal interest. It would be a strained and unwarranted deduction to conclude that, when Congress imposed the usual civil penalties for taking unlawful interest common to nearly all state usury laws, it meant to have such penalties cover other or different ground, or have other or different effect, from the same penalties when found in corresponding provisions of state laws."

Unconscionable Defense.—Usury is regarded as an unconscionable defense, and a judgment will not be opened for the purpose of enabling the debtor to interpose it. Marsh v. Lasher, 13 N. J. Eq. 253; Hazelrigg v. Wainwright, 17 Ind. 215; Morris v. Slatery, 6 Abb.

interfere to relieve him from the judgment under such circumstances, in the absence of a good excuse for failing to plead the usury.¹ And where the circumstances are such as to entitle the judgment debtor to equitable relief, it is never granted except upon the condition of his paying the amount justly due, with legal interest.² But it seems that a bill in equity will lie to recover back usury paid under a judgment at law.³ Of course, where the (Ky.) 92; Greenfield v. Frierson, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 633.

Neglect to Defend at Law.—It is no ground for relieving against a judgment at law on a usurious contract, that the debtor could not be present at the term at which the judgment was rendered, where he did not employ counsel nor take any steps to defend. McCollum v. Prewitt, 37 Ala. 573; 1 Ala. Sel. Cas. 498.

New York Statute.—By New York Act of May 15th, 1837, it was enacted that no bill should be maintained for relief on the ground of usury after a judgment by action at law, even by default, unless such bill could have been maintained before the judgment. See Topping v. Van Pelt, 1 Hoffm. Ch. (N. Y.) 545; Skinner v. Christmas, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 268.

In Tennessee, though a debtor has failed to make the defense of usury in an action at law, yet equity will entertain a bill for relief where the question of usury has become complicated by a series of transactions and renewal notes. Buchanan v. Nolin, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 63; Frierson v. Moody, 3 Humph. (Tenn.) 561. And by Tennessee Act of 1846, ch. 167, courts of equity were given jurisdiction of all questions of usury, without regard to previous proceedings at law. See Gilliam v. Moore, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 468.

Equitable Terms.—In Scott v. Nesbitt, 2 Bro. C. C. 641; 2 Cox 183, Lord Thurlow observed "that if it be necessary for you to come into this court to dispute a judgment at law, you must do it upon the equitable terms of paying the principal money really due, with lawful interest. I have no idea of displacing a judgment upon any other terms;" and he directed that the judgment in that case should stand as security for the money actually paid, with legal interest.

In Moss v. Rowland, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 321, it was held, that if the judgment creditor afterward became a non-resident, equity had jurisdiction to set off the usury against the judgment.

Recovery Back.—On the other hand, some courts hold that after the judgment has been paid, it is too late for the debtor to sue to recover back the usury. Schroeppel v. Corning, 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 576; Smith v. Stoddard, 10 Mich. 148; 81 Am. Dec. 778. See also Calvin v. Blymyer, 121 Pa. St. 582; Carlisle v. Bindley, 91 Pa. St. 220.

Failure to Appeal.—In an action to foreclose a mortgage, usurious interest paid on the debt was deducted by the court at the instance of another defense of usury was interposed in the action and failed, it cannot afterwards be raised in equity against the judgment.¹

2. Judgments by Confession.—When it is made to appear that a judgment by confession upon a usurious debt was entered collusively, or in pursuance of the usurious agreement, as a device to conceal the taint, it ought not in principle to stand upon any better footing than other usurious securities; but the courts are not entirely agreed either as to the proper method of proceeding for relief, or as to their right to interfere at all.²

creditor and against the objection of the mortgagor, who, however, took no appeal. It was held that he could not afterward sue to recover back the usury. McDonald v. Smith, 53 Vt. 33.

1. Lamme v. Saunders, 1 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 263.

2. The following cases hold that judgments by confession cannot be attacked for usury in the debt: Bell v. Fergus (Ark. 1892), 18 S. W. Rep. 931; Fowler v. Henry, 2 Bailey (S. Car.) 54; Goff v. Dabbs, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 300; Hightower v. Beall, 66 Ga. 102; Twogood v. Pence, 22 Iowa 543; Miller v. Clark, 37 Iowa 325.

Evidence of Collusion.—In Kendig v. Marble, 58 Iowa 529, it was held that where a mortgage was given to secure a judgment confessed for a usurious debt, an action to foreclose could not be defeated on the ground of such usury, where it did not appear that the judgment was entered collusively.

But in the later case of Stoddard v. Lloyd, 79 Iowa 11, Robinson, J., said: "If, as is claimed by appellants, the judgments were confessed merely as a means of evading the law against usury, appellants would be entitled to defend on the ground of usury in the notes on which the judgments were rendered." Citing Kendig v. Marble, 55 Iowa 386; Ohm v. Dickerman, 50 Iowa 671; Kendig v. Linn, 47 Iowa 62; Mullen v. Russell, 46 Iowa 386. The result of the Iowa cases is that if the debtor can show that his confession of judgment was collusive, he is entitled to relief; but that the burden of proving this is on him, and if he fails, the judgment must stand.

At common law, judgments by confession could not be avoided for usury, by a plea scire facias. Middleton v. Hill, Cro. Eliz. 588; Rowe v. Bellasup, 1 Sid. 182; Bush v. Gower, Strange, 1043; Cooke v. Jones, Cowp. 727; Matthews v. Lewis, 1 Anstr. 7. But it was suggested by Lord Hardwicke in Bush v. Gower, Strange 1043, that the usury "might be got at by a motion to vacate the judgment." And in several cases the courts of common pleas and King's Bench entertained motions to set aside judgments entered upon warrants of attorney, and awarded feigned issues to try the question of usury. Duke of Bolton v. Williams, 2 Ves. 156; Machin v. Delavel, Barnes' Notes 52, 277; Edmondson v. Popkin, 1 B. & P. 270; Hindle v. O'Brien, 1 Taunt. 413. The nature of the relief granted in these cases in the common-law courts was equitable, by requiring the defendant to pay the sum actually advanced, with legal interest.

In the case of Machin v. Delavel in the common pleas, Barnes' Notes 52, 277, the court went further and set aside the judgment, and directed the warrant of attorney and the bond on which the judgment was entered, to be delivered up, and made the plaintiff pay the costs.

In New York, the old supreme court formerly followed the English practice, by awarding feigned issues to try the question of usury against a judgment by confession. Wardell v. Eden, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 258; Gilbert v. Eden, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 280; Slate v. Schuyler, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 139.

In Hewett v. Fitch, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 250, the judgment was set aside without the formality of a feigned issue the usury being undisputed. The practice, however, seems to have been abandoned early in the present century, the defendant being left to seek relief in a court of equity. See the observations of Chancellor Kent, in Fanning v. Dunham, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 122; 9 Am. Dec. 283.

But where a judgment has been entered on a usurious note, and a bond given in satisfaction, under a previous agreement made to evade the usury law, such judgment is no bar to the defense of usury in an action on the bond. Moses v. McDivitt, 88 N. Y. 62.

3. As to Other Creditors.—If a judgment estops the debtor from attacking it for usury in the debt, it would seem that another creditor, in the absence of collusion, can have no better right, and it has been so held.¹

XXXVII. EQUITABLE RELIEF—1. Jurisdiction.—The ground of equitable jurisdiction to relieve the debtor from a usurious contract is, that for some reason he cannot have a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law.²

Pennsylvania.—Upon a loan of $500, a judgment note for $680 was given, upon which the creditor subsequently entered judgment. Upon an application to open the judgment on the ground of usury, the court refused to do so, the creditor having disclaimed any interest in the judgment other than as collateral security for the loan of $500 and legal interest. Real Estate Inv. Co. v. Roap, 132 Pa. St. 496; 25 W. N. C. (Pa.) 380.

The revival of a judgment after the payment of usurious interest thereon, without deducting such payments, prevents the debtor from having them deducted from the proceeds of execution. He should apply to open the revived judgment. Rutherford v. Boyer, 84 Pa. St. 347.

In Shafer's Appeal, 99 Pa. St. 246, it was held that payments of usurious interest, made after entry of judgment on a judgment note, should be treated as payments on the judgment debt to the extent of the excessive interest, and that it was not necessary to have the judgment opened in order to afford the debtor relief. See also Anderson's Appeal (Pa. 1885), 1 Atl. Rep. 329.

Other States.—In other states, judgments by confession in pursuance of usurious agreements are relieved against in equity. Fisher v. Carroll, 6 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 485; West v. Beanes, 3 Har. & J. (Md.) 568; Lee v. Peckham, 17 Wis. 383.

1. Pickett v. Pickett, 2 Hill Eq. (S. Car.) 470.

But see Brooke v. Morris, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 528, which holds that a judgment of foreclosure of a usurious mortgage does not prevent other judgment creditors, before final distribution of the proceeds of sale, from attacking the mortgage on the ground of usury.

Judgment as Collateral Security.—In Wyeth v. Braniff, 84 N. Y. 627, reversing 14 Hun (N. Y.) 537, an assignment of a foreclosure judgment taken as collateral security for a usurious loan was held void, together with all proceedings under it.

Remedy at Law.—Equity will not relieve a party from a usurious agreement or security to which he has a good defense at law, unless the instrument is a cloud on title, or some other necessity for equitable interference is established. Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373.

In New York, the right of a transferee of property, pledged to secure a usurious note, to bring an action to have the note canceled and the property surrendered, is expressly conferred by Code Civ. Proc., § 1911, and it is, therefore, error to dismiss such an action on the ground of an adequate remedy at law. Dickson v. Valentine, 6 N. Y. Supp. 540.

Cancellation.—Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to cancel notes given upon a usurious agreement for forbearance of a judgment, and to apply payments made on the notes in satisfaction of the judgment. Coughman v. Drafts, 1 Rich. Eq. (S. Car.) 414.

Subrogation.—The defendant gave a deed, absolute on its face, to secure a loan; subsequently he borrowed money at usurious rates from the plaintiff, who, at the defendants' request, paid off the first loan and took a deed from the creditor as security. The latter deed being void on account of the usury, it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the first creditor, because equity will not lend its assistance to one who is compelled to prove an illegal contract as the basis of his claim. Nichols v. Tribble (Ark. 1890), 13 S. W. Rep. 796.

Concurrent Jurisdiction.—A complainant need not give any reason for Except where usury renders the contract void, an injunction will not be granted to restrain a sale under a trust deed, on the ground that usurious interest has been reserved or included in the note secured. The trustee has still the right, and it is his duty, to exercise the power of sale, and apply the proceeds to the payment of the amount legally due. But if he should attempt to apply any portion of the proceeds in payment of the usury, the court would interfere.¹

Where the statute declares all usurious contracts void, the exercise of the power of sale in a usurious mortgage will be restrained, notwithstanding the debtor might have some remedy at law.²

2. Oppressive Contracts.—Even in the absence of any statute of usury, courts of equity will, under circumstances of oppression, undue influence, or unconscionable advantage, set aside or otherwise afford relief from a contract for the payment of exorbitant interest, and allow the creditor only a fair and moderate compensation for the use of his money; this being done upon the theory that the contract is tainted with fraud.³

not defending at law. He has his election; but he cannot avail himself of both the legal and equitable remedies. Pearce v. Hedrick, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 109; Morrison v. Miller, 46 Iowa 84.

Relief Pending Action at Law.—Pending an action at law upon a note on which usurious interest has been paid, a bill will lie to have the amount so paid allowed as a credit on the principal debt. Day v. Cummings, 19 Vt. 496.

Though the defense of usury might be interposed in a pending action at law, a bill will lie to deliver up the securities. Peters v. Mortimer, 4 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 279.

Enjoining Transfer of Notes.—The maker of usurious notes, which are about to be transferred before maturity to innocent purchasers without notice, is entitled to have such transfer enjoined, where the law prevents setting up usury against such innocent purchasers. Wilhelmson v. Bentley, 25 Neb. 473.

1. Tooke v. Newman, 75 Ill. 215; Jones on Mortgages (4th ed.), § 1808.

Enjoining Sale.—On a bill filed to enjoin a sale under a usurious deed of trust, on the ground that the complainant had no opportunity to plead the usury at law, he alleged that he had proof of the fact, but did not pray for discovery. It was held that he ought not to be relieved upon condition of paying the principal, but that he was entitled to an injunction to restrain the trustee from selling until the cestui que trust could by some proper proceeding establish the validity of the contract. Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. (Va.) 407; 5 Am. Dec. 481. This decision was followed with approval in McPherrin v. King, 1 Rand. (Va.) 172, 182, but was afterward criticised or restricted in Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. (Va.) 415; Thornton v. Gordon, 2 Rob. (Va.) 719, and Brockenbrough v. Spindle, 17 Gratt. (Va.) 25, and was finally overruled. See Bank of Washington v. Arthur, 3 Gratt. (Va.) 173; Bell v. Calhoun, 8 Gratt. (Va.) 22. But in the recent case (1875) of Belton v. Apperson, 26 Gratt. (Va.) 218, it is said that, notwithstanding the disapproval of Marks v. Morris, 2 Munf. (Va.) 98, it has "been adopted by statutory enactment and is now the law of the state, not to be questioned by this or any other court."

3. Debt and Interest Must Be Tendered.—Cases of usury furnish perhaps the most frequent application of the maxim that "he who seeks equity must do equity." Whenever the debtor asks the aid of a court of equity to give him affirmative relief from a contract on the ground of usury, he is required, as a condition of obtaining it, to pay the sum actually due, together with legal interest.¹

A court of equity will not enforce a contract to pay interest at the rate of two and a half per cent. per month, and to compound it, though such a contract be valid by the lex loci contractus. It is unconscionable and deceptive. Sime v. Norris, 8 Phila. (Pa.) 84.

Relief Refused.—An agreement under which one furnishes the capital to carry on a business, takes a chattel mortgage on the property to secure payment of the money advanced, and is to receive two-fifths of the profits, is not usurious, nor is it so hard a contract that a court of equity will refuse to enforce it. Lilliendahl v. Stegmair, 45 N. J. Eq. 648. Nor will equity relieve a debtor from a stipulation in his note that if not paid at maturity it shall draw interest at the rate of thirty per cent. per annum, as liquidated damages, even though by neglecting to read the note he was ignorant of this provision. Downey v. Beach, 78 Ill. 53. But see Bidwell v. Whitney, 4 Minn. 76.

Where the borrower procures a loan for the purpose of making a profitable speculation, and not on account of financial pressure, it is not a case of taking advantage of his necessities, and the court will not interfere to relieve him; though the lender made very advantageous terms, including in the security a pre-existing debt. Dowdall v. Lenox, 2 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 267.

In Fitzroy v. Gwillim, 1 T. R. 153, in trover for goods which had been pledged for money advanced on a usurious contract, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover without showing a previous tender of the amount actually due, although the statute made all usurious contracts void. This was a recognition by a court of law of the principle adopted in equity.

Where the borrower sues to have a contract annulled on the ground of usury, he cannot insist upon the benefit of an extension of credit, for which the usurious interest was given. Raspberry v. Jones, 7 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 146.

Accounting Without Tender.—If a mortgagor seeking equitable relief on the ground of usury, does not offer in his bill to pay what is justly due with legal interest, the court will refuse to order an account taken, even though the defendant's answer declares his

The fact that the statute forfeits all interest for usury does not affect this equitable rule;¹ nor does the fact that the statute declares all contracts and securities void for usury.² But it willingness to accept the sum borrowed with legal interest. Eslava v. Elmore, 50 Ala. 587.

Opposing Claimants.—The rule that a party seeking equitable relief must be willing to allow the debt and legal interest, applies to a case where two creditors, the usurer and another, are each claiming priority over a fund, the second creditor being the complainant and the usurer the defendant. Spain v. Hamilton, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 604.

Sureties.—Where sureties on a usurious bond are sued thereon in equity, they are entitled to file a cross bill setting up the usury and praying for relief, without tendering the amount justly due. Bank of Wooster v. Stevens, 6 Ohio St. 262.

Waiver of Condition.—Where a bill to cancel as usurious, certain notes secured by mortgage, had been granted, the court refused to entertain a subsequent application by the mortgagee to have the decree so modified as to require the debtor, as a condition of relief, to pay the amount actually due; the refusal being put on the ground that no such condition of relief had been asked for in the original action. Wilhelmson v. Bentley, 27 Neb. 658.

Pleading.—The complainant must aver, if such is the fact, that he has already paid the debt and legal interest; and that if anything remains of these unpaid, he is ready and willing and now offers to pay whatever remains unpaid. Pencock v. Terry, 9 Ga. 137.

An averment that the complainant "hereby offers to pay the real advance and lawful interest thereon," is sufficient. Miller v. Bates, 35 Ala. 580.

New York Statute.—Where a usurious note was given prior to the enactment of the New York statute allowing relief without a tender of the debt, but was renewed with additional usury, subsequent to that act, it was held that the maker was entitled to relief without making a tender. Folsom v. Blake, 3 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 442.

1. Cushman v. Sutphen, 42 Ill. 256; Carver v. Brady, 104 N. Car. 219.

In Mississippi, however, it is held that as the statute forfeits all the interest, the complainant need not offer to pay any. Parchman v. McKinney, 12

Smed. & M. (Miss.) 631; Long v. McGregor, 65 Miss. 70; Norcum v. Lum, 33 Miss. 299. See also Chapman v. State, 5 Oregon 432.

Minnesota Rule.—The extent to which the equitable requirement that he who seeks relief against usury must offer to do equity by paying the actual debt with legal interest, may be modified by statutory construction, is well illustrated by recent decisions of the supreme court of Minnesota. The statute of that state declares that all usurious notes, conveyances, contracts, and securities shall be void, except as to bona fide purchasers of negotiable paper before maturity. Also that if the debtor be compelled to pay a usurious note in the hands of an innocent purchaser, he may recover the amount so paid from the original holder. In the case of Scott v. Austin, 36 Minn. 460, the facts were that Scott had given a note, fair on its face, but in fact usurious, to one Hayes, secured by mortgage upon real property. Before maturity, Scott sold the note and mortgage for value to the defendant, Austin, who had no knowledge of the usury. Default having been made, Austin foreclosed and bought in the property at the sheriff's sale. Prior to the foreclosure, however, the existence of the usury was brought to his knowledge. Thereafter Scott brought an action to avoid the mortgage sale and for the surrender and cancellation of the note and mortgage. He made no offer to pay any part of the debt or legal interest, and for this reason the trial court held that he was not entitled to any equitable relief. On appeal the supreme court rendered a decision affirming the judgment below, holding that the statute had not changed the equitable rule. Judges Mitchell and Berry dissented. Subsequently the court of its own motion ordered a reargument, and overruled its former decision, and decided that under the statute the debtor's right to be relieved from a usurious contract was absolute; that the equitable doctrine was founded upon the court's abhorrence of forfeitures; and that the legislature must have intended that the debt should be sometimes expressly provided by statute that the debtor shall be entitled to relief by paying the principal without interest.¹

Where the debtor seeks to enjoin the enforcement of usurious securities, and tenders the amount actually due, as a condition of granting the relief, judgment should be rendered for the defendant in accordance with the tender.²

As a general rule, the amount of principal and interest must be brought into court.³

The equitable rule under consideration has no application to cases where the debtor, instead of applying for affirmative relief, acts strictly on the defensive, and asserts his legal right to set up the plea of usury. In such cases he is not required to tender anything.⁴ But a defendant will not be allowed to put in an amended answer, or an answer after default, setting up usury, unless he tenders the debt and legal interest.⁵

4. Recovery of Usurious Payments.—Though there is some conflict of opinion as to whether the debtor can maintain a suit in equity to recover back voluntary payments of usury,⁶ it is clear that as defendant he is entitled to have deducted from forfeited, by the provision authorizing the debtor to recover it back from the creditor after paying it to an innocent purchaser. This decision was followed in the case of Exley v. Berryhill, 37 Minn. 182.

1. Such provisions are construed in the following cases: Spann v. Sterns, 18 Tex. 556; Walker v. Cockey, 38 Md. 75; Young v. Scott, 4 Rand. (Va.) 415; Marks v. Morris, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 463; Campbells v. Patterson, 11 Leigh (Va.) 93; Haggerson v. Phillips, 37 Wis. 364.

But notwithstanding the statute, if the debt has been paid and the debtor sues to recover back, the measure of relief is the excess above legal interest, with interest thereon. Spengler v. Snapp, 5 Leigh (Va.) 478.

2. Cook v. Patterson, 103 N. Car. 127; Eiseman v. Gallagher, 24 Neb. 79; Whately v. Barker, 79 Ga. 790; Matthews v. Warner, 6 Fed. Rep. 461; Norman v. Peper, 24 Fed. Rep. 403.

3. Cunningham v. Davis, 7 Ired. Eq. (N. Car.) 5; Muir v. Clark, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 423; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 453.

Bond in Lieu of Money.—Upon an application to enjoin the collection of a judgment on the ground of usury, the plaintiff will not be allowed to give a bond in lieu of bringing the amount of the judgment into court, as required by statute, unless he consents to waive the forfeiture and pay what is justly due. Gee v. Southworth, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 297. Where, however, the plaintiff, before the suit was brought and also in his bill, has offered to pay the amount justly due, the defendant cannot, after answering, object that the money has not been paid into court. Morgan v. Schermerhorn, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 544; 19 Am. Dec. 449.

4. Union Bank v. Bell, 14 Ohio St. 200; Gore v. Lewis, 109 N. Car. 539; Kuhner v. Butler, 11 Iowa 419.

Plea in Ejectment.—A plea in ejectment that the plaintiff's deed was part of a usurious contract is a strictly legal defense, and no tender of the debt is necessary, even though the deed amounts in equity to a mortgage. Sugart v. Mays, 54 Ga. 554.

Discovery.—A defendant who has pleaded usury need not offer to pay the debt and legal interest in order to entitle him to read the answers of the plaintiff to interrogatories taken in support of his plea. Such payment is a condition of relief, but not of discovery. Zeigler v. Scott, 10 Ga. 389; 54 Am. Dec. 395.

5. Remer v. Shaw, 8 N. J. Eq. 355; Newman v. Kershaw, 10 Wis. 333; Dole v. Northrop, 19 Wis. 249; Jones v. Walker, 22 Wis. 220. See also Bates v. Voorhess, 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 234.

the balance due on the debt, whatever usurious interest he has paid.¹

5. Enforcement of Usurious Contracts.—Where the statute does not avoid the principal debt for usury, equity will not refuse its aid to enforce payment thereof.² But if usury is disclosed by the bill, the lender must allege his willingness to abandon the usurious portion, otherwise the bill is demurrable.³ In one case, a court of equity refused to aid the lender by foreclosing a mortgage given to secure a usurious debt.⁴

XXXVIII. PLEADING—1. Requirements of Plea.—As a general rule, usury cannot be taken advantage of by the defendant in an action on the debt, unless it has been specially and clearly pleaded.⁵ The plea of usury has been said to be sui generis, and

3. Phelps v. Pierson, 1 Greene (Iowa) 121.

Offer to Abate All Interest.—In the recent case of Hawkins v. Pearson (Ala. 1892), 11 So. Rep. 304, the court, by McClellan, J., declared the following rule: "A contract which stipulates for the payment of a greater rate of interest than eight per cent. is tainted with an evil and unlawful intent, in such sort that while the payor, if he invokes equitable interposition upon it in his behalf, must do equity by offering to pay the legal rate of interest, the payee, when he becomes the actor in a court of equity, must always remove the taint by an offer to abate the whole of the interest, since the principal is all that he is entitled to recover, and without such abatement he cannot be said to come into the court with clean hands. And it is immaterial what the relief presently sought may be, whether an immediate enforcement of the debt or some collateral advantage—as, for instance, in the case at bar, the reformation of the contract in matter of description. Whether direct and ultimate, or mediate and collateral, a court of conscience will not respond to the prayer of one who stands before it in the attitude of insisting upon any relief on a claim thus infected with this element of quasi criminality. The bill in this case showing that the mortgage sought to be reformed was tainted with usury, and containing no offer to abate the whole interest, complainant was not entitled to any relief upon it, and the demurrers which were addressed to this point were properly sustained." Citing 2 Brick. Dig., p. 124; 3 Brick. Dig., p. 572; Hunt v. Acre, 28 Ala. 580; Noble v. Walker, 32 Ala. 456. See also EQUITY, vol. 6, p. 707, and notes.

Subrogation.—The plaintiff, under a usurious agreement, advanced money to the defendant to pay off a mortgage, and took a deed of the land as security. This deed being void because of the usury, the plaintiff sought to be subrogated to the rights of the former creditor, and to have the mortgage foreclosed. This the court refused to allow, on the ground that a court of equity would not lend its aid to one who was obliged to prove his own illegal contract as the basis of his claim to relief. Trible v. Nichols, 53 Ark. 271; 22 Am. St. Rep. 190.

St. Rep. 57; Martin v. Pugh, 23 Wis. 184; Bond v. Worley, 26 Mo. 253; Pilsbury v. McNally, 22 Ark. 409.

Necessity of Special Plea.—Where commissions paid to a factor are set up in a plea of usury, it must be averred that the parties intended such commissions as a premium for advances, beyond legal interest. Suydam v. Bartle, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 94. And if the usury has been paid to the lender's agent, it should be pleaded as having been paid to the lender. Jones v. Herndon, 7 Ired. (N. Car.) 79.

Defective Pleas.—The following allegations in pleas of usury have been held insufficient:

A plea that the payee of the note sued on exacted from the maker "illegal and usurious interest for the loan and forbearance of the moneys mentioned in the note." Watson v. Bailey, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 509.

In an action against an indorser, that the "plaintiff reserved a greater rate of interest than is allowed by law, at the time of discounting said note for the defendant, to-wit," a certain sum. Clarke v. Hastings, 9 Gray (Mass.) 64.

That the plaintiff in an action on a note "unlawfully, corruptly, and usuriously" contracted with the defendant, the maker, where no facts are averred, showing of what the usury consisted. Durham v. Tucker, 40 Ill. 519.

That the plaintiff "usuriously took" a certain per cent. premium. Mullanphy v. Phillipson, 1 Mo. 188.

That the bond sued on "was given in payment of usurious interest by a contract for the payment of the same." Anglo-American Land, etc., Co. v. Brohman, 33 Neb. 409.

That "the bond was executed by this defendant to the said R. H. Rountree for an illegal and usurious consideration." Rountree v. Brinson, 98 N. Car. 107.

A plea that the plaintiff loaned the defendant a certain sum of money and "exacted and extorted" a bond and mortgage for a larger sum, is insufficient, in that it negatives the idea of consent to the exaction, and without a contract there can be no usury. Westerfield v. Bried, 26 N. J. Eq. 357.

Plea in Bar.—Where the statute does not render a usurious note void, but only affects the interest, a plea in bar setting up the usury is bad, being too broad. Lockwood v. Woods, 3 Ind. App. 258.

Where usury is a defense only as to the illegal excess, a plea in an action on a debt which professes to answer the whole cause of action, is demurrable. Tittle v. Bonner, 53 Miss. 578.

Where the effect of the statute is to prevent only the collection of the excess over legal interest, usury is only a partial defense, and if pleaded as a complete defense to the action, the answer cannot stand as a partial defense. McDaniel v. Pressler, 3 Wash. 636.

Verification.—An affidavit to a plea of usury upon belief merely, is insufficient under a statute requiring the defendant to "verify the truth" of his plea. Kingsland v. Cowman, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 608.

But an averment by the borrower, in a bill for relief, of facts in relation to usury, made upon information and belief, was held sufficient, it being further alleged that the information was derived from the lender. Cole v. Savage, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 361.

Verification of Joint Plea.—Under Texas Rev. Stat., art. 2981, requiring a plea of usury to be verified "by the affidavit of the party wishing to avail himself of such defense," a plea set up by several defendants, but verified only by one who refuses to join in it, or to avail himself of it, cannot be used by the others. Cherryhomes v. Carter, 66 Tex. 166.

Amendment.—It is proper to allow a plea held bad on demurrer to be amended upon reasonable terms. Williams v. Little, 11 N. H. 66.

Objection, How Raised.—The objection to a plea on a note alleged by the defendant to be the last of a series of usurious renewals, that the plea does not give the dates of the various renewals or of the payments of usury, should be raised by motion to make more specific, and not by demurrer. Holcraft v. Mellett, 57 Ind. 539.

Sufficient Plea.—A plea is sufficiently specific which states the sum actually borrowed, the date when the usury commenced, the various computations of excessive interest, and the payments made. Smith v. Stevens (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 986.

In an action on a note of $500 due in three months, a plea is sufficient which alleges that the plaintiff bank discounted the note upon a corrupt agreement that the defendant should receive $300 and leave the remaining $200 in the bank until maturity, to be then used toward paying the note. Butterworth v. Pecare, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 671.

A plea is not bad for failing to aver the rate of interest agreed upon, where it states the amount of the original to resemble a declaration in an action for the statutory penalty, more than an ordinary plea in bar.¹ The principle adopted by nearly all the courts is that the plea must aver with distinctness and particularity all the essential elements of the usurious contract, so that an inspection of the plea will reveal the entire transaction, and leave nothing to conjecture.² The plea should state the date and amount of the original loan, and the amount of usury paid or reserved.³ It must also allege that the excessive interest was taken or reserved with a corrupt or usurious intent,⁴ and upon notes, and the date and amount of the renewal note, from which it can be ascertained that the latter is for more than the originals with the highest legal interest added. First Nat. Bank v. Waybourn (Tex. 1891), 16 S. W. Rep. 554.

A plea that the plaintiff deducted from the amount loaned and expressed in the note sued on, as usurious interest, "about enough, as he said, to get him a barrel of flour, which amount the defendant believes was about seven or eight dollars," sufficiently set forth the usury, though not with commendable precision. Dagal v. Simmons, 23 N. Y. 491.

Though a plea of usury does not conform to the statute requiring it to "set forth the sum upon which it was paid, or to be paid, the time when the contract was made, where payable, and the amount of usury agreed upon," yet if it states the agreed rate, and that usury in the contract exceeds the amount claimed to be due, it is sufficient in the absence of demurrer or exception. Siesel v. Harris, 48 Ga. 652.

Where by statute all titles are declared void for usury, a plea of usury in a deed relied on for title, need not specify dates or amounts with the same particularity as is required in similar pleas to actions on the debt. Carswell v. Hartridge, 55 Ga. 412.

Replication.—A replication to a plea of usury must, of course, put in issue all its material allegations, but need not go further, or offer explanations. Wright v. Minter, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 453; Darling v. Homer, 16 Mass. 288; Copeland v. Jones, 3 N. H. 116; Tappan v. Sargeant, 14 N. H. 299; Waterman v. Haskin, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 283; 1. Copeland v. Jones, 3 N. H. 116; Williams v. Little, 11 N. H. 66.

The plea is in the nature of a penal action, and much strictness is required in pleading it. Hancock v. Hodgson, 4 Ill. 333.

Jefferson*, 75 Ga. 743; Kilpatrick v. Henson, 81 Ala. 464.

The plea must negative every supposable fact in connection with the transaction, which if true would render it innocent. Thus, a plea that a note was ante-dated, must allege that the loan was not closed, or the money set aside for the benefit of the borrower, from such earlier date. Banks v. Van Antwerp, 5 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 411.

In Georgia, it is required by statute that the plea of usury shall state the sum upon which the usury was paid or to be paid, the time when the contract was entered into, when payable, and the amount of usury taken or agreed upon. See Trammell v. Woolfolk, 68 Ga. 628.

4. National Bank v. Lewis, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 468; Crane v. Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co., 27 N. J. Eq. 484; Cohee v. Cooper, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 115;

a corrupt agreement.¹ But if the plea clearly shows that unlawful interest was agreed upon, it is not bad for failing to designate the transaction as "usurious."² On the other hand, if the facts pleaded do not amount to usury, no averment that the transaction was usurious can make the plea good.³ The courts also hold that the evidence in support of the plea must agree strictly with the allegations, and any substantial variance is fatal.⁴ This is particularly true of allegations in respect to the amount of usury taken or received,⁵ the time of forbearance,⁶ and the parties to the alleged usurious agreement.⁷ Keeping in view the necessity of pleading all the essential elements of the usurious contract, it may be stated that the usual rules for the construction of pleadings apply as well to a plea or answer of usury as to one setting up any other defense,⁸ and that although the pleading may be lacking in precision and certainty, it is sufficient if it be not misleading as to the defense intended, or as to the facts and circumstances relied upon to support it.⁹

Some courts, however, hold that where the effect of usury is

2. Kurz v. Halbrook, 13 Iowa 562; Fanning v. Pritchett, 6 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 79.

In an action to recover the agreed price of a sale, under a general averment of usury, the defendant cannot show that the sale was intended by the parties as a mere cover for a usurious loan. Holford v. Blatchford, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 149. See generally VARIANCE, vol. 28.

5. Smith v. Brush, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 84; Rowe v. Phillips, 2 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 14; Kilpatrick v. Henson, 81 Ala. 464.

Under a plea that the plaintiff dis- counted the notes in suit at from ten to fourteen per cent., evidence tending to prove that they were discounted at the rate of sixteen per cent., is a fatal variance. Farmers' etc., Bank v. Lang, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 372.

So of a plea that $150 usury was paid where the evidence showed that only $125 had been paid. Frank v. Morris, 57 Ill. 138; 11 Am. Rep. 4.

But a slight variance as to the amount is not fatal unless it appears that the plaintiff was misled. Katz v. Kuhn, 9 Daly (N. Y.) 166.

6. Allen v. Ferguson, 6 Ired. (N. Car.) 17, where a variance of one day in favor of the creditor was held fatal.

7. Jones v. Canady, 4 Dev. (N. Car.) 86.

A plea of usury in that the note sued on was given for an extension of time on another note of the maker held by a third party, must be supported by proof that the person who procured the execution of the note in suit was the agent of the payee of the other note referred to. First Nat. Bank v. Bonawitz, 47 Iowa 322.

In an action on a note, the defendants pleaded that it was given for accommodation, and that the plaintiff discounted it at a usurious rate. It was held that usury between the original parties to the note could not be shown under the plea. Taylor v. Jackson, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 497.

to render the contract void, a plea of the general issue in an action, either directly on the contract or necessarily depending upon its validity, entitles the defendant to avail himself of the defense of usury.¹

The rules applicable to defensive pleadings also apply to declarations or complaints in actions to recover back usury; and particularly the rule requiring a statement of the amount paid.²

2. Demurrer.—If the usury clearly appears on the face of the declaration or complaint, the defense may be raised by demurrer or exception.³

3. In Equity.—Unless the bill itself clearly shows a usurious contract, the defense of usury must, as a general rule, be specifically pleaded in the answer.⁴ But in some cases, as in a creditor's bill involving the priority of liens, the defense may be made by

General Issue.—In Solomons v. Jones, 3 Brev. (S. Car.) 54; 5 Am. Dec. 538, Brevard, J., said: "Usury is clearly admissible in evidence under the plea of the general issue. The effect of such evidence is to prove that the promise was not obligatory, but void in its origin; and that there never was any such legal undertaking as that which the plaintiffs claim to recover on."

In an action of replevin, by a chattel mortgagee to recover possession of the goods, alleging title and ownership in general terms, the defendant may show, under a general denial, that the mortgage debt was void for usury. Adamson v. Wiggins, 45 Minn. 448. In this case, it was said by Vanderburgh, J., "Where the action is brought to set aside an instrument as usurious, of course the facts must be specifically alleged, and so, in an action brought to recover upon or to enforce a contract claimed by defendant to be void for usury, such affirmative defense is new matter in confession and avoidance, which must be affirmatively alleged in the answer. But where, as in this case, the plaintiff alleges title generally to the property in question, the defendant may deny generally the allegations of title and ownership, and, under such denial, he may attack the contract or instrument upon which plaintiff relies to prove his title, and show that it is void for usury, as well as for fraud. And there is no distinction in such cases between the defense of usury and other defenses which tend to disprove the plaintiff's case, and show that he had no title."

In Trover.—In an action of trover for property claimed by the plaintiff under a bill of sale from a third person, but which bill is not set out, the defendant, without filing a plea of usury, may show that the bill of sale was given as security for a usurious debt, and therefore, under the Georgia law, insufficient to give the plaintiff any title. Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 81.

In ejectment, the defendant may avail himself of usury to defeat the plaintiff's claim of title under a mortgage, without having given notice of such defense. Halton v. Button, 4 Conn. 437.

In Real Actions.—Under a plea of nil disseisin, a defendant may show usury to defeat a prior conveyance from his grantor. Hills v. Eliot, 12 Mass. 26; 7 Am. Dec. 26.

written exceptions to a commissioner's report, though not specially pleaded.¹

Usury is not regarded as an equitable defense, and therefore courts of equity are not disposed to allow an amendment for the purpose of interposing it,² nor to extend the time of answering.³

When permission is granted to amend or to have a default opened for the purpose of such a plea, the defendant is required to pay the amount justly due.⁴ A lack of certainty or precision in stating the defense, however, cannot be objected to after issue has been joined.⁵ And where the evidence does not strictly conform to the answer, the defendant will be allowed the benefit of an amendment.⁶

When the debtor brings a bill in equity for relief, he must put the question of usury clearly and directly in issue,⁷ the same particularity being required as in defensive pleadings.⁸

XXXIX. EVIDENCE—1. Burden and Degree of Proof.—The burden of proving usury is always upon the party who alleges it,⁹ and it must be established by a strong and clear preponderance of evidence.¹⁰ If, upon the whole case, the evidence is as consistent with the absence as with the presence of usury, the party alleging

Where a bill in equity discloses a usurious mortgage, the defense may be raised by exceptions to the master's report allowing interest at the usurious rate, though not put in issue by the pleadings. Drake v. Latham, 50 Ill. 270.

On scire facias to revive a decree, the defendant may plead usury in the original contract. Lane v. Ellzey, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 504.

It is proper to allow the defense to be pleaded at any time before final decree, especially where the bill itself suggests the truth of the plea. Ellzey v. Lane, 4 Munf. (Va.) 66.

8. In Cole v. Savage, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 361, which was a bill for relief on the ground of usury, the vice chancellor said: "In Vroom v. Dittmas, 4 Paige (N. Y.) 533, the chancellor says that the defense of usury must be distinctly set up in the plea or answer; and the terms of the usurious contract and the quantum of the usurious interest or premium must be specified and distinctly and correctly set out. The corrupt agreement must also be stated. The chancellor is here speaking of a defense; but I can see no good reason, either in principle or common sense, why the same governing principles will not apply to any pleading which relies upon usury as its substance."

9. Berdan v. School Dist. No. 38, 47 N. J. Eq. 8; Kihlholz v. Wolf, 103 Ill. 362; Rappanier v. Bannon (Md. 1887), 8 Atl. Rep. 555.

In Smith v. Lehman, 85 Ala. 394. Stone, C. J., said: "When parties enter into a contract which, on its face, contains no stipulation which is per se or prima facie illegal, and only becomes so by the existence of certain extrinsic facts, the court must, in the absence of extrinsic proof, pronounce the contract legal, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat. The burden of making the extrinsic proof must rest on him who assails the validity of such contract. Usury is a defense, and must be satisfactorily proved when set up."

10. Bayliss v. Cockcroft, 81 N. Y. 363.

Answer in Equity.—Evidence in sup-

it has failed in his proof.¹ The courts will never infer usury if the opposite conclusion can reasonably and fairly be arrived at.² It has been held that the plea of usury must fail where the only evidence is the testimony of the borrower and the lender, who squarely contradict each other.³

It has sometimes been said that usury must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but what is meant is that there must be a clear and unmistakable preponderance of evidence in support of the plea, and not that the same degree of strictness is required as in criminal cases.⁴

2. Presumptions.—The payment and acceptance of unlawful interest is prima facie evidence of a prior agreement therefor.⁵ But evidence of previous usurious transactions between the parties port of a defense of usury is not aided by the defendant's answer, unless he is called upon by the bill to disclose. McDaniels v. Barnum, 5 Vt. 279; Barnum v. McDaniels, 6 Vt. 177.

1. Booth v. Swezey, 8 N. Y. 276; Valentine v. Connor, 40 N. Y. 248; 100 Am. Dec. 476; In re Consalus, 95 N. Y. 340; Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 100; Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473.

2. Homeopathic Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 25 N. J. Eq. 422; Gillette v. Ballard, 25 N. J. Eq. 491; Lujette v. Wilson, 13 Oregon 514; Holladay v. Holladay, 13 Oregon 523; Van Beil v. Fordney, 79 Ala. 76.

Sufficiency of Evidence.—Usury is not proved by showing that an agreement for a usurious bonus was made, but which appears never to have been carried out or insisted upon. Brestle v. Mehaffie, 19 Pa. St. 117. Nor is it proved by showing that the face of the note sued on is larger than the sum received by the maker, without any explanation of the circumstance. New England, etc., Security Co. v. Sanford, 16 Neb. 689.

In Brolasky v. Miller, 8 N. J. Eq. 790, Potts, J., said: "Usury must be strictly proved. It is not sufficient for the party who sets it up to make out a probable case. We cannot undertake to guess away men's rights upon vague or doubtful testimony." And in Berdan v. School Dist. No. 38, 47 N. J. Eq. 8, McGill, Ch., in delivering the opinion of the Court of Chancery, stated the rule as follows: "The burden of proof is upon the parties setting up usury. The facts necessary to constitute it must be clearly established, beyond reasonable doubt, by the decided preponderance of evidence. It is not enough that the circumstances proved render it highly probable that there was a corrupt bargain. Such a bargain must be proved, and not left to conjecture."

In Lukens v. Hazlett, 37 Minn. 441, Mitchell, J., said: "The rule of evidence in these usury cases is the same as in any other civil action. All that is required is a fair preponderance of evidence."

The proof must be "clear and cogent, not by inferences, probabilities, or conjectures." Pappleton v. Nelson, 12 Oregon 349.

It must exclude every other fair and reasonable hypothesis. Gillette v. Ballard, 25 N. J. Eq. 491.

5. Cummins v. Wire, 6 N. J. Eq. 326.

Presumptions.—The payment of usurious interest from time to time, in accordance with a common course of dealing between the parties, but without express agreement, authorizes the jury to find that there was a prior tacit agreement for such interest. Quarles v. Brannon, 5 Strobb. (S. Car.) 151. And it will be inferred that usurious interest was reserved in the contract, when it is shown that such interest was demanded by the creditor and paid by the debtor. Stout v. Wright, 6 Litt. (Ky.) 481.

Evidence that when the debt became due the creditor demanded and received from the debtor usurious interest, and is not admissible to prove that the contract in question was also usurious.¹ Nor can the defense be made out by evidence that the plaintiff had taken usury in other loans at or about the time of the loan in question.² Where it is not shown that the contract in suit was made at a time when the rate of interest stipulated for was illegal, it will be presumed to have been made at a time when the statute authorized such rate.³

3. Parol Evidence—The rule that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract, has no application to evidence of usury. The statute would be a dead letter if its penalties could be evaded by simply omitting the usurious agreement from the written part of the contract.⁴

4. Parties as Witnesses.—The common-law disability of interested parties to testify was largely removed as to usury in several of the states at an early day; but the tendency of the courts has been to interpret such statutes somewhat strictly.⁵

XL. PROVINCE OF JURY.—The question whether a transaction apparently valid was actually intended by the parties as a cover for usury, is, in all cases of doubt or conflict of evidence, a question gave a receipt therefor as being money "due" on the contract, establishes an original usurious agreement. Smith v. Hathorn, 88 N. Y. 211, reversing 25 Hun (N. Y.) 159.

1. Eagle Bank v. Rigney, 33 N. Y. 613; Brinckerhoff v. Foote, 1 Hoffm. Ch. (N. Y.) 291.

Proof that the plaintiff had agreed to loan money to the defendant at five per cent. per month, does not tend to prove that the draft in suit, which was subsequently drawn, was drawn in pursuance of such agreement. Warren v. Coombs, 20 Me. 139.

2. Ottillie v. Waechter, 33 Wis. 255.
3. Hughes v. Marquette, 85 Tenn. 127.

Where deeds absolute are held to be a mortgage, the courts, in cases where the consequence of usury is the forfeiture of both debt and interest, will, in the absence of clear and satisfactory proof to the contrary, presume that a legal rate of interest was reserved. Vangilder v. Hoffman, 22 W. Va. 2.

4. Massa v. Dauling, 2 Str. 1243; Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. (U. S.) 418; Tucker v. Wilamouicz, 8 Ark. 157; Levy v. Brown, 11 Ark. 16; Train v. Collins, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 145; Smith v. Stevens 81 Tex. 461; Wilkinson v. Wooten, 59 Ga. 584; Denyse v. Crawford, 18 N. J. L. 325; Lear v. Yarnel, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 419; Grayson v. Brooks, 64 Miss. 410; Luckett v. Henderson, 12 Smed. & M. (Miss.) 334.

Parol Evidence.—In an early Massachusetts case, it was held that an absolute conveyance of land could not be shown by parol to have been intended as security for a debt drawing usurious interest. Flint v. Sheldon, 13 Mass. 443; 7 Am. Dec. 162.

In Butterfield v. Kidder, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 512, it was held that a verbal promise to pay unlawful interest on a contemporaneous note, expressed for the sum lent and lawful interest, "ought not to vitiate the note, for it was wholly without consideration, and cannot be taken as part of the contract, which was in writing, and must be considered as evidence of the intention of the parties."

In Bowers v. Douglass, 2 Head (Tenn.) 376, it was held that an oral contract made by one partner to pay usurious interest upon a note executed by him at the same time in the name of the partnership, could not be shown to defeat the note.

These cases are not in harmony with the great majority of the authorities, and it may be doubted whether they ought now to be recognized as sound. They certainly leave the door wide open for the usurer to escape from the consequences of the statute.

5. See Goodwin v. Appleton, 22 Me. 453; Myrick v. Hasey, 27 Me. 9; 46 Am. Dec. 583; Frye v. Barker, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 65; Knights v. Putnam, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 171; Little v. Rogers, of fact for the jury.¹ And their finding will not be reviewed on appeal, even though the evidence to support the verdict appears vague, indefinite, and unsatisfactory.²

XII. TRANSACTIONS HELD USURIOUS.—A number of cases not capable of classification elsewhere, which have been held to be within the usury laws, are given in the note.³

2. Valker v. First Nat. Bank, 26 Neb. 602; Klosterman v. Olcott, 25 Neb. 382.

Disturbing Verdict.—Where the jury has found that a renewal note included usurious interest, their verdict will not be disturbed on appeal, though the evidence in support of it is not very strong or convincing, and though the alleged excess is quite small. Mitchell, J., dissenting. Cowles v. Canfield, 49 Minn. 496.

The defendant delivered to the plaintiff five notes of $100 each, at ninety days, for which the plaintiff gave him $400. At the maturity of the notes, the defendant gave the plaintiff in lieu of them, and without additional consideration, other notes for $625. Similar renewal notes were made at short intervals, until the amount represented by the last notes was $875. In an action on these notes, it was held that a charge to the jury which assumed the possibility of a fair transaction was erroneous, and that a verdict for the plaintiff could not stand. Lawrence v. Griffin, 30 Tex. 400.

3. Stipulating for more than current premium on gold. Austin v. Walker, 45 Iowa 527.

An agreement to pay on a loan of currency one-half of one per cent. per month in currency and seven per cent. per annum in gold, the latter being at a premium of thirty-nine and one-half. Tyng v. Commercial Warehouse Co., 58 N. Y. 308.

A loan by a bank at the highest rate of interest allowed by its charter, on condition that the borrower would secure it by first a mortgage on land, and further that he would execute a second mortgage to secure a debt due to the bank by a third person. New Orleans Canal, etc., Co. v. Hagan, 1 La. Ann. 62.

An agreement by the borrower to pay the debt of another, in addition to legal interest and the principal sum loaned. Brown v. Baer, 79 Ga. 347.

An agreement in consideration of £800 in cash to pay a debt of £1,200 due to a third person in three years. Watkins v. Taylor, 2 Munf. (Va.) 234.

Setting off a debt against a claim of illegal interest. Dean v. Herrick, 54 Vt. 573.

But the mere fact that a loan is made conditional upon the execution of some other and contemporaneous contract between the lender and the borrower, does not necessarily infect the loan with usury. The test is the nature of such contract, the advantages or disadvantages to the respective parties, and all the attendant circumstances and objects. Clarke v. Sheehan, 47 N. Y. 188.

Taking in settlement of a debt, besides legal interest, drafts at par which the creditor knew were at a premium in the market. Seneca Co. Bank v. Schermerhorn, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 133.

Giving a usurious note and mortgage to a third person, by whom they are immediately assigned without consideration to the lender. Transaction cannot be saved by such device. Johnson v. Smith, 39 Iowa 549.

An agreement that A, who had been compelled to pay usury on borrowed money by reason of B's failure to pay a debt which he owed A, might retain out of certain of B's rents, as they became due, a sufficient amount to reimburse him for the excessive interest so paid. White v. Ault, 19 Ga. 551.

Stipulation made at the time of mortgage loan that the lender shall be allowed to retain a part of the land mortgaged after being repaid the principal and legal interest. Gleason v. Burke, 20 N. J. Eq. 300.

The exaction by the lender from his borrower of the same illegal rate which the former has agreed to pay to a third person. Dowell v. Vannoy, 3 Dev. (N. Car.) 43.

An agreement by the borrower, who had loaned the money to others at usurious interest, to pay his lender the same rate. Levy v. Gadsby, 3 Cranch (U. S.) 180.

The defendant, at the request of the plaintiff and for his benefit, borrowed money and lent it to the plaintiff, who agreed to pay the defendant therefor the same rate of interest that the latter had agreed to pay, and an additional two per cent. for his credit and incidental expenses. The court held that while there was nothing usurious in the agreement for the two per cent., yet, if the defendant might, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have borrowed the money at legal rates, but in fact did borrow it at unlawful rates, it was usury for him to exact such rates from the plaintiff. Ricker v. Clark, 54 Vt. 289.

The certificates of deposit, payable at a future day, with interest at four and one-half per cent., payable semi-annually, were issued as consideration for a mortgage of the same amount, bearing interest at the highest legal rate. It was held to be usury. New York L. Ins., etc., Co. v. Beebe, 7 N. Y. 364.

Where A gave B his note and a mortgage for a certain amount payable in one year without interest, for which B gave A his note for the same amount due in six months without interest, which latter note A raised money on, it was held to be usury for B to exact a compensation greater than legal interest for the six months following the maturity of his own note. Williams v. Fowler, 22 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 4.

A applied to B for a loan, but B said he had no money, but thought perhaps he could get some from his son-in-law, who, he said, would want seven per cent. above legal interest. A made out a note for the amount wanted and left it with B, under an agreement to return it if B failed to get the money. B then borrowed the amount from his son-in-law, giving his own note therefor, which he afterward paid, and delivered to A the amount of A's note, after deducting the premium agreed upon, and kept A's note in his own hands. It was held that B must be deemed the lender, and the note usurious. Reed v. Smith, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 647.

The defendant agreed to pay orders issued by the plaintiff out of money deposited with him, for a compensation of one-fourth of one per cent.; for payments made when no funds therefor were on deposit, one-half of one per cent., if the amount so paid should be made good the following day; and if not so made good, then one and one-half per cent. per month. It was held that the last provision was for a rate of interest for the use of money greater than eight per cent., and therefore was usurious. Burwell v. Burgwyn, 100 N. Car. 389.

A sold his land, which was then mortgaged to D, to B and C, and the purchase price, consisting in part of cash and in part of notes payable to D in ten years with legal interest, was given to D in payment of his mortgage. It was held that it was usury for D to charge A, in settlement, with one per cent. interest on the notes of B and C. Hawkins v. National L. Ins. Co., 57 Vt. 591.

A debt being due, the debtor, by agreement, indorsed and delivered to the creditor notes not due against third parties, in payment of the debt, at a discount of four per cent. per month for the period the notes had to run, and also, by the same agreement, procured another indorser on the notes. It was held that the transaction was usurious, and that the second indorser could take advantage of it. Campbell v. Read, Mart. & Y. (Tenn.) 392.

The plaintiff had taken a mortgage for $700 at the highest legal rate of interest, but the evidence showed that his draft to the defendant, the mortgagor, given at the time of making the loan, was for but $680, and the defendant testified that that was all he had ever received. It was held that the loan was usurious, notwithstanding the plaintiff swore that he subsequently sent the defendant the remaining $20, but produced no vouchers. Lombard v. Gregory, 81 Iowa 569.

Interest Disguised as Wages.—Where a loan is made on condition that the lender shall be given an official position in the borrower's employ, where he is not needed and where there is practically nothing to do, and is paid a very large salary. See Griffin v. New Jersey Oil Co., 11 N. J. Eq. 49.

But an agreement, by which a person was to take the office of treasurer of a corporation, and advance money for it, in consideration of $300 per year as salary and twelve per cent. on advances, is void only as to the interest. Waite v. Windham Co. Min. Co., 37 Vt. 608.

An agreement by the borrower to allow the lender a salary as a clerk in his brewery, which would yield him more than legal interest on his money,

XLII. TRANSACTIONS HELD NOT USURIOUS.—In the instances specified in the following note, the statutes of usury have been held not to be infringed.¹

it not being intended that he should perform any services, was admitted to be corrupt and illegal, in Wright v. Wheeler, 1 Camp. 165.

So where the borrower appointed the lender receiver of his rents, with a pretended salary, which appointment was in fact only used as a means of paying him exorbitant interest. Scott v. Brest, 2 Tenn. 238.

1. It is not usury for a borrower, in consideration of a further loan, to agree to pay the principal and legal interest of a valid preëxisting debt. Marsh v. Howe, 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 649. Nor is a loan rendered usurious because, in violation of its terms, the lender withholds a portion of the amount agreed to be advanced. Auble v. Trimmer, 17 N. J. Eq. 242.

On a loan of $2,800, a mortgage was given for $3,000, and it was provided that interest on the sum loaned should be added until it increased the principal to $3,000, and that then interest should begin to run on the last mentioned sum. It was held not usurious. Mount v. Suydam, 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 399.

A bond given in 1782, conditioned for the payment of £1,000, "or such further sum as shall be equal to the said £1,000 in 1774, that is to say, to purchase as much land, and as many negroes, as it might have done at that time," is not on its face usurious. Faulcon v. Harriß, 2 Hen. & M. (Va.) 550.

A mortgage was given to secure a preëxisting debt, and also to secure the mortgagee for a note he had signed for the mortgagor's accommodation. A discount exceeding legal interest was allowed when the mortgagee paid the latter note. It was held that a mortgage subsequently given to secure the amount then due on the first mortgage, with further advances, was valid. Staley v. Kneeland, Clarke Ch. (N. Y.) 30.

A provision in a bond that "the lawful interest on the whole principal sum shall be paid annually, together with one-third of the said principal sum at the end of each year, until the whole is paid off," is not usurious, as the agreement contemplates only the interest each year on the amount of principal remaining unpaid. Gibbs v.

Chisholm, 2 Nott. & M. (S. Car.) 38; 10 Am. Dec. 560.

On a loan of $3,000, a promise to give the lender during the period of the loan all future dividends on certain bank stock of the nominal value of $3,000, is not usurious, where the average dividends up to that time had been seven per cent. per annum, and there was no evidence of intent to evade the statute. Potter v. Yale College, 8 Conn. 52.

A lessor agreed with his lessee that if the latter would build houses on the leased premises within a certain time, he should receive a conveyance of a tract of land in fee. The houses not being finished in time, the lessee, in consideration of further time, released his claim to the fee. It was held that there was no usury in the release. Rust v. Chisolm, 57 Md. 376.

One Hollenback gave his note to the plaintiff for $275, and also executed a deed of certain land for an expressed consideration of $200, in connection with which the plaintiff executed an agreement to reconvey on payment of the note at maturity and the taxes. The plaintiff also indorsed upon the agreement the following: "I hereby agree to receive payment on the within bond as follows: at thirty-seven and one-half per cent. on $200, from the date of the above bond to the date of payment." Usury being interposed as a defense, the court, by Beck, J., said: "The only evidence upon this branch of the case is this: The deed executed by Hollenback to plaintiff names the consideration at $200, and the indorsement upon the agreement provides that it may be paid at any time, with thirty-seven and one-half per cent. interest. There is not one word more of testimony upon the question of usury. No presumption is raised, no inference can be drawn, contradicting the face of the note, from the fact that the deed recites its consideration to be $200. An additional consideration may have existed, and may have been included in the note. The indorsement on the note has no force to establish usury. It binds plaintiff to receive, at any time, payment of the note, with thirty-seven and one-half per centum on $200. This appears somewhat as though the $200 may have been the original contract. But it is consistent with other suppositions. We are not authorized to find upon this evidence that the contract was usurious. Surely, if there is usury in the transaction, the defendants would have shown it by the parties to the contract, both of whom were witnesses on the trial. We cannot, upon the extremely meager and uncertain evidence offered to us, find the existence of usury, when it was in the power of the defendants to give us clear and convincing testimony upon the question. It will be observed that the indorsement upon the agreement of plaintiff does not bind Hollenback to pay the interest named; plaintiff simply agrees to accept it." Brush v. Peterson, 54 Iowa 243.

Reimbursement of Surety.—An insolvent bank held a judgment against A, drawing twelve per cent. interest, upon which B was liable as surety. B had a deposit in the bank, for which a third person had offered to allow him in trade its face value. B agreed with A to pay the judgment by permitting the bank to charge the amount thereof against B's deposit, and A agreed to repay him the full amount so charged, with six per cent. interest. The insolvent bank never paid but about sixty per cent. on the dollar of its indebtedness. It was held that there was no usury in the agreement between A and B. Southall v. Farish, 85 Va. 403.

Loan to Pay Usurious Debt.—A note or bond given to a third person who, at the debtor's request, advanced money to pay the latter's usurious debt, is not affected by such usury. Cottrell v. Southwick, 71 Iowa 50; Vaught v. Rider, 83 Va. 659; 5 Am. St. Rep. 305. And it makes no difference that the person advancing the money knew that the debt was usurious. Coffman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. (Va.) 698; Drake v. Chandler, 18 Gratt. (Va.) 909.

Payments to Third Person.—Unauthorized payments of excessive interest were made by a mortgagor to the husband of the mortgagee for the purpose of obtaining his consent to extensions of time, but the mortgagee was not shown to be a party to the transaction, and did not receive any part of such payments. It was held that this was not usury. Mahoney v. Mackubin, 54 Md. 268.

Payment by Third Person.—An agreement by a third person to pay extra interest, in consideration of the creditor's giving the debtor an extension of time, does not render the contract usurious, where the debtor is not a party to such agreement. Gleason v. Childs, 52 Vt. 421.

Where A agreed to buy B's farm for $2,500, if he could borrow the money, and the lender asked $30 in excess of legal interest, which A refused to pay, whereupon B agreed to pay the lender the $30, and a note and mortgage were given for $2,500, and A paid B $2,470 for his deed, it was held that the transaction was free from usury. McArthur v. Schenck, 31 Wis. 673; 11 Am. Rep. 643.

Use of Collaterals by Creditor.—The fact that collaterals, given to secure a note, are converted into cash by the creditor prior to the maturity of the note, and the proceeds retained and used by him during the interval, does not make the note usurious, unless such use was agreed upon by the parties when the note was given. Morgan v. Mechanics' Banking Assoc., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 584.

Indemnifying Creditor from Loss.—A owed B $100,000, and in consideration of forbearance agreed to continue to pay interest thereon, and also to give B his notes for $40,000, to be disposed of by B for his own use at such discount as he should see fit, such notes to be taken up by B at maturity, and new ones given by A, to be disposed of in the same way; also, to pay B all sums in excess of legal interest, which B might be obliged to allow in disposing of them. It was held that this agreement was not usurious, in the absence of evidence of an intention to evade the statute. Kimball v. Boston Athenæum, 3 Gray (Mass.) 225. To the same effect, see Stevens v. Davis, 3 Met. (Mass.) 211.

So where a debtor, being unable to raise the money with which to pay his creditor, directed the latter to raise it elsewhere, promising to pay him whatever rate of interest he might be obliged to pay, and thereupon the creditor borrowed the money at usurious rates, it was held that he was acting merely as the agent of his debtor, and could recover of him the full amount of interest paid. Shirley v. Spencer, 9 Ill. 583.

Assumption of Another's Debt.—A loan is not rendered usurious per se by reason of the fact that the lender exacted, as a condition of making the loan, that the borrower should secure to the lender the payment of a subsisting and genuine debt due the lender from a third person. Valentine v. Conner, 40 N. Y. 248; 100 Am. Dec. 476.

Payment of Unearned Fees.—To avoid having an execution put into the hands of an officer, the debtor gave the creditor a note for the amount of the judgment and costs, and also a note for a further sum equal to the fees which would have been charged by the officer for collecting the execution. But it was at the same time agreed in substance that, if the debtor would pay the note within a certain time, the creditor would receive in full payment the amount of the judgment without interest or the officer's fees. It was held not usurious. Cutler v. How, 8 Mass. 257.

Testimony of Lender.—In an action to foreclose a mortgage, there was evidence that one Van Winkle agreed to loan $1,500 to a school district for the purpose of erecting a schoolhouse, and that he paid out the money at intervals as the building progressed. The mortgage was made out for $1,650 to one Baxter as mortgagee, by whom it was afterward assigned to Van Winkle. He denied any knowledge of the fact that the mortgage was for more than the sum loaned until after it was assigned to him, and he testified that Baxter told him the additional $150 was to be used by the school trustees to buy furniture; that he thereupon paid Baxter, who was then school clerk, the $150 less the amount of accrued interest on the $1,500. It did not appear that Baxter had authority to receive the money, or that it was ever put into the school treasury. Subsequently Van Winkle accepted payment of interest for the same period covered by the interest claimed to have been previously deducted, and did not disclose the transaction with Baxter. One of the school trustees swore that the $150 was a bonus agreed upon, at the time of the loan, between the trustees, Van Winkle and Baxter. On this state of facts, McGill, Ch., held that usury was not sufficiently proved, saying: "The evidence raises in my mind a strong suspicion that Van Winkle entered into a corrupt, usurious agreement with the defendant, but it is not sufficiently convincing to overcome Van Winkle's positive oath to the contrary." Berdan v. Trustees School Dist. No. 38, 47 N. J. Eq. 8.

Interest on Overdrafts.—An agreement between a bank and its depositor to charge the latter, at the end of each month, with interest for the month on the amount of his overdrafts, and include such charge as a part of the overdraft, does not constitute usury, even though the overdraft may not have existed during the whole month for which the interest is charged, where the arrangement is made bona fide for the purpose of avoiding involved calculations. Timberlake v. First Nat. Bank, 43 Fed. Rep. 231.

A note given by a depositor to his bank, for, as he supposed, the amount of his overdraft, at the highest legal rate of interest, is not rendered usurious by the fact that without his knowledge the bank had charged him with interest on the overdrafts at the rate of one per cent. per month, and included it in the amount of the note. There was no contract made to pay the usurious interest. First Nat. Bank v. Moore, 83 Iowa 740.

Custom of Merchants.—A custom among merchants of taking a commission above the legal rate of interest on the exchange or discount of notes, does not remove the illegality of such transactions. Dunham v. Gould, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 367; 8 Am. Dec. 323; Ex p. Aynsworth, 4 Ves. 678.
